TO THE READER.

AS I intend, when these Annotations are compleated, to prefix a Dissertation on the genius and antiquity of the Hebrew language, and shall likewise examine the different computations of time, in the Hebrew, Samaritan, and Septuagint copies; with such other particulars as may be judged necessary and instructive; I shall therefore, at present, only collect some observations relating to Moses the great law-giver of the Jews, and the sacred books of which he is generally allowed to be the author.

MOSES is the most ancient writer of whom there remains any authentic work; he has left us the Pentateuch, or the five first books of the Old Testament, of which the law may be considered as the body, and Genesis as the introduction. These books are acknowledged to be authentic, and divinely inspired, by the generality of Christians, and Jews of all denominations. A few difficulties have indeed been started with reference to the author of the Pentateuch. And Aben Ezra, a Jewish doctor, who lived not much above five hundred years ago, was perhaps the first who raised any doubts of its being the genuine composition of Moses, in his notes upon the first chapter of Deuteronomy, and he cites twelve passages, which he pretends could not be written by Moses, and are therefore inserted by some later author. But it will appear, when those passages come to be considered in the course of these Annotations, that all such exceptions are very frivolous and inconclusive, and that the first five books of sacred Scripture were really pen'd by Moses, and not by any other writer whatever.

BESIDES the Pentateuch, the Jews also ascribe to Moses all the Psalms, from the 90th to the 100th inclusively, but there is no sufficient evidence, that those eleven Psalms had him for their author: For the proof taken from the title of the 90th Psalm, which is, A prayer of Moses the man of God, and which they pretend must be likewise applied to the ten following Psalms, is far from a demonstration, that they were composed by this great law-giver, as will be render'd evident in the proper place.

THE book of Job has likewise been reputed to be the work of Moses, but the consideration of that fact will be more properly introduced in our Animadversions on that book. A few fragments of other writings are likewise cited, by some of the ancients, as pen'd by him; such as, 1. his Apocalypse, out of which St. Paul is, by them, supposed to have taken these words, For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, &c. 2. His lesser Genesis. 3. His Ascension. 4. His Assumption. 5. His Testament, and some other mysterious books. 'Tis imagined also, that what is said in the Epistle of Jude, ver. 9. concerning the contention of Michael the archangel with the Devil, about the body of Moses, is taken from his Assumption.

SOME Rabbies attribute to him a treatise entitled, Beer Mosheh, or Beer Chockmak, the Fountain of wisdom. As for the Lesser Genesis, St. Jerom, who quotes a passage or two out of it, assures us they had it in Hebrew, in his time. The Sethites, an ancient sect of hereticks, cited his Testament, and his mysterious discourses, but all these were so far from bearing any authority in the church, that they sunk into contempt and oblivion as fast as Christianity prevailed.

WITH respect to the Pentateuch, of which he is the undoubted author, it manifestly appears, that he was fully informed of all the particulars he has there related. He sets down the names of the heads or fathers of the several nations of the world, in such a manner as makes his account correspond very well with what the most ancient heathen historians have transmitted to posterity concerning that matter. He speaks of these nations, of the countries they possessed, and the kings that govern'd them, with that perspicuity as makes it evident he was perfectly acquainted with each circumstance he describes.

HIS

To the READER.

HIS greateſt enemies muſt likewiſe confeſs, that the heathens themſelves have acknowledged Moſes for the moſt ancient legiſlator, ſince, for this, we have the teſtimonies of Plato, Polemus, Artapanus, Pythagoras, Theopompus, and Diodorus Siculus, who places Moſes in the front of ſix of the moſt ancient law-givers, thus, Moſes, Sauchnis, Seſonchoſis, Bachoris, Amaſis, and Darius father of Xerxes.

THERE is indeed one objection againſt the genuineneſs of the five books of Moſes we now enjoy, that ought to be removed, and it is this. There was a time when the book of the law was wholly unknown in the kingdom of Judah; and indeed the hiſtory plainly informs us, that this book was found again in the reign of Joſias; from whence 'tis infer'd, that if it were then unknown, it might likewiſe be forged. In anſwer to which, thoſe who form this objection muſt acknowledge, that the books of Moſes were not only among the three tribes, but alſo among the ten, ſince the time of their revolt from Rehoboam; and that they who were carried by Salmanaſſar, into Aſſyria, had theſe books among them, as well as the ten tribes who were left in their own country. Thus we ſee, that when the king of Aſſyria ſent ſome of the prieſts of Samaria, to inſtruct the colony he had ſettled in their country, in the law of God, it is not ſaid that thoſe prieſts went to borrow the law of Moſes from them of Judah, nor that this law was altogether unknown in that country; but only that they had formerly violated the law, in ſerving ſtrange gods, as they did then, but that they withal kept the law of God in their poſſeſſion, and it is to this day found among their poſterity.

AGAIN, it is evident, that tho' the wickedneſs and violent proceedings of Manaſſeh cauſed a great change in religion, yet it was not ſo conſiderable, but that his ſubjects had ſtill the books of Moſes among them; the blood which he ſhed in Jeruſalem was a manifeſt indication that there were ſome pious men left among them, who continued true to their religion, and obſerved the laws of God. Beſides, if we conſider his repentance, we muſt conclude that towards the end of his reign he did, in ſome degree, re-eſtabliſh the purity of that religion he had before profaned, a main part of which was the expounding and reading the books of Moſes.

IT is likewiſe viſible, that the reaſon why Hilkiah, when he found the book of the law in the Temple, as they were cleanſing and repairing it, ſent the ſame to Joſiah, was not becauſe there was no other ſuch book left in Judah, but becauſe the ſame book being written by the hand of Moſes himſelf, there ſeemed to be ſomething very extraordinary in their finding it, in the very conjuncture when they were endeavouring a reformation; and it was a circumſtance which did in a peculiar manner kindle the zeal of that good prince. And indeed if we ſuppoſe that he had never ſeen the book of the law till then, how could he have applied himſelf to the reformation of his country, his people, and the temple, in the manner recorded in the book of Kings? By what means could a ſufficient number of copies of it be diſperſed over all his kingdom in an inſtant, to inſtruct the people in the ceremonials of the Paſſover; which ſoon after was ſo ſolemnly celebrated by them? Or how was it poſſible that the Levites, the prieſts, and people, could have been ſo ſuddenly informed of all the points neceſſary to be obſerved in the performance of that venerable ſolemnity?

IT is apparent therefore, that the ſacred hiſtorian took notice of this circumſtance, that the book found was of the hand-writing of Moſes himſelf, for no other reaſon but to make it appear, that their veneration for this book was not entirely extinguiſhed, ſince they had carefully concealed it from the fury of their idolatrous kings, and depoſited it in ſome ſecret receſs of the Temple, where now they had ſo happily found it again.

THE character of this great law-giver has been expreſſed by none, in fewer and ſtronger terms, than by the Author of the Additions in the laſt chapter of the book of Numbers, which cloſes with this noble panegyric, And there aroſe not a prophet ſince in Iſrael like unto Moſes, whom the Lord knew face to face. In all the ſigns and the wonders which the Lord ſent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh, and to all his ſervants, and to all his land. And in all that mighty hand, and in all the great terror which Moſes ſhewed in the ſight of all Iſrael.

In the Beginning God created the Heaven & the Earth

Critical and Explanatory ANNOTATIONS
ON THE
FIRST BOOK of MOSES,
CALLED

The ARGUMENT.

The firſt ſacred book of Moſes is called Geneſis, or Generation, becauſe it comprehends the creation of the world, and the genealogy of the firſt patriarchs, from Adam, to the ſons and grandſons of Jacob. It is ſtiled Bereſchith, in the Hebrew, becauſe it begins with this word; and it includes the hiſtorical tranſactions of two thouſand three hundred ſixty and nine years, from the creation, to the death of the great patriarch Joſeph, according to the Hebrew computation.

CHAP. I.

1 The creation of heaven and earth, 3 of the light, 6 of the firmament, 9. of the earth ſeparated from the waters, 11 and made fruitful, 14 of the ſun, moon, and ſtars, 20 of fiſh and fowl, 24 of beaſts and cattel, 26 of man in the image of God. 29 Alſo the appointment of food.

IN the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.

2 And the earth was without form, and void, and darkneſs was upon the face of the deep: and the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.

3 ¶ And God ſaid, Let there be light: and there was light.

4 And God ſaw the light, that it was good: and God divided the light from the darkneſs.

5 And God called the light Day, and the darkneſs he called Night: and the evening and the morning were the firſt day.

6 ¶ And God ſaid, Let there be a firmament in the midſt of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters.

7 And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament, from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was ſo.

8 And God called the firmament, Heaven: and the evening and the morning were the ſecond day.

9 ¶ And God ſaid, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was ſo.

10 And God called the dry land, Earth, and the gathering together of the waters called he, Seas: and God ſaw that it was good.

11 ¶ And God ſaid, Let the earth bring forth graſs, the herb yielding ſeed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after his kind, whoſe ſeed is in itſelf, upon the earth: and it was ſo.

12 And the earth brought forth graſs, and herb yielding ſeed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whoſe ſeed was in it ſelf, after his kind: and God ſaw that it was good.

13 And the evening and the morning were the third day.

14 ¶ And God ſaid, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven, to divide the day from the night: and let them be for ſigns, and for ſeaſons, and for days, and years.

15 And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven, to give light upon the earth: and it was ſo.

16 And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the leſſer light to rule the night: he made the ſtars alſo.

17 And God ſet them in the firmament of the heaven, to give light upon the earth,

18 And to rule over the day and over the night, and to divide the light from the darkneſs: and God ſaw that it was good.

19 And the evening and the morning were the fourth day.

20 ¶ And God ſaid, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may flie above the earth in the open firmament of heaven.

21 And God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly after their kind, and every winged fowl after his kind: and God ſaw that it was good.

22 And God bleſſed them, ſaying, Be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the waters in the ſeas, and let fowl multiply in the earth.

23 And the evening and the morning were the fifth day.

24 ¶ And God ſaid, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattel and creeping thing and beaſt of the earth after his kind: and it was ſo.

25 And God made the beaſt of the earth after his kind, and cattel after their kind, and every thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind: and God ſaw that it was good.

26 ¶ And God ſaid, Let us make man in our image, after our likeneſs: and let them have dominion over the fiſh of the ſea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattel, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.

27 So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him: male and female created he them.

28 And God bleſſed them and God ſaid unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and repleniſh the earth, and ſubdue it: and have dominion over the fiſh of the ſea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.

29 ¶ And God ſaid, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing ſeed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding ſeed: to you it ſhall be for meat.

30 And to every beaſt of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was ſo.

31 And God ſaw every thing that he had made, and behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the ſixth day.

Ver. 1. In the beginning.] That the univerſe was created out of nothing, by an infinitely powerful and wiſe God, who, being ſelf-exiſtent, is the original cauſe of all things, is not only certain from revelation, but is likewiſe deduceable, and has been clearly proved from reaſon. And tho' all atheiſts have conſtantly denied, that even infinite power can create matter, and the affirmative has been thought to be embarraſs'd with ſeveral conſiderable difficulties, as our having no idea how a Nothing from all eternity can be made to exiſt, and the ſeeming contradiction in ſuppoſing the world to be created in time, becauſe it would then be ſeparated from eternity, only by an indiviſible point, which cannot ſufficiently diſtinguiſh an eternal being from a temporary production; yet theſe are rather difficulties ariſing from our own imperfect reaſon and conception, whereby we are not able to form a diſtinct idea of creation or eternity, than any real impoſſibility in the thing itſelf: For it is no contradiction to affirm, that ſomething which once was not, may, ſince, have begun to exiſt; the true notion of creation being not a forming of ſomething out of nothing, as out of a material cauſe, but only a bringing ſomething into being, that before had no being at-all, and which without this cauſe would not have exiſted; which no man can reduce to a contradiction, any more than the formation of any thing into a ſhape which it had not before, can be reduced to a contradiction. And they who deny God's power to create matter, muſt fly to one of theſe ſuppoſitions, either that matter exiſted from eternity, as a paſſive ſubject of all the operations of God, and as a collateral principle, or elſe that matter is the only ſelf-exiſtent being; either of which involves us in the moſt impious abſurdities. The firſt ſuppoſition neceſſarily implies two ſelf-exiſtent principles, which is a direct contradiction; and the other, that it is impoſſible to conceive matter not to be, or to be in any reſpect otherwiſe than it now is, without a contradiction; than which nothing is more eaſy: For whether we conſider the form of the world, with the diſpoſition and motion of its parts, or whether we conſider the matter of it as ſuch, without reſpect to its preſent form; every thing in it, both the whole and every one of its parts, their ſituation and motion, the form and alſo the matter, are the moſt arbitrary and dependent things, and the fartheſt removed from neceſſity than can poſſibly be imagined.

The Heaven.] The Hebrew word is in the plural number, the Heavens, but it frequently ſignifies only one Heaven, or the ſingular number, as in the 8th verſe of this chapter. Some learned men give it a plural ſignification in their verſions, and it is certain, that the Hebrews believed there were three heavens; namely, the aerial heaven, of which mention is made in verſe 8. The ſtarry heaven, intimated in verſe 14. and the ſupreme or higheſt heaven, which they conſider'd as the reſidence of God, and called it the Heaven of Heavens, Deut. x. 14. 1 Kings viii. 27. 2 Cor. xii. 2.

Ver. 2. And the earth was without form and void.] The earth, after its immediate creation was, for ſometime, a promiſcuous, dark, fluid and unformed chaos, or maſs of matter, which God, in the ſpace of ſix days, diſpoſed into the preſent form of the world; his Spirit moving, or brooding over the ſurface of the water, or fluid matter, to influence and actuate the ſame.

And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.] Onkelos and moſt of the Jewiſh expoſitors, by the word Spirit, underſtand a wind, whoſe vehemence and immediate directions from the Deity, entitled it to the name of the Wind of God. Other interpreters imagine that this word adumbrates the Deity himſelf, in that perſonality perſonality by which the Holy Spirit is denominated. Others conſider it as repreſenting the energy of the divine power, by which all things were created, and this ſeems to be the ſignification intended by Moſes.

Ver. 3. And God ſaid let there be light, &c.] The confuſed ſtagnating parts of matter began to raiſe themſelves in order; and the groſſer parts ſubſiding, the higher mounted up, by which means the atmoſphere being, in ſome degrees, cleared, the luminous rays of the ſun began to pierce it and cauſed an imperfect and glimmering light, yet ſufficient partly to diſpel the darkneſs, which before was total, and to diſtinguiſh day from night. And this account of the light, which appear'd on the ſecond day, is much more reaſonable, than to ſuppoſe the ſubſtance of the ſun, much leſs the fix'd ſtars, were then extracted from the chaos; becauſe more than ninety nine parts in an hundred, of the matter of the univerſe, are fiery corpuſcles, and if they were included, at firſt, in the chaos, it could not poſſibly have been dark or caliginous. To account for this day's light, before the ſun is ſaid to be made, there is no occaſion to recur to the ſuppoſition of its being either the divine Shechinah, or no more than a temporary light, occaſioned by the rapid motion communicated by God to a portion of matter. Longinus the nobleſt Heathen critic has celebrated the narration, in this verſe, for its ſublimity, in the following manner. "This conduct "was obſerv'd by the legiſlator of the Jews, who "was a man of no common genius, and whoſe ideas "and deſcription of the divine power were ſuitable to "that ſubject, when he declares, in the introduction to "his laws, that God ſaid,——What? Let there be "light: And there was light."

Ver. 6.—Let there be a firmament.] The Hebrew word rakiah, a firmament, may likewiſe be properly tranſlated expanſion, and it comprehends that immenſe ſpace which ſurrounds our earth, and is extended to the remote region of the fixed ſtars. The word Heaven has much the ſame ſignification, and, like the firmament, is applied ſometimes to the air which encompaſſes the terreſtrial globe, and ſometimes to the region of the planets and fixed ſtars. The words firmament and heaven have the ſame ſignification in the 8th verſe of this chapter, and likewiſe in the 14th, and in the 20th verſe, where mention is made of this part of the air in which the birds are commiſſioned to fly.

Ver. 7.—And divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament.] The ſecond day, the expanſe or air, called by Moſes, Heaven, was perfected, being now freed from the groſs terrene particles which before crowded it, and were made capable of ſupporting clouds and aqueous vapours, which were the ſuperior waters, as thoſe on the earth were the inferior. The notion the old Chriſtian Fathers had of ſuper-celeſtial waters, is perfectly groundleſs.——It is commonly noted, that it is not ſaid of this, as of all the works of the other five days, God ſaw that it was good. The reaſon of which is alledged by ſome to be this: The waters mention'd upon this day, were not yet ſeparated, and diſtinguiſhed from the earth: and therefore in the next day's work, when God gathered the waters together, ver. 10. and when he commanded the earth, which became dry, to bring forth, ver. 12. theſe words, God ſaw that it was good are twice repeated, viz. in verſes the 10th and 12th.

Ver. 9. And God ſaid, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear.] The former part of the third day's work was to gather the waters, which before covered the face of the earth, into ſeas and lakes, that the dry land might appear. How this was effected is not eaſy to determine. That God himſelf ſhould raiſe the mountains, and hollow the chanels of the ſea for this purpoſe, appears not a little indecent; for which reaſon ſome have ſuppoſed the mountains might have been thrown up by the force of a ſubterraneous fire, or flatus, in the ſame manner as earthquakes are now cauſed: But the more philoſophical opinion is that they were occaſioned by the different denſities of the ſeveral columns of the earth, when its ſurface was firſt formed; ſome ſinking lower into the abyſs than others, for it is more than probable that the mountainous columns are much hollower and lighter than the other, notwithſtanding the vulgar opinion to the contrary. The latter part of this day's work was the production of vegetables, which were deſigned as food for the future animals. But how great ſoever we ſuppoſe the fœcundity of the primigenial earth to have been, it is ſcarce to be imagined, that trees and plants could arrive at full growth, and bear their ſeveral fruits and ſeeds in ſo ſhort a ſpace as a day, without the aſſiſtance of a ſupernatural power: And as God is on all hands, allowed to have formed the ſeeds of theſe vegetables, it may not, perhaps be wrong to attribute their ſudden maturation alſo to his interpoſition.

Ver. 16. And God made two great lights, &c.] On the fourth day, the two great lights, the Sun and the Moon, are ſaid to have been made and placed in the heaven. It muſt not however, be ſuppoſed they were then firſt created, or aſſigned to their ſeveral orbs; for the Sun was not only in being from the beginning of the Moſaic creation, as ſhall be fully proved in the diſſertation intended to be prefixed to theſe Annotations, but had all along great influence on the earth, its light and heat gradually increaſing and influencing the earth and its productions with greater power, as the air became from time to time more pure and defæcated; and the Moon, as well as the other planets, kept pace with the earth in its formation; but only that the bodies of thoſe luminaries which had been hid from the earth till the fourth day, when the air was perfectly freed from the heterogeneous particles, and the vapours which before obſcured it, did then firſt appear to the earth, and viſibly begin to perform their ſeveral offices.

He made the ſtars alſo.] The words, he made, are interpolated in our tranſlation, and there is not one word or expreſſion in the Hebrew of this part of verſe, which has any ſuch ſignification. Dr. Nicholls ſupports the opinion of other worlds or ſyſtems before ours, by a criticiſm on the Hebrew word Veeth in this verſe, which ſignifies, together with; and thence concludes, that by Moſes's text, the Moon was to rule the night, and, together with, the ſtars, whereby is denoted the peculiar uſefulneſs and predominancy of the moon above all other ſtars in this earth; for the moon ſhines out when they do but twinkle, and affords a mighty influence in the production and growth of vegitables; and therefore may be well called the ruler of the night, and, as it were, the Prince among the ſtars.

Ver. 20. And God ſaid let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth, &c.] After the formation of the inanimate world, Moſes proceeds to the formation of animals, and begins with fiſhes and fowls, which were both produced on the fifth day, out of the waters, in great numbers, and as the original of fiſh and volatiles was from the ſame element, ſo there is ſuppoſed to be ſome congruity in their nature, being both oviparous, and their motions of ſwiming and flying, ſomething alike.

Ver. 24. And God ſaid let the earth bring forth the living creature after its kind, &c.] It has been thought by ſome modern philoſophers, that God at firſt created only two of each ſpecies of animals, from which all the reſt proceeded by generation: To ſupport which opinion, they obſerve, that there was but one man and one woman created: But it ſeems more conſonant to ſcripture, that a greater number of every kind were formed at firſt: We are aſſured the aquatic creatures and fowls were brought forth abundantly. There has been alſo a farther queſtion moved, whether all animals that have already been, or hereafter ſhall be, were at firſt actually created by God? or whether he hath given to each kind of animal ſuch a power of generation, as to prepare matter and produce new individuals in their own bodies? and it ſeems to be the moſt reaſonable opinion that God did himſelf, at firſt, actually create all the individual animals that ever were, or ever ſhall be. For the parent animal cannot be the agent or efficient in the generation, or forming and nouriſhing of the fœtus, becauſe that is a work of art and reaſon, which brute creatures are not endued withal; nor indeed does man himſelf underſtand any thing of the proceſs of generation in himſelf. Again, it is moſt probable, if not certain, that moſt animals have in them, from the beginning, the ſeeds or eggs of all the young they ſhall afterwards bring forth, which when ſpent and exhauſted, the creature becomes barren.

Ver. 26. And God ſaid let us make man.] Man was by a divine power created on the ſixth day, after the terreſtrial ſtrial animals had been produced, his body was formed out of the duſt of the ground, from whence he had the name of Adam. Adamah in Hebrew ſignifies Earth, but more properly, as is ſaid, a ſort of red earth, or clay. Ludolphus derives it from the Æthiopic, Adama, to be pleaſant, or delightful, which epithets are attributed to the earth for its amenity, and might be to the firſt man for his beauty. But this name of Adam, is an appellative, rather than a proper name, and includes even both the ſexes, Gen. v. 2 The ſoul of this noble creature was inſuſed into him immediately, by his creator; in which better and immortal part, more evidently conſiſted that image, or reſemblance of God, wherein he is ſaid to have been made. With reſpect to the words, let us make man, moſt of the modern expoſitors take the plural number here uſed, to be no more than a majeſtic form of ſpeech as princes now uſe. The Jewiſh doctors are of opinion, that this deliberation was real, and held with ſuch angelic beings, as God might employ in the work of man's creation: And on this occaſion tell the following ſtory; that as Moſes was writing his book by God's appointment, and theſe words came to be dictated, he made ſome difficulty to ſet them down; crying out, O Lord, wouldſt thou lead men into error, and make them doubt of the doctrine of the unity? whereupon God anſwered, I command thee to write, and if any will err, let them err. The woman was alſo formed on the ſame day, out of the ſide of the man; and this original it is to be ſuppoſed, was choſen, to conciliate the ſtricter love and union between them; the ſide being alſo the moſt proper part to denote that equality with the man, for which the woman was deſigned.

That the firſt pair were created in an adult and perfect ſtate, immediately capable of the full exerciſe of their natural powers and faculties, is not to be doubted: Nor is it to be imagined, but that they came out of their maker's hands in the greateſt perfection both of body and mind.

Ver. 29. And God ſaid, behold I have given you every herb bearing ſeed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding ſeed: to you it ſhall be for meat.] Herbs and fruits are here only aſſigned to man for his food, from whence ſeveral learned men have conjectured that he was not then allowed to eat the fleſh of animals.

There have been, and poſſibly may ſtill be ſome perſons who think mankind were in being before Adam, whom they will allow to be only the progenitor of the Jews; and the moſt plauſible objection of theſe Præ-Adamites is, that if Adam and Eve were the progenitors of all mankind, there can be no tolerable cauſe aſſigned of the difference in colour between the white and the black, it being very improbable they were both the offſpring of the ſame parents. To this it may be anſwered, that the variety of complexion in the world may be rationally accounted for another way. We know how the hair and colour of mens bodies differ, according to the climate they inhabit, and their greater or leſſer diſtance from the Sun. We may therefore well conclude that the firſt colony, which ſettled in a very hot country, received a great change in their complexion, proportionable to the heat of the climate, and became very tawny, gradually inclining to blackneſs as the Sun was more intenſe upon them. Hence is a generation or two, that high degree of tawnineſs might become natural, and at length the pride of the natives. The men might begin to value themſelves upon this complexion, and the women to affect them the better for it; ſo that their love for their husbands, and daily converſation with them, might have a conſiderable influence upon the fruit of their wombs, and make each child grow blacker and blacker, according to the fancy and imagination of the mother, the force of which is evident from many inſtances. Upon this ſuppoſition, the children thus produced, muſt every birth approach nearer to an abſolute blackneſs, and as their tender bodies came to be expoſed naked to the violent heat of the ſun, their skin muſt needs be ſcorched in an extraordinary manner, and perhaps its very texture altered, and by that means contract a blackneſs far ſuperior to that of their parents. As to what ſome have imagined, that this blackneſs was, at firſt preternatural, and a judgment upon Ham, the ſon of Noah, and that all people of that complexion are the progeny of that undutiful ſon, this ſeems very unlikely, the curſe on that occaſion being laid on Canaan, the ſon of Ham, by name, and yet his poſterity are allowed not to have been black.

CHAP. II.

1 The firſt ſabbath. 4 The manner of the creation. 8 The planting of the garden of Eden, 10 and the river thereof. 17 The tree of knowledge only forbidden. 19 20 The naming of the creatures. 21 The making of woman, and inſtitution of marriage.

THUS the heavens and the earth were finiſhed, and all the hoſt of them.

2 And on the ſeventh day God ended his work which he had made: and he reſted on the ſeventh day from all his work which he had made.

3 And God bleſſed the ſeventh day, and ſanctified it: becauſe that in it he had reſted from all his work, which God created and made.

4 ¶ Theſe are the generations of the heavens and of the earth, when they were created; in the day that the LORD God made the earth and the heavens,

5 And every plant of the field, before it was in the earth, and every herb of the field, before it grew: for the LORD God had not cauſed it to rain upon the earth, and there was not a man to till the ground.

6 But there went up a miſt from the earth, and watered the whole face of the ground.

7 And the LORD God formed man of the duſt of the ground, and breathed into his noſtrils the breath of life; and man became a living ſoul.

8 ¶ And the LORD God planted a garden eaſtward in Eden; and there he put the man whom he had formed.

9 And out of the ground made the LORD God to grow every tree that is pleaſant to the ſight, and good for food: the tree of life alſo in the midſt of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

10 And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads.

11 The name of the firſt is Piſon: that is it which compaſſeth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold.

12 And the gold of that land is good: there is bdellium and the onyx-ſtone.

13 And the name of the ſecond river is Gihon: the ſame is it that compaſſeth the whole land of Ethiopia.

14 And the name of the third river is Hiddekel: that is it which goeth toward the eaſt of Aſſyria. And the fourth river is Euphrates.

15 And

15 And the LORD God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden, to dreſs it, and to keep it.

16 And the LORD God commanded the man, ſaying, Of every tree of the garden thou may'ſt freely eat:

17 But of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou ſhalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eateſt thereof, thou ſhalt ſurely die.

18 ¶ And the LORD God ſaid, It is not good that the man ſhould be alone: I will make him an help meet for him.

19 And out of the ground the LORD God formed every beaſt of the field, and every fowl of the air, and brought them unto Adam to ſee what he would call them: and whatſoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof.

20 And Adam gave names to all cattel, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beaſt of the field: but for Adam there was not found an help meet for him.

21 And the LORD God cauſed a deep ſleep to fall upon Adam, and he ſlept; and he took one of his ribs, and cloſed up the fleſh inſtead thereof.

22 And the rib, which the LORD God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man.

23 And Adam ſaid, This is now bone of my bones, and fleſh of my fleſh: ſhe ſhall be called Woman, becauſe ſhe was taken out of man.

24 Therefore ſhall a man leave his father and his mother, and ſhall cleave unto his wife: and they ſhall be one fleſh.

25 And they were both naked, the man and his wife, and were not aſhamed.

Moſes having given a ſhort account of the orderly production of things, explains more largely in this chapter, ſome particulars which were delivered briefly in the foregoing; becauſe he would not too much interrupt the coherence of his diſcourſe about the works of the ſix days. He deſcribes, for inſtance, the ſituation of paradiſe, relates the particulars of the formation of Eve, and alſo further illuſtrates the production of Adam, &c.

Whether the ſeveral parts of the creation, ſpecified in the preceding chapter, were really accompliſhed in the ſpace of ſix days, has been a queſtion; ſome thinking it much too ſhort for ſuch a work, and others too long, theſe latter ſuppoſing that the world was created in a moment, and that Moſes extends it to ſix days, the better to help the imagination of the people, that things may ſeem to riſe in ſome order and method, and to take off any image of haſte, or precipitancy. But there ſeems to be no juſt reaſon to depart from the letter of Moſes in the particular, the creation deſcribed by him being not this creation of the ſubſtance of all things out of nothing, which was moſt probably the effect of one individual act, but the formation of one world, or ſyſtem only, out of matter before created. Vid. Burnet, Archeol. l. 2. p. 312.

It has been diſputed alſo, in what ſeaſon of the year the world was made; which it is to be preſumed muſt be meant in reſpect of the place where Adam was created; for otherwiſe all the ſeaſons muſt have been in being, at once, in different parts of the world. Some have ſuppoſed the vernal equinox to have been the time; but others the autumnal; which opinion is the more generally recieved, and ſeems to be confirmed from the years anciently beginning from that time. This indeed was afterwards altered by Moſes, who ordered the eccleſiaſtical year ſhould commence from the vernal equinox, or the month Niſan, Exod. xii. 2. but the Jews, in civil affairs, ſtill continue to compute from the former, or the month Tiſri.

Ver. 2. And on the ſeventh day, God ended his work.] It ſhould ſeem, by the manner in which this part of the verſe is rendred by our tranſlators, that God did not fully compleat all his works, till the ſeventh day, but as this interpretation is very inconſiſtent with the true meaning of the ſacred hiſtorian, the Hebrew ought to have been tranſlated thus, viz. And on the ſeventh day God had ended his work. And in order to make it evident that this is a juſt verſion, it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that the Hebrew tongue having no pluſquam perfectum, muſt conſequently expreſs the ſenſe of it by the perfectum, and therefore the particular circumſtances of the context muſt determine the time preſent, and when that already paſt is to be underſtood. In the inſtance before us, Moſes having ſpecified the ſeveral parts of creation, that were accompliſhed in ſix days, adds, in the firſt verſe of this chapter, Thus the heavens and the earth were finiſhed, and all the hoſt of them. The deity therefore had compleated all his works before the ſeventh day, for which reaſon the beginning of the ſecond verſe ought to have been tranſlated in the manner already intimated.

Ver. 3. And God bleſſed the ſeventh day, and ſanctified it.] He determined and appointed the ſeventh day, from the beginning of the world, to be obſerved in memory of its creation. And this conſecration of it to that holy uſe, was his bleſſing it, or recommending it to be obſerved, as a day of bleſſing and praiſing him, in all his works of wonder.

There is no mention, indeed, made of Adam's or Abel's, &c. obſerving this day; which hath inclined many to conclude theſe words to have been written by way of anticipation: This day being ſet apart, in after times, by the law of Moſes, for God's ſervice; but, in their opinion, not till then. To which we cannot agree; becauſe it ſeems much more reaſonable to think, that God took care to preſerve the memory of the creation, in the minds of mankind; and the worſhip of him, the only one God, by whom it was effected: Which could not be done more effectually, than by ſetting apart this day for that purpoſe. And what time more proper, wherein to honour the great Creator with ſacrifices, praiſes, and thankſgivings, than this day? Which Philo well ſtiles the birth day of the world, and which was ſo obſerved in all lands (tho' mankind in length of time forgot the reaſon) that the ſeventh day, as the ſame author declares, may be truly called the Univerſal Feſtival. Joſephus writes to the ſame purpoſe; and there is a great deal more obſerved by Ariſtobulus, a peri patetic philoſopher, out of Heſiod, Homer, and others, in Euſeb. Præp. Evang. l. xiii. c. 12. concerning the ſacredneſs of the ſeventh day. Which tho' Mr. Selden (L. 3. de Jure N. and G. c. 17, &c.) endeavours to prove it meant of the ſeventh day of the month, not of the ſeventh day of the week; yet we may look upon that as a remain of this ancient tradition; Which in time, men forgot, as they did the moſt natural duties, and therefore, no wonder if they did not regard the ſervice of God every ſeventh day; to which we ſhall ſhew in due place, that Noah, the only righteous man among them had ſome regard, and that it continued in the family of Abraham, after the Flood, ſince Moſes ſpeaks of it, not long after their coming out of Egypt (where it is likely they were not ſuffered to obſerve it, having no time free from their intollerable labours) as a day known to them before the giving of the law on Mount Sinai. Exod. xvi. 23 25, 26.

Ver 4. ——— In the day.] i. e. At that time (for day has often that ſignification) when the Lord God made the earth and the heavens. The Hebrew doctors obſerve that the words Jehovah Elohi (Lord God) conſtitute the full and perfect name of God. And therefore are fitly reſerved till this place, when the works of God were compleated.

Ver. 5. And every plant in the field, before it was in the earth, &c.] That is, before there was any ſeed to produce them, God cauſed them to ſpring up, with their ſeed in them.

For the Lord God had not cauſed it to rain on the earth, and there was not a man to till the ground.] Here are two reaſons to confirm, that plants were not produced, in the way they are now. For there had not been any ſhowers of rain; nor was there any man to prepare the earth to receive the ſeed; both which are neceſſary in the ordinary method of divine providence, ever ſince the world was made. From hence we may likewiſe collect that there were no people before Adam, for if there had, Moſes could not have ſaid, there was no man to till the earth.

Ver. 7. —— And breathed into his noſtrils the breath of life] This being ſaid of no other creature, leads us to conceive not only that the ſoul of man is a diſtinct thing of a different original from his body; but that a more excellent ſpirit was infuſed into him by God (as appears by its operations) than into other animals. For tho' the meer expreſſion of inſpiring him with the breath of life, would not prove this, yet Moſes by ſpeaking in the plural number, that God breathed into him niſchmath chajim, the breath or ſpirit of lives, plainly denotes not only that ſpirit which cauſes man to breathe and move, but that likewiſe which enables him to think, reaſon, and diſcourſe.

And man became a living ſoul.] That the ſoul of man is a ſpiritual ſubſtance, independent on the matter it informs, is evident to any who conſiders the power and freedom of its operations, which no accident can be ſuppoſed to have; and which matter, with all its refinements and maturations, can never be able to perform. It has however been queſtioned whether the ſouls of men are infuſed into them immediately from God, or whether they are derived, ex traduce, from their parents? The latter opinion has been maintained, from all other creatures having the power of propagating their ſpecies in full perfection; by which it ſeems to follow, that mankind were indued with the ſame; from the likeneſs of temper and diſpoſition of mind, which children often take from their parents; and from the indecency of conceiving God to be inceſſantly making ſouls, whenever the ſexes are ſtimulated to ſatisfy their natural appetite. But it is ſcarce poſſible to maintain the immateriality and immortality of the human ſoul on this ſuppoſition: For if it be propagated by generation, it muſt, to our beſt apprehenſion, be material and liable to corruption; it is therefore moſt reaſonable to believe, that tho' God has committed the formation of our bodies to the agency of ſecond cauſes, yet he has reſerved the production of our ſouls to himſelf, who is the Father, and God of the ſpirits of all fleſh.

It has alſo been doubted, whether the ſouls of mankind were all created at once, together with that of Adam, in order to be united to certain bodies which ſhould be prepared afterwards for their reception; or whether they are ſucceſſively created, as the bodies they are to inform are made fit to receive them? Such of the old philoſophers who believed the ſoul to be a diſtinct ſubſtance from the body, as Pythagoras, Empedocles, and Plato, concluded that all ſouls muſt pre-exiſt in the univerſe, before generation and tranſmigration into their reſpective bodies; and this doctrine was not confined to human ſouls only, but extended univerſally to all ſouls and lives whatſoever; for the ancients were ſo far from denying the ſenſe and conſciouſneſs of brutes, that the generality of them allowed them the faculty of reaſoning, tho' they were unable to expreſs their thoughts as man did: For which reaſon they were ſuppoſed, by ſome, to tranſmigrate indifferently from men into other animals, and from animals into men; it being only the difference of the organs, and the modification of the matter to which they were united, wherein conſiſted the ſeeming diſparity of their powers. Several of the ancient Chriſtians have alſo believed the pre-exiſtence of ſouls, induced by this conſideration, that it was incongruous to bring God upon the ſtage perpetually, and make him immediately interpoſe, every where in the generation of men, by the miraculous production of their ſouls out of nothing. Nay, the continual creation and decreation of the ſouls of brutes has been thought ſo improbable, that it has been fancied they were but ſo many particular eradiations, or effluxes, from that ſource of life above, which animate ſuch matter as is fitly prepared to receive and be actuated by them, ſo long as it continues ſuch; but when theſe organized bodies, by reaſon of their indiſpoſition, become incapable of being further acted upon; thoſe eradiations are reſumed and retracted into that original head or fountain; it ſeeming not at all abſurd to grant perpetuity of duration to the ſouls even of brutes, any more than to every the leaſt particle of matter. That the Jews had likewiſe ſome notion of the ſoul's exiſting before the body, appears from their queſtion put to our Saviour, whether the man who was born blind, had himſelf ſinned, or his parents, to deſerve that puniſhment? And as this opinion was not then contradicted, ſome have ſuppoſed it to have been thereby tacitly approved.

Notwithſtanding which, the vulgar opinion of the ſucceſſive creation of ſouls, may, with good reaſon, be allowed; for why ſhould we imagine that God put forth all his creative vigour at once, in a moment; ever afterwards remaining a ſpectator only of the conſequent reſult, and permitting nature alone to do all, without any farther interpoſition? And how is it poſſible, that if our ſouls ever were in ſuch a ſtate of pre exiſtence, we ſhould have ſo perfectly loſt all memory and conſciouſneſs of any thing previous to its preſent union with our bodies?

That the ſoul of Eve was imparted to her by ſuch a divine infuſion as produced the ſoul of Adam, ſeems to be unqueſtionable; for if it had been made out of Adam, as her body was, he would have ſaid not only, ſhe is bone of my bone, but ſoul of my ſoul; which would have mightily ſtrengthened the bond of marriage, and exceedingly hightened conjugal affection.

Ver. 8. And the Lord God planted a garden.] Had planted, is the proper tranſlation, ſince the formation of this garden was part of the work performed by the deity in the ſpace of the firſt ſix days.

In Eden.] The word Eden in the Hebrew language, according to its primary and common acceptation denotes pleaſure, or delight. Whence it was afterwards appropriated to ſeveral places whoſe ſituation was remarkably delightful, conſidered either in themſelves, or comparatively with the adjacent country. Thus we find two places diſtinguiſhed by the name of Eden in Scripture, beſides that in the moſaic deſcription, if it be not one of them, viz. One near Damaſcus in Syria; Amos i. 5. the other in or about Thelaſſar in Chaldea, 2 Kings xix. 12. Iſaiah xxxvii. 12. There is alſo another Eden in Syria, near Tripoli. There is likewiſe a city near Tarſus, in Cilicia, ſtill called Adena, and Aden is a very noted one on the coaſt of Yaman, or Arabia Fælix, a little without the ſtraits of Bab al mandab, corruptly called Babelmandel.

Ver. 9. The tree of life.] In reference to the two trees which ſeem to be ſo very extraordinary; it is but reaſonable to imagine there was a wide difference between the ſtate of innocence, and our preſent condition, and conſequently that there were ſome things conſonant to the firſt ſtate, which are very incongruous to our preſent. Now of thoſe Moſes has mentioned but a few, and among them theſe trees. As to the tree of life, nothing can be more agreeable to a ſtate of innocence, which ſeems to imply a ſtate of immortality; and ſomething was requiſite to make men immortal, when their bodies were not ſo; and what can be ſuppoſed more effectual than the fruit of ſuch a tree? When God had deſigned that mens bodies ſhould never yield to death it ſeems but reaſonable he ſhould direct them to the eating of ſuch a fruit whoſe juice was of that ſpirituous nature as to impregnate their blood with an indefatigable vigour, and to keep them up in conſtant youth, without pain, diſeaſe, or weakneſs, till ſuch time as he ſhould tranſlate them to a better world. When mankind had ſinned, it is likely God deſtroy'd this tree out of the world, as then grown uſeleſs, and inconſiſtent with the curſe and puniſhment of man. And of this tree the Heathens ſeem to have had ſome traditional notion, when they ſpeak of the Nectar and Ambroſia, which maintained the immortality of their gods, and Moly, which was the great panacea, or univerſal medicine celebrated by the poets.

In the midſt of the garden.] This ſignifies either its ſituation, or its excellence: For that which is moſt eminent in any place, the Hebrew ſay is in the midſt.

And the tree of knowledge of good and evil] This tree is conceived to have been ſo called; either becauſe it had really a virtue to open man's underſtanding, and to make him him diſtinguiſh between good and evil; or elſe becauſe the eating of it would eventually teach him the difference between the good of obedience, and the evil of tranſgreſſion: But others ſuppoſe it ſo called, meerly from the devil's pretending it had a virtue to conſer knowledge, having received its name from the unfortunate deception; and that it is ſtiled the tree of knowledge of good and evil, by way of anticipation: And as to God's ſaying, Behold the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil, that is taken to be a bitter irony, to upbraid man with his fooliſh diſobedience and diſappointment.

But what particular tree, this tree of knowledge was, has been a matter of much conjecture; the vine, the apple, the common and Indian fig-tree, and wheat, tho' no tree, have all put in their claims. Goropius Becanus is moſt confident it was the Indian fig-tree; which notion, however, he did not borrow from Moſes Barcephas, as Sir Walter Raleigh ſuppoſes. The chief reaſons urged why it ſhould be this tree are, 1. The goodneſs of the fruit, and fairneſs of the tree. 2. The breadth of its leaves, very commodious for hiding the nakedneſs of Adam and Eve, which it is ſuppoſed they would cover aſſoon as ever they perceived it: 3. The largeneſs and thickneſs of the tree, very proper to conceal them, as they imagined, from the preſence of God. But here Becanus, from the words of the vulgate verſion, in medio ligni, in the middle of the wood, fancied they hid themſelves in the body of the tree itſelf, tho' the ſtem of the Indian fig-tree, notwithſtanding the extravagant ſize given it by ſome authors, be not very large. But tho' the generality of expoſitors are for the common fig-tree, yet what Moſes has ſo induſtriouſly concealed, is above the power of any to diſcover. Philo the Jew, according to his cuſtom, allegorizes what is ſaid of both theſe trees, ſuppoſing that no ſuch ever were, nor ever will be in the world.

Ver. 10. And a river went out of Eden to water the garden.] The particular deſcription of Eden is continued from this verſe to the end of the 14th, and in order to diſcover the true ſituation of the four rivers there ſpecified, we ſhall conſider them in the ſame order as they are mentioned by Moſes.

Ver. 11. The name of the firſt is Piſon; that is it which compaſſeth the whole land of Havilah.] In order therefore to find out the river Piſon, we muſt firſt endeavour to fix the ſituation of the land of Havilah; and here we cannot follow better guides than the ſacred writers. We read then of a country called Havilah, in Gen. xxv. 18. and 1 Sam. xv. 7. In the former of which places, Moſes acquaints us that the Iſhmaelites dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt, &c. In the latter we are informed, that Saul ſmote the Amalekites from Havilah, until thou comeſt to Shur, that is before Egypt. In both which paſſages, by this expreſſion, from Havilah unto Shur, is probably meant the whole extent of that part of Arabia, which lies between Egypt to the weſt, and a certain channel or river, which empties itſelf into the Perſian gulph, to the eaſt, for that Shur was the weſtern extremity of this part of Arabia, is evident from Exod. xv. 22. where we read, that Moſes brought Iſrael from the Red Sea, and they went out into the wilderneſs of Shur. It ſeems manifeſt therefore, that Havilah was the eaſtern part of this tract of Arabia, and we accordingly find that authors have placed a people here, whoſe name, in all the variations of it that occur in different writers, retains viſible traces of the name of their anceſtor Havilah, or as it is written, more agreeably to the original Hebrew word, Chavilah. This region, for inſtance, is aſſigned to the Chaulothæi, by Eratoſthenes; to the Chauloſii, by Feſtus Anienus; to the Chablaſii, by Dionyſius Periegetes; and to the Chavelæi, by Pliny; all retaining in their name, moſt of the radical letters of the word Chavilah.

Where there is gold.] The gold of Arabia is much commended by authors both ſacred and profane. Diodorus declares (Lib. 2. and 3.) that, in Arabia, was found gold of ſo lively a colour, that it greatly reſembled the brightneſs of fire, and ſo fixed, that it wanted neither fire nor refining to purify it: And it may be eaſily made evident, that Ezekiel had regard to theſe parts when he ſays to the city of Tyre; the merchants of Sheba and Raamah, they were thy merchants: They traded in thy fairs with the chief of all ſpices, and with all precious ſtones and gold. Sheba and Raamah were places on the eaſtern coaſts of Arabia, not far from Havilah.

Ver. 12. There is Bdellium and the onyx ſtone.] Interpreters are much divided in their opinions of the ſignification of the Hebrew word Bdolah; ſome render it Bdellium, as our tranſlators; others pearls; ſome have aſſerted that it ſignifies the loadſtone; the carbuncle; the cleaſter: But of all theſe various opinions, the moſt probable, and which moſt divide the learned, are that which takes Bdolah for an aromatic gum, and that which takes it for pearls. The paſſage in the book of Numbers (chap. xi. ver. 7.) which is uſually quoted in defence of this laſt opinion ſeems to be ſo deciſive that no good objection can be raiſed againſt it, for Moſes, intending to deſcribe the Manna, declares that it was like the ſeed of coriander, and the colour thereof as the colour of Bdolah. Now it is evident from another deſcription of the ſame Manna, Exod. xvi. 14. and 31. that it was white, (according to the verſion of the Septuagint, and followed, ver. 31. in our common tranſlation) which is very appoſite to pearls; as alſo is the roundneſs of Manna, but in no wiſe to the Bdellium gum. Hence it is that the Talmudiſts mentioning this deſcription of Manna, inſtead of ſaying that its complexion reſembled that of Bdellium, affirmed it to be of the colour of pearls. But whether the Hebrew word be taken for pearls, or gum, a variety of authors ancient and modern, agree that both are to be found in the land of Havilah.

As to the Schoham, which is commonly render'd the Onyx-ſtone, it can eaſily be made evident that Arabia was formerly very productive of precious ſtones. Nearchus, who had ſailed the Perſian gulf, affirmed, as Strabo informs us, That there were many iſlands in that gulph, in which there were precious ſtones of an extraordinary fineneſs. Strabo likewiſe declares, that the riches of Arabia conſiſted in excellent perfumes and precious ſtones: And Pliny who employed all his laſt book in clearing this ſubject, very accurately deſcribes the countries that produce precious ſtones, and aſſures us, that the moſt valuable were tranſmitted from Arabia; and likewiſe adds, that the ancients were perſuaded that the onyx-ſtone was no where to be found but in the mountains of this country.

After this account of the land of Havilah and its productions, if there can likewiſe be found a river which encompaſſes (i. e. with a winding ſtream waſhes) all one ſide of this country, and has alſo a communication with three other rivers by one common channel, we ſhall then have diſcovered all the concurring marks whereby Moſes deſcribes the Piſon. Steuchus expreſsly mentions this river, and adds that it flows from the Euphrates, toward the Arabians of Havilah. Father Kircher, in the geographical map, he inſerted in his deſcription of the tower of Babel, deſcribes the four Moſaic rivers, and gives the name of Piſon to the weſtern channel that empties itſelf into the Perſian gulph: And Teixeira declares in his travels, from the Indies into Italy, that it runs into the Perſian gulph, towards Al-Katif near Bahrein Now Katif is a town on the eaſtern coaſt of Arabia, and Bahrein is an iſland of the ſame gulph about ten leagues from Katif.

Again, the etymology of the word Piſon, enables us in ſome meaſure, to diſtinguiſh the river ſo called; for moſt of the Hebrew grammarians derive it either from the verb Puſch, which ſignifies to run out, to be full, to increaſe; or from Paſcha, which ſignifies to ſpread; becauſe tides are ſo violent and high at that end of the Perſian gulph, that trenches were not a ſufficient defence againſt the irruptions into the neighbouring lands that are very ſoft and low. All that coaſt therefore is full of lakes, marſhes, and ſands, as Strabo obſerves. (l. 16.) In the time of Moſes, therefore, when the induſtry of man might not have oppoſed any boundaries to thoſe innundations, they, in all probability, were much more extenſive than they are at preſent: Conſequently the name Piſon, was the propereſt appellation of a channel that was ſo often apt to overflow; and the author of the apocryphal book called Eccleſiaſticus ſeems to allude to this etymology, where he declares of the deity, that he filleth all with wiſdom as Phiſon, Eccluſ. xxiv. 25.

This concurrence therefore, of the ſeveral marks given by Moſes, may juſtly incline us to believe we have diſcovered the true Piſon; and it will not be improper to add, that as Moſes wrote his hiſtory in Arabia Petræa, or ſome place not very remote from thence, this river was the neareſt to him of the four, and conſequently it was natural for him to mention it firſt. Ver.

Ver. 13. And the name of the ſecond river is Gihon:] Moſes has not affixed ſo many marks on this river, as on the Piſon; for this latter being once ſufficiently diſtinguiſhed, the ſituation of the Gihon would be eaſily diſcovered. The Piſon being known to be the firſt river, in reſpect to the place where Moſes wrote, it is but natural to ſuppoſe, that the Gihon, as being the ſecond, was the river next to it, and conſequently the eaſtern channel of the two, into which the Euphrates, after its conjunction with the Tigris, is again divided.

The ſame it is that compaſſeth the whole land of Ethiopia.] Our tranſlators follow the Septuagint in rendering the Hebrew name Cuſh, by Ethiopia, not meaning that in Africa, but this in Aſia: For the antients frequently mention a double Ethiopia, as many have obſerved; particularly Job Ludolphus (Comment. in Hiſtor. Æthiop. c. iii. n. 6. This land of Cuſh was the Suſiana of the antients; but is now called Khuzeſtan by the Perſians, and is a province of Iran, extending itſelf as far as the coaſt of the Perſian gulph, at the eaſtern outlet of Euphrates, which may therefore be conſidered as the very Gihon deſcribed by Moſes.

Ver. 14. And the name of the third river is Hiddekel.] The name of Hiddekel which Moſes gives this river, that of Dijlat, which it bears in the Levant or eaſt; and that of Tigris, by which it is denominated by the Europeans, are one and the ſame name, varied by different nations according to the idioms of their reſpective languages: And in order to confirm this opinion it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that taking away the aſpiration of Hiddekel, the word Dekel remained, which the Aſſyrians and Chaldeans changed to Dijlat; Pliny or thoſe who informed him, diſguiſed it into Diglito; and the Greeks, who gave to all ſtrange words, the turn and genius of their own tongue, inſtead of Diglis, called it Tigris; induced probably ſo to do, by the information they had received of the ſwiftneſs of this river, which was aptly denoted by the name Tigris.

The method obſerved by Moſes in reckoning up the four rivers proves, that the Hiddekel is no other than the Tigris. For, as in reſpect of the place where Moſes was writing, the Piſon was the neareſt to him, and ſo in natural order was to be named firſt; and then the Gihon, as being the channel that preſented itſelf next: So having paſt over this channel or river, and turning to the left hand to come back to the place where he pen'd his hiſtory, we meet with the Tigris in the third place, which therefore it was but natural for Moſes to mention in this order.

That is it which goeth towards the eaſt of Aſſyria.] Or rather before Aſſyria; Moſes, by Aſſyria, could only mean that one province which was firſt ſo called, and whereof Nineveh was the capital city; now the river Hiddekel or Tygris does run along before Aſſyria; ſo taken, and conſidered in reſpect of the place where Moſes was writing, ſince there was no going from thence directly to Aſſyria, without croſſing firſt the Tigris, as running before it, or on that ſide of Aſſyria, which lay next to the parts where Moſes then was. This ſenſe is followed by the learned Hebrician Arias Montanus; and the ſeventy interpreters, together with the authors of the vulgar Latin, and Syriac tranſlations, render the Hebrew word, over-againſt, or along the ſide of Aſſyria, not reſtraining it to the eaſtern ſide.

And the fourth river is Euphrates.] This river is called Pherath in the Hebrew, and the neighbouring people ſtill give it the appellation of Frat; for Euphrates is one of thoſe corrupt names which our tranſlators have borrowed from the Septuagint verſion, and which probably the Greeks, as Reland judiciouſly obſerved, took from the Perſians, who often ſet the word Ab or Au, which in their language, ſignifies water, before the name of rivers; of which name, and Frat, the name Euphrates is compounded. The other opinion, which forms that name from a conjunction of Frat with the preceding particle hua, in the Hebrew text, is abſurd; as ſuppoſing the Greeks became firſt acquainted with that river, by reading this paſſage of Moſes relating to the ſituation of Eden.

Moſes only names this river, without affixing any mark of diſtinction on it; and that for theſe two reaſons; partly becauſe the other three being diſcovered and known, this laſt could not but be eaſily diſtinguiſhed; and partly becauſe its largeneſs and neighbourhood render'd it ſufficiently known, among the people to whom he writ.

Having thus diſcovered the four rivers mentioned by Moſes, in relation to the earthly Paradiſe, or the garden of Eden, we think we may venture to declare, that Eden was placed upon the united ſtream of Hiddekel or Dijlat (called Tigris by the Europeans) and of Frat or Euphrates. This united ſtream is called by the Arabs, Shat al Arab, that is, the river of the Arabs; and it begins two days journey above Baſrah, and about five leagues below, divides again into two or three channels, which empty themſelves into the Perſian gulph. By this hypotheſis, the Shat al Arab is the river paſſing out of Eden, which river, conſider'd according to the diſpoſition of its channel, and not according to the courſe of its ſtream, divides into four heads, or different branches, which make the four rivers mention'd by Moſes; two below, viz. the two branches of the Shat, which ſerve for the Piſon and Gihon; and two above, viz. the Frat and Dijlat, or the Euphrates and Hiddekel. According to this diſpoſition, the weſtern branch of the Shat will be Piſon, and the adjoining part of Arabia, bordering on the Perſian gulph, will be Havilah; and the eaſtern branch will be the Gihon, encompaſſing the country of Cuſh or Khuzeſtan, a province of Iran, as it is ſtill named by the Perſians.

Ver. 17. But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou ſhalt not eat of it.] That the trial of man's obedience ſhould be by ſuch a prohibition as is mentioned by Moſes, ſeems perfectly rational, and adapted to the ſtate of innocence; no moral precept could have been at all proper for that purpoſe, becauſe there was ſcarce a poſſibility of their tranſgreſſing any ſuch: it muſt therefore have been ſome indifferent action, neither good nor evil in itſelf, but ſo far only as it was commanded or forbidden. And what ſo natural and agreeable to the ſtate of our firſt parents (conſidering they were to live in a garden) as the forbidding them to eat of the fruit of a certain tree in that garden? a tree near at hand, and which might give them every moment an opportunity of ſhewing their obſervance of the Divine command, by their abſtaining from it.

And this takes off the objection againſt the puniſhment inflicted on man for his diſobedience, as too ſevere, and no way proportionable to the offence; for we are deceiv'd, if we ſuppoſe that good and evil are only in the nature of the things, and not in the commands and prohibitions of God. And conſidering this crime to have been a downright rebellion againſt God, and committed againſt the cleareſt conviction of conſcience, with other aggravating circumſtances, it will appear to have been a crime ſo heinous, that nothing can now be ſuppoſed to reſemble it.

For in the day thou eateſt thereof thou ſhalt ſurely die.] It is in the Hebrew, dying thou ſhalt die, to denote the certainty of it, not that Adam's death was to be inſtantaneous to his eating the forbidden fruit. The true meaning of the words is, he ſhould certainly die in conſequence of that ſtate of mortality to which he would be ſubject ment he tranſgreſſed the Divine command.

Ver. 18. And the Lord ſaid it is not good that the man ſhould be alone.] What an endearing inſtance is this of God's compaſſion to his new creature! It is as if he had ſaid, I know that ſolitude will be an uncomfortable ſtate for man, I will therefore provide a ſuitable companion for him, to heighten his reliſh of the Paradiſe wherein I have placed him.

Ver. 20. And Adam gave names to all cattle, &c.] The firſt thing which Adam did, after his introduction into the delightful garden of Eden, was to give names to all the beaſts and birds which preſented themſelves before him, not only for that purpoſe, but to perform their homage, as it were, and make Adam ſenſible that there was none among them fit to be a companion for him.

Ver. 21. And the Lord God cauſed a deep ſleep to fall upon Adam, &c.] Whereby he was render'd inſenſible of the pain which he might have experienced in the opening his ſide, if his mind had not been wholly intent upon ſomething elſe; as it was in this ſleep, which was accompanied with an ecſtaſy (ſo the ſeventy interpreters tranſlate this word) wherein was repreſented to his mind, both what was done to him, and the myſtery of it, as appears by verſes 23, 24.

And he took out one of his ribs.] It is fit here to be obſerved, that God did not form Eve out of the ground, as he he had done Adam; but out of his ſide, that he might kindle the greater love and tenderneſs between them, as parts of the ſame whole. Whereby he alſo effectually recommended marriage to all mankind, as founded in nature, and as the re-union of man and woman.

Ver. 23. And Adam ſaid this is now bone of my bone, &c.] Now indeed I have found, what I could not ſee before among all God's creatures, another ſelf.

She ſhall be called woman.] She ſhall partake of my name, as ſhe doth of my nature; for he called her Iſchah, as he was called Iſch, in the Hebrew.

Ver. 24. Therefore ſhall a man leave his father and mother, &c.] It may properly be asked, whether theſe words were ſpoken by Adam, or added by Moſes as a precept he receiv'd from God? The latter ſeems to be confirmed by the words of our bleſſed Saviour, Matt. xix. 4, 5. And he anſwered and ſaid unto them, Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning, made them male and female? And ſaid for this cauſe ſhall a man leave father and mother, &c.

And they ſhall be one fleſh.] It ſhould ſeem that the Deity, by creating, and joining together but one man and one woman in the beginning, intended mankind ſhould be ſo propagated, and not by polygamy.

Ver. 25. And they were both naked — and were not aſhamed.] Their minds were immaculate, and they were not conſcious of any ſentiment or tendency of mind that could poſſibly affect them with the guilty impreſſion of ſhame.

CHAP. III.

1 The ſerpent deceiveth Eve. 6 Man's ſhameful fall: 9 God arraigneth them. 14 The ſerpent is curſed. 15 The promiſed ſeed. 16 The puniſhment of mankind: 21 Their firſt cloathing: 22 Their caſting out of Paradiſe.

NOW the ſerpent was more ſubtil than any beaſt of the field which the LORD God had made: and he ſaid unto the woman, Yea, hath God ſaid, Ye ſhall not eat of every tree of the garden?

2 And the woman ſaid unto the ſerpent, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden:

3 But of the fruit of the tree which is in the midſt of the garden, God hath ſaid, Ye ſhall not eat of it, neither ſhall ye touch it, leſt ye die.

4 And the ſerpent ſaid unto the woman, Ye ſhall not ſurely die.

5 For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes ſhall be opened: and ye ſhall be as gods, knowing good and evil.

6 And when the woman ſaw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleaſant to the eyes, and a tree to be deſired to make one wiſe; ſhe took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave alſo unto her husband with her, and he did eat.

7 And the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked: and they ſewed fig-leaves together, and made themſelves aprons.

8 And they heard the voice of the LORD God walking in the garden in the cool of the day: and Adam and his wife hid themſelves from the preſence of the LORD God amongſt the trees of the garden.

9 And the LORD God called unto Adam, and ſaid unto him, Where art thou?

10 And he ſaid, I heard thy voice in the garden: and I was afraid, becauſe I was naked, and I hid myſelf.

11 And he ſaid, Who told thee that thou waſt naked? Haſt thou eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee, that thou ſhouldſt not eat?

12 And the man ſaid, The woman, whom thou gaveſt to be with me, ſhe gave me of the tree, and I did eat.

13 And the LORD God ſaid unto the woman, What is this that thou haſt done? And the woman ſaid, The ſerpent beguiled me, and I did eat.

14 And the LORD God ſaid unto the ſerpent, Becauſe thou haſt done this, thou art curſed above all cattel, and above every beaſt of the field: upon thy belly ſhalt thou go, and duſt ſhalt thou eat all the days of thy life.

15 And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy ſeed and her ſeed: it ſhall bruiſe thy head, and thou ſhalt bruiſe his heel.

16 Unto the woman he ſaid, I will greatly multiply thy ſorrow and thy conception. In ſorrow thou ſhalt bring forth children: and thy deſire ſhall be to thy husband, and he ſhall rule over thee.

17 And unto Adam he ſaid, Becauſe thou haſt hearkned unto the voice of thy wife, and haſt eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee, ſaying, Thou ſhalt not eat of it: curſed is the ground for thy ſake; in ſorrow ſhalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life.

18 Thorns alſo and thiſtles ſhall it bring forth to thee: and thou ſhalt eat the herb of the field.

19 In the ſweat of thy face ſhalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it waſt thou taken: for duſt thou art, and unto duſt ſhalt thou return.

20 And Adam called his wife's name Eve, becauſe ſhe was the mother of all living.

21 Unto Adam alſo and to his wife did the LORD God make coats of skins, and cloathed them.

22 ¶ And the LORD God ſaid, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil. And now leſt he put forth his hand, and take alſo of the tree of life, and eat, and life for ever:

23 Therefore the LORD God ſent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground, from whence he was taken.

24 So he drove out the man: and he placed at the eaſt of the garden of Eden, Cherubims, and a flaming ſword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life.

Euſebius obſerves, that Moſes having ſettled the great doctrines of the creation of the world, and the dignity of man, made in the image of God, proceeds very wiſely to inſtruct the Iſraelites, that there are none ſo happy, but, without due care and watchfulneſs, may become moſt miſerable, there being always hovering about every man an envious wicked Dæmon, an implacable enemy to the good, and, from the beginning, a wily underminer of mens ſalvation.

The conciſe manner, in which the fall of our firſt parents is related by Moſes, being, at firſt view, incumbred with ſome improbabilities, ſeveral learned and pious men have been inclined to believe, the whole ought to be taken in an allegorical ſenſe, alledging that the ancients, and particularly the eaſtern nations, had two different ways of delivering their divinity and philoſophy, a popular, and a myſterious or hidden one: which dubious ſort of ſtyle the ſcripture often makes uſe of, in explaining natural things; ſometimes, in accommodating itſelf to the capacities of the people, and at other times, to the real, but more veiled truth; and that to obviate the many difficulties which occur in the literal hiſtory of this ſad cataſtrophe, the ſafeſt way is to underſtand it as a parabolical ſtory, under which the real circumſtances are diſguiſed and concealed, as a myſtery not fit to be more explicitly declared.

But tho' it cannot be denied, that ſome of the ancient philoſophers affected ſuch an allegorical way of writing, to conceal their notions from the vulgar, and keep their learning within the bounds of their own ſchools, yet it is apparent that Moſes had no ſuch deſign, and as he only takes upon him to relate matters of fact juſt as they happen'd, without any intermixture of art or diſguiſe, it cannot be ſuppoſed but that this hiſtory of the fall is to be taken in a literal ſenſe, as well as the reſt of his writings.

Ver. 1. Now the ſerpent was more ſubtil than any beaſt of the field.] The firſt objection made to the letter of this hiſtory is in relation to the ſerpent, and particularly the improbability of his having the uſe of ſpeech, and rational diſcourſe; for to ſuppoſe an evil ſpirit, or the devil, made uſe of the organs of this animal, has, according to the objectors, no foundation in the text of Moſes, who attributes the ſeduction of Eve to the natural craftineſs of the ſerpent only. Beſides, the very ſpeech of ſuch an animal, if Eve had taken it to be dumb, muſt have ſo terrified her, that ſhe would ſcarce have ſtaid and entred into a conference with it. And if the ſerpent had originally the gift of ſpeech, but loſt it, as a puniſhment for his crime in ſeducing the woman, Moſes would ſurely not have paſſed it over in ſilence, and mentioned ſo ſmall a penalty as going on his belly, and licking the duſt; the meaning of which words it is not eaſy to explain, unleſs we ſuppoſe that the ſerpent did before walk upright; for if he crept from the beginning, it ſeems ridiculous to impoſe, as a puniſhment for a crime, what he was by nature ſubject to.

To all this it is anſwered, that as Moſes contents himſelf with relating facts as they appeared, without any comment or explication; he makes the ſerpent, it is true, who was the viſible inſtrument, to have been the ſeducer of the woman, and ſays nothing of the latent efficient cauſe; for which reaſon ſome of the ancient Jews were of opinion, that the whole paſſage is to be underſtood of a real ſerpent, which creature they ſuppoſe had originally the gift of reaſon and ſpeech; ſo that Eve might well have underſtood him. Joſephus ſuppoſes that all creatures, at that time, uſed the ſame language, and that the ſerpent converſing familiarly with Adam and Eve, excited by envy of their happineſs, maliciouſly perſuaded the woman to taſte the tree of knowledge; for which, among other puniſhments, he was deprived of the uſe of ſpeech, and of his feet, and obliged, ever after, to crawl on the ground. Of the ſame opinion are Aben Ezra and others. Others, thinking this too incredible, have imagined that it was not a real ſerpent, but only the devil under that name: But this opinion is no leſs liable to exception, For tho' the devil is frequently ſtiled in ſcripture the ſerpent, and the old ſerpent, yet why he ſhould be called the moſt ſubtle beaſt of the field, we cannot conceive; neither will the puniſhment inflicted on the ſerpent ſuffer us to doubt but that a ſerpent's body, at leaſt, was employed in the tranſaction.

The moſt common, therefore, and indeed the only probable opinion is, that it was the devil, ſome wicked and malicious ſpirit (probably the chief of thoſe beings) who envied the happineſs of mankind, and was reſolved to reduce them to the ſame miſerable condition with himſelf and his apoſtate companions; and that to effect his purpoſe he made uſe of a ſerpent's body as the propereſt organ for the ſucceſsful accompliſhment of his fraud. And this ſeems reaſonable, not only from the improbability of a brute beaſt's over reaching mankind in their higheſt pitch of underſtanding, but from the atteſtations of other parts of Scripture, where the devil is called the old ſerpent, and is, by our Saviour himſelf, ſaid to have been a murtherer from the beginning, or the firſt creation, alluding to his miſchievous deſtruction of mankind at that time: The author of the Book of Wiſdom, who was well acquainted with the doctrines of the Jewiſh church, alſo telling us, that by envy of the devil death came into the world. Wiſd. ii. 24.

Why the devil ſhould chuſe the body of a ſerpent rather than that of any other creature, was probably on account of that ſubtlety attributed to him by Moſes; which may not, perhaps, ſo much denote the craft and inſidiouſneſs, as the familiar and inſinuating nature of this creature. That the ſerpent, before the fall, was mild and gentle, and more familiar with man than any other creature; and that he did not then creep on the ground, but went erect, and had by his engaging behaviour gained, in ſome meaſure, the good will of our firſt parents, is not only the ſentiment of both Jews and Chriſtians, (Joſeph. Antiq. l. i. c. i. Sect. 4. Baſil. Homil. de Paradiſo. Damaſcen. de Orthodox. Fid. l. ii. c. x.) but ſeems likewiſe to have ſome foundation in Scripture: For when God declares, that he will put enmity between the ſerpent and the woman, and between his ſeed and her ſeed it muſt be implied that there was ſome kind of friendſhip between them before.

It is no way unreaſonable therefore to ſuppoſe, that this creature was beloved both by Adam and Eve: She eſpecially might be delighted with it; ſhe laid it perhaps in her boſom, adorned her neck with its windings, or made it a bracelet for her arms. So that its being ſo intimate with the woman, made it the propereſt inſtrument for the devil's purpoſe, who ſliding into it, might wantonly play before her, until he inſenſibly brought her to the forbidden tree, and then twiſting round its branches, might take of the fruit and eat, to ſhew her, by experience, that there was nothing of death contained in it, before he began to ſpeak to her; and his ſpeech might be the leſs ſurprizing to her, becauſe ſhe might probably think (as he might poſitively affirm) that this new acquired faculty proceeded from the virtue of the fruit.

But this conjecture is ſtill more probable, if we will but allow that the ſerpent, whoſe body the devil poſſeſſed, was not of a common ſpecies, but ſomething like that flying fiery ſort, which, as we are told, are bred in Arabia and Egypt. They are of a ſhining yellowiſh colour like braſs, and by the motion of their wings, and vibration of their tails, reverberating the ſun beams, make a glorious appearance. Now if the ſerpent, whoſe body the devil abuſed, was of this kind (tho' perhaps of a ſpecies far more ſplendid) it was a proper creature for his purpoſe: For theſe ſerpents are in Scripture called Seraphs or Seraphim, and gave name to thoſe bright angelical beings whom we commonly underſtand by that appellation: It being very probable, from the repreſentations tollerated of them in the Jewiſh church, that the Angels, when they miniſtred to Adam and Eve, were wont to aſſume certain ſplendid forms; ſome of them the form of Cherubim, or beautiful flying oxen, and others the ſhape of Seraphim, winged and flying ſerpents, the devil therefore might uſurp the organs of one of theſe ſhining ſerpents, which by his skill in natural cauſes he might improve into ſuch a ſurpaſſing brightneſs, as to repreſent to Eve the angelical appearance of the Schechinah, to which ſhe was accuſtomed: and having done this, it was no wonder that he ſo eaſily deceived her.

And he ſaid unto the woman, yea, hath God ſaid, ye ſhall not eat of every tree of the garden?] This rather looks like the concluſion of a diſcourſe than the beginning: And it is not improbable, that the tempter, before he ſpake theſe words, repreſented himſelf as one of the heavenly court; who came, or was ſent, to congratulate the happineſs God had beſtowed upon her in paradiſe; which was ſo great, that he could not eaſily believe he had denied them any of the fruit of the garden. He deſired therefore to be ſatisfied from her own mouth of the truth of what he pretended to have heard, or to know how they underſtood the command of God.

Ver. 6. And when the woman ſaw the tree was good, &c.] The ſerpent having gained the ear of Eve, ſhe looked ſo long upon the forbidden fruit, that ſhe had not only an appetite to it, as excellent food, but was delighted with its amiable colour; and was alſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed, by the perſuaſion of the old ſerpent, that her mind would be no leſs pleaſed than her palate, by an increaſe of knowledge and wiſdom. There were powerful temptations; ſhe thought them irreſiſtable; ſhe yielded, and did eat.

And gave alſo unto her husband with her.] It is probable, that he, after ſome reluctance, was prevailed on, by her charms and endearments, to violate the command, contrary to his ſenſe and duty, and to ſhare the doom which God's indignation for her tranſgreſſion ſhould bring upon her, Fatal tenderneſs!

Ver. 7. And the eyes of them both were opened, &c.] Not in the ſenſe promiſed by the deluding ſerpent, but in one extremely different. For they now ſaw their folly and made melancholly reflections upon what they had done.

And they knew or felt, that they were naked.] A cold ſhivering ſeized them, and they grew ſenſible that they were diveſted of their intellectual ornaments, they alſo bluſhed at their bodily nakedneſs of which they before were not aſhamed.

And they ſewed fig-leaves together, &c.] They twiſted or platted the pliant branches of the fig-tree round their waiſts, ſo that that the broad leaves hanging down might ſerve them inſtead of aprons: For we muſt not imagine that they ſewed the leaves together, which is more than the words of Moſes imply, ſince the Hebrew word, which is tranſlated ſewed; ſignifies no more than to put together, to apply, or fit, in which ſenſe it is uſed, Job xvi. 15. and Ezek. xiii. 18. And the word which we render leaves, ſignifies alſo branches of trees, ſuch as were fit to make booths, or bowers; Nehem. vii. 15.

Ver. 8. And they heard the voice of the Lord walking in the garden.] The ſound of the majeſtic preſence, or glory of the Lord, approaching nearer and nearer to the place where they vainly hoped to lie concealed. The walking may be referred to voice, as well as to the Lord, ſignifying that the awful ſound of the Divine Majeſty's approach came ſtill nearer and made a lowder noiſe to terrify their ſouls. For thus the word walk is applied to the voice of the trumpet at the giving of the law, when Moſes ſays of it (Exod. xix. 19.) it walked, or increaſed, and grew ſtronger.

In the cool of the day.] When the wind began to blow: In the wind of the day, as it is in the Hebrew, that is, towards the evening, as moſt underſtand it; for then there was wont to be a gentle breath of wind as Ariſtotle obſerves of his country, when he ſays, it was uſual for the Weſt Wind to blow, towards the cloſe of the day. Which being a ſoft and gentle gale, the ſound they heard was the more ſolemn and aſtoniſhing, and ſeem'd to be the harbinger of a dreadful ſtorm.

Adam and his wife hid themſelves from the preſence of the Lord.] The conſciouſneſs of their guilt rendered them incapable of ſuſtaining the view of that tremendous preſence; they were chill'd with horror, and fled away, to ſhroud themſelves in unavailing ſhade.

In all probability, the divine Schechinah was no longer array'd in the affable majeſty he aſſumed, amidſt the condeſcention of his former viſits, and which rendered his appearance ſupportable to his then favour'd creatures. He now was cloathed with terrors, his radiant ſmiles, that once were the heavenly ſolace of their ſouls, were loſt in frowns of indignation, and he perhaps advanced towards them, in a tempeſt of ſuch flames as kindled mount Sinai, at the promulgation of the law.

Ver. 9. And the Lord God called unto Adam, and ſaid unto him, where art thou?] Why doſt thou fly from the preſence of thy maker, in this unuſual manner? What induces thee to hide thy ſelf in gloomy coverts, like the beaſts of the forreſt? Come forth, and acquaint me with the reaſon of this timorous conduct.

Ver. 10. And he ſaid, I heard thy voice, and I was afraid, becauſe I was naked, &c.] I trembled at the ſound of thy approaching preſence, and durſt not preſent myſelf before thee, becauſe I beheld myſelf naked!

Ver. 11. And he ſaid who told thee that thou waſt naked? &c. To what cauſe doſt thou owe this ſudden diſcovery? Is then the nakedneſs of which thou art conſcious, thy only motive for concealing thyſelf from thy Lord and benefactor? Or haſt thou violated my command, and eaten of the fruit from which I enjoin'd thee to abſtain?

Ver. 12. And the man ſaid, the woman whom thou gaveſt to be with me, ſhe gave me of the tree, &c.] I confeſs my guilt, into which I was enſnared by her whom thou gaveſt me for my ſolace. Thus are we apt to palliate our own Crimes, by charging them on others, when we ought to take the imputation to ourſelves.

Ver. 13. And the Lord God ſaid unto the woman, what is this thou haſt done?] What could be thy inducement to act in this inexcuſable manner?

And ſhe ſaid the ſerpent beguiled me, &c.] My unſuſpecting innocence was betray'd by the ſubtlety of the ſerpent. She was as willing as her husband to transfer the guilt of her conduct upon another. But God undoubtedly convinced them both of the enormity of their offence, and the miſerable condition into which it had involved them. Which ſhews the infinite mercy of the benign creator who was unwilling to abandon them in their deſtitute ſtate, and was deſirous to ſave them when they had loſt themſelves.

It has been objected that it would have been but juſt, that ſome good angels ſhould have ſuccoured a poor weak woman, and that a perſon who had ſo great a price ſet upon her head, as the ſalvation of all mankind, might well have deſerved an angelic guard. 'Tis likewiſe added, that it ſeems to reflect upon the wiſdom and goodneſs of God himſelf to ſuffer his whole creation, which he had been ſo many days in forming, to be ruin'd in a moment's time by a malicious ſpirit; and they think it very extraordinary that the God of mercy ſhould abandon a poor young creature to the malignant wiles of an old crafty devil, and damn all her poſterity, for her not being ſo cunning as her enemy.

To all which it may be anſwered, that theſe allegations are grounded upon a miſtake common to the objectors and ſome of the ancient heathens, that a good and juſt God could not permit evil among free agents, which is a ſuppoſition that ariſes from another unreaſonable miſtake, viz. that a juſt and wiſe God cannot permit evil at all. Now it is true, that there are ſome parts of natural evils which God could not permit, ſuch, for inſtance, as might happen to the inanimate parts of the creation, as any blunder'd irregular formation of their parts, any defect in their nature or conſtitution; for all ſuch evil as this muſt then needs proceed from God, who gave them this irregular nature, in which they could have no hand themſelves. Therefore we freely own, God cannot permit evil of this kind. But the queſtion is, whether he cannot permit moral evil among free agents, and unleſs we grant that he could, it is impoſſible there can be any ſuch being as a free agent: For if God could not permit evil, then man could do nothing but good, his actions would all be determined on one ſide, and conſequently he could no more be ſaid to be free, than a ſtone is ſuch, when it neceſſarily falls downwards. Nor does this permiſſion at all reflect upon God's goodneſs; for he only gives his free-will and power to his creatures, which is an act of beneficence, but it is owing to their own voluntary ill uſe of it that they commit commit evil. The only difficulty therefore ſeems to be how to think God ſhould permit an evil of ſo vaſt a conſequence as the diſobedience of our firſt parents.

In anſwer to which, it muſt be granted that Adam and Eve were free agents, and therefore all the reſtraints God could lay upon them to reſiſt the devil's temptations, muſt be ſuch as were conſonant to their free-will. For if the deity had given them ſuch powerful influxes of his ſpirit, as would have render'd it impoſſible for them to ſin, he muſt have alter'd their natures, and have changed them from free to neceſſary agents, and then they would have been over-ruled by as abſolute an impulſe, as operates on ſtones and trees. All that we can ſuppoſe reaſonable for God to do, is to diſpenſe to them ſuch abundant meaſures of his grace, as might enable them to encounter the ſtrongeſt temptations; but yet in ſuch a manner as might be conſiſtent with their reaſon and free-will. Now if ſuch an angelic guard, as ſome have thought neceſſary to preſerve them from ſinning, had been ſo continually about them as to prevent the devil from propoſing any temptation; if they had ſupernaturally over-ruled the organs of our firſt parents bodies, or the inclinations of their minds, from the leaſt tendency to evil, God then would not have dealt with them as human creatures; but as brutes. Beſides, he placed them in a ſtate of probation; but to have over-ruled their actions and determined them only on one ſide, would have been to have acted counter to his deſign, it would have been to have put them to a trial, and at the ſame time to have render'd it impoſſible for them to be tried. So that let the miſcarriage be of ever ſo great conſequence, we cannot ſuppoſe, that God ſhould act contrary to his wiſdom and eternal reaſon, for the prevention of it.

I may add too that what God did not by his abſolute power hinder before, he did by his mercy ſufficiently repair in the event. For immediately after the fall, God the Father agreed to the mediatorſhip of his Son, and by this wonderful condeſcenſion, after ſo great a provocation, his goodneſs is now much more abundantly manifeſted, than it would have been by the prevention of the offence; as men are more ſenſibly affected, with a pardon graciouſly offered after the conviction of a crime, than they are by a diſpenſation for it, or a connivance at it.

Ver. 14. And the Lord ſaid unto the ſerpent thou art curſed, &c.] It is obſerved by Tertullian, that tho' God inflicted puniſhments on Adam and Eve, yet he did not curſe them, as he did the ſerpent, ut reſtitutionis candidatos, they ſtanding fair for reſtitution to his favour.

Upon thy belly ſhalt thou go, &c.] We are not to ſuppoſe that God Almighty was any ways offended at the ſerpent, becauſe the devil had deceived our firſt parents by the miniſtration of his organs; but he created this change in his body, that it might remain as a monument of the unhappy fall; of God's averſion to ſin; and to deter men from the commiſſion of that which brought ſo much vengeance with it. As for the original reptility of the ſerpent, it is plain from this hiſtory that it is falſe; and we ſuppoſe the change to be from ſuch a radiant Seraph, as was before mentioned, to a mean creeping ſnake.

Ver. 15. I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy ſeed and her ſeed.] An irreconcileable averſion, throughout all generations. Which is true of the ſerpent literally underſtood, between whom and mankind there is ſuch an antipathy, that it diſcovers itſelf both in the natural and ſenſitive faculties of them both. But this is far more true of the ſpiritual ſerpent, the devil, and his angels who joined with him in his apoſtacy, and the woman and her ſeed, in whom theſe words are more literally fulfilled.

It ſhall bruiſe thy head.] That ſeed of the woman ſhall deſpoil thee of thy power, (meaning the devil) and aboliſh thy tyranny. For in the head of the ſerpent, to which there is here an alluſion, lies his ſtrength. And therefore Mr. Mede has rightly interpreted the ſerpent's head, to ſignify the devil's ſovereignty; and that ſovereignty is the power of death: Which headſhip of the devil, the ſeed of the woman (that is Chriſt the Lord) hath broken in pieces, and at laſt will utterly deſtroy.

And thou ſhalt bruiſe his heel.] This victory over the devil was not to be acquired without blood, for that malignant ſpirit did his utmoſt to deſtroy the ſeed, but that was impracticable, and he could only aſſault his lower part (called here the heel) viz. his body, which, by his inſtruments, he perſecuted, and at laſt crucified. By which very means (ſo admirable was the wiſdom and goodneſs of God) the ſeed of the woman conquer'd the devil. For Chriſt was literally the ſeed of the woman, and not of the man, being born without his inſtrumentality, of a pure virgin. God in this promiſe was infinitely gracious to our father Adam; who having been ſeduced by his wife, to eat the forbidden fruit, might have entertain'd an irreconcileable averſion to her, had not the Deity condeſcended to prevent it by making this merciful promiſe of a Redeemer, to depend upon his union with his wife, from whom he aſſures them, one ſhould deſcend, who ſhould repair the loſſes they had ſuſtain'd.

Ver. 16. Unto the woman he ſaid,] Next to the ſerpent the woman receives her ſentence, becauſe ſhe was more in fault than Adam, being guilty of her own perſonal ſin, and of her husband's alſo.

In ſorrow ſhalt thou bring forth children.] Brute creatures are obſerved to bring forth their young with far leſs pain and difficulty, and danger, than women commonly experience in their labour.

And thy deſire ſhall be to thy husband.] That is, it ſhall be ſubject to him, as the vulgar latin, and Aben Ezra expound this phraſe.

Ver. 17. And unto Adam he ſaid — curſed ſhall the ground be, &c.] It is not at all abſurd that the earth ſhould be curſed for the tranſgreſſion of man; ſince ſuch a conduct is agreeable to the general opinion of mankind in circumſtances of the like nature. The ancient heathens had not only their piacula, things accurſed, by way of tranſmutation of puniſhment, and their dies nefandi, accurſed times; but even their campi ſceleratı, accurſed fields. Thoſe are greatly miſtaken who imagine this curſe of the earth by God Almighty, was an effect of his anger, when it is only the reſult of a wiſe and equitable juſtice, ſince it was but a preſent puniſhment of man who had offended, and who was to ſuffer by the conſequences of this curſe, when he, by the ſweat of his brows, was obliged to keep it in an ordinary ſtate of fertility, much inferior to its paradiſiacal fruitfulneſs.

Ver. 21. And unto Adam and his wife did the Lord God make coats of ſkins, &c.] Judgment being paſſed on all that were concerned in this unhappy affair, the ever merciful creator condeſcended to furniſh the dejected pair with a proper cloathing to defend them from the ſeverities of the air, which was now to degenerate from its original ſerenity and genial temperament. There is no neceſſity for ſuppoſing that either the Deity himſelf, or ſome angel made them their coats of skin, for the Hebrew language attributes many things to God, which are not done by his immediate act, but ſometimes by his direction, and ſometimes by the permiſſion of his ordinary providence. So here the coats are ſaid to be made by God, whereas 'tis probable, that our firſt parents only received inſtructions how to ſhape them, or only, perhaps, becauſe they were the gift of God, who having made a moſt gracious covenant with them, it ſeems not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that he alſo ſignified to them, they ſhould, for the confirmation of it, offer ſacrifices to him. By the blood of which, covenants were ratified in future times, from this example. For it is not likely that the beaſts, whoſe skins were appropriated to the cloathing of Adam and Eve, died of themſelves; or that they were killed merely for this purpoſe, or to furniſh them with food. In all probability therefore they were ſlain, by the expreſs order of God, for a ſacrifice to him (the better to repreſent to our firſt parents their guilt) and he directed coats to be made of the skins of thoſe beaſts to cloath the penitent offenders.

Ver. 22. Behold the man is become like one of us.] Man, in this place, includes woman, and theſe words are generally thought to have been ſpoken ſarcaſtically, to reprove their great folly in thinking to increaſe their knowledge whether God would or no. This expreſſion, like one of us, is ſuppoſed by ſeveral commentators, plainly to inſinuate a plurality of perſons in the Godhead. Others imagine that the Deity addreſſed this diſcourſe to the angels, who are ſometimes called Gods. But the former opinion ſeems moſt conſonant to truth.

And now leſt he put forth his hand, &c.] This ſeems to be an incompleat form of ſpeech, ſomething concluſive from it being omitted, as let us diſplace him from this garden, or ſome ſuch expreſſion. This paſſage likewiſe ſeems to be a continuation of the bitter irony couched in the

firſt words of the verſe, and the whole may be paraphraſed thus: Man, by eating of the forbidden fruit, has already render'd himſelf as competent a judge of the nature of good and evil as one of us, and therefore, leſt he ſhould prove our equal in immortality, as well as in knowledge, let us defeat the intentions of this aſpiring rival, by removing him from the garden which he imagined would dignify him with ſuch godlike qualifications,

Ver. 24. — And he placed at the eaſt of the garden of Eden, Cherubims.] There are ſeveral opinions concerning the Cherubims, and flaming ſword, placed to guard the tree of life. Thoſe who place Paradiſe in the ſouthern hemiſphere, conceive the ſword to have been no more than the torrid zone, which in the parallel ſituation the earth is then ſuppoſed to have had, muſt have been a region of flame intolerably hot like a furnace, and conſequently impaſſable; its encompaſſing the whole earth ſufficiently (as they imagine) anſwering the Moſaic deſcription, that it turned every way. Others have thought it to have been a wall or circle of fire encompaſſing Paradiſe (the words commonly render'd flaming ſword, being in the original the flame of cutting, or diviſion, or a dividing flame; for the ſame word which ſignifies a ſword ſignifies alſo diviſion) and that this flame was an accenſion of ſome inflammable matter round about the garden, which excluded all comers to it, till the beauty of it was defaced: which opinion may be more probable to them who place Paradiſe about Babylon, where there is ſuch an abundance of naptha and bitumen, and where there are fields, which even yet, at ſome time of the year, ſeem all on fire. But it may be asked, what have theſe Cherubims or angels to do with this impervious wall of flame? To which I anſwer, That it was cuſtomary for the Hebrews to expreſs all the extraordinary works of God by angels, as to call a plague, famine, &c. a deſtroying angel. Nay farther, they being averſe from the philoſophy of mechanic and material principles, uſed to explain the common phænomena of nature by vital, pneumatic, or which is the ſame, angelic principles. So the Pſalmiſt explains the motions of winds, and the burning of fire to be performed by the miniſtry of angels. Who maketh his angels ſpirits, or winds, and his miniſters a flaming fire. Pſalm civ. 4. So that in ſhort, by the Cherubim and flaming diviſion here, is underſtood only a fiery wall or circle encompaſſing the garden, and raiſed in a ſupernatural manner for its defence.

I ſhall cloſe the remarks on this important chapter with obſerving, that the devil's aſſuming the form of a ſerpent in preference to that of any other creature, was but conſonant to ſome of his after-practices in other parts of the world. It is known to all, that the great oracle of Delphos was deliver'd by the Pythoniſſa, or the prieſteſs of the ſerpent. Maximus Tyrius ſays the ſerpent was the great ſymbol of the deity to moſt nations, and as ſuch was worſhipped by the Indians. And Grotius has made it evident out of ancient authors, that in the old Greek myſteries they uſed to carry about a ſerpent, and cry Eva; which ſeems to be a perfect exultation of the devil over the unhappy deception of our firſt mother.

With reſpect to Paradiſe, Plato, in his Sympoſium, hath preſerved the memory of it; his Kepos Dios, the garden of Jupiter, being the ſame with this garden of God, in which man was firſt placed. And as to that malignant ſpirit, who was the firſt author of evil, Pherecydes, the ſchollar of Pythagoras, called him Ophionea, which ſignifies, a dæmon in the ſhape of a ſerpent, as is obſerved by Heidegger, Exercit. iv. de Adamo & Eva, n. 82.

CHAP. IV.

1 The birth, trade, and religion of Cain and Abel. 8 The murder of Abel. 11 The curſe of Cain. 17 Enoch the firſt city. 19 Lamech and his two wives. 25 The birth of Seth, 26 and Enos.

AND Adam knew Eve his wife; and ſhe conceived and bare Cain, and ſaid, I have gotten a man from the LORD.

2 And ſhe again bare his brother Abel: And Abel was a keeper of ſheep, but Cain was a tiller of the ground.

3 And in proceſs of time it came to paſs, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the LORD.

4 And Abel, he alſo brought of the firſtlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof. And the LORD had reſpect unto Abel, and to his offering.

5 But unto Cain and to his offering he had not reſpect. And Cain was very wroth, and his countenance fell.

6 And the LORD ſaid unto Cain, why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen?

7 If thou doeſt well, ſhalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doeſt not well, ſin lieth at the door. And unto thee ſhall be his deſire, and thou ſhalt rule over him.

8 And Cain talked with Abel his brother: and it came to paſs when they were in the field, that Cain roſe up againſt Abel his brother, and ſlew him.

9 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? and he ſaid I know not: Am I my brother's keeper?

10 And he ſaid, What haſt thou done? the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground.

11 And now art thou curſed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand.

12 When thou tilleſt the ground, it ſhall not henceforth yield unto thee her ſtrength: A fugitive and a vagabond ſhalt thou be in the earth.

13 And Cain ſaid unto the LORD, My puniſhment is greater than I can bear.

14 Behold, thou haſt driven me out this day from the face of the earth, and from thy face ſhall I be hid, and I ſhall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth; and it ſhall come to paſs, that every one that findeth me ſhall ſlay me.

15 And the LORD ſaid unto him, Therefore whoſoever ſlayeth Cain, vengeance ſhall be taken on him ſeven-fold. And the LORD ſet a mark upon Cain, leſt any finding him ſhould kill him.

16 ¶ And Cain went out from the preſence of the LORD, and dwelt in the land of Nod, on the eaſt of Eden.

17 And Cain knew his wife, and ſhe conceived and bare Enoch: and he builded a city, and called the name of the city, after the name of his ſon, Enoch.

18 And unto Enoch was born Irad: and Irad beget Mehujael: and Mehujael begat Methuſael: and Methuſael begat Lamech.

19 ¶ And Lamech took unto him two wives: the name of the one was Adah, and the name of the other Zillah.

20 And Adah bare Jabal: he was the father of ſuch as dwell in tents, and of ſuch as have cattel.

21 And his brother's name was Jubal: he was the father of all ſuch as handle the harp and organ.

22 And Zillah, ſhe alſo bare Tubal-cain, an inſtructer of every artificer in braſs and iron: and the ſiſter of Tubal-cain was Naamah.

23 And Lamech ſaid unto his wives, Adah and Zillah, Hear my voice, ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my ſpeech: for I have ſlain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt.

24 If Cain ſhall be avenged ſeven-fold, truly Lamech ſeventy and ſeven fold.

25 ¶ And Adam knew his wife again; and ſhe bare a ſon, and called his name Seth: For God, ſaid ſhe, hath appointed me another ſeed inſtead of Abel, whom Cain ſlew.

26 And to Seth, to him alſo there was born a ſon; and he called his name Enos: then began men to call upon the name of the LORD.

It is evident that the immediate poſterity of Adam could eaſily be aſſured of the manner in which the Deity had created their parents, from whom they derived their beings. They could likewiſe be fully ſatisfied of the truth of their ſin, and of the promiſe God had made them, that the ſeed of the woman ſhould deſtroy the enemy of mankind.

Theſe important points may therefore be juſtly ſuppoſed to have been the principal objects of their meditations; and it appears through the whole courſe of their conduct, not only when they did that which was good, but when they ſuffered themſelves to be betrayed into ſin, that the promiſe of a Meſſiah had affected their hearts with a deep impreſſion.

The ſin of Cain in killing his brother, manifeſts his belief of that promiſe, and his perſuaſion that it was applicable to himſelf; for as the divine oracle was expreſſed in very general terms, it might be thought to have a reference either to the firſt ſon of Eve, or to his poſterity; or elſe to ſome other who might be called her ſeed, becauſe born from one of her progeny. Now it appears from the name which Eve gave to Cain, that ſhe took the words of this prediction in the firſt ſenſe, that is, ſhe look'd upon Cain to be the ſon that had been promiſed her, as appears from her own words, I have gotten a man from the Lord; and it may naturally be ſuppoſed, that as ſhe entertained this opinion herſelf, ſhe was careful to cheriſh and flatter the ſame in her ſon, that he was to fulfill the firſt prophecy. And it is no more unreaſonable to believe this, than it is to imagine that Mandane infuſed into the mind of her ſon Cyrus aſpiring thoughts for the empire of Aſia, from the dream of Aſtyages, which ſhe conſidered as a divine prediction.

When we read, therefore, that Cain ſlew his brother, when he ſaw him approved by God, by a very diſtinguiſhing preference in the act of their ſacrificing, we may reaſonably conclude, that as he had never diſtruſted the truth of the promiſe itſelf, ſo he could not endure to ſee another diſpute his pretenſions to be the fulfiller of that firſt oracle,

Ver. 1. And Adam knew his wife, &c.] Where Adam dwelt after his expulſion from Paradiſe, is uncertain; but it is likely he did not remove to any great diſtance from it. The eaſtern nations, indeed, have a tradition that Adam went into India, and did penance on the mountain, thence named Pico de Adam, in the iſle of Ceylon, for ſeveral years. Some Rabbins pretend that he was ſeparated from Eve for the ſpace of 130 years, and lived with another woman named Lilith, formed out of the ground like himſelf; during which time he begat dæmons on her, as the devils did on Eve. The Mohammedans ſay, that when the firſt pair were caſt down from Paradiſe, Adam fell on Ceylon, and Eve near Joddah in Arabia, and that after a ſeparation of 200 years, Adam was, on his repentance, conducted, by the angel Gabriel, to a mountain near Mecca, where he found and knew his wife. But leaving theſe opinions to thoſe who are weak enough to embrace them, we proceed to remark, that Adam, after his removal from Paradiſe, conſummated his marriage with Eve, which, as the words of Moſes ſeem to imply, he had not done before the fall, and which appears to be a ſtrong argument for the ſhort duration of the primitive ſtate of innocence.

And ſhe conceived and bare Cain, and ſaid I have gotten a man from the Lord.] The name Cain, ſignifies an acquiſition, or poſſeſſion, being derived, tho' not very regularly, from the Hebrew verb kana, to acquire.

Ver. 2. And ſhe again bare his brother Abel.] Or Hebel, which in Hebrew ſignifies vanity, or a vapour, and not mourning, as Joſephus and Euſebius ſuppoſe. This ſeems a name not very appoſite to Adam's ſecond ſon, and therefore Moſes has given no reaſon for its impoſition; but if it be derived from the Syriac, Yhab il, which anſwers to the Latin name Deus dedit, God gave, it is very proper; and accordingly in the margin of a manuſcript copy of Abu'lfaragius, we find the name of Abel interpreted in Arabic, by that of Hebatallah, the gift of God. Thoſe, however, who contend for the Hebrew derivation of this name, may poſſibly have reaſon on their ſide; for when Eve became ſenſible that the promiſe of the Meſſiah was not likely to be accompliſhed in her firſt-born ſon Cain, in whom ſhe had placed her expectation, ſhe might deſpair of its being fulfilled by her ſecond, and conſequently it would be natural for her to give him a name which intimated the fruſtration of her hopes, which were now vaniſhed like a vapour, and were as little to be depended upon as vanity itſelf.

Abu'lfaragius ſays, Cain was born in the 30th year of the world, with a twin ſiſter, whom that author calls Klimia; Eutychius, Azrun, and others, Kalmanna. And that thirty years after, Abel was born with a twin ſiſter alſo, named Lebudha, or Leſura; by Eutychius (who ſays Leſura was her Greek name) Owain, and by others Delborah. But in all probability Cain was born in the firſt year of the world, and his brother Abel the year following.

When they were grown up, they betook themſelves to diſtinct employments; the former of them to husbandry, and the latter to the keeping of ſheep, but their inward diſpoſitions were ſtill more different.

Ver. 3. And in proceſs of time.] The words in the Hebrew are, in the end of days, by which may be ſignified the concluſion of the year, or time after harveſt. This is the import of the word days, in many other places, particularly Judg. xi. 4. where after days, is after a year; and this was a very ſeaſonable time to teſtify their grateful acknowledgments to God, who had given them a fruitful year, and bleſſed their labours with increaſe.

Cain brought of the fruit of the ground, an offering unto the Lord.] Theſe were the moſt ancient ſacrifices among the Gentiles, both Greek and Roman, and it is moſt likely that Adam began with theſe oblations of herbs, flowers, frankincenſe, meal, &c. in which Cain follow'd him, as being of the ſame profeſſion. And as there were ſome ſolemn times of making their devout acknowledgments to God, ſo, in all probability, there were ſome ſet places, where they met for that purpoſe; for the Hebrew word which ſignifies brought, is never applied to domeſtic or private ſacrifices, but always to thoſe publick ones which were brought to the door of the Tabernacle of the Congregation, to be offered by the prieſt, as Levit. iv. 4. He ſhall bring his bullock to the door. Which form of expreſſion expreſſion occurs all along, eſpecially in the 9th chapter of that book.

We may reaſonably ſuppoſe, therefore, that Cain and Abel brought their reſpective ſacrifices to ſome fixed place, looking, perhaps, to the happy garden of Eden, from which their parents had been expelled. It is the opinion of ſome commentators, that they brought theſe oblations to Adam to be offer'd by him; but there ſeems to be no convincing reaſon for this ſuppoſition, ſince they rather ſeem to have made their offerings themſelves. This paſſage likewiſe effectually confutes the opinion of thoſe who ſay the firſt born were ſeparated to the office of the prieſthood; for it is evident, by the inſtance under conſideration, that the youngeſt ſacrificed as well as the eldeſt.

Ver. 4. And Abel he alſo brought of the firſtlings of his flock, &c.] Many have concluded from hence, that the guilt of Cain conſiſted in his not bringing the firſt of his fruit, as he ought to have done; for it is only ſaid, that he brought of the fruit of his ground, when Abel brought of the firſtlings of his flock; and Moſes alſo adding that Abel brought of the fat thereof, or the very beſt, they think Cain's fault was, that he with-held the fulleſt ears of corn, and only brought the lankeſt, and even them with an avaricious reluctant mind. But there is no certainty of this, and the author to the Hebrews directs us to a better account Heb. xi. 4. Abel offered with a pious mind, Cain without a due ſenſe of God, or any ſincere affection to him. He offer'd the fruit of his ground, but did not devote himſelf to God, the author of its fertility.

And the Lord had reſpect unto Abel and his offering, &c.] In what viſible manner God declared his acceptance of Abel's offering, is not expreſſed by Moſes. The common opinion is, that fire from heaven deſcended on the ſacrifice, and conſumed it, but did not touch Cain's. This is ſupported by the verſion of Theodotion, who tranſlates the Hebrew word, which we render had reſpect unto, enepuriſen, he ſet on fire; the uſual ſign whereby God has been pleaſed to teſtify his approbation in other inſtances. The Mohammedans likewiſe affirm the ſame thing, and the Heathens themſelves boaſted of the like extraordinary marks of the divine favour, in ſome particular places, which if duly attended to, no conſidering man would think the antiquity of the books of Moſes to be leſs conſiderable than we have aſſerted, ſince they open to us the very fountains of things, and particularly of the ancient religion.

Ver. 5.———And Cain was very wroth, &c.] This highly incenſed him againſt his brother, and tempted him to kill him, that he might not ſupplant him in his hope, of being the fulfiller of the oracle before mentioned.

Ver. 6. And the Lord ſaid unto Cain, why art thou wroth? &c.] God condeſcended to expoſtulate the matter with Cain, and that he did not caſt him wholly off, by refuſing his ſacrifice, ſeems apparent from this queſtion, which was to acquaint him in effect, that he had no reaſon to be angry, but only to become a better man: And then God would have reſpect to him alſo.

Ver. 7. If thou doſt well ſhalt thou not be accepted?] Canſt thou doubt that I have an impartial reſpect to true goodneſs, in whomſoever it appears?

And if thou doſt not well ſin lieth at the door.] According to Dr. Lightfoot, the Hebrew ought to have been render'd, a ſin-offering lieth at the door; intimating, that if he repented there was hope of pardon. Thus as God had read the firſt lecture of faith to Adam, in the promiſe of the Meſſiah, ſo he now read the firſt lecture of repentance to Cain, under the doctrine of a ſin-offering.

Ver 8. And Cain talked with Abel his brother.] The words, in the original, ſtrictly ſignify, Cain ſaid unto Abel his brother: After which there is a blank ſpace left in the Hebrew copies, as if ſomething was wanting. The Samaritan Pentateuch and Septuagint verſion ſupply this vacancy by adding the words, Let us go into the field: But the Jeruſalem Targum, and that of Jonathan ben Uzzel, have obliged us with the whole converſation. Says Cain, There is no future judgment, nor judge, nor life after this, nor reward for the juſt, nor puniſhment for the wicked: The world was neither created, nor is governed by the mercy of God, foraſmuch as thy oblation was accepted, and mine rejected. To which Abel anſwers, There is a future judgment, and a judge, and a life to come: There is both a reward for the juſt, and a puniſhment for the unjuſt: The world was created, and is governed by the mercy of God. And becauſe my works are better than thine, therefore was my oblation accepted, and thine rejected. Upon which enſued the quarrel, which ended in Abel's murther. An ill beginning of religious controverſy. Mohammed has alſo, in his Koran, inſerted the debate between the two brothers, ſomewhat to the ſame purpoſe.

Cain roſe up againſt Abel and ſlew him.] Whatever might have been the converſation that paſt between them, Cain was implacable in the antipathy he had conceived againſt his brother, and ſlew him, after which he, in all probability, buried his dead body in hopes of concealing the murder.

The time, place, and manner of this unnatural action, are incapable of being determined with any ſufficient certainty, perhaps it might be committed about the 129th year of Adam, the Scripture declaring expreſsly, that Seth who was appointed inſtead of Abel, was born in the 130th year, Gen. v. 3. The place where this righteous perſon was ſlain, according to an ancient tradition, is ſaid to be ſtill ſhewn at the foot of a hill near Damaſcus. As to the manner wherein Cain committed this barbarity, there is a great variety of opinions. Eutychius and the Arabs ſay he ſtruck him on the head with a ſtone; ſome Jews tell us that he tore him in pieces with his teeth; others, that he killed him with the Jaw-bone of an aſs, which is the weapon the painters generally put into Cain's hand. Some arm him with a fork; St. Chryſoſtome with a ſword; St. Irenæus with a ſcythe, and Prudentius with a pruning-hook.

Whether Abel was married or not, has been diſputed. Some of the ancient Fathers, have maintained the affirmative, as did alſo ſome hereticks called Abelians. According to the oriental tradition, Adam propoſed to Eve that Cain ſhould marry Abel's twin ſiſter, and Abel Cain's; but this Cain refuſed to agree to, inſiſting to have his own ſiſter, who was the moſt amiable of the two. Adam hereupon was greatly diſpleaſed, becauſe it was againſt the divine command that he ſhould marry his twin ſiſter, and ordered his ſons to make their offerings before they took their wives, referring the diſpute, probably, to God's determination. But while they went up the mountain for that purpoſe, the devil put it into Cain's head to deſtroy his brother; for which wicked intent his ſacrifice was not accepted; and they were no ſooner come down from the mountain, than he fell on Abel, and killed him with a ſtone. Thus was a woman, according to this ſtory, the occaſion of the firſt quarrel in the world; nam fuit ante helenam, &c.

The Rabbins, and ſome Chriſtians (Eutych. p. 16.) ſay that Adam and Eve mourned for Abel one hundred years, during which time they lived ſeparate; Adam in a valley near Hebron, thence named the valley of tears. The inhabitants of Ceylon pretend, that the ſalt lake on the mountain of Columbo, was formed by the tears which Eve ſhed on this occaſion.

Ver. 9. And the Lord ſaid unto Cain where is Abel thy brother?] This is not ſpoken as if the deity was ignorant of what had happened; but to awaken Cain, and make him ſenſible that God knew what he had acted by his brother.

Ver. 10. The voice of thy brother's blood crieth, &c.] In the Hebrew it is bloods, in the plural number; becauſe, ſay the Jewiſh doctors, he killed Abel and all his poſterity, which were then in his loins. According to what we find, 2 Kings ix. 26. I have ſeen the blood of Nabotk, and the blood of his ſons, ſaid the Lord: Tho' we read of nobody ſtoned but Naboth himſelf.

Ver. 11. And now thou art curſed from the earth, &c.] I paſs a ſentence of perpetual baniſhment upon thee from this country. Hitherto Adam and his children had lived together; but now, as Aben Ezra well obſerves, Cain was baniſhed into a region far from his father, who dwelt in the neighbourhood of Paradiſe.

A fugitive and a vagabond ſhalt thou be in the earth.] In that ſtrange country thou ſhalt have no reſt nor ſatisfaction of mind; but ſhalt wander from place to place, tortured with the reproaches of thy evil conſcience; or, as the words are tranſlated by the Septuagint, groaning and trembling.

ling. Hen. Valeſius, thinks his brother's ghoſt haunted him whitherſoever he went, which made him fly from place to place, to avoid its perſecution. And indeed it was a notion not only among the Pagans, but likewiſe among the Jews, that the ghoſts of thoſe who were murthered, perſecuted their murtherers, and called for vengeance againſt them.

Ver. 13. —— My puniſhment is greater than I can bear.] Some interpret this paſſage thus. My ſin is greater than can be forgiven; for the Hebrew word havon, ſignifies iniquity, as well as puniſhment, and naſha may be render'd to forgive. Others tranſlate it interrogatively, Is my ſin too great to be forgiven? Which laſt, is the ſenſe followed by the Hebrew expoſitors, and ſeems to be the beſt. See Shuckford's Connection, Vol. I. p. 6.

Ver. 14. ——— And it ſhall come to paſs that every one that findeth me ſhall ſlay me.] Lightfoot has render'd it thus: Now therefore let it be, that any one that findeth me may kill me, and indeed when we conſider the dreadful condition to which Cain was now reduced, by incurring the diſpleaſure of God, he might be ſuppoſed, to beg for death in the anguiſh of his ſoul, that he might not be expoſed to the fatal conſequences of the ſentence inflicted upon him for his offence. However, we chooſe to adhere to the common tranſlation, becauſe guilt is generally timerous, and a murderer, eſpecially, has ſufficient reaſon to be apprehenſive of a retaliation from the reſentment, as well as from the juſtice of man.

That there were ſuch numbers of men in the world, at the time of Abel's murder, that Cain might juſtly apprehend ſome danger from them, ſeems to be a very natural concluſion, for as Cain may be juſtly ſuppoſed to be near 129 years old, when he went out from the preſence of the Lord, the deſcendants from Adam, and their offspring, muſt needs be very numerous at that time. For we are told in the next chapter, that Adam begat ſons and daughters, tho', as they had no relation to the deſign of the Moſaic hiſtory, their names are not recorded. And when we conſider the long lives of the Antediluvian people, which exceeded the preſent ſtandard of life in proportion, at leaſt, of ten to one, they muſt accordingly, in any long ſpace of time, double themſelves, at leaſt, in about the tenth part of the time in which mankind do now double themſelves; for they began to beget children as early, and left off as late, in proportion, as men do now; and the ſeveral children of the ſame father ſeem to have ſucceeded as quickly one after another as they uſually do at this day; and as many generations which are but ſucceſſive with us, were contemporary in thoſe times, the number of people living on the earth at once, would by thoſe means be ſufficiently encreaſed, to anſwer any defect which might ariſe from other circumſtances not conſidered. So that if we make a computation, on theſe principles, we ſhall find that there were a conſiderable number of people in the world at the death of Abel, tho' their father Adam was not then 130 years old. For if the children of Iſrael, from 70 ſouls, in the ſpace of 210 years became 600,000 fighting men, beſides women and children, and beſides the great numbers that died by the cruel mandate of Pharaoh, and other cauſes, during the increaſe, it may rationally be ſuppoſed, that the children of Adam might amount to 100,000, in 130 years, which was a little after the murder of Abel. Cain therefore had abundant reaſon to dread the reſentment of mankind, at that time, for his barbarity to his brother.

Ver. 15. And the Lord ſaid unto him, Therefore whoſoever ſlayeth Cain, vengeance ſhall be taken on him ſeven-fold.] As the Almighty had already appointed the puniſhment which Cain was to undergo, for the crime he had perpetrated, it was perfectly agreeable to God's juſtice that Cain ſhould not ſuffer more ſeverely from the wrath of man; wherefore he declared to him, ſurely it ſhall not be ſo, as the Hebrew is tranſlated by the LXX.

—— And the Lord ſet a mark upon Cain, leſt any finding him ſhould kill him.] God, the more effectually to ſecure Cain from his apprehenſions, was pleaſed to give him a ſign (probably by ſome ſenſible miracle) that none that met him ſhould take away his life. This is the true ſenſe of this paſſage; and not that God ſet a mark upon Cain, according to the common expoſition. In purſuance of which, many ridiculous conjectures have been made as to this imaginary mark. Some aver, that God ſtigmatized Cain on the forehead with a Letter, which was to ſerve him as a paſſport, being taken either from the name of Abel, or the ineffable name of God, or from the word repentance; that every one might perceive Cain had repented. Others are pleaſed to tell us, that this mark conſiſted of three letters, which compoſed the name of the ſabbath, or elſe that it was the ſign of the croſs. Others are ſo ſagacious as to think that Abel's dog was given him as a conſtant companion, either to warn people not to attack him, or to prevent his taking any dangerous road. Others ſay that his face was covered with leproſy. Others that the mark was nothing but a wild aſpect, with bloody eyes, which rolled in a horrid manner. Moſt of the fathers imagined, that his body continued trembling to that degree, that he could not get his victuals to his mouth. The Septuagint verſion ſeems to favour this opinion, for inſtead of a fugitive and and a vagabond, they have tranſlated στένων καὶ τρέμων, lamenting and trembling and the Hebrew words do indeed import a reſtleſsneſs and uneaſineſs of mind, with which Cain is ſuppoſed to have been afflicted all his life. Some ſay, that wherever he ſtopped, the earth ſhook and trembled around him. Others pretend, that God inſpired him with extraordinary courage, and render'd him void of fear. And another extraordinary notion, as well founded as the former, is, that a horn grew on Cain's forehead, to warn people to avoid him. But all theſe extravagant fancies may be avoided, by adhering to the proper tranſlation of this verſe, viz. God ſet a ſign or wonder before Cain, to convince him that whoſoever ſhould find him ſhould not kill him. For the Hebrew word, which is here tranſlated a mark, is in the 9th chapter of this book, ver. 13. render'd a token. I do ſet my bow in the cloud, and it ſhall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth.

Ver. 16. And Cain went out from the preſence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod.] Where the land of Nod (which word ſignifies wandering) was ſituate, is uncertain. Moſes places it, according to our tranſlation on the eaſt of Eden; and it has been obſerved, that Ptolemy mentions a city called Anuchtha in Suſiana, or Khuzeſtân, a country lying eaſtward from Chaldea; which ſituation and the near reſemblance of the name Anuchtha to the original Hanokh, (for tha is ſuppoſed to be only the Chaldee termination) induced the learned Huet biſhop of Soiſſons to believe it to be the ſame with that built by Cain. But it ſeems very improbable that the city of Enoch, built before the flood; ſhould either withſtand the deluge, or retain its ancient name after ſo great an alteration of the face of things. Beſides, Suſiana being a very fertil and pleaſant country, it is not likely Cain ſhould be baniſhed thither, but rather to ſome barren and deſolate land, remote from the place of his nativity, and ſeparated by mountains, or other natural obſtructions, from the commerce of his relations. For which reaſon Grotius and Junius are of opinion, that the country into which Cain retired, was the deſert of Arabia; but that lying on the weſt, and not on the eaſt of Eden, to remove ſo formidable an objection, it is ſaid that the words which we tranſlate on the eaſt of Eden, ſignify no more than before, or over-againſt Eden, and the Septuagint have accordingly render'd them in this manner.

Ver. 17. And Cain knew his wife.] It is moſt probable that Cain was married before he murder'd his brother, becauſe we may well ſuppoſe all the world would abhor the thoughts of conjugal alliance with ſuch an impious murderer, whom God alſo had accurſed. But whether it were before or after, there is no reaſon to conclude that his wife was his ſiſter; there being women enough in the world before this time. For even in our country, in the age before us, as biſhop Patrick obſerves, there ſprung from two perſons, three hundred ſixty ſeven children, within the ſpace of eighty years. And therefore the world being about 129 years old when Cain ſlew Abel, there muſt have been a great number of people in it, deſcended from all thoſe ſons and daughters whom Adam begot.

And he builded a city.] When Cain built this city cannot be conjectured from any circumſtance recorded by Moſes; but it is probable he did it not till many years after his baniſhment, and when his poſterity was greatly increaſed. Philo ſuppoſes he alſo built ſix other cities, named Maich, Jared, Tehe, Jeſca, Selet, and Gebat; but what foundation he had for that opinion we cannot conceive.

Joſephus

Joſephus ſays, that the puniſhment inflicted on Cain, was ſo far from effecting any reformation in him, that he grew worſe, and became a reprobate to all ſenſe of goodneſs; that he got together abundance of wealth by rapine and violence, that he firſt corrupted that ſimplicity wherein men had lived till then, by the invention of weights and meaſures, changing their innocence of life, which had been happily ignorant of ſuch things, and their greatneſs of mind, into fraud and cunning: And that he alſo firſt ſet bounds to fields and poſſeſſions, and walled the city which he had built, obliging his dependants to live in a community, the better, it is probable, to ſecure their ill gotten wealth.

Ver. 18. And unto Enoch was born Irad, &c.] It is remarkable, that tho' Moſes gives us ſome account of the deſcendants of Cain; yet he is entirely ſilent as to the length of their lives, and continues their genealogy but a little way. Whereas he deduces the genealogy of Seth down to the flood, and from thence to his own time, and alſo relates particularly to what age the lives of his principal poſterity were prolonged. It ſeems, according to St. Cyril, that he look'd upon Cain's race as ſuch a reprobate generation, that he would not number them in the book of the living.

Ver. 19. And Lamech took unto him two wives, &c.] This is the firſt known inſtance of Polygamy, and which Lamech was perhaps tempted to indulge by his impatient deſire of propagating that bleſſed ſeed which was promiſed to Eve. For as Cain had been rejected by God, for killing his brother, it is evident no man could any longer ſuppoſe him or any of his firſt poſterity, to be the promiſed ſeed; but at the ſame time they might imagine that this right, which belonged more properly to the firſt born, than to the younger brothers, was now to return to his poſterity after the ſeventh generation. And in this view it ſeems, that Lamech affected polygamy, as if by multiplying his poſterity, he had hoped to ſee that promiſe accompliſhed by ſome one or other of them.

Ver 20. He was the father of ſuch as dwell in tents, &c.] The Hebrews call him the father of any thing, who was the firſt inventor of it.

Ver. 22. She alſo bare Tubal-Cain, an inſtructer of every artificer in braſs and iron.] The Arabians ſtill call a plate of Iron or braſs, by the name of Tubal, and many think that Vulcan is the ſame with Tubal-Cain, their names being not unlike.

Ver. 23. — I have ſlain a man to my wounding, &c.] Theſe words would be capable of an eaſy expoſition, if we could credit the oriental tradition, which was believed in S. Jerom's time, that Cain was accidentally killed by Lamech; for they ſay, that Cain being old and dim-ſighted, and in continual terror on account of the murder he had committed, uſed to wander in the woods, and one day ſat down in a thicket to reſt himſelf; and that Lamech, who was alſo blind, being a hunting, attended by a youth, (whom ſome will have to be his ſon Tubal-Cain) either himſelf heard a ruſtling, or was informed by the Lad, that there was ſomething in the buſhes which he took to be a wild beaſt, and thereupon letting fly an arrow, he ſtruck Cain to the heart; and when he came to know what he had done, he in a rage fell upon his conductor, and kill'd him too. But as there is no certainty of this, ſo it appears inconſiſtent with the next verſe, which ſeems to ſuppoſe Cain was then alive. The Targums of Onkelos, and Jonathan Ben Uzziel, and the Arabic tranſlation, read the paſſage interrogatively, or negatively. Have I ſlain a man? that is, I have not ſlain a man that I ſhould bear the guilt, or be puniſhed for it; nor have I killed a young man that my ſeed ſhould be deſtroyed for it. And it is thought Lamech ſpoke them, on occaſion of ſome terror or apprehenſion his family were in, leſt Abel's murder ſhould be revenged on them; which fear he ſhews to be groundleſs, becauſe he had done nothing to deſerve any ill treatment. This interpretation ſeems the moſt reaſonable, but cannot be depended on, the ſpeech being introduced by Moſes very abruptly, and without any connection with what precedes or follows it.

Ver. 24. If Cain ſhall be avenged ſeven-fold, truly Lamech ſeventy and ſeven fold.] If God hath guarded Cain ſo ſtrongly, who was a murderer, as to threaten great and long puniſhments to thoſe who ſlay him, he will puniſh them abundantly more who ſhall kill me, being a guiltleſs perſon.

Ver. 26. — Then began men to call on the name of the Lord.] This doth not import that men did not call upon the Lord (which includes all his worſhip and ſervice) before this time: But that now they were awakened by the conſideration of their infirmity, to be more ſerious and frequent in religious offices. Or rather, they began to hold more public aſſemblies. For families, to which religion was before confined, being now multiplied, they joined together, and met in larger ſocieties and communion, for the ſolemn worſhip of God by ſacrifices, and other religious ſervices.

But it being ſcarce credible, that public aſſemblies were not held long before this, ſome men of note, ſuch as Bertram and Hackſpan, have been induced to follow our marginal tranſlation; then began men (i.e. the children of Seth) to call themſelves by the name of the Lord, that is, the ſervants or worſhippers of the Lord, in diſtinction from the Cainites, who had forſaken him.

CHAP. V.

1 The genealogy, age, and death of the patriarchs from Adam unto Noah. 24 The godlineſs and tranſlation of Enoch.

THIS is the book of the generations of Adam: In the day that God created man, in the likeneſs of God made he him:

2 Male and female created he them; and bleſſed them, and called their name Adam, in the day when they were created.

3 ¶ And Adam lived an hundred and thirty years, and begat a ſon in his own likeneſs, after his image; and called his name Seth.

4 And the days of Adam after he had begotten Seth were eight hundred years: and he begat ſons and daughters.

5 And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years: and he died.

6 ¶ And Seth lived an hundred and five years, and begat Enos.

7 And Seth lived after he begat Enos eight hundred and ſeven years, and begat ſons and daughters.

8 And all the days of Seth were nine hundred and twelve years: and he died.

9 ¶ And Enos lived ninety years, and begat Cainan.

10 And Enos lived after he begat Cainan eight hundred and fifteen years, and begat ſons and daughters.

11 And all the days of Enos were nine hundred and five years: and he died.

12 ¶ And Cainan lived ſeventy years, and begat Mahalaleel.

13 And Cainan lived after he begat Mahalaleel eight hundred and forty years, and begat ſons and daughters.

14 And all the days of Cainan were nine hundred and ten years: and he died.

15 ¶ And Mahalaleel lived ſixty and five years, and begat Jared.

16 And Mahalaleel lived after he begat Jared eight hundred and thirty years, and begat ſons and daughters.

17 And all the days of Mahalaleel were eight hundred ninety and five years: and he died.

18 ¶ And Jared lived an hundred ſixty and two years, and he begat Enoch.

19 And Jared lived after he begat Enoch eight hundred years, and begat ſons and daughters.

20 And all the days of Jared were nine hundred ſixty and two years: and he died.

21 ¶ And Enoch lived ſixty and five years, and begat Methuſelah.

22 And Enoch walked with God after he begat Methuſelah three hundred years, and begat ſons and daughters.

23 And all the days of Enoch were three hundred ſixty and five years.

24 And Enoch walked with God, and he was not: for God took him.

25 ¶ And Methuſelah lived an hundred eighty and ſeven years, and begat Lamech.

26 And Methuſelah lived after he begat Lamech ſeven hundred eighty and two years, and begat ſons and daughters.

27 And all the days of Methuſelah were nine hundred ſixty and nine years: and he died.

28 ¶ And Lamech lived an hundred eighty and two years, and begat a ſon.

29 And he called his name Noah, ſaying, This ſame ſhall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands, becauſe of the ground which the LORD hath curſed.

30 And Lamech lived after he begat Noah five hundred ninety and five years, and begat ſons and daughters.

31 And all the days of Lamech were ſeven hundred ſeventy and ſeven years: and he died.

32 And Noah was five hundred years old: and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet.

Ver. 3. And Adam lived an hundred and thirty years, and begat a ſon in his own likeneſs.] Not ſo perfect as himſelf when he was created, but with thoſe defects that impaired him after he had eaten the forbidden fruit. For his own likeneſs and image, wherein this ſon was begotten, ſeems to be oppoſed to the likeneſs and image of God.

Ver. 5. And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years.] One of the moſt extraordinary circumſtances which occurs in the Antediluvian hiſtory is the vaſt length of mens lives, in thoſe firſt ages, in compariſon of our own. Few now arrive to eighty or a hundred years, whereas, before the flood, they frequently lived to near a thouſand; a diſproportion almoſt incredible, were it not inconteſtably certain from the joint teſtimonies of ſacred and profane writers, whoſe authority in this point is not to be eluded. Joſephus reckons up the teſtimonies of Manetho, Beroſus, Mochus, Heſtiæus, Jerom the Egyptian, and the writers of the Phœnician antiquities. He ſays alſo that Heſiod, Hecatæus, Hellanicus, Acuſilaus, Ephorus, and Nicholas, wrote that the ancients lived a thouſand years. Some, to reconcile the matter with probability, have imagined, that the ages of thoſe firſt men might poſſibly be computed not by ſolar years, but months, which reduces the length of their lives rather to a ſhorter period than our own. But for this there is not the leaſt foundation; beſides the many abſurdities which would thence follow, ſuch as their begetting children at about ſix years of age, as ſome of them in that caſe muſt have done, and the contraction of the whole interval between the creation and the deluge, ſo conſiderably leſs than two hundred years, even according to the larger computation of the Septuagint.

The cauſes of this longevity are variouſly aſſigned: Some have imputed it to the temperance of the Antediluvians, and the ſimplicity of their diet; that they eat no fleſh, and had none of thoſe provocations to gluttony, which wit and vice have ſince invented. This, were it true, might have ſome effect, but not poſſibly to ſuch a degree as we are ſpeaking of, ſince we have had many temperate and abſtemious perſons, in later ages, who yet ſeldom have exceeded the uſual period. Others have imputed it to the excellency of their Fruits, and ſome peculiar virtue in the herbs and plants of thoſe days; but as the earth was curſed immediately after the fall, its fruits, we may ſuppoſe, gradually decreaſed in their virtue and goodneſs till the flood, and yet we do not ſee the length of mens lives decreaſed conſiderably, if at all, during that interval. Others have thought, that the long lives of thoſe inhabitants of the old world proceeded from the ſtrength of their ſtamina, or firſt principles of their bodily conſtitutions; which might indeed be a concurrent, but not the ſole and adequate cauſe of their longevity: for Shem, who was born before the deluge, and had all the virtue of the Antediluvian conſtitution, fell three hundred years ſhort of the age of his forefathers, becauſe the greateſt part of his life was paſſed after the flood.

It has therefore been more rationally ſuppoſed, that the chief cauſe of this longevity was the ſalubrious conſtitution of the Antediluvian air, which, after the deluge, became corrupt and unwholeſome, breaking by degrees the priſtine craſis of the body, and ſhortening mens lives, in a very few ages, to near the preſent ſtandard.

Ver. 6. And Seth lived an hundred and five years, and begat Enos.] We are not to think he lived ſo long before he begat any children; no more than that Adam had none till he was an hundred and thirty years old, when he begat Seth. Therefore, to explain this, and many other things that follow, and which ſeem more ſtrange, for Jared is ſaid to have lived an hundred ſixty two years before he begat Enoch, and Lamech an hundred eighty two years before he begat Noah, we muſt conſider, that Moſes ſets down only thoſe perſons by whom the line of Noah was drawn from Seth, and Abraham's line from Noah, by their true anceſtors, whether they were of the eldeſt family or not. Seth, in all probability, had many other children before Enos; as Noah, we may be confident, had, before he begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet, which was not till he was five hundred years old.

Ver. 18. And Jared —— begat Enoch.] The learning of Enoch, and particularly his skill in the mathematical ſciences, has been celebrated by Jews, Chriſtians, and Mohammedans. The Greeks likewiſe had anciently ſome notion of him, as appears by a diſcourſe of Eupolemus, quoted by Euſebius out of Alexander Polyhiſtor. L. ix. Præpar. Evang. c. 17. where he ſays Enoch was the firſt who taught the knowledge of the ſtars, and that he himſelf was taught by the angels of God, and was the ſame perſon whom the Greeks call Atlas.

Ver. 24. And Enoch walked with God, and he was not; for God took him.] This paſſage is paraphraſed by the writer of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews in this manner; By faith Enoch was tranſlated, that he ſhould not ſee death; and was not found, becauſe God had tranſlated him: for before this tranſlation he had this teſtimony, that he pleaſed God. By which words it ſeems plain that Enoch did not die, but ſuffered only ſuch a change as was neceſſary to fit him for the place whither he was going. The Jewiſh commentators ſuppoſe Enoch was carried into the terreſtrial paradiſe. Of the ſame opinion were ſome of the Chriſtian fathers; fathers; and it has been imagined, that both he and Elias will return from thence, at the coming of Antichriſt, with whom they are to wage war. But theſe notions are juſtly rejected by the moſt judicious interpreters.

Ver. 29. And he called his name Noah, ſaying this ſame ſhall comfort us, &c.] Noah was ſo called, becauſe Lamech his father ſaid yenahamenu, as it is in the Hebrew, he ſhall comfort us. But if his name were derived from the root niham, to comfort, it ſhould, according to the genius of the Hebrew language, have been Nohem, or Menahem, not Noah, which can regularly come from no other verb than nuah, to reſt. And the LXX. have, therefore, inſtead of he ſhall comfort us, render'd it διαναπαύσει, he ſhall cauſe us to reſt, which has induced ſome learned men to think the ancient and true reading was yanihenu. And Philo Judæus, and St. Jerome, tranſlate the name Noah, reſt.

Ver. 32. And Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet.] It doth not follow that Shem was the eldeſt of theſe three, becauſe he is here, and every where elſe in this book mentioned firſt. But it will be plain that Japhet was the eldeſt ſon, from the following obſervation, That Noah was 500 years old before any of his three ſons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, were born. When he was ſix hundred years old, he entred into the ark with them, Gen. vii 11. And when he came out, two years after the flood, Shem begat Arphaxad, being then an hundred years old, Gen. xi. 10. and conſequently Noah was then ſix hundred and two. From whence it follows, that Shem was born when Noah was five hundred and two years old, and therefore Japhet muſt be two years older than he, for Noah began to have children when he was five hundred. But God prefer'd Shem before him, giving thereby an early demonſtration (of which there were many inſtances afterwards) that he would not be confined to the order of nature, in the diſpoſal of his favours; which he frequently beſtowed upon the younger children; as he did upon Jacob, and, in after-times, upon David, who was the youngeſt and meaneſt of all his father's children.

CHAP. VI.

1 The wickedneſs of the world, which provoked God's wrath, and cauſed the flood. 8 Noah findeth grace. 14 The order, form, and end of the ark.

AND it came to paſs, when men began to multiply on the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them,

2 That the ſons of God ſaw the daughters of men, that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they choſe.

3 And the LORD ſaid, My ſpirit ſhall not always ſtrive with man, for that he alſo is fleſh: yet his days ſhall be an hundred and twenty years.

4 There were giants in the earth in thoſe days; and alſo after that, when the ſons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bare children to them: the ſame became mighty men, which were of old, men of renown.

5 ¶ And God ſaw that the wickedneſs of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually.

6 And it repented the LORD that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart.

7 And the LORD ſaid, I will deſtroy man, whom I have created, from the face of the earth, both man and beaſt, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air: for it repenteth me that I have made them.

8 But Noah found grace in the eyes of the LORD.

9 ¶ Theſe are the generations of Noah: Noah was a juſt man and perfect in his generations, and Noah walked with God.

10 And Noah begat three ſons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet.

11 The earth alſo was corrupt before God; and the earth was filled with violence.

12 And God looked upon the earth, and behold, it was corrupt: for all fleſh had corrupted his way upon the earth.

13 And God ſaid unto Noah, The end of all fleſh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them: and behold, I will deſtroy them with the earth.

14 ¶ Make thee an ark of Gopher-wood: rooms ſhalt thou make in the ark, and ſhalt pitch it within and without with pitch.

15 And this is the faſhion which thou ſhalt make it of: the length of the ark ſhall be three hundred cubits, the breadth of it fifty cubits, and the height of it thirty cubits.

16 A window ſhalt thou make to the ark, and in a cubit ſhalt thou finiſh it above; and the door of the ark ſhalt thou ſet in the ſide thereof: with lower, ſecond, and third ſtories ſhalt thou make it.

17 And behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to deſtroy all fleſh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven: and every thing that is in the earth ſhall die.

18 But with thee will I eſtabliſh my covenant: and thou ſhalt come into the ark; thou, and thy ſons, and thy wife, and thy ſons wives with thee.

19 And of every living thing of all fleſh, two of every ſort ſhalt thou bring into the ark, to keep them alive with thee: they ſhall be male and female.

20 Of fowls after their kind, and of cattel after their kind, of every creeping thing of the earth after his kind: two of every ſort ſhall come unto thee, to keep them alive.

21 And take thou unto thee of all food that is eaten, and thou ſhalt gather it to thee; and it ſhall be for food for thee, and for them.

22 Thus did Noah; according to all that God commanded him, ſo did he.

Ver.

Ver. 2. The ſons of God ſaw the daughters of men, &c.] There are two famous interpretations of theſe words (beſides that of ſome of the ancients, who took them for angels.) Some underſtand by the ſons of God, the great men, nobles, rulers, and judges, whether they were of the family of Seth or of Cain: And ſo indeed the word elohim ſignifies in many places, Exod. xxi 6. xxii. 28, &c. and the ancient Greek verſion, which Philo and St. Auſtin uſed, perhaps meant no more, where theſe words are tranſlated οἱ ἄγγελοι τοῦ Θεοῦ, the angels of God, his great miniſters in this world; who in after times were miſtaken for angels in heaven. Theſe great perſons were captivated by the beauty of the daughters of men, i. e. of the meaner ſort (for ſo men ſometimes ſignifies, Pſalm xlix. 2, &c.) and took by force and violence as many as they pleaſed; being ſo potent as to be able to do any thing with impunity. For they who ſhould have given a good example, and puniſhed vice, were the great promoters of it. But there are other ancient interpreters, who, by the ſons of God, underſtand the poſterity of Seth, who were the worſhippers of the true God, tho' they were afterwards corrupted by marrying into the wicked family of Cain, intimated by the daughters of men, by which means their manners were ſoon debauched, and at length degenerated to ſuch a degree, that the wickedneſs of man was very great in the earth, and every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. Joſephus writes, that the family of Seth perſevered in the true worſhip of God, and in the purſuit of virtue, for ſeven generations; after which, in proceſs of time, they neglected both, by which means they drew on themſelves the indignation of God.

Ver. 3. And the Lord ſaid my ſpirit ſhall not always ſtrive with man.] This paſſage is variouſly interpreted; our Engliſh tranſlation ſeems to give the true ſenſe of the Hebrew; but the Septuagint, Vulgate, and Syriac verſions render the word jadon, (which we tranſlate ſtrive with) continue, or dwell in; ſuppoſing the meaning to be, either that God's Spirit of admonition or forbearance, would not always wait on man; or elſe that the ſpirit or breath of life, ſhould not always continue in him; that is, no longer than the ſpace of 120 years, after which, if he continued impenitent, he ſhould be deſtroyed. And this is the ſenſe of Onkelos. The Jews have much uſeleſs learning in their comments on this text. But they who infer from hence that the ſtandard of man's life was now reduced to 120 years, are manifeſtly miſtaken; for that reduction was not made immediately after the Flood, nor till the days of Moſes, and St. Peter approves another ſenſe when he obſerves that the long ſuffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the Ark was preparing.

Ver. 4. There were giants in the earth, &c.] The Hebrew word nephilim rendered giants, by our tranſlators, is derived from naphal, which ſignifies to fall, and this etymology is urged in defence of that opinion which makes them incarnate ſpirits, or the fallen angels, under the ſhape of men. The Targum of Ben Uzziel agrees with this interpretation, and names two of thoſe angels then converſant on earth, viz. Shamhazai, and Uzziel. But the radical word ſignifies alſo to fall upon, to ruſh with violence. According to which ſenſe Symmachus tranſlates nephilim βιασὰς violent men and Aquila ἐπιπτευσας invaders. The other tranſlations generally rendering it giants.

Some take theſe Nephilim to have been men of ordinary ſtature, and ſo called on account only of their enormous impiety, rapaciouſneſs, and inſolence, which, as it ſeems, was the opinion of Joſephus. But others, with greater reaſon, believe they were alſo of extraordinary ſtature and ſtrength. The word nephilim being manifeſtly uſed elſewhere in Scripture, (viz. Numb. xiii. 33, 34.) to denote men above the common ſize. Not but that it may alſo ſignify thoſe who fall away, Apoſtates. See 2 Kings xxv. 11. Jerem. xxxvii. 13. and xxxviii. 19.

That there were, in thoſe ancient times, men of a gigantic ſize and ſtrength, is very credible, both from inſtances in hiſtorians, ſacred and profane, and likewiſe from inſtances in our times. But we muſt not hence conclude, as ſome have done, that mankind in general were, in the firſt ages, of a much larger ſtature than they are at preſent. Giants being manifeſtly ſpoken of as rarities and the wonders of their time, tho' their number ſeems to have been much greater before the Flood.

Some authors have inquired into the cauſe of this monſtrous ſtature of the giants; St. Cyrill thinks it a judgment of God on the luſts of their parents. They who ſuppoſe them to have been the iſſue of the fallen ſpirits, ſay it was by their artful promoting the inordinate deſires of the women with whom they had to do. Some attribute it to the vigour of the ſons of Seth; while others make Seth's deſcendants to have been of a very large ſize, and thoſe of Cain, on the contrary, of a leſs.

Ver. 6. And it repented the Lord that he had made man.] God can neither properly repent, nor be grieved; but ſuch expreſſions ſignify he reſolved to do, as men do; who when they repent of any thing, endeavour to undo it.

Ver. 14. Make thee an ark of gopher wood, &c.] What ſort of wood this is, the learned Fuller our countryman, ſeems to have been very happy in his conjecture; for he has obſerv'd that from the Greek word Cypariſſus, take away the termination and there will remain Cypar, which has all the radical letters of the word gopher, and differs from it but little in ſound. Now as from the Hebrew word gopher, is derived the Greek word Cypariſſus, ſo from this is derived the Latin word Cypreſſus, and from it our Engliſh word cypreſs; ſo that what is called gopher wood in Scripture, we may reaſonably ſuppoſe is meant of cypreſs wood. Nor is this opinion founded barely on etymology, but it is likewiſe confirmed by other conſiderations. As 1. That cypreſs is a very durable wood, not apt to breed worms or rot. Now, upon this account, it is very likely that the Ark of Noah was made of the ſame wood; ſince ſome relicts of it remained for above a thouſand years after, as is atteſted by a great number of ancient writers. 2. The cypreſs wood is not only durable, but fit for ſhipping. Hence the fleet of Alexander the Great, that was built at Babylon, was made of cypreſs wood, as we learn from the hiſtorian Arrianus; who adds that there was in thoſe parts a ſcarcity of other wood fit for ſhipping. We have ſhewn that the country of Eden lay in Babylonia, and the parts adjoining on the other ſide of the common channel of the Euphrates and Tigris; whence theſe conſiderations mutually ſtrengthen one another; namely the Ark being made of gopher or cypreſs wood corroborates the opinion that it was made in the country of Eden, and conſequently that Noah lived there before the Flood; and on the other hand, the probability of Noah's living in Eden before the Flood, adds ſtrength to the opinion, that the Ark was made of cypreſs wood.

The Vulgate and Septuagint take the word gopher not to denote the ſpecies of timber, but for an adjective, the firſt tranſlating it ligna levigata; ſmoothed or planed timber, and the other ξύλα τετράγωνα, ſquare timber, but we chooſe to adhere to the opinion of its being cypreſs wood.

Ver. 15. The length of the Ark ſhall be three hundred cubits, &c.] We might preſume, if Moſes had not told us ſo, that a veſſel proportionable and adapted to the uſe deſigned, muſt have been of more than human contrivance, and built by the direction of God himſelf. What was the exact meaſure of the cubit here mentioned, is diſputed, ſome fearing the capacity of the Ark would be otherwiſe too ſmall for the intended purpoſe, have enlarged the dimenſions even to extravagance. When Celſus objected that the Ark was a monſter with all things in its belly, Origen anſwered, that the Ark was like a great city, whoſe baſe was 90,000 cubits long, and 25,000 broad, but in another place he is more moderate, and without encreaſing the number of the Moſaic cubits, ſuppoſes they were geometrical cubits, each containing ſix ordinary cubits, which laſt opinion is approved by St. Auſtin. But the general opinion of learned men is, that they were but common cubits, one of which, though formerly ſuppoſed equal to 18 of our inches, is now allowed to contain almoſt 22, or more exactly 21. 888. According to which meaſure the Ark muſt have been 547. 2 Engliſh feet long, 91, 2 broad, and 54. 72 high, and the ſolid contents 2, 730, 781. 9008 feet, almoſt double to what they would be by the former computation. The form of it was an oblong ſquare, or parallelopiped, with a flat bottom, and a ſloped roof raiſed a cubit in the middle; it had neither ſails nor rudder, nor was it made ſharp ſo as to cut the water; which form, as it was admirably contrived for lying ſteadily on the water without rolling, which might have endangered the lives of the animals within it, ſo it was very unfit for ſwimming to a great diſtance, or for riding in a boiſterous ſea. It conſiſted of three ſtories, each of which, abating the thickneſs of the floors, might be about 18 feet high, and was partitioned into a great many rooms or apartments. This veſſel was without doubt ſo contrived as to have the benefit of the air and light on all ſides, tho' the particular conſtruction of the windows be not mentioned; and the whole ſeems to have had another covering beſides the roof, probably made of skins like that of the Tabernacle; for Noah is ſaid after the flood to have removed the covering of the Ark, which cannot well be ſuppoſed to have been the roof, but ſomething flung over it like that of the Tabernacle which is expreſſed by the ſame Hebrew word; and the uſe of it was probably to hang over and defend the windows in bad weather.

That the ſpace in the Ark was abundantly ſufficient to contain both Noah and his family, and the animals, together with all neceſſary proviſions for them, does evidently appear from the geometrical calculations of learned men, who have yet generally ſuppoſed the length of the cubit to have been but 18 inches; whereas if we take the dimenſions according to the larger meaſure above mentioned, the whole capacity will be nearly doubled, as may be eaſily proved.

Ver. 19. And of every living thing of all fleſh, two of every ſort ſhalt thou bring into the Ark, &c.] The great biſhop Wilkins has reduced the number of ſpecies of animals, which at firſt view may ſeem almoſt infinite, within very moderate bounds; he reckons they do not amount to one hundred of quadrupeds, and two hundred of birds; and of theſe muſt be excepted ſuch as live in the water, ſuch as proceed from a mixture of different ſpecies, and ſuch as change their colours, ſize, and ſhape, by changing their climate; and thence, in different countries, ſeem to be of different ſpecies; when they are not. He afterwards enters into a particular detail of the animals, the quantity of food neceſſary for them, and the capacity and proportion of the Ark; and concludes, there was room enough and to ſpare; whereupon he obſerves that had the moſt skilful mathematicians and philoſophers been ſet to conſult what proportions a veſſel deſigned for ſuch a uſe ſhould have in the ſeveral parts of it, they could not have pitched on any more ſuitable to the purpoſe, than thoſe mentioned by Moſes.

An objection has been raiſed againſt the preſervation of animals in the Ark; and that is, how the unknown kinds of ſerpents in Braſil, the ſlow bellied creature of the Indies, and all thoſe ſpecies of animals ſeen in the Weſt Indies, ſhould either come into the Ark, or be conveyed out of it into thoſe countries which are divided from that continent where Noah was, by ſo vaſt an ocean on one ſide, and at leaſt ſo large a tract of land on the other (ſuppoſing a paſſage out of one continent to the other, which has not been yet diſcovered) and ſome animals cannot live out of the particular climate wherein they are. But to this it may be anſwered, that it is probable that the temperature of the air, before the deluge, was ſo equal and ſerene, that all kinds, even of the American animals, might live and be found in thoſe parts of Aſia when Noah went into the Ark, tho' none of them could bear the climate ſince, by reaſon of the change wrought in nature.

CHAP. VII.

1 Noah with his family and the living creatures enter into the ark. 17 The beginning, increaſe, and continuance of the flood.

AND the LORD ſaid unto Noah, Come thou, and all thy houſe into the ark: for thee have I ſeen righteous before me in this generation.

2 Of every clean beaſt thou ſhalt take to thee by ſevens, the male and his female: and of beaſts that are not clean by two, the male and his female.

3 Of fowls alſo of the air by ſevens, the male and the female; to keep ſeed alive upon the face of all the earth.

4 For yet ſeven days, and I will cauſe it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights: and every living ſubſtance that I have made, will I deſtroy from off the face of the earth.

5 And Noah did according unto all that the LORD commanded him.

6 And Noah was ſix hundred years old, when the flood of the waters was upon the earth.

7 ¶ And Noah went in, and his ſons, and his wife, and his ſons wives with him, into the ark, becauſe of the waters of the flood.

8 Of clean beaſts, and of beaſts that are not clean, and of fowls, and of every thing that creepeth upon the earth.

9 There went in two and two unto Noah into the ark, the male and the female, as God had commanded Noah.

10 And it came to paſs after ſeven days, that the waters of the flood were upon the earth.

11 ¶ In the ſix-hundredth year of Noahs life, in the ſecond month, the ſeventeenth day of the month, the ſame day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened.

12 And the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights.

13 In the ſelf-ſame day entered Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japhet, the ſons of Noah, and Noahs wife, and the three wives of his ſons with them, into the ark:

14 They, and every beaſt after his kind, and all the cattel after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind, and every fowl after his kind, every bird of every ſort.

15 And they went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all fleſh, wherein is the breath of life.

16 And they that went in, went in male and female of all fleſh, as God had commanded him: and the LORD ſhut him in.

17 And the flood was forty days upon the earth: and the waters increaſed, and bare up the ark, and it was lift up above the earth.

18 And the waters prevailed, and were increaſed greatly upon the earth: and the ark went upon the face of the waters.

19 And the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth; and all the high hills, that were under the whole heaven, were covered.

20 Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail; and the mountains were covered.

21 And all fleſh died that moved upon the earth, both of fowl, and of cattel, and of beaſt, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man.

22 All in whoſe noſtrils was the breath of life, of all that was in the dry land, died.

23 And every living ſubſtance was deſtroyed, which was upon the face of the ground, both man, and cattel, and the creeping things, and the fowl of the heaven; and they were deſtroyed from the earth: and Noah only remained alive, and they that were with him in the ark.

24 And the waters prevailed upon the earth an hundred and fifty days.

Ver. 2. Of every clean beaſt thou ſhalt take to thee by ſevens, &c.] A doubt has been raiſed whether there went into the ark but ſeven of every clean, and two of every unclean ſpecies; or fourteen of the firſt, and four of the laſt. Some adhere to the former expoſition, and others to the latter, which ſeems to be the natural ſenſe of the Hebrew words, ſeven and ſeven; and two and two; the male and his female. Beſides, if there were but ſeven of the clean beaſts, one muſt have been without a mate; and if we anſwer that the odd one was for ſacrifice, it is more than Moſes tells us, who, on the contrary, repeats it, that the animals all went in by pairs. If this be admitted, the capacity which we have allowed the ark, being double to what Biſhop Wilkins computes it, will be no more than neceſſary for double the number of animals, eſpecially if we conſider the birds all went in by ſevens; unleſs the diſtinguiſhing word clean, which is inſerted in the Samaritan text, and in the Septuagint and Syriac verſions, ſhould be ſupplied in the Hebrew.

If it be asked by what means Noah got all theſe animals together into the Ark? The beſt anſwer that has been given is, that they came voluntarily by a ſupernatural impulſe from God; which ſeems to be intimated by the words of Scripture Gen. vi. 20. And likewiſe in the 9th verſe of this chapter; though others ſuppoſe it was done by the aſſiſtance of angels.

Ver. 11. In the ſix hundredth year of Noah's life, in the ſecond month, the ſeventeenth day of the month, the ſame day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, &c.] This period of time anſwers to our ſecond of December, ſeveral writers have fallen into miſtakes as to the day when the flood began, by computing from the vernal equinox. But ſince the antediluvian year indiſputably commenced from the autumnal equinox, the ſeventeenth day of the ſecond month will fall about the time we have fixed it, according to the Samaritan chronology; and according to the Hebrew, on the ſeventh day of December, as archbiſhop Uſher computes; on the ſixth day of November, as others reckon; or more exactly, on the twenty-eighth day of November, which is the calculation of Mr. Whiſton.

It is remarkable that the day aſſigned by Moſes for the beginning of the deluge, agrees exactly with the day wherein Plutarch tells us Oſiris went into the Ark, viz. the 17th of Athyr, which month is the ſecond after the autumnal equinox, the ſun then paſſing through Scorpius. Nor does it differ above a day or two from that ſet down by Beroſus, if we allow what probably may have been the caſe, that this writer or his tranſcribers fell into the miſtake above mentioned, and ſuppoſed the flood began the ſecond month from the vernal equinox, which was Dæſius, whereas the true month was Apellæus, the ſecond from the autumnal equinox.

That there was ſuch an univerſal deſtruction by water, as is related by Moſes, is confirmed by the concurrent teſtimonies of ſeveral of the moſt ancient writers and nations in the world. The Chaldean account of the flood, as recorded by Beroſus, is as follows, Cronus or Saturn appear'd to Xiſuthrus (the ſame as Noah) in a dream, and warned him, that on the fifteenth of the month Dæſius, mankind would be deſtroyed by a deluge; and therefore commanded him to write down the original intermediate ſtate, and end of all things, and bury the writing under ground in Sippara, the city of the ſun; that he ſhould alſo build a ſhip, and go into it with his relations and deareſt friends, having firſt furniſhed it with proviſions, and taken into it fowls and four-footed beaſts, and that when he had provided every thing, and was asked whither he was ſailing? he ſhould anſwer, To the Gods, to pray for happineſs to mankind. Xiſuthrus did not diſobey, but built a veſſel whoſe length was five furlongs, and breadth two furlongs He put on board all that he was directed, and went into it with his wife, children, and friends. The flood being come, and ſoon ceaſing, Xiſuthrus let out certain birds, which finding no food nor place to reſt upon, returned again to the ſhip. Xiſuthrus, after ſome days, let out the birds again; but they came back to the ſhip, having their feet ſoiled with mud, whereby Xiſuthrus underſtood that the earth appeared again, and thereupon he made an opening between the planks of the ſhip, and ſeeing that it reſted on a certain mountain, he came out with his wife, his daughter, and his pilot; and having worſhipped the earth, raiſed an altar, and ſacrificed to the gods, he and thoſe who went out with him diſappeared.

That the Egyptians were no ſtrangers to this great event, appears not only from the circumſtances in their ſtory of Oſiris and Typhon, but likewiſe from the teſtimony of Plato, who ſays that a certain Egyptian prieſt recounted to Solon, out of their ſacred books, the hiſtory of the univerſal flood, which happened long before the particular inundations known to the Grecians. The inhabitants of Heliopolis in Syria ſhewed a chaſm, or cleft in the earth, in the temple of Juno, which, as they affirmed, ſwallowed up the waters of the flood. Nay, the very Americans are ſaid to acknowledge and ſpeak of it in their continent, as we are informed by Acoſta and other writers. Moſt nations have ſome traditions of a deluge, which happened in their reſpective countries; but it muſt be owned at the ſame time, that ſeveral of them were particular inundations only, and therefore carefully to be diſtinguiſhed from that of Noah.

That the deluge was univerſal, is put out of all doubt by the Moſaic account, which is too plain to admit of any ſubterfuge; and the earth itſelf ſeems to offer us a demonſtrative argument of the univerſality of the flood, from the vaſt number of the ſhells and teeth of fiſh, bones of animals, entire or partial vegetables, and other ſtrange things, which are to be found on the tops of the higheſt mountains, and in the bowels of the earth, at a great diſtance from the ſea, and were probably left by the flood.

If the deluge therefore was univerſal, the quantity of water required to effect it is ſo immenſe, that it has been generally thought extremely difficult, if not impoſſible, to ſay whence it came, or whither it went. But it ſeems, after all objections, that the Divine aſſiſtance muſt be called in on this occaſion, for tho' the waters, which covered the earth at the creation, might be ſufficient to cover it again, yet how this ſhould be effected by meer natural means, cannot be conceived. The waters, which were ſuſpended in the clouds, might indeed deſcend upon the earth, and that in cataracts, or ſpouts of water (as the Septuagint interpret the windows of heaven) like thoſe in the Indies, where the clouds frequently, inſtead of dropping, fall with a terrible violence like a torrent; and this alone might form a great inundation on the lower grounds: but as the clouds could pour down no more water than they had, which would ſoon be exhauſted at this rate, it ſeems likewiſe, by the length of the rain's continuance, that the ſhowers were rather moderate and gradual. The ſubterraneous ſtores would afford a much more plentiful ſupply to compleat the deluge, and probably contain water enough to drown the world to a greater height than Moſes relates; the only difficulty is to draw it out of the abyſs on the ſurface of the earth. And here, ſince we can aſſign no natural cauſe, we apprehend we may, not unphiloſophically, reſolve it into the Divine power, which might, on this occaſion, ſo far controul (no greater miracle than that of continuing) the uſual courſe of nature, as to effect its purpoſe.

Ver.

Ver. 19. And the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth, and all the high hills that were under the whole heavens were covered.]. With reference to the mountains, moſt of them are very low; very few are ſuppoſed to be a mile high, and the higheſt not to be above four, taking their altitude from the plain on which they riſe. The height of Olympus is ſo extolled by the poets and ancient Greeks, that it is ſaid to ſhoot above the clouds; and yet Plutarch tells us, that Xenagoras meaſured it, and found it not to exceed a mile and an half. Mount Athos is ſuppoſed to be of an extraordinary height, becauſe it caſts its ſhadow to the iſland of Lemnos, which, according to Pliny, was eighty ſeven miles; yet Gaſſendus allows it to be no more than two miles high, and Iſaac Voſſius will not have it to be above ten or eleven furlongs at moſt. And it is certain, that if we allow but 60 miles to a degree, the ſhadow might have been ſeen ſo far upon level ground at ſun-riſing, or ſun-ſet, if the mountain had been but nine furlongs, or a little more than a mile high. Caucaſus by Ricciolus is ſaid to be 51 miles in height; Gaſſendus allowing it to be higher than Athos or Olympus, conceives it not to be above three or four miles at moſt; but Voſſius will not allow it to be above three miles perpendicular, for which he aſſigns this good reaſon, That there is no mountain in Greece, which may not be aſcended in a day, and makes the higheſt mountain there not to be above ten furlongs, which (ſaith Voſſius) it is ſcarce poſſible for any one to reach in that time, unleſs he be a mountaineer born: But if we allow eight furlongs to a day's aſcent, yet it will thereby appear, that moſt of the higheſt mountains in the world are not above three miles in height, becauſe they may be aſcended in leſs than the ſpace of three days. And the Spaniards affirm, that the Andes of Peru, in compariſon of which, they ſay, the Alps are but cottages, may be aſcended in the compaſs of four days; and therefore, as no mountain can be ſuppoſed to exceed four miles in height, ſo the addition of fifteen cubits more, will bring the waters to the utmoſt height allotted for them by Moſes.

The Stoics, who ſuppoſed alternate deſtructions of the earth by fire and water, make no doubt of the poſſibility of a general deluge. "There are vaſt lakes, ſays Seneca, "which we do not ſee; great part of the ſea lies hidden "and concealed, and many rivers glide in ſecret; ſo that "there may be cauſes of a deluge on all ſides, when ſome "waters flow in under the earth, others flow round about "it, and being long pent up overwhelm it; and rivers "join with rivers, pools with pools, &c. And as our bo-"dies ſometimes diſſolve into ſweat, ſo the earth ſhall "melt, and, without the help of other cauſes, ſhall find "in itſelf what will drown it, there being in all places, "both openly and ſecretly, from above and beneath, an "eruption of waters, ready to overflow and deſtroy it." Senec. Nat. queſt. l. 3. c. 27. Which words, ſays biſhop Patrick, are written as if they had been directed to make a commentary upon Moſes.

CHAP. VIII.

1 The waters aſſwage. 4 The ark reſteth on Ararat. 7 The raven and the dove. 15 Noah, being commanded, 18 goeth forth of the ark: 20 He buildeth an altar, and offereth ſacrifice; 21 which God accepteth, and promiſeth to curſe the earth no more.

AND God remembred Noah, and every living thing, and all the cattel that was with him in the ark: and God made a wind to paſs over the earth, and the waters aſſwaged.

2 The fountains alſo of the deep, and the windows of heaven were ſtopped, and the rain from heaven was reſtrained.

3 And the waters returned from off the earth continually: and after the end of the hundred and fifty days the waters were abated.

4 ¶ And the ark reſted in the ſeventh month, on the ſeventeenth day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat.

5 And the waters decreaſed continually until the tenth month: in the tenth month, on the firſt day of the month, were the tops of the mountains ſeen.

6 ¶ And it came to paſs at the end of forty days, that Noah opened the window of the ark which he had made.

7 And he ſent forth a raven, which went forth to and fro, until the waters were dried up from off the earth.

8 Alſo he ſent forth a dove from him, to ſee if the waters were abated from off the face of the ground.

9 But the dove found no reſt for the ſole of her foot, and ſhe returned unto him into the ark: for the waters were on the face of the whole earth. Then he put forth his hand, and took her, and pulled her in unto him into the ark.

10 And he ſtayed yet other ſeven days; and again he ſent forth the dove out of the ark.

11 And the dove came in to him in the evening, and lo, in her mouth was an olive-leaf pluck'd off: So Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth.

12 And he ſtayed yet other ſeven days, and ſent forth the dove; which returned not again unto him any more.

13 ¶ And it came to paſs in the ſix hundredth and firſt year, in the firſt month, the firſt day of the month, the waters were dried up from off the earth: and Noah removed the covering of the ark, and looked, and behold, the face of the ground was dry.

14 And in the ſecond month, on the ſeven and twentieth day of the month, was the earth dried.

15 ¶ And God ſpake unto Noah, ſaying,

16 Go forth of the ark, thou, and thy wife, and thy ſons, and thy ſons wives with thee.

17 Bring forth with thee every living thing that is with thee, of all fleſh, both of fowl, and of cattel, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth; that they may breed abundantly in the earth, and be fruitful, and multiply upon the earth.

18 And Noah went forth, and his ſons, and his wife, and his ſons wives with him:

19 Every

19 Every beaſt, every creeping thing, and every fowl, and whatſoever creepeth upon the earth, after their kinds, went forth out of the ark.

20 ¶ And Noah builded an altar unto the LORD, and took of every clean beaſt, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt-offerings on the altar.

21 And the LORD ſmelled a ſweet ſavour; and the LORD ſaid in his heart, I will not again curſe the ground any more for mans ſake; for the imagination of mans heart is evil from his youth: neither will I again ſmite any more every thing living, as I have done.

22 While the earth remaineth, ſeed-time and harveſt, and cold and heat, and ſummer and winter, and day and night ſhall not ceaſe.

Ver. 1. And God remembred Noah, &c.] Took compaſſion upon him, and heard his prayers, which we may well ſuppoſe he made for himſelf, and for all the creatures that were with him.

And God made a wind to paſs over the earth.] Some gather from hence, that during the fall of the rain, there was no ſtorm or violent wind, but the rain fell downright; and conſequently the ark was not driven far from the place where it was built. It having no maſts, or ſails, but moving as a hulk or body of a ſhip, without a rudder, upon a calm Sea. This wind, it is very probable, was the north wind, which is very drying, and drives away rain, Prov. xxv. 23. Thus Ovid repreſents it in the flood of Deucalion, where he ſaith of Jupiter, Nubila dejecit, nimbiſque Aquilone remotis.

Ver. 4. And the ark reſted in the ſeventh month, on the ſeventeenth day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat.] The Sibylline verſes place mount Ararat in the borders of Black Phrygia, near Celænæ, at the ſprings of the river Marſyas, which riſes out of the ſame lake with the Mæander, and falls at length into it. But it appears from Strabo, Ptolemy, and Stephanus, that there is really no mountain at all in that place, at leaſt none ſo high as Ararat muſt needs have been. This fancy therefore ſeems to have taken its riſe from Apamea, another city near Celænæ, being ſur-named Cibotos, or the ark; not, as Bochart obſerves, from any tradition of Noah's ark, but from its ſituation, being ſhut up like an ark or cheſt, by three rivers which encompaſſed it; as the port of Alexandria in Egypt was called Cibotos, from the bay ſurrounding it: Beſides, Cibotos was a new name, which does not ſeem to have been known in thoſe parts, till given to Apamea, built by Seleuchus, or Antiochus Soter; and Celænæ had a prior right to it, if there had been any ſuch tradition; ſo that what is farther alledged of the Apameans coining medals, having on the reverſe the impreſſion of an ark, as may be ſeen on three ſeverally ſtruck in honour of Adrian, Septimius Severus, and Philip the Arabian, is of no weight.

Joſephus ſeems to extend the name of Ararat to Caucaſus: But by the mountains of Ararat have been generally underſtood, both by ancient and modern authors, thoſe of Armenia: Ararat is by the Septuagint, and in the vulgate render'd Armenia; and there is actually a province of that country named Ararat, or Airarat, from a plain therein, ſo called in memory of Arai the eighth king of that nation who was ſlain in battle there; Arayi arat ſignifying the ſlain of Arai. But tho' authors have generally agreed in placing Ararat in Armenia, yet they differ as to the particular ſituation of the mountain where the ark reſted, there being two opinions concerning it, each of which is ſupported by a tradition.

The firſt opinion is, that it was one of the mountains which divide Armenia, on the South, from Meſopotamia, and that part of Aſſyria inhabited by the Curds, from whom thoſe mountains took the name of Curdu, or Cardu, by the Greeks turned into Gordyæi, Carduchi, Cardiei, Cordyæi, Cordueni, Gordi, Cordæi, Curdi, &c. It is alſo called by the Arabs Al Judi, (if it be not a miſtake for Gordi, or a corruption of Cordi or Jordi, as it ought to be written by the Arabs) and alſo Thamanin, probably from the town at the foot of it.

The tradition which affirms the ark, to have reſted on theſe mountains muſt have been very ancient, ſince it is the tradition of the Chaldeans themſelves. To confirm it we are told, that the remainders of the ark were to be ſeen upon theſe mountains: Beroſus and Abydenus both declare there was ſuch a report in their time; the firſt obſerves farther, that ſeveral of the neighbouring inhabitants ſcraped the pitch off the planks as a rarity, and carried it about them for an Amulet: And the latter declares, they uſed the wood of the veſſel againſt many diſeaſes, with wonderful ſucceſs. The relicks of the ark were to be ſeen alſo in the time of Epiphanius, if we may believe him, and we are told the Emperor Heraclius went from the town of Themanin up the mountain Al Judi, and ſaw the place of the ark. This town of Themanin is, or was, ſituate at the foot of the mountain Al Judi, the name ſignifies eighty (and not eight, as Bochart, Calmet, and others would have it) in memory of the eighty perſons who, according to a Mohammedan tradition, were ſaved in the ark. The ſecond opinion places mount Ararat towards the middle of Armenia, near the river Araxes, or Aras, above 280 miles diſtant from Al Judi, to the north-eaſt. Jerom ſeems to be the firſt who gave an account of this tradition, and it would appear of equal antiquity with the former, could we be certain this was the high mountain Baris, in the province of Minyas in Armenia, to which, according to a tradition reported by Nicholas of Damaſcus, many people, in the time of a deluge, fled for ſanctuary; and upon the top of which a certain man ſtruck with his veſſel. At the foot of this mountain they alſo ſhew a town called Cemain, which has a conſiderable ſimilitude to Shemonah, ſignifying eight, the number of perſons who came out of the ark, and, as the Armenians ſay, built it.

An objection indeed has been ſtarted by Tournefort, a modern traveller, which tends to overthrow both traditions: He ſays, he does not ſee where the dove could find an olive branch, if the ark be ſuppoſed to have reſted on any of the mountains of Armenia; for the olive is not found thereabouts, nor, we are told, in any part of Aſia, beyond Aleppo, except one ſingle place near Casbin in Perſia. However, it ſeems to have been otherwiſe anciently, for the Scripture mentions Aſſyria as a land of oil-olive, 2 Kings xviii. 32. and we are told, by Strabo, l. 11. p. 800. that the olive grew in Gogarene, a province of Armenia.

But the Armenians are not to be convinced by any arguments, that this is not the very mountain on which the ark reſted; they call it Maſis, and derive it from Amaſia, the third ſucceſſor of Haikh, the founder of their nation. It ſtands about twelve leagues to the ſouth-eaſt of Erivan, and of Ejmiadzin, or the three churches, four leagues from the Aras, and ten to the north-weſt of Nackhchuvan, in whoſe name, it is ſaid, the memorial of the ark's reſting on the mountain near it, is preſerved. Nak ſignifying, in the Armenian language, a ſhip, and ſhivan, reſted. But this ſeems to be an etymology not well grounded; the Perſians ſaying it was called Nakkaſh jehan, from the great number of painters ſettled there; for the Perſians call one of that profeſſion, by the Arabic word Nakkaſh: And in Armenian alſo Nakſherar, is a painter, and Nakſhel to paint.

Upon the whole, the ſituation of mount Ararat, whether it be mount Maſis, or the mountain of Cardu, is very convenient for the ſons of Noah, from thence to Shinaar, the diſtance not being very great, and the deſcent eaſy, eſpecially from the latter, into the plain of Meſopotamia, of which Shinaar is a part. We diſcover plainly, thro' the Moſaic hiſtory, a neighbourhood between the land of Eden, where man was created, that of Ararat, where the remains of mankind were ſaved, and that of Shinaar where where they fixed the center of their plantations. And certainly it was more natural it ſhould be ſo, than to ſeparate thoſe ſcenes at ſuch a diſtance from each other, as ſome have done.

Ver. 7. And he ſent forth a raven, &c.] The raven is ſuppoſed to have been ſent out, becauſe Noah thought the ſmell of the carcaſſes would tempt him to fly to ſome diſtance; inſtead of which he kept hovering about the ark, having ſome jealouſy, as the Jews pretend, of his mate. Tho' the Hebrew ſays the raven returned again, yet according to the Septuagint, Syriac, and Vulgate verſions, he did not return.

Ver. 8. Alſo he ſent forth a dove, &c] The dove was probably ſent, becauſe of her tameneſs, her flying far, feeding on the ground, and returning to her neſt from the greateſt diſtance. From the olive leaf Noah might infer, that the lower hills, where thoſe trees chiefly grow, were left by the waters, and that the vegetables were not totally deſtroyed. The Chaldean tradition agrees with the Moſaic hiſtory in the circumſtance of the birds being ſent out by Xiſuthrus. And Plutarch ſays, that according to the Mythologiſts, a dove was let out of the ark, and that her going out was, to Deucalion, a ſign of fair weather, and her return, of foul.

Ver. 16. Go forth out of the ark, &c.] I do not think the obſervation of ſome of the Jews is abſurd; who by comparing this verſe with the 13th of the 7th chapter, infer that while they were in the ark the men did not cohabit with their wives; it being a time of great affliction; ſo R. Eliezer in his Pirke, cap. xxiii. where R. Levitus thus gathers it: When they went into the ark it is ſaid, vii. 13. Noah and his ſons enter'd, and then Noah's wife, and his ſon's wives. Behold, ſaith he, here the men are put together, and the women together. But when they come out, it is ſaid, Go forth, thou and thy wife, and thy ſons, and thy ſons wives with thee; here they are coupled together, as before they were ſeparated.

Ver. 21. The Lord ſmelled a ſweet ſavour.] That is, as Munſter underſtands it, he ceaſed from his anger and was appeaſed: So the Syriac and Joſephus. But it may ſignify no more but, that the thankfulneſs of Noah and his family, was as grateful to God as ſweet odours are to us.

Ver. 22. ——— Day and night ſhall not ceaſe.] One would think by this expreſſion, that the day did not much differ from night; while the heavens were covered with thick clouds, which fell in diſmal floods of rain.

CHAP. IX.

1 God bleſſeth Noah. 4 Blood and murder are forbidden. 8 God's covenant, 13 ſignified by the rain-bow. 18 Noah repleniſhed the world. 20 planteth a vineyard, 21 is drunken, and mocked of his ſon, 25 curſeth Canaan, 26 bleſſeth Shem, 27 prayeth for Japhet, 29 and dieth.

AND God bleſſed Noah and his ſons, and ſaid unto them, Be fruitful and multiply, and repleniſh the earth.

2 And the fear of you and the dread of you ſhall be upon every beaſt of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fiſhes of the ſea; into your hand are they delivered.

3 Every moving thing that liveth ſhall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things:

4 But fleſh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, ſhall you not eat.

5 And ſurely your blood of your lives will I require: at the hand of every beaſt will I require it; and at the hand of man, at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man.

6 Whoſo ſheddeth man's blood, by man ſhall his blood be ſhed: for in the image of God made he man.

7 And you, be ye fruitful, and multiply, bring forth abundantly in the earth, and multiply therein.

8 ¶ And God ſpake unto Noah, and to his ſons with him, ſaying,

9 And I, behold I eſtabliſh my covenant with you, and with your ſeed after you;

10 And with every living creature that is with you, of the fowl, of the cattel, and of every beaſt of the earth with you, from all that go out of the ark, to every beaſt of the earth.

11 And I will eſtabliſh my covenant with you; neither ſhall all fleſh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood: neither ſhall there any more be a flood to deſtroy the earth.

12 And God ſaid, This is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you, and every living creature that is with you, for perpetual generations:

13 I do ſet my bow in the cloud, and it ſhall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth.

14 And it ſhall come to paſs, when I bring a cloud over the earth, that the bow ſhall be ſeen in the cloud:

15 And I will remember my covenant, which is between me, and you, and every living creature of all fleſh; and the waters ſhall no more become a flood to deſtroy all fleſh.

16 And the bow ſhall be in the cloud; and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlaſting covenant between God and every living creature of all fleſh that is upon the earth.

17 And God ſaid unto Noah, This is the token of the covenant, which I have eſtabliſhed between me and all fleſh that is upon the earth.

18 ¶ And the ſons of Noah that went forth of the ark, were Shem, and Ham, and Japhet: and Ham is the father of Canaan.

19 Theſe are the three ſons of Noah: and of them was the whole earth overſpread.

20 And Noah began to be an husbandman, and he planted a vineyard.

21 And he drank of the wine, and was drunken, and he was uncovered within his tent.

22 And Ham the father of Canaan ſaw the nakedneſs of his father, and told his two brethren without.

23 And Shem and Japhet took a garment, and laid it upon both their ſhoulders, and went backward, and covered the nakedneſs of their father; and their faces were backward, and they ſaw not their fathers nakedneſs.

24 And Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger ſon had done unto him.

25 And he ſaid, Curſed be Canaan; a ſervant of ſervants ſhall he be unto his brethren.

26 And he ſaid, Bleſſed be the LORD God of Shem; and Canaan ſhall be his ſervant.

27 God ſhall enlarge Japhet, and he ſhall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan ſhall be his ſervant.

28 ¶ And Noah lived after the flood, three hundred and fifty years.

29 And all the days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years: and he died.

Ver. 3. Every moving thing that liveth ſhall be meat for you, &c.] Here the firſt grant made to man concerning food is enlarged, and beaſts are allowed for the ſuſtentation of his life; for he had been the preſerver of theirs. This, ſays Dr. Lightfoot, was what Lamech had foretold by the ſpirit of prophecy when his ſon Noah was born; namely, that he ſhould comfort them concerning their labour and toil, which they had when they might eat nothing but the fruits of the ground, which coſt them hard labour in the tillage and culture to get them. But Noah ſhould be a comfort, in reference to this, becauſe to him, and in him to all the world, God would give liberty to eat fleſh. But with the fleſh God permitted him not to eat the blood; partly for avoiding of cruelty, and partly becauſe blood was to be an attonement for ſin. And this prohibition of eating blood, to Noah, now, and afterwards renewed to Iſrael, was, becauſe of that cuſtom which God foreſaw would grow; and which in the time of Iſrael, was grown common, of eating raw fleſh, 1 Sam. xiv. 32. This very injunction not to eat the fleſh with the blood, confuteth the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation (or the eating of the very fleſh and blood of Chriſt) to all the world.

Ver. 5. And ſurely your blood of your lives will I require: at the hand of every beaſt will I require it.] Not as if beaſts were to blame, if they killed a man, for they are not capable either of vice or virtue, but this was ordained with reſpect to men, for whoſe uſe beaſts were created. For, firſt, ſuch owners as were not careful to prevent ſuch miſchiefs were hereby puniſhed: Secondly, others were admoniſhed, by their example to be cautious: Thirdly, God hereby inſtructed them that murder was a moſt grievous crime, whoſe puniſhment extended even to beaſts. And laſtly, the lives of men were hereby much ſecured, by the killing ſuch beaſts as might otherwiſe have done the like miſchief thereafter.

And at the hand of every man's brother.] And therefore much more will I require it at the hand of every man, whom he calls brother, to ſhew that murder is more heinous upon this account; becauſe we are all brethren. Or the meaning may be (as ſome will have it) that tho' he be as nearly related as a brother, he ſhall not go unpuniſhed.

Ver. 13. I do ſet my bow in the cloud, and it ſhall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth.] Moſt think this doth not ſignify there never had been a rain-bow before the flood, but that it was now appointed for a ſign, which it was not before: But it is very difficult to conceive how it could be a ſign or confirmation of the covenant, which God made with Noah, that he would drown the world no more with water, if it had been in the clouds before, and with no regard to this promiſe. For if we ſuppoſe it even an arbitrary ſign, and to have no connection with the effect, it ſeems that to make it ſignificant and ſatisfactory, it muſt be ſomething new, otherwiſe it could not ſignify a new thing, or be the confirmation of a new promiſe. And accordingly it has been obſerved, that the ſigns by inſtitution only, mentioned in ſcripture, have all ſomething new and ſtrange, as a mark of the hand of God: At leaſt it muſt be acknowledged, that if Noah had never ſeen a rain-bow before, that ſign muſt have made a much more lively impreſſion on him, and given him much greater comfort and aſſurance in God's promiſe, than if it had been no more than what he muſt have often obſerved before the late terrible devaſtation.

Ver. 22. And Ham the father of Canaan ſaw the nakedneſs of his father, &c.] The Jews pretend that Canaan was the perſon who firſt diſcovered the nakedneſs of Noah, with which he acquainted his father Ham; who made ſport of the accident and went and told it to his brothers Shem and Japhet; and that Noah awaking out of his ſleep curſed Canaan, becauſe he was the firſt occaſion of the ſcandal. But this opinion is without foundation.

Ver. 24. And Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger ſon had done unto him.] This verſe makes it evident that Ham was the youngeſt ſon of Noah, (for that is the proper ſignification of the word younger) tho' he is generally placed the ſecond of the three. However, numbers of commentators relying more upon the order wherein he is named, maintain, that he was the ſecond ſon of Noah; and to elude the force of the text, ſeveral of them pretend that it is not Ham himſelf, but Canaan his ſon who is here ſpoken of: Others will have it that Ham was called the younger, or the youngeſt, for no other reaſon, but becauſe his conduct was leſs prudent than that of his brothers. But ſuch interpretations, if once admitted, will ſerve only to render the moſt clear expreſſions in Scripture obſcure.

If we enquire by what means Noah came to know that it was Ham who had treated him in that irreverent manner, St. Chryſoſtom's opinion is very rational; he believes that Noah ſeeing himſelf covered with a garment which did not belong to him, asked the occaſion of it, and learned from Shem and Japhet all that had paſſed.

Ver. 25. And he ſaid curſed be Canaan, &c.] Some have believed that Noah curſed Canaan, becauſe he could not well have curſed Ham himſelf, whom God had not long before bleſſed, in the firſt verſe of this chapter; others, more reaſonably, think Moſes's chief intent in recording this curſe and the prediction which attended it, was to raiſe the ſpirits of the Iſraelites, then entering on a terrible war with the children of Canaan, by the aſſurance; that in conſequence of the curſe, that people were to be ſubdued by them; for the opinion of thoſe who imagine all Ham's race were here accurſed, ſeems repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, which confines the malediction to Canaan and his poſterity, and alſo contrary to fact.

Ver. 27. God ſhall enlarge Japhet ——— and Canaan ſhall be his ſervant.] The Greeks and Romans, deſcended from Japhet, conquered Canaan: And whatſoever relicts there were of them any where; for inſtance at Tyre, built by the Sidonians; at Thebes, by Cadmus; at Carthage by Dido.

The learned Mr. Mede hath affirmed page 378 of his works, that there hath never yet been a ſon of Ham, who hath ſhaken the ſcepter over the head of Japhet. Shem, ſays he, hath ſubdued Japhet, and Japhet ſubdued Shem, but Cham never ſubdued either. But this muſt be a miſtake, if there be any truth in what the Egyptian hiſtories relate of the actions of Seſoſtris, and ſome other of their kings who conquered the greateſt part of Aſia and Europe; and conſequently Ham, or Cham, may be ſaid to have ſubdued both. Beſides, we find the Iſraelites were long the ſlaves of the Mizraim or the Egyptians; and we ſee no reaſon, why the ſhameful ſubmiſſion, which Rehoboam, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Solomon, made to Shiſhak the Egyptian Pharaoh, who after taking all the ſtrong cities of Judah, ſeems to have had Jeruſalem delivered up to him without oppoſition, to be ſpoiled with the temple, may not be deemed a ſervitude; it being expreſsly ſaid, the Jews ſhould be his ſervants, 2 Chron. xii. 5, 8. Ham alſo appears to have encroached upon Shem very early, for he ſeems to have driven the Shemites out of their firſt ſeats in Shinaar Shinaar; and every one knows that the Babylonians, who were the Hamites, had a conſiderable ſhare in the deſtruction of the Aſſyrian empire. But a ſtronger inſtance than any of the preceding, is the Babyloniſh captivity, in which the Jews themſelves were the ſufferers. Nay, the very branch of Canaan ſeems to have had great ſucceſs againſt Japhet, not only by the exploits of the Carthaginians (originally Canaanites) in Italy, but by their conqueſt of Spain.

Ver. 28. And Noah lived after the flood three hundred and twenty years.] The Armenians have a tradition, that Noah, after quitting the ark, went and ſettled at Erivan, about twelve leagues from Ararat, and that it was there he planted the vineyard, in a place where they ſtill make excellent wine. According to Tavernier, Nakſhivan, which is three leagues diſtant from Ararat, was the place where Noah went to dwell; and he adds that, that it is reported to be the oldeſt city in the world. This tradition, ſo far as it relates to Noah's ſettling in the country near the mountain where the ark reſted, ſeems more probable than a notion lately advanced by Dr. Alix, Mr. Whiſton, Mr. Shuckford, and Mr. Bedford, that Noah left his three ſons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, in ſome little time, and with his younger iſſue travelled to China, where he lived before the deluge, and that he was the firſt king of that country, whom the Chineſe call Fo hi; The opinion of theſe learned men depends on the following obſervations. 1. The Chineſe hiſtories ſay Fo hi had no father; which agrees well enough with Noah, becauſe the memory of his father might be loſt in the deluge, and ſo give occaſion to this fable that he had no father. 2. The ſame hiſtories affirm, that Fo hi's mother conceived him, as ſhe was encompaſſed with a rain-bow, which ſeems an imperfect tradition concerning the firſt appearance of the rain-bow to Noah after the flood. 3. The character and appellation of Fo hi among the Chineſe agrees with what the Scriptures affirm of Noah. ——— Fo hi, ſays Le Compte, carefully bred up ſeven ſorts of animals which he uſed to ſacrifice to the ſupreme Spirit of heaven and earth. For this reaſon ſome called him Paohi, that is Oblation. Noah, ſays Moſes, took into the ark of every clean beaſt by ſevens, &c. and after the flood, Noah builded an altar to the Lord, and took of every clean beaſt and every clean fowl, and offered burnt-offerings on the altar. 4. The Chineſe hiſtorians affirm, that Fo hi ſettled in the province of Shenſi, which is the moſt north-weſt province of China, and very near to mount Caucaſus, upon which, according to the opinion of ſome, the ark reſted. 5. That the Moſaic hiſtory, as it is perfectly ſilent in relation to the peopling of China, at the diſperſion, confining itſelf within the bounds of the then known world; ſo it ſays very little of Noah after the flood, which ſeems to be an intimation that he had no ſhare in the ſubſequent tranſactions related in the ſacred hiſtory, and ſo, by a fair conſequence, might be in China. 6. That this is confirmed by the Chaldean tradition of the ſudden diſappearing of Xiſuthrus, or Noah, his wife and daughter, and the pilot, on their coming out of the ark. 7. That the Chineſe language and writing, are ſo entirely different from thoſe among us, introduced by the confuſion of Babel, that they cannot well be derived from thence. 8. That the diſperſion beginning from Babylon, ſo remote a country as China, could not be ſo ſoon reached and peopled, as the prodigious number of its inhabitants at preſent ſhew it to have been; and therefore they could not be of ſo late an original. 9. That the learned ſciences ſeem to have been anciently, much better known in China, than in theſe parts of the world; their government and conſtitution much firmer and more laſting then ours; their moſt ancient hiſtories more authentic and certain than ours, (excepting thoſe of more than human original) all which things, would incline one to imagine, that as Noah might be much more wiſe and learned than any of his ſons, ſo all thoſe ſettlements, laws, and traditions, which are derived from him, are remarkable effects and teſtimonies of the ſame. 10. And principally that the reign of Fo hi, according to the moſt exact account hitherto given of the Chineſe chronology, coincides with the time of Noah; and the length of the reigns and lives of Fo hi, and his firſt ſucceſſors, greatly correſponds with the duration of the lives of men, in the ſame ages, recorded in Scripture.

But as this opinion is conjectural only, ſo ſeveral objections might be made to it. As, 1. It is improbable, if Noah was Fo hi, that the Chineſe annals ſhould make no mention of the deluge, which they are ſo far from having recorded, that Couplet expreſly makes it an error in thoſe who imagine they have. 2. The uncertainty of the Chineſe writers themſelves as to the hiſtory of Fo hi and his next ſucceſſors, ſome doubting whether there ever was ſuch a man as Fo hi; and others rejecting both him and his ſucceſſor Shin nungh, and beginning with Hoangh ti; wherefore Couplet leaves them out of the ſucceſſion of Chineſe monarchs, and with good reaſon, ſince Fo hi, is ſaid to have had the body of a ſerpent, and Shin nungh the head of an ox. 3. Moſes's account of the diſperſion ſeems moſt evidently to relate to all mankind without exception, who he ſuppoſes were collected together in the plain of Shinaar, as will hereafter be more particularly evinced. Conſequently Noah could not reign in China.

Noah died in the 950th year of his age, and, according to the tradition of the orientals, was buried in Meſopotamia, where they ſhew his ſepulchre in a caſtle, near a monaſtery called Dair abunah, that is, the monaſtery of our father.

CHAP. X.

1 The generations of Noah. 2 The ſons of Japhet. 6 The ſons of Ham. 8 Nimrod the firſt monarch. 21 The ſons of Shem.

NOW theſe are the generations of the ſons of Noah; Shem, Ham, and Japhet: and unto them were ſons born after the flood.

2 The ſons of Japhet; Gomer, and Magog, and Madai, and Javan, and Tubal, and Meſhech, and Tiras.

3 And the ſons of Gomer; Aſhkenaz, and Riphath, and Togarmah.

4 And the ſons of Javan; Eliſhah, and Tarſhiſh, Kittim, and Dodanim.

5 By theſe were the iſles of the Gentiles divided in their lands; every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations.

6 ¶ And the ſons of Ham; Cuſh, and Mizraim, and Phut, and Canaan.

7 And the ſons of Cuſh; Seba, and Havilah, and Sabtah, and Raamah, and Sabtecha: and the ſons of Raamah; Sheba and Dedan.

8 And Cuſh begat Nimrod: he began to be a mighty one in the earth.

9 He was a mighty hunter before the LORD: wherefore it is ſaid, Even as Nimrod the mighty hunter before the LORD.

10 And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh: in the land of Shinar.

11 Out of that land went forth Aſhur, and builded Nineveh, and the city Rehoboth, and Calah, 12 And Reſen between Nineveh and Calah: the ſame is a great city.

13 And Mizraim begat Ludim, and Anamim, and Lehabim, and Naphtuhim, 14 And Pathruſim, and Paſluhim (out of whom came Philiſtim) and Caphtorim.

15 ¶ And

15 ¶ And Canaan begat Sidon his firſt-born, and Heth,

16 And the Jebuſite, and the Emorite, and the Girgaſite,

17 And the Hivite, and the Arkite, and the Sinite,

18 And the Arvadite, and the Zemarite, and the Hamathite: and afterward were the families of the Canaanites ſpread abroad.

19 And the border of the Canaanites was from Sidon, as thou comeſt to Gerar, unto Gaza; as thou goeſt unto Sodom, and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Zeboim, even unto Laſhah.

20 Theſe are the ſons of Ham, after their families, after their tongues, in their countries, and in their nations.

21 ¶ Unto Shem alſo the father of all the children of Eber, the brother of Japhet the elder, even to him were children born.

22 The children of Shem; Elam, and Aſhur, and Arphaxad, and Lud, and Aram.

23 And the children of Aram; Uz, and Hul, and Gether, and Maſh.

24 And Arphaxad begat Salah; and Salah begat Eber.

25 And unto Eber were born two ſons: the name of one was Peleg, for in his days was the earth divided; and his brothers name was Joktan.

26 And Joktan begat Almodad, and Sheleph, and Hazarmaveth, and Jerah.

27 And Hadoram, and Uzal, and Diklah,

28 And Obal, and Abimael, and Sheba,

29 And Ophir, and Havilah, and Jobab: all theſe were the ſons of Joktan.

30 And their dwelling was from Meſha, as thou goeſt unto Sephar a mount of the eaſt.

31 Theſe are the ſons of Shem, after their families, after their tongues, in their lands, after their nations.

32 Theſe are the families of the ſons of Noah, after their generations, in their nations: and by theſe were the nations divided in the earth after the flood.

Ver. 1. Now theſe are the generations of the ſons of Noah, &c.] As Moſes had often mentioned the three ſons of Noah before, ſo now he mentions them again, being to give an account of their children by whom the earth was peopled after the flood. And he reckons them in the ſame order he had always done. But 'tis obſervable, that in the next verſe he gives an account firſt of the ſons of Japhet, who was indeed the eldeſt, and is called ſo in the 21ſt verſe of this chapter. This genealogy is very uſeful becauſe the doctrine of the creation of the world, which is the foundation of the law, would not have been ſo eaſily believed, if Moſes had not given an account of the ſucceſſion of mankind from their original parents to the flood; and from thence to his own time, ſhewing how all nations were diſpers'd, and the means by which that diſperſion was effected.

Ver. 2. The ſons of Japhet; Gomer and Magog, &c.] The Scripture leaves us in the dark as to the country where Japhet ſettled, as it does with regard to the particular reſidence of his brothers; and we can only collect that he retired from Shinaar with his deſcendants, and ſettled among them to the north of the countries planted by the children of Shem. Some imagine him, from the affinity of names, to be the Japetus of the Greeks; but there is no likelihood of his having ever been known to them, or that their traditions reach ſo high as this ſon of Noah, by many ages.

Gomer, the eldeſt ſon of Japhet, according to Joſephus, was the father of the Gomerites, called by the Greeks Galatians, who were the Gauls of Aſia minor, inhabiting part of Phrygia. Of this opinion is Bochart, and, if it be right, thoſe who derive the Cimmerians, or Cimbri, from Gomer, have ſome grounds for it; the Cimmerians ſeeming to be the ſame people with the Gauls, or Celts, under a different name: And it is obſervable that the Welſh, who are deſcended from the Gauls, ſtill call themſelves Kumero, or Cymero, and Cumeris. We may therefore let Gomer reſt where the learned Bochart places him, viz. in Phrygia, without ſtraining to make that word to be the Greek tranſlation of that name.

The plantations of Gomer's ſons may be preſumed to be thereabouts. 1. Aſhkenaz, as it ſeems, ſhould be ſeated near Armenia, in the eaſtern part of Aſia minor; for the Scripture, among the nations which were to be called by the Medes, under Cyrus, to deſtroy Babylon, mentions Ararat, Minni, and Aſhkenaz: But if regard be had to the footſteps found of this name, the country which he planted ſeems to have been in the north-weſt part of that continent; for in Bithynia there was the Aſcanian lake, and a river call'd Aſcanius, with a bay of the ſame name; and there was anciently a city named Aſcania in leſſer Phrygia, or Troas, with iſles on the coaſt, call'd the Aſcanian iſlands: And it is obſerved, that, beſides Aſcanius, the ſon of Æneas, Homer mentions a king of that name who was at the ſiege of Troy. In a word, the Pontus Euxinus, or Axinus, as it was firſt call'd by the Greeks, is ſuppoſed to be a corruption for the ſea of Aſhkenaz, now call'd the Black Sea. 2. That Riphath probably ſettled near his brother Aſhkenaz, we may admit the teſtimony of Joſephus, who ſays the Paphlagonians were originally called Riphathæans, from Riphath. Bochart finds the river Rhebas, near Paphlagonia. Stephanus not only mentions a river, but alſo a region of that name, where the inhabitants were called Rhebæi; and Pliny places here a people call'd Riphæi, which comes nearer the name of Riphath. 3. Togarmah, the laſt ſon of Gomer, was, probably, ſeated to the eaſt of Riphath; ſome think to the north of Armenia, among the Iberians; others in Cappadocia and Galatia; which opinions are not out of the way, ſince theſe countries lie contiguous to thoſe of the reſt of Gomer's family, and are ſituate conformable to that expreſſion of the Prophet, Gomer and his bands, the houſe of Togarmah of the north quarters and all his bands, Ezek. xxxviii. 6. which ſeems to be ſpoken of their ſituation with reſpect to Judea. Turcomannia, where many have placed this colony, ſeems too remote, becauſe they are ſaid to have traded to the fairs of Tyre, Ezek. xxvii. 14. and they brought thither horſes, horſemen, and mules, which confirms their ſettling in or about Cappadocia; for that country produced excellent horſes and mules, which laſt are ſuppoſed to have come firſt from thence, and was famous for good horſemen, as is atteſted by ſeveral of the ancient hiſtorians. Beſides, in the borders of Cappadocia, we find a people called Trocmi, Trogmi, or Trocmeni, as Stephanus calls them. In the council of Chalcedon they are call'd Trocmades, or Trogmades, which names have an affinity with Togarmah, or, as the Greeks uſually write it, Thorgama.

But, after all, the Armenians give themſelves out to be deſcended from Togarmah, (whom they make the ſon of Tiras, the ſon of Gomer) by his ſon Haikh, from whom they and their country, from all antiquity, have borne the name of Haikh. They ſay, alſo, that the name of Armenia, made uſe of by other nations, is derived from Aram, the ſeventh in deſcent from Haikh, who much enlarged the bounds of this kingdom: The Armenians had alſo numerous breeds of excellent horſes, which they paid to Cyrus inſtead of tribute; and many of thoſe creatures are ſtill bred there, for the uſe of the kings of Perſia. Upon theſe conſiderations, we muſt leave Armenia to the deſcendants of Togarmah, or Thurgumai, as they call him.

We now come to Magog, the ſecond ſon of Japhet, with regard to whoſe ſettlement the learned have many different and confuſed opinions. Joſephus, Jerom, and moſt of the Fathers, held them to be the Scythians about mount Caucaſus, which name Bochart ſuppoſes was made by the Greeks out of Gog haſan, ſignifying Gog's Fort, in Chaldee; a dialect of which he imagines to have been in the language of the Colchi and Armenians: But perhaps it is rather a wrong pronunciation of Cuh Kaf, which in Perſian ſignifies the mountain of Kaf, as the Arabs alſo call it: That his plantation adjoined upon thoſe of Meſhech and Tubal, appears from Ezekiel's making Gog, king of Magog, to reign over the other two, ch. xxxviii. 2. And it is thought we ſhould come nearer ſtill to a diſcovery of his quarters, if thoſe words, the chief prince, or (as it is in our marginal tranſlation) the prince of the chief of Meſhech and Tubal, be render'd according to the Septuagint, the prince of Roſh, Meſhech, and Tubal, becauſe in the iſthmus, or neck of land, between the Euxine and Caſpian ſeas, there formerly dwelt two ſorts of people; the one called Rhoſſi, on the river Cyrus, as Joſephus has it, or rather on the Ros, Ras, or Aras, call'd by the Greeks Araxes; the other call'd Moſchici, inhabiting a long chain of mountains, ſtretching, according to Ptolemy, along the north-weſt part of Armenia, and ſeparating it from Colchis and Iberia. From which two people, migrating or driven over Caucaſus, it is ſuppos'd the Ruſſians and Muſcovites are deſcended.

We are inclined to think the parts already mentioned, between the Euxine and Caſpian ſeas, are moſt likely to be thoſe in which Magog ſettled; however, we can by no means omit this occaſion of taking notice of an error which many of the modern writers have fallen into, who place Magog in Syria. Bochart's great judgment would not ſuffer him wholly to come into it, however he ſuppoſes Magog himſelf gave his name to a town there. Dr. Wells more cautiouſly ſuggeſts, that the name was long after taken from the Scythians, when they made an excurſion into Syria, and took that city, as Bethſan in Judæa was alſo called, after them, Scythopolis. But Mr. Shuckford fixes Magog himſelf there, with Gomer, Tubal, Togarmah, and Meſhech, about him. What gave riſe to this opinion is a paſſage in Pliny, where he obſerves that Bambyce, otherwiſe Hierapolis, is called by the Syrians Magog; but this proves to be a palpable miſtake of the tranſcriber, who has written Magog inſtead of Mabog, as has been obſerv'd by Dr. Hyde, who wonders no-body had corrected that error in Pliny.

It is generally thought that Madai, the third ſon of Japhet, planted Media; and the Medes are always called by this name in ſcripture.

Javan, the fourth ſon of Japhet, may probably be ſuppoſed to have ſettled near his brothers, in the ſouth-weſt part of the leſſer Aſia, about Ionia, which contains the radical letters of his name.

His four children may find places correſpondent with their names in the ſame parts, 1. The Æoles, who inhabited Æolia, to the north of Ionia, are by Joſephus made to deſcend from Eliſha, Javan's eldeſt ſon; but there is a greater appearance of his name in Hellas, the ancient name of Greece; the iſles of which ſeem to be thoſe called the iſles of Eliſha, by Exekiel, chap. viii. 7. Peloponneſus, which may be well comprehended among the iſles, as being almoſt one, contained moreover a city and province, by the name of Elis; and in Attica was the city Eleuſis, and the river Eliſſus or Iliſſus. 2. Tarſhiſh, according to Joſephus, gave name not only to Tarſus, but to all Cilicia, of which it was the capital; it ſeems alſo to have been the Tarſhiſh, to which Jonas thought to flee from the preſence of the Lord, as well as that mentioned ſo often by the prophets, on account of its trading with Tyre. 3. To the weſt of Tarſhiſh it is ſuppoſed Kittim firſt planted. Homer mentions a people in thoſe parts, called Cetii (from the river Cetius) which is the word by which the Septuagint have render'd Kittim. But in the Apocrypha, Macedonia is plainly denoted by the land of Chettiim, Alexander being mentioned as coming from thence, 1 Mac. i. 1. and Perſeus, king of Macedonia, is called king of the Citims, 1 Mac. viii. 5. Nor do we ſee any thing amiſs in ſuppoſing that country to be the original plantation of the Kittim, ſince it comes under the general denomination of the iſles which were to be the portion of Japhet; at leaſt, of the poſterity of Javan. 4. It is not ſo eaſy to find a place for Dodanim, the youngeſt of Javan's ſons, except we admit the change of the D into R (which letters in the Hebrew are ſcarcely to be diſtinguiſhed) and call him Rodanim, as the Septuagint have done, in order to ſettle the iſland of Rhodes upon him, which, for ought we know, is not a worſe ſhift than to extract the name of Doris, and the Dorians, in Peloponneſus, from Dodanim.

As to Tiras, the ſeventh ſon of Japhet, we may reaſonably allow, according to Joſephus, and the general opinion, that he led his colony into Thrace.

Ver. 5. By theſe were the iſles of the Gentiles divided in their lands, &c.] By the word iſles we commonly underſtand countries ſurrounded by the ſea. But the Hebrews uſe this word to ſignify all thoſe countries divided from them by the ſea, or ſuch as they uſed not to go to but by ſea. Many paſſages of ſcripture teſtify this. Iſa. xi. 10, 11. xl. 15. Jer. ii. 10, &c.

As to the order or method wherein theſe firſt plantations of the earth were made, ſome have imagined there was little or none, but that each colony ſettled where they did, by meer chance; yet if we attentively conſider the account given of this tranſaction by the ſacred hiſtorian, we ſhall find nothing more foreign to his intention, than a precipitate and confuſed diſſipation; for we are told, with regard to the ſons of Japhet, that by theſe were the iſles of the Gentiles divided in their lands; every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations. And much the ſame expreſſions are uſed, with relation to the ſons of Ham and Shem. From which paſſages may be inferred, that this great diviſion of the earth was performed in the moſt regular and unconfuſed manner. For we ſee a twofold order in theſe firſt plantations. Firſt they were ranged according to their nations, and then every nation was ranked after their families; ſo that every nation dwelt, and had his lot by himſelf, and in every nation the particular families alſo dwelt, and had their lots by themſelves; for the true import of the words of Moſes ſeems to be, that the land, or peculiar lot of each family, did lie within the general lot of each nation.

Ver. 6. And the ſons of Ham; Cuſh, and Mizraim, and Phut, and Canaan.] Ham probably removed from Shinaar. Suppoſing him to be the Cronus of Sanchoniatho, he reigned in Phænicia. According to others, who make him to be the ſame with Menes, he muſt have ſettled in Egypt, which indeed in ſcripture is often called the land of Ham; and ſome from the ſimilitude of Ammon, and other words of the like ſound, would infer, that he dwelt there for ſome time, but nothing can be concluded from ſuch weak evidence.

Cuſh, his eldeſt ſon, may probably be ſuppoſed to have ſettled in the ſouth-eaſtern part of Babylonia; and in the adjoining part of Suſiana, ſtill called Khuzeſtan, or the country of Chuz; from whence his poſterity, in the ſucceeding generations, might have paſſed into other countries. That a part of Arabia, near the Red-ſea, was named Cuſh, appears from ſcripture. Cuſhan and Midian are joined together, as the ſame or neighbouring people, Habak. iii. 7. The Arabs are made to border on the Cuſhites, 2 Chron. xxi. 16. which therefore cannot be the Ethiopians; in a word, by Cuſh in ſcripture is always to be underſtood Arabia. Cuſh, according to the Arab and Perſian traditions, which name him Cutha, was king of the territory of Babel, and reſided in Erak, where there were two cities of his name; from whence, among other reaſons, Dr. Hyde is of opinion, that Cuſh reigned in Babylonia, and that his deſcendants removed into Arabia, tho' it is hard to fix the quarters of any of them; which has given occaſion to thoſe who ſuppoſe Cuſh to be Ethiopia, to ſpread them all along the coaſt of Africa, to the end of Mauritania.

But ſuppoſing them to have ſeated themſelves in Arabia, which is the moſt rational opinion, we will allow 1. That Seba the eldeſt ſon of Cuſh, placed himſelf ſomewhere in the ſouth of Chaldea, or the Arabian Erak; becauſe, 2. His ſecond brother Havilah's country lay thereabouts, watered by the Piſon, as we have formerly obſerved. 3. The ſeat of Sabtah, the third ſon, lay perhaps more to the ſouth, where we find a city called Saphtha by Ptolemy, not far from the Perſian gulph, and another named Sabatha, lower down in Arabia Felix, which comes much near Sabtah. 4. Raamah, or Rhegma, the fourth ſon, may find a place more ſouthward ſtill, about a city called Rhegama by Ptolemy, on the ſame gulph. Some moderns mention a city not far from it called Daden, which Dr. Wells does not doubt was the reſidence of his ſon Dedan. Tho' others will have Raamah and both his ſons, Sheba as well as Dedan to people the parts adjacent to the red ſea. They conclude Dedan to have been near Edom, becauſe Ezekiel joins them together, chap. xxv. 13. as Raamah muſt have been near Sheba, being mentioned as joint traders to Tyre, in ſpices, by the ſame prophet, chap. xxvii. 22. And elſewhere Sheba and Seba are joined as neighbours, Pſal. lxxii. 10. tho' diſtinguiſhed at different kingdoms: They ſeem to have poſſeſſed a larger part of Arabia; for Pliny obſerves that the Sabæan nations inhabited from ſea to ſea, that is from the Arabian to the Perſian gulph. Mr. Shuckford ſuppoſes Sheba lived on the borders of the land of Midian, and gave name to the country whoſe Queen, in after ages, went to viſit Solomon. But the Arabs ſay the country of Sheba lies much more to the ſouth, in Yaman, or, as we call it, Arabia Felix, near the Indian ſea; the chief city of which was formerly called Saba, now called Mareb, and founded, according to their tradition, by a deſcendant of Joctan; or Kahtan. And it muſt be confeſſed this ſeems to be the country of Sheba, mentioned in ſcripture; for the frankincenſe grows thereabouts. 5. Sabtecha the fifth ſon of Cuſh, has puzzled all the geographers to aſſign his quarters. Bochart not finding a place in Arabia, which bore any reſemblance to the name, paſſes over to Carmania in Perſia, and preſſes the city Samydace into the ſervice, obſerving that the M. and B. are often changed the one for the other, by the Arabs and their neighbours. On the other hand Dr. Wells imagines that the Saracens are the deſcendants of Sabtecha, which nation being ſtiled at firſt by the Greeks Sabtaceni; that name was afterwards ſoften'd into Saraceni; and the rather he thinks, becauſe alluding to the Arabic verb ſaraka, to ſteal, it ſerved for a nick-name. Tho' indeed the word Saraceni, is no other than Sharkiin, which in Arabic ſignifies Eaſterlings; as the African Arabs weſt of Egypt, are called Mogrebins or Weſterlings. For our part, being afraid to meddle in a point of ſo much uncertainty, we think it the ſafeſt way to paſs this perſon by, and proceed, 6. to his brother Nimrod.

Ver. 8. And Cuſh begat Nimrod, &c.] Nimrod was the ſixth ſon of Cuſh, and, in all appearance, much younger than any of his brothers; for Moſes mentions the ſons of Raamah, his fourth brother, before he ſpeaks of him. From the account given of him, by Moſes, a great idea hath been conceived of his ſtrength and valour. Some repreſent him as a giant; all conſider him as a great warrior. It is generally thought that by the words, a mighty hunter, is to be underſtood that he was a great tyrant. But ſome of the Rabins interpret thoſe words favourably, ſaying that Nimrod was qualified, by a peculiar dexterity, and ſtrength, for the chaſe; and ſeveral of the moderns are of opinion that this paſſage is not to be underſtood of his tyrannical oppreſſions, or of hunting of Men, but of beaſts.

It muſt likewiſe be owned that the phraſe, before the Lord, may be taken in a favourable ſenſe, and as a commendation of a perſon's good qualities; tho', in this place, the generality of expoſitors underſtand it otherwiſe. Hunting, however, muſt have been one of the moſt uſeful employments in the times juſt after the diſperſion, when all countries were over-run with wild beaſts, of which it was neceſſary they ſhould be cleared, in order to make them habitable; and therefore nothing ſeemed more proper to procure a man eſteem and honour in thoſe ages, than his being an expert hunter, as Nimrod probably was.

We may add too, that there is nothing in the ſhort hiſtory of Nimrod, which carries the leaſt air of reproach, except his name, which is generally ſaid to ſignify a rebel, as being derived from the Hebrew word marad to rebel. But if a compoſition may be allowed of, a more favourable etymology, and more agreeable to Nimrod's occupation, might be offered, from namer a Leopard, which may by a metonymy denote wild beaſts in general, and radad, to fell or beat down, or radah, to ſubdue or take. The Arabs make Nemrud, the plural of which is Nemaredah, the ſame with mared a rebel. However, a Perſian author, who makes Nimrod the ſame with Cay Caus, a King of the ſecond dynaſty of Perſia, gives the name a Perſian derivation, as if it was Nemurd, which ſignifies immortal, which appellation he ſays was given him, on account of his long reign of above 150 years. If the firſt of the three ſignifications be right, the name muſt have been given him by his enemies, not by ſubjects. The Greeks write the name Nembrod, and Nebrodes.

Commentators being prepoſſeſſed in general, that the curſe of Noah fell upon all the poſterity of Ham; and finding this prince ſtigmatized by his name, have interpreted every paſſage relating to him to his diſadvantage. They repreſent him as a rebel againſt God, in perſuading the deſcendants of Noah to diſobey the divine command to diſperſe, and in ſetting them to build the tower of Babel, with an impious deſign of ſcaling heaven. They brand him as an uſurper, and an inſolent oppreſſor; and make him the author of the adoration of fire, of idolatrous worſhip given to men, and the firſt perſecutor on the account of religion. On the other hand, ſome repreſent him as a virtuous prince, and ſo far from adviſing the building of Babel, that they ſay he left the country, and went into Aſſyria, becauſe he would not conſent to that proceeding.

Nimrod is generally thought to have been the firſt King after the flood, tho' ſome authors ſuppoſing a plantation, or diſperſion prior to that of Babel, have made Kings in ſeveral countries before him. Mizraim is ſuppoſed by many, who contend for the antiquity of the Egyptian monarchy, to have begun his reign a good deal earlier than Nimrod.

Ver. 10. And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, &c.] The four cities Moſes gives to Nimrod, made a large kingdom in thoſe early times, when few kings had more than one. Whether he became poſſeſſed of thoſe cities by conqueſt, or otherwiſe, does not appear: It is moſt probable he did not build Babel, all the poſterity of Noah ſeeming to have been equally concerned in that affair; nor does it appear that he built the other three, tho' the founding of them, and many more, with other works, are attributed to him by the oriental writers. It may ſeem a little ſtrange that Nimrod ſhould be preferred to the regal dignity, and enjoy the moſt cultivated part of the earth then known, rather than any other of the elder chiefs, or heads of nations, even of the branch of Ham. Perhaps it was conferr'd on him for his dexterity in hunting; or it may be, he did not aſſume the title of king till after the death of his father Cuſh, who might have been ſettled there before him, and left him the ſovereignty. Al Tabari, a Perſian author, of great authority, affirms, that Cuſh, or Cutha, was king of the territory of Babel, and reſided in Erak; and attributes to him the making of the river Cutha. Dr. Hyde places the original ſeat of Cuſh in the ſame country, which he calls the moſt ancient Cuſh; and ſays, that his poſterity removing into Arabia, it thence took the name of Cuſh, alſo.

We might be able to form ſome judgment concerning the extent of the firſt Babyloniſh kingdom, could we fix the ſituation of theſe four cities: But this is very difficult, all of them having been long ſince deſtroy'd, and authors differing ſo much in opinions about them. There are even two traditions, with regard to the ruins of Babel, ſome placing them at Felugia, a village on the Euphrates, about 36 miles to the ſouth-weſt of Baghdad, on the Tigris; others, about the ſame diſtance from Felugia ſouthward, on the firſt of theſe rivers: How much more uncertain, then, muſt be the ſituation of the reſt, which were towns not ſo famous, and whoſe ruins, if any remain, are ſeldom enquired after?

According to the eaſtern authors, Erech, or Arach, is Hadas, or Edeſſa, call'd by the Syrians Urhoi, by the Arabs Roha, and by the inhabitants Orfa; Accad, or Akhar, as ſome write it, is Niſibin; and Calneh, Calanne, or Calya, is Cteſiphon, or Medain; and, if they are not miſtaken, the diſtances of theſe cities from each other will give Nimrod's kingdom a greater extent. But the Aſiatics, in many things relating to their own antiquities, are not to be relied on more than the Europeans. We are of opinion, the Babylonian kingdom, under Nimrod, was much more limited; and rather agree with thoſe who believe Erech to have been a city of Chaldea, which from thence took its preſent Arabic name of Erak. This ſeems to be the the Arecca of Ptolemy, and Arecha of Marcellinus, who places it in Suſiana. Neither can Erec be Urhoi, or Edeſſa, in the opinion of thoſe who hold Ur of the Chaldees, and Urhoi, to be the ſame. For Erec and Ur are diſtinguiſh'd in Scripture as two different cities. Calne we admit to be Cteſiphon, or Medain, nearer either of the aforeſaid towns than is Baghdad; and as for Accad, we may ſuppoſe it to have been ſome city in the neighbourhood of the other three, long ſince ruined, and the memory of it loſt: And thus will this early monarchy be reduc'd to ſuch dimenſions, as, in all probability, the firſt could not exceed.

Ver. 11. Out of that land went forth Aſſur, and builded Nineveh, &c.] The Scripture has recorded no one action of any one of the five ſons of Shem, mention'd in the 22d verſe of this chapter, except Aſhur; and the paſſage in this 11th verſe, relating to him, is a very material one, as it fixes the true time of the foundation of the Aſſyrian kingdom. We are ſenſible this text is by many applied otherwiſe, and render'd, according to the marginal reading of our tranſlation, He went out into Aſſyria; as if Nimrod was the perſon ſpoken of: But ſuch a ſenſe puts a manifeſt force upon the words. Pezron ſuppoſes he was driven out of Shinaar by Nimrod, which indeed ſeems to be the caſe. But however that be, it was Aſhur, and not Nimrod, who went out of Shinaar into Aſſyria, and built Nineveh and other cities, as Perizonius has clearly prov'd that text is to be underſtood, and as the circumſtances require.

Nineveh is ſuppoſed to have ſtood on the Eaſt-ſide of the Dijlat or Tigris, oppoſite to Muſol, or Moſul; at leaſt the tradition of the country will have it ſo: But there are no ruins to be ſeen there, as there are at Old Babel; it was deſtroyed in the time of Lucianus Samoſatenſis, who lived under the emperor Adrian. A certain traveller declares that he has diſcovered and thoroughly viewed ſome remains, by which he judged the city to have been built in form of a long ſquare, in length 150 furlongs, and in breadth 90; which, at eight furlongs to an Italian mile, make threeſcore miles in compaſs. See the Preachers Travells p. 89.

The city Rehoboth is by many ſuppoſed to be Reheboth on the Euphrates, the ſame probably with that called Rahabat Malek, not many miles below the place where the Khabur falls into the Euphrates; and Reſen to be the Reſania of the ancients, in Meſopotamia, ſtill in being, and called Ras alain, that is, the head of the fountain, on account of the many ſprings riſing thereabouts; and among the reſt that of the Khabur. It is alſo called Ain Wardah. But others endeavour to find Rhohoboth, and Reſen nearer Nineveh, and alſo object that they cannot be Rahabat, and Ras alain, becauſe theſe laſt are not in Aſſyria, which lies to the eaſt of Tigris. They ſuppoſe that Rehoboth is the ſame with the Birtha of Ptolemy, or Virtha of Ammianus Marcellinus, ſituate at the mouth of the river Lycus, from which the preſent ruins of Nineveh are not many miles diſtant to the north, and the reaſon they give is becauſe Birtha ſignifies the ſame in the Chaldee, which Reheboth does in the Hebrew, that is, ſtreets. And as a confirmation that theſe names are the ſame, Ptolemy alſo places a Birtha on the Euphrates, about the place where we have ſuppoſed the other Rehoboth to have ſtood, nor does his placing it above the confluence of the Khabur and Euphrates, inſtead of below it, lay any good objection in the way, ſince Ptolemy is full of ſuch faults. It may rather be objected, that Moſes ſeems to have given all the cities he mentions the names they went by in the country where they ſtood, as near as the Hebrew orthography would permit; but in ſuch doubtful caſes we muſt always make allowances; ſo that Birtha or Virtha may ſtand for Rhehoboth, ſince we cannot find a more likely place.

Calah, the next city, is ſuppoſed to be the Calach, ſituate about the ſprings of the river Lycus, mentioned by Strabo as the capital of a province called Calachene, which ſeems to be the ſame with Ptolemy's Calacine, above Adiabene, towards mount Niphates. Bochart thinks it is the ſame with Halah, whither the Iſraelites were carried captives.

Could we be ſure of being right, as to the ſituation of Calah, that of Reſen would be found of courſe; for Moſes ſays it lay between it and Nineveh, which is enough for our purpoſe, without ſuppoſing it to be the Lariſſa of Xenophon, according to whoſe deſcription it was a great city, as Reſen is likewiſe ſaid to have been. But we muſt own Lariſſa ſeems to lie too much out of the way to be Reſen, for it ſtood on the Tigris, to the ſouth of Nineveh; whereas it ſhould rather have been ſituate to the north of that city, and at a diſtance from the river, to lie in the way between Nineveh and Calah. We may however ſuppoſe Reſen to have been ſome city in the neighbourhood of thoſe two, long ſince deſtroyed.

Ver. 13. And Mizraim begat Ludim and Anamim, &c.] Mizraim ſtands in the place of the ſecond ſon of Ham; for there is a great diſpute, whether this is the name of a ſingle perſon or of a people, as having a dual termination, tho' the verb in the 13th verſe, where he is ſaid to beget Ludim, is in the ſingular number. The name by which Egypt is uſually denoted in Scripture is the land of Mizraim, and as this ſecond ſon of Ham is generally reputed to have been the firſt planted of Egypt, it has been thought that his name is expreſſed in the dual number to intimate the two-fold diviſion of Egypt, viz. the upper and the lower.

As to the nations deſcended from Mizraim. 1. The Ludim are judged to be the people above Egypt, called by the Greeks Ethiopians, and at preſent Abyſſins. We rarely find them called otherwiſe in Scripture than Lud. In one place of it they are ſtiled a mix'd people, Ezek xxx. v. in others they are ſaid to be very skillful in drawing the bow, Iſaiah lxvi. 19. Jerem. xlvi. 9. which the Ethiopians were famous for; and Lud is, in thoſe laſt mention'd paſſages of Scripture, join'd with Cuſh and Phut, as are the Lubims elſewhere with the Egyptians; from whence it may be inferred they were all neighbouring people. 2. The Anamim are thought by Bochart to be the Ammonians, or inhabitants of that part of Lybia where ſtood the temple of Jupiter Ammon, deſcended, according to Herodotus, partly from the Egyptians, and partly from the Ethiopians. 3. The Lebahim are ſuppoſed to be the ſame with the Luhim, who with the Sukkiims and Cuſhites came out of Mizraim, or Egypt, with Shiſhak, to invade Judæa. Theſe, therefore, may not improperly be judged to be the Libyans of Cyrenaica or proper Libya near Egypt.

The Naphtuhim are thought to have ſettled in Marmarica, adjoining to Cyrenaica. It is to be obſerved, that the Egyptians called all the skirts of a country, and promontaries waſhed by the Sea, Nephthys; and Bochart places the Naphtuhim rather on the coaſt of the mediterranean than on that of the red ſea, becauſe the Troglodites and Ichthyophagi, who are the inhabitants of the latter, are in the Scripture called Zigim and Sukkiim. Some place the Naphtuhim about Noph or Memphis, in Egypt. 5. Pathruſim are evidently the inhabitants of Pathros, which ſome wrongly take for Peluſium; others more juſtly for Thebais, or the upper Egypt, which is diſtinguiſhed from the lower Egypt, in prophane hiſtory as well as ſacred. 6. The Caſluhim are ſuppoſed to have ſettled ſomewhere towards the entrance of Egypt, about mount Caſſius, in that part of the lower Egypt called Caſſiotis by Ptolemy and others; which places it is thought retain ſome likeneſs of the name; but without relying on that argument, they appear to have been planted near the Caphtorim, becauſe the Philiſtim, as it ſeems, were deſcended from both theſe people, and conſequently in Egypt. As for the Philiſtim, we ſhall conſider their original ſettlement in Egypt, before they removed into Canaan, when we come to their particular hiſtory, in the courſe of this work. Caphtorim the laſt of the offspring of Mizraim, are, as Bochart obſerves, agreed by all the fathers to be the Cappadocians, and Caphtor Cappadocia; as the Septuagint have rendered it. In this doubtleſs they follow the Jews, who explain thoſe names the ſame way, as do the three Chaldee paraphraſts. But by Cappadocia in theſe writings, is not to be underſtood Cappadocia in Aſia minor, as Bochart, and perhaps the reſt, judged, but ſome place in Egypt, generally ſuppoſed by the Rabbins to be Demyat, or Damietta, commonly confounded with Peluſium.

As to Phut the third ſon of Ham, authors are not agreed about the country where he planted himſelf. Bochart endeavours to prove, that Mizraim and he divided Africa between them: What is moſt to the purpoſe is taken ken from St. Jerom, who affirms Phut to be Libya, and that in his time there was a river in Mauritania, with the adjacent region, named from him Phut. But to this it may be objected, that Ezekiel, chap. xxxviii. 5. mentions Phut with Cush and Persia, as auxiliaries to the northern enemies of the Jews; and in the army of Gog; which looks as if Phut's quarters lay somewhere between Cush and Babylon. However, in points so uncertain, we will not presume to determine any thing.

We are not so much to seek for the parts planted by Canaan and his posterity, viz. Sidon, Heth, the Jebusites, Amorites, Girgathites, Hivites, Arkites, Sinites, Arvadites, Zemarites, and Hamathites, and who undoubtedly settled in Phænicia, and the land of Canaan; and of whom we shall speak more particularly in our Annotations on those passages of scripture where their respective histories occur.

Ver. 22. The children of Shem; Elam, and Ashur, &c.] Shem may be supposed for the few years, viz. eleven, which according to the Samaritan chronology, he lived after the dispersion of mankind, to have dwelt in Shinaar: His descendants seem to have settled from Media westward to the sea-coast of Aram or Syria. The number of chiefs of his line concerned in the dispersion were seven. Elam, Ashur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram, the sons of Shem; Salah the son of Arphaxad, and Eber the son of Salah.

1. Elam settled in the country of Elam, lying to the south-east of Shinaar; in the time of Daniel, Susiana, or Khuzestan, seems to have been part of it, Dan. viii. 2. and before the captivity it does not appear that the Jews called Persia by any other name. Elymæ and Elymais are often mentioned by the ancients: Ptolemy, tho' he makes Elymais a province of Media, yet he places the Elymæi in Susiana near the sea-coast. Stephanus takes it to be a part of Assyria, but Pliny and Josephus, more properly, of Persia, whose inhabitants, this latter tells us, sprung from the Elamites; and this seems to have been the most easterly bounds of the posterity of Shem; for adjoining on the east was Media, supposed to be possessed by Madai, the third son of Japhet.

2. As Ashur was the second son of Shem, so we find his country lying next to Elam's, on the west or north-west, called likewise, after him, Ashur, and by the Greeks Assyria, at present Curdestan, or the country of the Curds.

3. Arphaxad the third son of Shem is placed by some in Arrapachitis, a province of Assyria, towards the north-part of that country; but others settle him, with his family, in Chaldea, where indeed we find his descendants till the time of Abraham. And could it be proved that the Chasdim, or Chaldeans, derive their name, as well as descent, from that patriarch, as Josephus affirms, there would be no doubt of this last being the true opinion. Some, who make but one and the same person of Arphaxad and Cainan, who is inserted between him and Salah in the Septuagint version, suppose him to be the founder of the monarchy of China. Vide Boldac. de Eccles. ante leg. l. 2. cap. 2.

Arphaxad had one advantage above the rest of his brethren, namely, of having the patriarchal line continued through him: He was born in the 100th year of his father, two years after the flood, and begat the succeeding patriarch in the 135th year of his age.

Who this son so begotten by Arphaxad was, has occasioned no small dispute among the learned: According to the Hebrew, and the Samaritan, Salah was his son; but in the Septuagint version we find Cainan inserted between the two, as the son of the first, and father of the latter. This variation not only adds another link to the chain of succession, but alters the chronology of this period, making that of the Septuagint to exceed the Samaritan by 150 years, the age fixed for Cainan to have begotten his son. Those who adhere to the Septuagint, draw their chief argument from St. Luke's mentioning Cainan in his genealogy of Christ, Luke iii. 6. but this may easily have happened, by its being added from some erroneous copies of the Septuagint, and first, as is most probable, put in the margin, tho' it has since crept into the text; and this is still more likely, because Cainan is not to be found in the chronology of those times, given us from the Septuagint itself, by Africanus and Eusebius, which circumstances we look upon as a sufficient authority to reject him out of the number of the patriarchs.

Salah is the only patriarch concerning whom the Christian writers have observed an equal silence with Moses. Where he settled is very uncertain; some suppose it to have been in Susiana, or Khuzestan in Persia, because they find a town there formerly called Sala; but Morocco, Spain, Phrygia, Armenia, and Hyrcania, may claim this patriarch for their planter, for the same reason, having had each of them a town of the same name; and in Colchis we find a nation called Salæ, according to Pliny, (Hist. Nat. l. 6. c. 4) which seems to have the best pretensions to him of all, since he ought to be consider'd rather as the founder of a nation than of a town. But as affinity of names weighs very little with us, except backed by some other proof, we shall not remove him out of Chaldea, where we suppose room enough for all his descendants in the right line till Abraham; for which reason we settle Eber also in the same country.

It is the general opinion, that the Hebrews derive their name from the patriarch Eber, and many of the Jews (as well as Christians) attribute to him the honour of being the founder of their name and nation. But there is much more appearance, that the name of Hebrews was given to Abraham and his descendants, on account of his passing over the rivers in his way from Irak, or Chaldea, into Syria. So that a Hebrew should signify nothing else, in the original sense of the word, than a man from beyond the Euphrates. In confirmation of which opinion, it will be proper to observe, that the Hebrew word Eber signifies beyond, or simply a passage.

4. We can see no more reason than Sir Walter Raleigh why Lud, Shem's fourth son, should straggle so far from his friends as Lydia, where Josephus fixes him; besides, there is a strong objection against this opinion, the Lydians having been first called Mæones, as all the ancients agree, and Lydians from Lydus, the son of Atys, except we suppose the Greeks were deceived, and that the name of Mæones ceasing, they resumed their old name of Lydians. But even in that case we ought perhaps to consider Lydia as possessed by the Ludim, or posterity of Lud, on a second or third remove, and to look for his first settlement nearer his brothers.

5. Mesopotamia and Syria, comprehending the countries westward of Assyria, as far as the Mediterranean sea, seem wholly (if we except Phœnicia and Palestine) to have fallen to the share of Aram, Shem's fifth and youngest son, whose name is given both to the whole, and the several regions thereof, in scripture.

Within, or bordering on this country of Aram, it is likely that Uz, Hul, Gether, and Mash, the four sons of Aram, settled. It is generally agreed, that Uz, the eldest, built Damascus, and gave name to the country about that city, which seems to be different from the land of Uz, where Job dwelt, lying towards Edom. 2. Bochart supposes Hul to have settled in Cholobetene, a part of the greater Armenia, where he finds several places whose names begin with Chol or Col. 3. Gether, according to Josephus, was a prince of the Bactrians, but Bactria lay out of Shem's lot, as well as too far for the first plantation; and if we allow him a seat about the river Centrites, between Armenia and the Carduchi, it is not because we think there is the least affinity in the two names to induce us to it, as Bochart does. 4. Mash, or Meshek, Aram's fourth son, is supposed to fix in Armenia, about the mountain Masius, the same with that commonly held to be Ararat, and call'd by the Armenians Masis. However, the Armenians themselves do not lay claim to any of Shem's line as their progenitor, but say they are descended from Togarmah of Japhet's posterity.

Ver. 25. And unto Eber were born two sons: The name of the one was Peleg, for in his days was the earth divided, and his brother's name was Joktan.] Peleg was born just after the dispersion happen'd, on which occasion that name was given him; for Peleg signifies division. The division of the earth, and the dispersion of mankind, was, doubtless, the same transaction, tho' several authors, especially those who follow the Hebrew chronology, make two of them, as we shall observe hereafter.

The Scripture mentions only one son of Peleg's, but the orientals have given him another, mention'd, indeed, in scripture, tho' not as Peleg's son; namely, Melchizedec. They

They ſay he begat him, 209 years after the birth of his brother; which is a more rational opinion, tho' perhaps no better grounded, than that of the Jews, who make Melchizedec to be the ſame with Shem. Of this perſon we ſhall have occaſion to ſay more hereafter.

Joctan is generally ſuppos'd to have been Peleg's elder brother, upon a preſumption that he and his thirteen ſons were leaders of colonies at the diſperſion of Babel. They are indeed mention'd at the ſame time with the heads of other nations, and are, doubtleſs, to be included among thoſe by whom, it is ſaid, the nations were divided in the earth after the flood: But we do not think it follows from thence that they muſt have been leaders in that firſt diſperſion, in caſe their ages would allow it. Beſides, we ſhould not only poſtpone the time of that tranſaction, which ſeems to be neceſſarily connected with the birth of Peleg, but introduce five generations in the line of Shem, as concerned in it, which are two more than we find of the deſcendants of Ham and Japhet. Thoſe who follow the Hebrew computation, are at a great loſs for an expedient to make Joktan and his thirteen ſons leaders of colonies at the diſperſion, ſuppoſing it to have happened at the birth of Peleg. For Eber having been but thirty-four years old when he begat the latter, there cannot reaſonably be allowed above half that ſpace for Joktan's age at that time, even granting him to be the elder: So that we cannot well conceive him to have been the father of more than one ſon before the diſperſion. Upon which account many poſtpone that tranſaction to a ſucceeding part of Peleg's life, ſuppoſing Eber impoſed that name on his ſon prophetically. But the great Uſher thinks himſelf oblig'd to refer it to his birth, tho' he knows not how to get over the difficulty juſt now mention'd, which may be ſolv'd well enough by the Samaritan chronology, according to which, time ſufficient may be allow'd for Joktan and his ſons to propagate.

With reſpect, therefore, to Joktan's ſons, Moſes aſſigns them their habitation, from Meſha as thou goeſt unto Sephar, a mount of the eaſt, ver. 30. of this chapter. The want of knowing the ſituation of theſe places, has run authors into ſtrange miſtakes: Some ſuppoſe Meſha to be mount Maſius, or Ararat in Armenia (but it ſeems rather to be a city) and look for mount Sephar beyond Media, towards India. In ſhort, the ancients have generally peopled all the eaſtern parts of Aſia beyond Media, with theſe ſons of Joktan; which is ſo inconſiſtent, that Bochart might well wonder ſo many of the moderns have been led by them; and yet ſome have done worſe, and planted America immediately by Joktan, from whom Arias Montanus imagined that the province of Jucatan derived its name; and the ſame author judges mount Sephar to be the Andes of Peru.

In all probability the places in queſtion are to be look'd for in Arabia; but we cannot agree with Bochart, that Meſha is Muza (ſuppoſed to be Mokha, a noted port in the Arabian gulph) and Sephar the city Sapphar, any more than with the Arab paraphraſts, that they are Mecca and Medina. We ſhould therefore chuſe, out of theſe two conjectures, to form a third, and ſuppoſe Meſha and Sephar to be Mecca and Sapphar, or rather (if the Moſaical deſcription would agree with it) Dhafar, a port in the middle of that coaſt of Arabia waſh'd by the Indian ſea, which would take in all the country lying beyond that of Cuſh, and which the Arabs allow to have been poſſeſs'd by the poſterity of Yarab, the ſon of Kahtan, or Joktan. We do not indeed find Yarab, among the ſons of Joktan mentioned by Moſes; but it is no difficult matter to ſet him there by a change of the h in Jerah (the fourth ſon) into b.

We meet with no good ſigns of the ſettlement of Almodad and Sheleph, the two firſt ſons of Joktan; but the name of the third, Hazermaveth, or as it is better written in the Vulgate, Haſarmoth, is plainly to be found in Hadhramaut, a province of Yaman or Arabia Felix; having both the ſame radicals, and ſignifying the court or country of death. 4. Bochart diſcovers the name of Jerah in the iſland Hieracon (or of Hawks) in the Arabian Gulph, and a town ſo called within land, on the river Lar, near the Omanitæ; And 5. That of Hadoram in the Drimati of Pliny, towards the Perſian Gulph. 6. Uzal is the name given to Sanaa, the capital of Yaman, by the Jews who dwelt there; and it appears from Pliny to be the ſame city; its port was Ocela, or Ocilis, as Ptolemy calls it, which alſo bears ſome reſemblance to the name. 7. Diklah, ſignifying in the Chaldean or Syriac, a palm tree, or a country ſtored with palms, may have choice of ſeats in Arabia. 8. It is with reluctance that we muſt croſs the ſea with Obal, from Arabia to the Avalitic port, in the Avalitic Bay on the coaſt of Africa, juſt without the ſtraits of Bab-al-mandab, corruptly called Babelmandel, for want of a place in Arabia bearing ſome ſimilitude to his name, to ſettle him in. 9. We might be obliged to look for a ſeat on the ſame coaſt for Abimael, if Theophraſtus did not luckily furniſh us with the name of a place in the Aromatic quarters of Arabia, called Mali. 10. Sheba will not have the ſame difficulty with the reſt of his brethren to find a place in Arabia. Pliny ſays, the Sabæan nations extended themſelves from one ſea to the other, that is from the Arabian to the Perſian Gulph. Indeed there wants no proof of a people of this name poſſeſſing a large ſhare of the ſouth parts of Arabia, but authors differ in the name of their chief city; for ſome call it Saba, others Mariab, or Maraba. However, that cauſes no difficulty in the matter, ſince we learn from the Arab authors that they are both names of the ſame place, and that it was the ancient regal ſeat which was afterwards tranſlated to Sanaa. They alſo tell us that Balkis, who viſited Solomon, reigned there; and our Saviour ſeems to allude to this country, when he calls her the queen of the ſouth; for yamin with the Jews, as well as yaman with the Arabs, ſignifies the ſouth; and Saba or Mareb is that part of Arabia called Yaman. 11. We are at a loſs again about providing a ſettlement for Ophir; Arabia furniſhes no place which reſembles the name, except Copar, a place on the Arabian Gulph, near the northern limits of the Cincedocolpitæ, and Ogyris an iſland in the ſame ſea. Bochart endeavours to ſqueeze Ophir in among the Caſſaniæ, or Gaſſandæ, probably the tribe of Ghaſſan, conſulting the ſimilitude of ſenſe in words, when that of ſound fails: and he choſes rather to be put to his ſhifts, than to run into the common abſurdity of planting Ophir in India, where the place which bears his name (ſo famous in ſcripture for gold) is ſuppoſed to be ſituate. We ſhall ſpeak more particularly, with reference to this land, when we come to the reign of Solomon; and ſhall only obſerve here, that the gold of this place ſeeming, in 2 Chron. iii. 6. to be called the gold of Parvaim, hath occaſioned two conjectures; the firſt, that Ophir is the iſland of Taprobana; the ſecond, that it is Peru in America. The reader may eaſily ſee the latter name comes neareſt to that of Ophir, but to ſhew what an ignis fatuus the ſimilitude of names is, Peru, as Sir Walter Raleigh aſſures us, is not the true name of that country, but was given it by the Spaniards, on their miſtaking the anſwer of the natives to a queſtion they did not underſtand. 12 Havilah is, by Bochart, ſuppoſed to have ſettled in the land of Khaulan, towards Yaman, but we have already endeavoured to clear up the geography of this country in our remarks on the ſituation of paradiſe. In this land we may likewiſe fix Jobab, the thirteenth and laſt ſon of Joktan, unleſs any ſhould rather chuſe to quarter him upon the Jobarites, near the Sachalites, in the ſouth-eaſt part of Arabia, upon a preſumption that they ſhould be written Jobabites.

As the plantation of the earth by the ſons of Noah and their poſterity, has been always conſidered as an illuſtrious proof, among many others, of the veracity of the Moſaic hiſtory, we thought it neceſſary to employ our beſt endeavours to ſet this great tranſaction in the cleareſt lights we could collect, and for which we acknowledge ourſelves not a little obliged to the learned authors of The Univerſal Hiſtory, a work that is the envy of foreigners, and will always do honour to the Engliſh nation.

CHAP. XI.

1 One language in the world. 3 The building of Babel. 5 The confuſion of tongues. 10 The generations of Shem. 27 The generations of Terah the father of Abram. 31 Terah goeth from Ur to Haran.

AND the whole earth was of one language, and of one ſpeech.

2 And it came to paſs as they journeyed from the eaſt, that they found a plain in the land of Shinar, and they dwelt there.

3 And they ſaid one to another; Go to, let us make brick, and burn them throughly. And they had brick for ſtone, and ſlime had they for morter.

4 And they ſaid, Go to, let us build us a city and a tower, whoſe top may reach unto heaven, and let us make us a name, leſt we be ſcattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth.

5 And the LORD came down to ſee the city and the tower, which the children of men builded.

6 And the LORD ſaid; Behold, the people is one, and they have all one language: and this they begin to do: and now nothing will be reſtrained from them, which they have imagined to do.

7 Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not underſtand one anothers ſpeech.

8 So the LORD ſcattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth: and they left off to build the city.

9 Therefore is the name of it called Babel, becauſe the LORD did there confound the language of all the earth: and from thence did the LORD ſcatter them abroad upon the face of all the earth.

10 ¶ Theſe are the generations of Shem: Shem was an hundred years old, and begat Arphaxad two years after the flood.

11 And Shem lived after he begat Arphaxad five hundred years, and begat ſons and daughters.

12 And Arphaxad lived five and thirty years, and begat Salah.

13 And Arphaxad lived after he begat Salah four hundred and three years, and begat ſons and daughters.

14 And Salah lived thirty years, and begat Eber.

15 And Salah lived after he begat Eber four hundred and three years, and begat ſons and daughters.

16 And Eber lived four and thirty years, and begat Peleg.

17 And Eber lived after he begat Peleg four hundred and thirty years, and begat ſons and daughters.

18 And Peleg lived thirty years, and begat Reu.

19 And Peleg lived after he begat Reu two hundred and nine years, and begat ſons and daughters.

20 And Reu lived two and thirty years, and begat Serug.

21 And Reu lived after he begat Serug two hundred and ſeven years, and begat ſons and daughters.

22 And Serug lived thirty years, and begat Nahor.

23 And Serug lived after he begat Nahor two hundred years, and begat ſons and daughters.

24 And Nahor lived nine and twenty years, and begat Terah.

25 And Nahor lived after he begat Terah an hundred and nineteen years, and begat ſons and daughters.

26 And Terah lived ſeventy years, and begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran.

27 ¶ Now theſe are the generations of Terah: Terah begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran; and Haran begat Lot.

28 And Haran died before his father Terah, in the land of his nativity, in Ur of the Chaldees.

29 And Abram and Nahor took them wives: the name of Abrams wife was Sarai; and the name of Nahors wife, Milcah, the daughter of Haran, the father of Milcah, and the father of Iſcah.

30 But Sarai was barren; ſhe had no child.

31 And Terah took Abram his ſon, and Lot the ſon of Haran his ſons ſon, and Sarai his daughter-in-law, his ſon Abrams wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan, and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there.

32 And the days of Terah were two hundred and five years: and Terah died in Haran.

Ver. 1. And the whole earth was of one language.] It may be expected, that we ſhould here enter into a formal enquiry concerning the primitive tongue, and endeavour to determine what particular language it was that the firſt progenitors of mankind ſpoke. But as this is an enquiry rather of curioſity than uſe, and we cannot be certain whether that language, whatever it was, be now in being, the moſt we can do will be to ſhew the vanity of the pretenſions of thoſe languages, which have laid claim to this honour, as a great number have done; each nation being fond of it, as an undeniable evidence of their own antiquity; quity; tho' they generally argue in a circle, and urge their antiquity as a proof of the former.

But as the diſcuſſion of this point would take up too much room in this place, we have judged it proper to reſerve it for one of the articles of the Diſquiſition intended to be prefixed to this work, and in which this ſubject ſhall be fully treated, with all imaginable candour and impartiality.

Ver. 2. And it came to paſs as they journeyed from the eaſt, that they found a plain in the land of Shinar; and they dwelt there.] The wording of this paſſage has occaſion'd a doubt whether Armenia could be meant by Ararat, on which the ark is ſaid to have reſted, ſince then their journeying would have been from the north-weſt. Wherefore others inſtead of from the eaſt, render it eaſtward. But there is no need to ſtrain this text for the elucidation of a geographical difficulty. Moſes might probably expreſs himſelf in this manner, with reference to the wilderneſs wherein he wrote, and from which Shinaar lying eaſtward he might judge Ararat lay eaſtward too; or the difficulty may be eaſily ſolved by ſuppoſing with Kircher and others, that as mankind multiplied they ſpread themſelves in the country ſouth-eaſtward of Ararat, and made ſmall removes between the time of their deſcending from that mountain, and their arrival at the place from whence they are mentioned to have moved towards Shinaar, which might have lain weſtward of that place. But after all the miſtake ſeems to lie on the ſide of the critics, and not of Moſes; for even the mountain, which at preſent paſſes with us for Ararat, lies above two degrees more eaſt than the city of Shinaar, or Senjar, from whence the plain, in all probability, took the name; and if the ſons of Noah entered Shinaar on the north-ſide, they muſt of neceſſity have journeyed from the eaſt; or, which is the ſame thing, have travelled weſtward in order to arrive there; tho' at the ſame time they muſt have travelled ſouthward too; for Ararat lies about north-eaſt by north of Senjar; but all the geographers (De Liſle excepted) having drawn that mountain a great way out of its proper ſituation, to the weſtward, the commentators and hiſtorians who relied upon them, have been embaraſſed to reconcile the words of Scripture with what they took for certain fact, viz. that Ararat lay to the weſt and not at all to the eaſt of Senjar.

It is difficult to determine what were the limits of the land of Shinar in the early times. The name in Hebrew is Shinaar or Sennaar; in Arabic Senjar. Bochart ſays it is derived from naar, which ſignifies to ſcatter, or diſſipate; and if ſo, it could not have been impoſed by the Noachidæ on the plain where they firſt fixed, as Joſephus affirms, without ſuppoſing them to have foreſeen the diſperſion; to which that etymology, if it be right, plainly alludes. We are informed from this chapter, that the city and tower of Babel were built in a plain within that province; and we likewiſe learn from Daniel i. 2. that Nebuchadnezzar carried the veſſels of the temple into the land of Shinaar, into the houſe of his God, which, in all probability, was the temple of Belus in Babylon. Beſides Babel, there are three other cities mentioned in Scripture to have been ſituate in Shinaar, viz. Erec, Accad, and Calneh; but as all the four ſeem to have ſtood at no great diſtance from each other, as we have obſerved in the Annotations on the preceding chapter, we cannot thence judge of the extent of the country. Thus far in general may be preſumed, that it took in more to the north of Babel, than to the ſouth, and that it lay, for the moſt part, between the Euphrates and Tigris: Babylon, if it was the ſame with Babel, was ſeated on the eaſt-ſide of Euphrates, which paſſed along the weſt-ſide of it, before Nebuchadnezzar built the new city on this ſide that river, which thenceforth ran through the middle of the whole.

We meet with traces of the name of Shinaar in thoſe parts, both in ancient and modern authors; Sennar of Babylon is mentioned by Heſtiæus the Mileſian, (apud Joſeph. Antiq. l. 1. c. 5. & Euſeb de pr. ev. l. 9. c. 15.) and the city of Singara in Meſopotamia by ſeveral. Some ſpeak of a territory of that name, in the ſame quarters, Ptolemy places both the city and mountain of Singara there; (Tab. 4. Aſiæ) in all which ſeem to be the ſame city, mountain, and territory, which ſtill bear the name of Senjar in the eaſt. The part of Meſopotamia choſen out by the aſtronomers in the time of the Khalifah al Mamun, for meaſuring the content of a degree of a great circle, was the deſart of Senjar; (vide Gol. not. ad Alfragan. p. 72.) which the nature of the experiment ſhews to have been a large, as well as a level country: And this we take to have been at leaſt a part of the ancient plain of Shinaar.

Ver. 4. And they ſaid, Go to, let us build us a city and a tower, whoſe top may reach unto heaven, and let us make us a name, leſt we be ſcattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth.] The learned are divided in their conſtructions of the ſenſe of this paſſage. Many imagine that the motive which induced them to undertake this ſtructure, was, their apprehenſion of a ſecond deluge; and therefore they reſolved to raiſe an edifice of ſufficient height, as a ſanctuary in caſe of danger. Others think there is no room for this ſuggeſtion; becauſe, in that caſe, they would rather have erected it on an eminence, than a plain: And the true reaſon for their undertaking it is expreſly aſſign'd in the verſe under conſideration, viz. to make them a name, or leave a memorial of themſelves, leſt they ſhould be ſcattered, or, as it is otherwiſe render'd by the vulgate verſion (perhaps to ſerve the purpoſe) before they ſhould be ſcattered abroad; which implies they knew, before they began to build, that they ſhould be diſperſed. But a third ſort, to whom this text appears altogether unintelligible, as it now ſtands in the ſeveral tranſlations, will have it that the Hebrew word ſhem ſhould not be render'd name, but ſign; and ſo the paſſage will run, let us make us a ſign leſt we be ſcattered; that is, as Perizonius explains it, the tower was to ſerve them as a beacon, or mark, by the ſight of which, or of a ſignal made from the top of it, they might avoid ſtraying in the open plains, with their flocks, (the firſt men being ſhepherds) and be brought back to the city which they had built for a place of abode, being unwilling to diſperſe themſelves.

Ver. 5. And the Lord came down to ſee the tower, &c.] Whatever the motives of the chiefs were (for they ſeem to be dubiouſly expreſs'd in the text) the enterprize they engag'd in was diſpleaſing in the eyes of God, as tending to fruſtrate, or delay the execution of his deſign, which was, that mankind ſhould not always continue in one place. As to God's coming down to ſee the tower; this is an accommodation to our conceptions; and means no more than that he made it appear, by the effects, that he obſerved their motions, and knew their intentions.

Perhaps the reader may be curious to ſee ſome account of a city and tower which employ'd all the men in the world, for ſo many years, in building them. This chapter informs us, ver. 3. that they made uſe of burnt bricks, inſtead of ſtone, and ſlime inſtead of mortar. The ſlime with which theſe bricks were cemented, was a pitchy ſubſtance, or bitumen, which was found in vaſt quantities in the parts adjacent to Babylon. Herodotus, that prince of hiſtorians, obſerves, that by the city Is, eight days journey from Babylon, there runs a ſmall river of the ſame name, into the Euphrates, whoſe waters carry along with them many lumps of bitumen, which are conveyed thence to the walls of Babylon. The oriental authors ſay, that the city built by the ſons of Noah was three hundred and thirteen fathoms in length, and one hundred and fifty-one in breadth; and that the walls of it were 5533 fathoms high, and thirty-three broad, and the tower ten thouſand fathom, or twelve miles high; which dimenſions bear no manner of proportion to each other. Even Jerom affirms, from the teſtimony of eye-witneſſes, who examined the remains of the tower carefully, that it was four miles high; (l. v. Comment. in Iſaiam) but Addo raiſes the height to no leſs than 5000 miles; (in Chronica) but theſe are ſhameful extravagancies. The only height we can depend upon, as to the dimenſions of this tower, ſuppoſing it to be the ſame tower with that which ſtood in the midſt of the temple of Belus, afterwards built round it by Nebuchadnezzar, muſt be taken from prophane authors. Herodotus (l. i. p. 33.) tells us it was a furlong in length, and as much in breadth; the paſſage to which we refer in that author may be rendered thus, In the midſt of the temple a ſolid tower is built, of a furlong in length, and as much in breadth, and upon this tower another tower is erected, and another again upon that, and ſo on, to the number of eight towers. It is true the word μῆκος, which we here tranſlate length, may alſo ſignify height; but ſome authors having thence ſuppoſed, as the conſtruction ſeems to require, that the firſt tower was a furlong high, and concluding cluding the other ſeven to be of equal height, have made the whole a mile high; to avoid which extravagant conſequence, it ſeems more reaſonable to underſtand Herodotus as we have render'd the paſſage, unleſs the furlong be taken for the height of all the eight towers. Strabo (l. vi. p. 1073.) determines the height to have been a furlong, which is the eighth part of a mile, or 660 Feet, which is in itſelf prodigious; for thereby it appears to have exceeded the greateſt of the Egyptian pyramids in height, 179 feet, tho' it fell ſhort of it, at the baſis, by 33. It conſiſted of eight ſquare towers, one above another, gradually decreaſing in breadth; which, with the winding of the ſtairs from the bottom to the top, on the outſide, gave it the reſemblance of a pyramid, as Strabo calls it. This antique form, joined to the extraordinary height of the ſtructure, eaſily induces us to believe it to be the ſame tower mentioned by Moſes; Nebuchadnezzar only finiſhing the deſign which the ſons of Noah were, by the confuſion of tongues, obliged to diſcontinue.

What this moſt wonderful city was, in its flouriſhing ſtate, and the ſeveral changes of fortune which befel it, till, at length, it was totally deſtroyed, will be remarked in the courſe of this work.

As to the ruins of this celebrated antiquity, they are ſo defaced, that the inhabitants of the country are uncertain of their true ſituation; and this has occaſioned travellers to differ in their ſentiments concerning them. The generality, led by a tradition of the natives, have judged a place about eight or nine miles to the weſt, or north-weſt, of Baghdad, to be the tower of Babel. Rawwolf ſuppoſes he diſcovered the ruins of Babylon upon the Euphrates, near Felujia, about 36 miles to the ſouth-weſt of Baghdad. And Della Valle was directed, by another tradition, to ſearch for them about two days journey lower, near an ancient city called Hella, ſituate upon the ſame river. Here alſo muſt be placed the ruins deſcribed by Mr. Gregory, in his Sepulchres of the Ancients, but we muſt acquaint the reader, that they do not any of them ſeem to us to be the remains of the original tower, but rather ſome later ſtructures of the Arabs.

Ver. 7. — Let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not underſtand one another's ſpeech.] The ſpeaking one common language, being the great obſtacle to that diviſion of mankind into diſtinct nations, which God had, for moſt wiſe purpoſes, determined to accompliſh, he thought fit to diſſolve this bond which held them ſo ſtrictly together, and confound their language; the natural conſequence of which was, that they were ſcattered abroad upon the face of the earth. This event is mentioned by profane hiſtorians, who write, that mankind uſed one and the ſame language, till the overthrow of the tower of Babylon; at which time a multiplicity of tongues was introduced by the gods: Whereupon wars enſued, and thoſe whoſe ſpeech happened to be intelligible to each other, aſſociated together, and poſſeſſed themſelves of ſuch countries as occurred to them in their diſperſion.

As to the degree of this Babyloniſh confuſion, and the manner in which it was effected, there is a great diverſity of ſentiments. Several learned men, prepoſſeſſed with an opinion that all the different idioms now in the world, did at firſt riſe out of one original language, to which they may be reduced, and that the variety we obſerve among them, is no more than muſt naturally have happened in ſo long a ſeries of time, have been induced to believe, that there were no new languages formed at the confuſion, but that the moſt that was then done, was only to ſet thoſe builders at variance, by creating a miſunderſtanding between them. To ſupport this opinion, it is ſaid, that the Hebrew word ſhapha, lip, which we render language and ſpeech, rather ſignifies agreement, or unanimity, i. e. one mouth, which is juſtly tranſlated with one accord. But this latter is an adverbial expreſſion, which the other is not; nor does it follow that one lip muſt import the ſame thing as one mouth; the only paſſage which has been produced as an inſtance of its being uſed in that ſenſe (viz. Iſa. xix. 18.) being far from proving any ſuch matter. Another text has been alledged, which ſeems to be much more favourable to this interpretation; it is where David, praying againſt his enemies, begs of God to divide their tongues (Pſalm l. 10.) that is, to ſet them at variance. But this cannot be the meaning of Moſes here, becauſe he immediately explains what he intends by one lip, by adding, and of one ſpeech, or more literally, of the ſame words.

None of theſe explications, therefore, ſeem fully to anſwer the deſign of Moſes, which was not only to inform us how mankind were at firſt diſperſed and broken into ſo many different nations; but to account for the diverſity of their languages; a thing very difficult, if not impoſſible to do, without having recourſe to ſome extraordinary interpoſition of the divine power. For thro' time, intercourſe with foreign nations, commerce, the invention and improvement of arts and ſciences, and even the difference of climates, cauſe very conſiderable alterations in languages; yet the utmoſt effect we can imagine them to have, will not come up to the preſent queſtion. We cannot conceive a language can thereby be ſo much disfigured, that all the general marks and characteriſtics ſhould diſappear. It is not eaſy to apprehend how all the words of a language ſhould be entirely changed for others; nor is there any one inſtance to be offer'd of any ſuch total change: But it is next to impoſſible to conceive that ſo great a diverſity as we find in the frame and conſtitution of languages, wherein the grand and eſſential differences between them conſiſt, rather than in the words which compoſe them, could ever have been occaſioned by the cauſes aſſigned above. The preſent diverſity of tongues, in the world, is prodigious; and conſidering the time that has elapſed ſince the building of Babel, and the alterations made in ſome known languages, in the courſe of one, two, and three thouſand years, and conſidering that there are many tongues, which, when compared with others, have not the leaſt affinity; ſo that a man muſt be the greateſt viſionary in the world to imagine them the offspring of the ſame parent; it ſeems to us that the variety of idioms now ſpoken, cannot poſſibly be accounted for, without approving either the pre-adamite ſyſtem, or allowing a formation of new languages at Babel.

Another argument againſt the formation of new languages at Babel, which has been thought to be of ſome weight, is, that if ſuch a diviſion of tongues be underſtood, no good reaſon can be aſſigned why thoſe colonies which ſpoke languages that were near a-kin, were not removed to the greateſt diſtances, and thoſe whoſe languages were entirely different, placed next one another: To this it may eaſily be anſwered, that there is no neceſſity of ſuppoſing every family had a diſtinct language, or that the ſeveral dialects of the mother tongues were formed at the confuſion. The diſperſion might, at firſt, be effected without ſuch an abſolute ſeparation of families derived from the ſame ſtock: Mankind was not then ſo numerous, but that it would be ſufficient to cut off the communication between the three great branches and their prime families, by the introduction of new tongues, which alone we contend was the work of God; for dialects we allow might, and neceſſarily would be formed by time.

Upon the whole, we think we may reaſonably conclude with the learned Dr. Wotton, that upon the confuſion of Babel, new languages were formed; which languages have been the roots and originals from which the ſeveral dialects that are, or have been, or will be ſpoken as long as this earth ſhall laſt, have ariſen, and to which they may with eaſe be reduced.

In what manner theſe new languages were form'd, is a queſtion hard to be determined; it ſeems by the Moſaical account, which is ſo ſolemn, and repreſents God as coming down in perſon to view the work of thoſe builders, that it was his own immediate act; and ſome have thence concluded that he effected it by inducing an oblivion of their former tongue, and inſtantaneouſly infuſing others into their minds, according to their ſeveral nations. There are other opinions in this affair, which it would be very tedious, and of little importance, to examine; and the beſt we can do is, to conclude, that this confuſion was effected inſtantly, in a way and manner of which we can give no account.

Ver. 8. So the Lord ſcattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth.] The primitive fathers diſtinguiſh between the diviſion of the earth and the diſperſion of mankind, and repreſent them as two different tranſactions. They ſuppoſe that Noah, to whom the earth was well known before the flood, as proprietor of the whole world, divided it among his three ſons, before any of their poſterity removed to Shinaar; from whence they were were afterwards diſperſed to take poſſeſſion of their reſpective allotments. This Noachical diviſion, groundleſs as it is, was ſo firmly believed, that Philaſtrius, (Hær. 11. 8.) condemns the contrary opinion as heretical.

Other writers have ſuppoſed a double diſperſion, one at the birth of Peleg, and the other of the builders of Babel, and Sulpicius Severus (Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. i.) ſeems to have imagined, that mankind increaſed ſo very faſt, that they had peopled ſeveral countries and iſlands, and built ſeveral towns, before they laid the foundation of Babel; abſurdly bringing them together again at that place, on purpoſe to be diſperſed a ſecond time, according to the Noachical partition. But the more received opinion, and the moſt agreeable to Scripture is, that the diviſion of the earth in the days of Peleg, and the diſperſion of mankind at Babel were one and the ſame tranſaction.

Thoſe who follow the Hebrew chronology, are extremely embaraſſed to fix the time of this event. Some, in order to reconcile the Sacred Hiſtory with the profane, or led by fancies of their own, hold a diſperſion or plantation of countries even before the birth of Peleg. Sir John Marſham is of this number; he to reconcile the Hebrew and Egyptian chronologies; will have Menes to have been the ſame with Ham, who, in the earlieſt times after the deluge, travelled, as he ſuppoſes, into Egypt, ſettled there with his children, and was the firſt king of that country. Others, on the contrary, place the diſperſion at Babel, towards the end of Peleg's life; for being unable, by any fair calculation, to find people enough to furniſh colonies for a plantation of nations, at his birth, which, according to the Hebrew, falls in the year of the flood 101. they are obliged to maintain that his name was given him prophetically, long before the diſperſion began, in order to make it fall in ſuch a part of his life as would allow time for propagating a ſufficient number of mankind for the purpoſe. The Jews place it in the laſt year of his life, wherein they are followed by St. Jerom and ſeveral of the Chriſtian chronologers. Others fix it at various periods, towards the middle of his age: Petau about his 52d year, or 153 years after the flood; biſhop Cumberland about his 79th year, or the 180th year after the flood; and archbiſhop Uſher in one paſſage ſeems to place it after the birth of Reu, which fell out in the 30th year of Peleg's age, or the 131ſt after the flood, without mentioning the preciſe time; tho' elſewhere he is of opinion it ought to be referred to the time of Peleg's birth. Thus thoſe who follow the Hebrew account, ſeem to be agreed only in not connecting the diſperſion of Babel with the birth of Peleg; which yet the Scripture requires to be placed at that juncture. For if by the days of Peleg, are to be underſtood his whole life, or the middle, or latter end of it, then Peleg will have nothing peculiar to deſerve the name; (which as we before obſerved ſignifies diviſion) becauſe in that ſenſe the diviſion happen'd in the days of all his progenitors, and even of Noah himſelf: Therefore it muſt have been peculiar to Peleg alone, of all the family of Eber, or Shem; to be born juſt at the very time of the diviſion or diſperſion of Babel; from whence, with very good reaſon, he had that name given him by his father.

Perizonius, who finds himſelf obliged, by the authority both of Scripture and reaſon, to place the Babyloniſh diſperſion at the time of Peleg's birth, to ſolve the difficulty, endeavours to prove that neither the Scripture ſuppoſes any great number of people in being at that conjuncture, and that the nature of the tranſaction did not require it, the firſt plantations being made with only a few, and thoſe ſmall families, which removed no farther than the countries in the neighbourhood of Shinaar. But after all, tho' he thinks the Hebrew copy ought to be followed, yet he acknowledges that the interval between the flood and the age of Abraham ſeems to be too ſhort according to that chronology; and that is the only interval wherein it differs from the Samaritan after the flood.

In a word, the diſperſion is the Scylla and Charybdis of thoſe who adhere to the Hebrew chronology: According to which, if any regard be had to profane hiſtory, that event muſt be carried much higher than the birth of Peleg; and if a proper number of people be required for planting nations, it muſt be brought a great way below his birth, if not to the time of his death; which happen'd within ſixty years of the time wherein the Samaritan chronology places his birth (the true epocha of the diſperſion): A plain demonſtration of the defect of the Hebrew and of the truth of the Samaritan computation.

Having thus ſettled the time of the diſperſion of Babel, let us next enquire into the number of mankind then in the world. Some authors imagining that a greater part of the earth was planted in this firſt diſperſion than we are obliged either by Scripture or reaſon to believe, have endeavoured to ſwell their calculations as much as ever they can; whilſt others would reduce the number of mankind to a ſmaller ſum than the occaſions ſeems to have required: But a medium is to be obſerved between theſe two extreams.

In this enquiry no computation can be made from the number of perſons mentioned in Scripture, as concerned in this firſt diſperſion, which are but fifty-three, excluding Noah and his three ſons; and if we have recourſe to the number of generations, we ſhall meet with leſs ſatisfaction ſtill from that quarter, for they were but three at moſt; Eber the father of Peleg (who could not be a leader in the diſperſion, becauſe it happen'd at his birth) being but the third ſon from Shem: There are likewiſe only three generations mentioned in the line of Ham, and but two in that of Japhet: So that if we were to confine ourſelves to that ſtandard, it would fall vaſtly ſhort. But as there were certainly many more generations procreated between the flood and the diſperſion, the time that intervened ought therefore to be conſidered, as well as the longevity of thoſe who lived in the firſt ages after the flood.

The chronologers (who have drawn this enquiry into their own province) have ſuited their calculations according to their different hypotheſes. Some, relying too much on the prophane hiſtorians, have taken ſuch a method as might account for the early beginning of monarchies, and the great armies ſet on foot by Cteſias and his followers, in the time of Ninus, whom they take to be Nimrod, or at leaſt his ſon. But the Hebrew chronology lays them under a difficulty which they cannot ſurmount, by contracting the ſpace between the flood and the birth of Peleg to 101 years; for if the calculation produces at that period ſuch a number of men as they judge neceſſary, the world will be overſtocked with inhabitants, by the natural increaſe of the firſt planters, in a very few ages after; and if it be proportioned to the number of mankind in the ſucceeding ages, the number procreated at the diſperſion muſt be exceſſive ſmall: Wherefore moſt of them, as has been obſerved, agree, contrary to the plain ſenſe of Scripture, to remove that event towards the middle or end of that patriarch's life, according as it ſuited their purpoſe.

It is an eaſy thing when a man is determined upon the number, to find out a way to help himſelf to it. Petau has made a computation, which, in 285 years after the flood (or within 7 years of the birth of Abraham, according to his computation) fills the world with above 155 times the number of inhabitants which are ſuppoſed to be at preſent exiſting in it; and yet he cannot make them riſe at the birth of Peleg to many above 32,768 ſouls. Dr. Cumberland, who hath alſo ſtrained the calculation to an extravagant height, can yet bring little more than 30,000 men upon the ſtage, in the year of the flood 101; tho' forty years after he encreaſes them to above 300,000; and in 40 years more to 3,000,000.

However, others have been more moderate: Mr. Mede allows there could not be above 7000 men, beſides women and children, in the year of the flood 101; Mr. Bedford, who ſtrenuouſly defends the Hebrew chronology, cannot raiſe above 1416 males of 20 years of age at the birth of Peleg; Mr. Whiſton produces, by his computation, about 2389, at that time; the largeſt of which numbers muſt be allowed to be much too ſmall for the purpoſe; an evident demonſtration of the inconſiſtency of the Hebrew chronology with the circumſtances of this firſt plantation of the earth.

But if we follow the Samaritan computation, which allows 300 years more than the Hebrew, in the interval between the flood and the death of Peleg; theſe difficulties, which are otherwiſe inſuperable, vaniſh at once; and we may venture to take even the loweſt calculation. According to that of the gentleman we laſt mentioned, the number of mankind, in the year of the flood 401, will be above 240,000; which we think may be reaſonably allowed ſufficient to begin the diſperſion; and furniſh fifty-three leaders with people enough to form as many colonies.

It is to be conſidered alſo that each of theſe colonies increaſed in proportion as they removed farther from the center of their migrations, before they arrived at the countries in which they finally ſettled; for the earth was not planted all at once, but by degrees; ſo that there is the leſs occaſion for ſtraining to enlarge the number of mankind at the time of the diſperſion as ſome have done.

Ver. 9. Therefore is the name of it called Babel, becauſe the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth.] The word Babel is generally derived from the Hebrew balal, to confound; but it may likewiſe be more naturally deduced from the Syriac, in which tongue balbel is to confound, and boblo, or bobel, confuſion.

Ver. 10. Theſe are the generations of Shem, &c.] The difference between the Hebrew and the Samaritan copies in ſtating the period from the flood to the call of Abraham, is very conſiderable, being no leſs than 650 years. This call, according to the Hebrew account, happen'd in the 427th year after the deluge, and in the 1077th year, according to the Samaritan. And this great diſagreement ariſes from the different computation of the years of the genitures of the patriarchs, and it is not probable that the ſeven firſt patriarchs after the flood, who liv'd 300 and 400 years, ſhould beget at thirty, or thereabouts, as the preſent Hebrew is, and yet that the following patriarchs who did not live half ſo long, ſhould not beget their firſt-born till double the age; Terah at ſeventy, Abraham at eighty-ſeven, Iſaac at ſixty, Jacob at eighty-four, Levi, Kohath, and Amram, at about ſixty each of them; for from the birth of Levi to the birth of Moſes, the ſon of Amram, were about 180 years.

It is likewiſe improbable that Noah, who was 600 years old at the time of the flood, ſhould, after it, ſee nine generations ſucceed each other, and live till the 128th year of Terah, within two years of Abraham's birth; that Arphaxad ſhould out-live Peleg, Reu, Serug, Nahor, and Terah, for five generations lineally deſcended from him. And, what is more ſtrange, that Shem ſhould ſurvive Arphaxad, and ſee eight generations after him ſucceſſively die; and live to the ſortieth year of Iſaac, within fifteen years of Abraham's death; that Eber ſhould out-live even Abraham himſelf, the ſeventh in deſcent from him, tho' Abraham is ſaid to die in a good old age, an old man, Gen. xxv. 8. Thus the great anceſtors which, in courſe of nature, ought to have died firſt, die laſt; by reducing the ſtandard of the length of human life too faſt, for the ſhortneſs of the ſpace allow'd, by the Hebrew, from the flood to the birth of Abraham; and hence, among other abſurd conſequences which follow from this chronology, occaſion was given to that notion among the Jews, follow'd ſtill by many modern writers, that Melchizedeck was Shem. All theſe difficulties and inconſiſtencies are entirely remov'd by the computation in the Samaritan Pentateuch, according to which Arphaxad, who was born two years after the flood, inſtead of begetting Salah at the age of 35, as he is repreſented to have done, in the Hebrew account, did not beget him till he was one hundred and thirty-five years old, according to the Samaritan, which obſerves much the ſame proportion in the genitures of the ſucceeding patriarchs.

It plainly appears, therefore, that the Hebrew period is much too ſhort for the hiſtorical facts belonging thereto. We have already ſhewn, in our account of the diſperſion, how inconſiſtent that computation is, in all reſpects, with that tranſaction, and to what extreams it hath driven thoſe who follow it, to place the birth of Peleg, when that diſperſion happen'd, at no greater a diſtance from the flood than 101 years; and nothing can be more improbable than that the world ſhould, in the ſpace of 427 years (the Hebrew computation from the deluge to the call of Abraham) be in ſuch an improv'd ſtate, as it appears to have been in the time of that great patriarch; when cities new built, kingdoms erected, and monarchs extended their dominion even from Perſia to Canaan, with a number of other inconſiſtencies. The Hebrew therefore may juſtly be conſider'd as defective, in the computation of this period, and, in all probability, it has been corrupted; for which reaſon we give the preference to the Samaritan, which makes the interval between the deluge and the call of Abraham, to comprehend the ſpace of 1077 years.

Ver. 26. And Terah lived ſeventy years, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran.] There ſeems to be an inſurmountable difficulty in the account of Terah's age; for if he was but 70 when he begat Abraham, and died in Haran, in the 205th year of his age, as mention'd in the laſt verſe of this chapter; and if Abraham left Haran in the 75th of his; it will follow, either that Terah muſt have liv'd 60 years in Haran; whereas it does not appear by the text that he liv'd there above one or two, or that Abraham muſt have liv'd 60 years longer than the text expreſly ſays he did. We ſhall not trouble the reader with the methods ſome ancient fathers and Jews have taken to ſolve this difficulty. Some moderns think, with Willet and Tremellius, that tho' Terah was but 70 years old when he began to have children, yet he was near 130 when he begat Abraham; and that thoſe who were born before him, are purpoſely omitted by Moſes, that Abraham might have the honour of the primogeniture, for the excellency of his faith. Others, with Calmet, chuſe rather to give him Adar, or Azar, for his father, and Terah for his grandfather, according to the Arabian hiſtory of that patriarch; and, to fill up the chaſm, ſuppoſe that Adar begat Abraham in the 60th year of his age; but, beſides the ſmall reliance we can have on that hiſtory, the fact is entirely contradictory to the ſacred text. Others, therefore, more reaſonably ſuppoſe, with Knatchbull, that there is an error crept into the original; and that Terah was either 130 years old when he begat Abraham, or that if he was then but 70, he died in his 155th, and not in the 205th of his age: For the text ſays, that Abraham was 75 years old when he left Haran, and that his father died but a little before it.

Terah is, on all hands, allowed to have been an idolater, and he is expreſly ſaid to have ſerv'd other gods, Joſh. xxiv. 2, 4. The eaſtern authors unanimouſly agree that he was a ſtatuary, or carver of idols; and he is repreſented as the firſt who made images of clay, pictures only having been in uſe before, and taught that they were to be ador'd as gods. However, we are told, that his employment was a very honourable one, and that he was a great man; and that at length he was converted by the earneſt perſuaſion of Abraham, and prevail'd upon to leave Ur. Joſephus ſays he quitted Chaldea, not being able to endure the country after the loſs of his ſon Haran, which is abſurd; and others ſay, he never was converted, any more than his ſon Nahor, who left Ur to join his father at Haran, which ſeems from him to be call'd the city of Nahor: But there is more probability that both Nahor and Haran were converted, ſeeing Lot was bred in the true religion, and Abraham choſe Iſaac a wife out of the family of Nahor, not caring to marry him to any of the idolatrous daughtets of Canaan.

Ver. 31. And Terah took Abram his ſon, and Lot the ſon of Haran his ſon's ſon, and Sarai his daughter in law, his ſon Abram's wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan, and they came unto Haran and dwelt there.] Several writers taking Ur, which ſignifies fire, for an appellative, tho' it was really a town in Chaldea, pretend that Haran was burnt; ſome ſaying that this accident happen'd as he was endeavouring to take the images of Terah out of the fire, into which Abraham had thrown them. Others, as he attempted to quench the flames of an idol-temple which Abraham had ſet on fire. Epiphanius ſays, that Terah's ſurviving Haran, was a puniſhment for his daring to make images of clay, and that before him no father had ſeen his children die a natural death. Joſephus affirms, that Haran's ſepulchre was to be ſeen at Ur in his time.

The city of Haran, to which Terah and his family came, was ſituate in the north-weſt parts of Meſopotamia.

CHAP. XII.

1 God calleth Abram, and bleſſeth him with a promiſe of Chriſt: 4 He departeth with Lot from Haran: 6 He journeyeth through Canaan, 7 which is promiſed him in a viſion: 10 He is driven by a famine into Egypt. 11 Fear maketh him feign his wife to be his ſiſter: 14 Pharaoh having taken her from him, by plagues is compelled to reſtore her.

NOW the LORD had ſaid unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy fathers houſe, unto a land that I will ſhew thee.

2 And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bleſs thee, and make thy name great; and thou ſhalt be a bleſſing.

3 And I will bleſs them that bleſs thee, and curſe him that curſeth thee: and in thee ſhall all families of the earth be bleſſed.

4 So Abram departed, as the LORD had ſpoken unto him; and Lot went with him: and Abram was ſeventy and five years old when he departed out of Haran.

5 ¶ And Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot his brothers ſon, and all their ſubſtance that they had gathered, and the ſouls that they had gotten in Haran; and they went forth to go into the land of Canaan, and into the land of Canaan they came.

6 ¶ And Abram paſſed through the land unto the place of Sichem, unto the plain of Moreh. And the Canaanite, was then in the land.

7 And the LORD appeared unto Abram, and ſaid, Unto thy ſeed will I give this land: and there builded he an altar unto the LORD, who appeared unto him.

8 And he removed from thence unto a mountain on the eaſt of Beth-el, and pitched his tent, having Beth-el on the weſt, and Hai on the eaſt: and there he builded an altar unto the LORD, and called upon the name of the LORD.

9 And Abram journeyed, going on ſtill toward the ſouth.

10 ¶ And there was a famine in the land: and Abram went down into Egypt to ſojourn there; for the famine was grievous in the land.

11 And it came to paſs, when he was come near to enter into Egypt, that he ſaid unto Sarai his wife, Behold now I know that thou art a fair woman to look upon.

12 Therefore it ſhall come to paſs, when the Egyptians ſhall ſee thee, that they ſhall ſay, This is his wife: and they will kill me, but they will ſave thee alive.

13 Say, I pray thee, thou art my ſiſter: that it may be well with me for thy ſake; and my ſoul ſhall live becauſe of thee.

14 ¶ And it came to paſs, that when Abram was come into Egypt, the Egyptians beheld the woman, that ſhe was very fair.

15 The princes alſo of Pharaoh ſaw her, and commended her before Pharaoh: and the woman was taken into Pharaohs houſe.

16 And he entreated Abram well for her ſake: and he had ſheep, and oxen, and he-aſſes, and men-ſervants, and maid-ſervants, and ſhe-aſſes, and camels.

17 And the LORD plagued Pharaoh and his houſe with great plagues, becauſe of Sarai Abrams wife.

18 And Pharaoh called Abram, and ſaid, What is this that thou haſt done unto me? Why didſt thou not tell me that ſhe was thy wife?

19 Why ſaidſt thou, She is my ſiſter? ſo I might have taken her to me to wife: now therefore, behold thy wife, take her, and go thy way.

20 And Pharaoh commanded his men concerning him: and they ſent him away, and his wife, and all that he had.

Idolatry having overwhelmed the world ſome ages after the deluge, and infected even the poſterity of Shem; God ſelected a family, which he decreed ſhould check the courſe of this torrent, and become the reſtorer and aſylum of religion; this was the family of Abraham, that illuſtrious patriarch, upon whoſe life the ſacred hiſtorian has dwelt longer than upon all the other tranſactions that preceded his birth: For he comprizes the hiſtory of the world from the creation to the deluge, in the compaſs of ſix chapters, but beſtows nineteen on the hiſtory of Abraham, tho' it comprehends no longer a ſpace of time than 175 years.

Ver. 1. Now the Lord had ſaid unto Abraham, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's houſe, unto a land that I will ſhew thee.] The country of Chaldea where Abraham liv'd, was exceedingly addicted to ſuperſtition, inſomuch that the Chaldeans, in Daniel's time, were reckoned a diſtinct ſort of divines from the magicians, aſtrologers, and ſoothſayers, or ſorcerers; and it is probable, that from ſuch ſort of men the anceſtors of Abraham might be infected with the errors of the country. The Jews tell us, that Abraham himſelf was bred up in the religion of the Zabæans, who, in thoſe early times, made images or repreſentations of the ſun, moon, and ſtars, and offer'd up their adorations to them, and likewiſe to fire; which makes it probable that Ur of the Chaldees, (from whence Abraham departed with his father and family) as it ſignifies fire, was a city dedicated to that element. They add, that Abraham being well skill'd in the aſtronomy of thoſe times, learn'd from thence that thoſe celeſtial bodies could neither make nor move themſelves by their own power, and that there was only one God who created and governed all things, and therefore that they ought to worſhip him alone.

Some people cannot comprehend how God could ſay to Abraham (ſpeaking of Haran where the family of Terah reſided but a few years at moſt) Get thee out of thy country. Perhaps the word country is to be underſtood in an indefinite ſignification: Meſopotamia, taken in its utmoſt extent, comprehended both the city of Ur, and that of Haran; in which ſenſe Haran might be call'd Abraham's country, as it was a town in that country, wherein he was born.

We are not told by Moſes in what manner God ſpake to Abraham, when he commanded him to leave his country; try; whether it was by a dream, a viſion, or the delegation of an angel; it might probably have been by a voice accompanied with ſome particular viſibility of the Schechinah, or divine majeſty; for St. Stephen declares expreſly, that the God of glory appeared to him before he dwelt in Charran.

Ver. 2. ——— And thou ſhalt be a bleſſing.] Others ſhall be the better for thee, as Lot was, and the king of Sodom; and indeed a good man is frequently render'd a bleſſing to thoſe among whom he reſides. Or the ſenſe may be as the Hebrews underſtand it, Thou ſhalt be ſo proſperous, that when men would wiſh well to others, they ſhall uſe thy name and ſay, The Lord bleſs thee as he did Abraham.

Ver. 2. And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bleſs thee, &c.] Never was any promiſe better fulfilled even in the literal ſenſe, ſince Jews, Mohammedans, and Chriſtians, who differ almoſt in every other particular, are unanimous in revering the name of Abraham. But thoſe promiſes were attended with another, the meaning of which has been much better verified in the evangelical ages, than by the whole life of Abraham himſelf. Namely in thee ſhall all families of the earth be bleſſed, ver. 3.

The command of God expoſed Abraham to a thouſand ſacrifices at the preſent, and to a thouſand dangers for the time to come; the promiſe only offered him remote advantages, which were out of the reach of meer ſenſe. A man whoſe wife was afflicted with barrenneſs could hardly comprehend how all the nations in the world ſhould be bleſſed in him. A ſtranger, a traveller, could form none but chimerical projects in appearance, for the conqueſt of a country, which, till then, he did not ſo much as know. But Abraham, encouraged by that faith, which is the ſubſtance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not ſeen, believed what he could not comprehend; but he believed it upon the veracity of an infallible God. He therefore departed with Sarah and all his domeſtics, and ſet out, without having any diſtinct idea of the place, whither he was to go, or not knowing whither he went, as the Scripture expreſſeth it. Faith was his guide, and the word of God his ſecurity.

Ver. 6. And Abram paſſed through the land, unto the place of Sichem, unto the plain of Moreh.] It was no ſmall inſtance of his faith to leave his own native city, to go to Haran: But it was ſtill a much greater, to travel three hundred miles more, from hence to Canaan, a country of which he had no knowledge, nor had ſent any one before him to diſcover it. Taking his journey thro' the dangerous and barren deſarts of Palmyrena; which obliged him to climb over the high mountains either of Libanus, Hermon, or Gilead: For in that part of the country he entered, as Sir Walter Raleigh hath obſerved.

And the Canaanite was then in the land.] Spinoza has endeavoured to prove that this paſſage was not written by Moſes, and that it muſt needs be the addition of a later writer, The ſubſtance of his argument is this. The words, and the Canaanite was then in the land, plainly imply that they were not in the land at the time when this part of the verſe was written, and from thence he infers that the hiſtorian could not be Moſes, becauſe the Canaanites were in the land, during all the ſpace of his life, and for a conſiderable time after his death. Aben Ezra, was the perſon who firſt ſtarted this objection, but he has furniſhed us at the ſame time with a proper anſwer to it. It is probable, ſays he, that Canaan ſeized the land of Canaan when it was in the poſſeſſion of another maſter. So that the ſenſe of the paſſage will be this. The Canaanite was already in the land, and had made himſelf maſter of it, before Abraham's arrival in it. But this anſwer, which one would have thought ſufficient, did not ſatisfy Spinoza, who pretends that the Canaanites were the firſt inhabitants of that land, and he ſuppoſes, without offering any proof, that this is evident by the account given of the fact in Geneſis. But he is manifeſtly miſtaken, as well in the propoſition he would eſtabliſh, as in the conſequence he would derive from it. 'Tis ſaid indeed, in Geneſis that Cainan begat the Jebuſite, the Emorite, the Girgaſite, &c. and afterwards were the families of the Canaanites ſpread abroad, And the border of the Canaanites was from Sidon, as thou comeſt to Gerar, unto Gaza; as thou goeſt from Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Zeboim, unto Laſha. But is this any demonſtration that the deſcendants of Canaan did not, before they eſtabliſhed themſelves in thoſe ſettlements, diſpoſſeſs ſome of the poſterity of Caſh, who had fixed themſelves before in that ſituation, and who were once very potent in the land? He is likewiſe as much deceived in his inference. For whether there was any other nation in this country, before the Canaanites, or not, it is certain that the progeny of Canaan had not always been in poſſeſſion of that country. The poſterity of Noah diffuſed themſelves over the earth by gradual advances, and the offspring of Canaan, had ſeated themſelves in that country, before Abraham came into it. Which is ſuch an explication of this paſſage as is no way inconſiſtent with reaſon, and therefore the words excepted againſt by Spinoza, might very naturally have been written by Moſes.

But as the objector will needs have it, that this part of the text muſt have been recorded by ſome hiſtorian who lived after the Canaanites were diſpoſſeſſed of their country by the children of Iſrael, and that his meaning is, the Canaanites were not diſpoſſeſſed of Canaan when Abraham firſt came into it, but it will be ſufficient to ſhew the abſurdity of ſuch a conſtruction by this ſhort paraphraſe. Thoſe Canaanites, ſays Spinoza's later hiſtorian, who have been extirpated from their country by the Iſraelites, who are the poſterity of Jacob the Grandſon of Abraham, were not extirpated by the Iſraelites, when Abraham came into that country, long before Jacob was born. An hiſtorian of ſo much ſagacity muſt needs have been a very extraordinary perſon.

If any one ſhould enquire of what conſequence it was for Moſes to mention ſuch a circumſtance as the Canaanites being in the land, when Abraham came there. 'Tis hoped the following anſwer will be thought ſatisfactory. God had promiſed this land to Abraham and his poſterity; but the good patriarch upon his arrival there, finds it already poſſeſſed by the Canaanites. This ſurely was a circumſtance that would ſufficiently exerciſe his faith; The diſcovery he had made was very diſcouraging, but he ſtill perſiſted in his firſt perſuaſion, that God would accompliſh his promiſe to him in due time, and he thereby gave an illuſtrious proof of the unſhaken confidence he repoſed in the veracity of the God who commanded him to leave his native country.

Ver. 10. And there was a famine in the land: And Abram went down into Egypt.] Not to dwell there for any long continuance, for he was incapable of diſtrufting God's promiſe to him, and his intention to fulfil it.

Ver. 11. And it came to paſs when he was come near to enter into Egypt, that he ſaid unto Sarah his wife, Behold now I know thou art a fair woman to look upon, &c.] Sarah, tho' ſhe was paſt the ſixtieth year of her age, retained beauty enough, to endanger the life of any man who ſhould paſs for her husband, in a country where a fair complexion, muſt be ſo very engaging to the ſwarthy Egyptians. As Abraham was not commanded by God, to quit the land of Canaan, he might naturally be timorous on the account of his wife, when he recollected that he had no warrant from the Deity to come and reſide in that country.

Ver. 13. Say thou art my ſiſter.] Abraham upon another occaſion explains in what ſenſe ſhe was ſo, chap. v. 12. There he teaches her, not to utter a falſhood, but to conceal the truth.

Ver. 15. The princes alſo of Pharoah ſaw her, and commended her before Pharaoh; and the woman was taken into Pharaoh's houſe.] The courtiers who ſtudied the moſt likely means to gratify the king's pleaſure, recommended her as an amiable perſon, and worthy of his affection.

The name Pharaoh ſignifies king, in the Coptic tongue. Ludolphus takes it to be a compound word, formed from the Æthiopic language, in which Phar-at ſignifies father of the country, and is certainly a proper appellation for a good prince. Bochart thinks the word Pharaoh, ſignifies properly a crocodile, and that Ezekiel alludes to it in theſe words: Behold I am againſt thee Pharaoh, king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midſt of the river. Le Clerc fancies, that the Arabic word Pharaoh, to be raiſed on high, or be ſuperior to, is the true root of the name: Kircher derives the word from the ſame root, but will have it to ſignify, to deliver, or be free; and that Pharaoh ſignifies one who is free from, or above the laws. Laſtly, to name no more, the learned Renaudot thinks that Pharaoh is the ſame as the Egyptian Pourro, or Pooro, which ſignifies, a king.

The parting of Abraham and Lot.

According to the Arabian hiſtorians, Walid the 15th king of Egypt after the flood, and the firſt king of the race of Amalek, took the ſirname of Pharaoh, which was uſed by all his ſucceſſors.

Ver. 17. And the Lord plagued Pharaoh and his houſe with great plagues, becauſe of Sarai, Abraham's wife.] Joſephus informs us, that God, to prevent the deſign of this prince, viſited him with a plague and ſedition at the ſame time, and that Pharaoh, in this diſtreſs, conſulted his prieſts, to know the cauſe of ſuch calamities, and the proper expedients for removing them. The prieſts, after ſacrificing, gave this anſwer, that it was a judgment upon him for his intended violation of the chaſtity of the ſtranger's wife, upon which Pharaoh reſtored Sarah to Abraham, and excuſed himſelf, by diſclaiming all intentions of injuring another man's wife, and declared that he ſhould only, for the future, deſire a fair alliance between them, without the leaſt thoughts of offering any ſcandalous indignity to her perſon.

The oriental hiſtorians ſay, that Abraham came into Egypt in the reign of Tulis, the 12th king of that country, after the deluge, and knowing the character of that prince, he, in order to preſerve the honour of his wife, ſhut her up in a cheſt, thinking, by that method, to paſs the guards poſted at the city-gate; but they, opening the cheſt, and finding a beautiful woman in it, carried her before the king. Tulis no ſooner ſaw her, than he determined to enjoy her, but was rendered unable to accompliſh his purpoſe, ſo that after he had in vain attempted it thrice, he was obliged to deſiſt, and ſent her back to her husband, having given her Hagar for a maid ſervant, as ſome reparation for the affront he had intended her; but ſtill continued an Infidel.

CHAP. XIII.

1 Abraham and Lot return out of Egypt: 7 By diſagreement they part aſunder. 10 Lot goeth to wicked Sodom. 14 God reneweth the promiſe to Abram: 18 He removeth to Hebron, and there buildeth an altar.

AND Abram went up out of Egypt, he, and his wife, and all that he had, and Lot with him, into the ſouth.

2 And Abram was very rich in cattel, in ſilver, and in gold.

3 And he went on his journeys from the ſouth, even to Beth-el, unto the place where his tent had been at the beginning, between Beth-el and Hai;

4 Unto the place of the altar, which he had made there at the firſt: and there Abram called on the name of LORD.

5 ¶ And Lot alſo which went with Abram had flocks, and herds, and tents.

6 And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their ſubſtance was great, ſo that they could not dwell together.

7 And there was a ſtrife between the herdmen of Abrams cattel, and the herdmen of Lots cattel: And the Canaanite and the Perrizzite dwelled then in the land.

8 And Abram ſaid unto Lot, Let there be no ſtrife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen: for we be brethren.

9 Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyſelf, I pray thee, from me: if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left.

10 And Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered every where, before the LORD deſtroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, even as the garden of the LORD, like the land of Egypt, as thou comeſt unto Zoar.

11 Then Lot choſe him all the plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed eaſt; and they ſeparated themſelves the one from the other.

12 Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom.

13 But the men of Sodom were wicked, and ſinners before the LORD exceedingly.

14 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Abram, after that Lot was ſeparated from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward, and ſouth-ward, and eaſt-ward, and weſt-ward.

15 For all the land which thou ſeeſt, to thee will I give it, and to thy ſeed for ever.

16 And I will make thy ſeed as the duſt of the earth: ſo that if a man can number the duſt of the earth, then ſhall thy ſeed alſo be numbred.

17 Ariſe, walk through the land, in the length of it, and in the breadth of it: for I will give it unto thee.

18 Then Abram removed his tent, and came and dwelt in the plain of Mamre which is in Hebron, and built there an altar unto the LORD.

Ver. 1. And Abram went up out of Egypt — into the ſouth.] That is, into the ſouthern part of Canaan, from whence he before came into Egypt.

Ver. 2. And Abram was very rich, &c.] His riches were increaſed ſince his journey into Egypt, by the bounty of Pharaoh, and, if Joſephus may be credited, by the rewards he had for teaching the Egyptians ſeveral parts of learning, and, amongſt the reſt, arithmetic and aſtrology, which he had acquired in Chaldea. Eupolemus ſays, that Abram converſed familiarly with the Egyptian prieſts at Heliopolis, and taught them many things, particularly the cæleſtial ſciences.

Ver. 7. And there was a ſtrife between the herdmen of Abram's cattel, and the herdmen of Lot's cattel.] When Abraham and Lot were returned into this country, they intended to ſettle at Bethel, but that deſign was fruſtrated by a difficulty which then occurred. The Canaanites continued in their old poſts, but the Perizzites had ſcattered themſelves abroad in all the adjoining lands, had eaten up ſome of the beſt paſturages, and ſiezed the reſt, ſo that Abraham and Lot could not live together in that part of the country, without incommoding each other, which occaſioned the contention between their reſpective herdmen.

Ver. 8. And Abram ſaid unto Lot, Let there be no Strife I pray thee between me and thee, &c.] This, with what follows, are inſtances of an amiable condeſcention in Abraham, and reſulted from that humane diſpoſition of mind, which all perſons, and relations, in particular, ſhould be ſedulous to cultivate.

Ver. 10. And Lot lift up his eyes and beheld all the plain of Jordan, &c.] Abraham finding it neceſſary that Lot and himſelf ſhould be ſeparated to a proper diſtance from each other, generouſly recommends the plain of Jordan to him, as a commodious and delightful ſituation, inſtead of chooſing it for himſelf, as many in his circumſtances, would have done.

By the plain of Jordan is undoubtedly meant that plain thro' which the river Jordan runs, before it diſcharges itſelf into the body of waters called the Lacus Aſphaltites, or the dead ſea, by common writers, but, by the ſacred hiſtorian, the ſalt ſea. Gen. xiv. 3. That this ſea is bounded on the north with the plain of Jericho, we are aſſured by Dr. Maundrel who was an eye witneſs of its ſituation; but how much farther, or beyond the plain of Jericho, that of Jordan extends itſelf, is not ſo eaſy to determine. It appears from 1 Kings vii. 46. that it ſtretches as high northward, as to the place where ſtood Succoth, which, by the agreement of all geographers, is placed not far ſouth of the ſea of Cinnereth or Galilee; it is evident, therefore, that by the plain of Jordan, was denoted the greateſt part of the flat country, thro' which the river Jordan flows, from its coming out of the ſea of Galilee to its falling into the ſalt ſea. But this is not ſo to be underſtood, as if the plain of Jordan was one continued level, or was extended all along in an equal breadth. 'Tis clear enough, that it was narrower in ſome places than in others, and that there were ſeveral vallies within it. Gen. xiv. 3. Deut xxxiv. 3.

Like the land of Egypt as thou comeſt to Zoar.] Theſe words, as thou comeſt unto Zoar, are not to be referred to the land of Egypt, from which Zoar was at a great diſtance, but to thoſe words in the beginning; a plain well watered every where; even to the utmoſt skirts of it, which was Zoar.

Ver. 14. And the Lord ſaid unto Abram —— Lift up now thine eyes, &c.] Abraham was no ſooner ſeparated from Lot, than God, who ſeems to have been the whole conductor of this ſcene, bids him caſt his eyes round the horizon, and promiſed to give all that land he then beheld, to him and his poſterity for ever; but it muſt be obſerved that the expreſſion for ever, does not ſignify a perpetuity of time, but a very long period. The Jews, indeed ſay, that when the hebrew word Olam, is written full, that is with the letter vau, it denotes eternity, but when it is without the vau, they confeſs it ſignifies only a length of time; but this little obſervation is quite overthrown by many examples to the contrary. Particularly Exod. xv. 18. where the Lord is ſaid to reign for ever, this word Olam is without a vau, and yet denotes eternity. And Deut. xv. 17. he ſhall be thy ſervant for ever, Olam is written with a vau and yet ſignifies only a term of fifty years, at moſt.

Ver. 18. Then Abram removed his tent and came and dwelt in the plain of Mamre.] It is ſomething extraordinary that ſo many verſions, as the Chaldee, Vulgate, Geneva, Munter, Caſtalio, as well as our own, ſhould render the word elon, in this verſe, a plain, ſince it always ſignifies an oak. The Syriac, Arabic, and St. Jerom, beſides ſome of the modern expoſitors, render it by this word, and our Engliſh tranſlators do the ſame, Gen xxxv. 4 Joſhua xxiv. 26. and in ſome other places. And were it to have any other ſignification in this verſe, that of valley would be much more proper than that of plain; becauſe Sichem is ſaid to be ſituate in the valley of Aulon, or Elon, (vide Euſeb. Jerom. Onomaſt. in 'Αυλών.) This plain, as it is falſly rendered, is called the plain of Moreh in verſe 6. of the preceding chapter. Now, the hebrew word Moreh, ſignifies illuſtrious, or conſpicuous, and ſeems to have been given to the oak, from whence that part of the country was denominated, either on account of the largeneſs of that tree, or the eminence of the place where it ſtood; or, more probably, becauſe it became famous on ſo many accounts; ſuch as Abraham's dwelling beneath its branches; and Jacob's burying his wife, nurſe, and ſtrange Gods under it. Sozomen tells us, that this oak was famous, in the time of Conſtantine, for pilgrimages and annual feaſts: that it was but ſix miles diſtant from Hebron, and that ſome of the cottages built by Abraham, were then ſtanding near it, a well of his digging was likewiſe to be ſeen there, and to which, Chriſtians, Jews, and Heathens reſorted, either out of devotion, or to trade. Brochard aſſures us, that he had ſeen this famous oak, and brought away ſome of the fruit and wood. He likewiſe obſerves, that its leaves has ſome reſemblance to thoſe of the maſtic, but that its fruit was like an acorn.

As for Hebron, mention'd in this verſe, it was certainly a very ancient city. Some authors, after Joſephus, think it was built ninety years after the flood, and that it claimed the precedency even of Memphis. However, it was undoubtedly ſeven years older than Zoar in Egypt, which is not Memphis, but Tanais, the ancient ſeat of the kings of Egypt. Hebron was afterwards called Arba, or Kirjath Arba, which ſignifies four cities, or rather the city of four. The ancient Jews will have it to be ſo called, becauſe Adam, Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, were buried there, with Eve, Sarah, Rebecca, and Leah; but it ſeems more probable, that it had its name from the great Arbah, the father of the Anakims, 1 Chron. ii. 42. And it is not likely that it took its name from Hebron, the grandſon of Caleb, as ſome authors imagine, but rather from the verb chavar, to couple or join; becauſe thoſe married couples, Abraham and Sarah, Iſaac and Rebecca, and Jacob and Leah, are buried there.

CHAP. XIV.

1 The battel of four kings againſt five. 12 Lot is taken priſoner. 14 Abram reſcueth him. 18 Melchizedek bleſſeth Abram. 20 Abram giveth him tithe: 22 The reſt of the ſpoil, his partners having had their portions, he reſtoreth to the king of Sodom.

AND it came to paſs in the days of Amraphel king of Shinar, Arioch king of Ellaſar, Chedorlaomer king of Elam, and Tidal king of nations;

2 That theſe made war with Bera king of Sodom, and with Birſha king of Gomorrah, Shinab king of Admah, and Shemeber king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela which is Zoar.

3 All theſe were joined together in the vale of Siddim, which is the ſalt-ſea.

4 Twelve years they ſerved Chedorlaomer, and in the thirteenth year they rebelled.

5 And in the fourteenth year came Chedorlaomer, and the kings that were with him, and ſmote the Rephaims in Aſhteroth Karnaim, and the Zuzims in Ham, and the Emims in Shaveh Kiriathaim,

6 And the Horites in their mount Seir, unto El-paran, which is by the wilderneſs.

7 And they returned, and came to Enmiſhpat, which is Kadeſh, and ſmote all the country of the Amalekites, and alſo the Amorites, that dwelt in Hazezon-tamar.

8 And there went out the king of Sodom, and the king of Gomorrah, and the king of Admah, and the king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela (the ſame is Zoar) and they joined battel with them in the vale of Siddim;

9 With Chedorlaomer the king of Elam, and with Tidal king of nations, and Amraphel king of Shinar, and Arioch king of Ellaſar: four kings with five.

10 And

10 And the vale of Siddim was full of ſlime-pits; and the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah fled, and fell there: and they that remained fled to the mountain.

11 And they took all the goods of Sodom and Gomorrah, and all their victuals, and went their way.

12 And they took Lot, Abrams brothers ſon (who dwelt in Sodom) and his goods, and departed.

13 And there came one that had eſcaped, and told Abram the Hebrew; for he dwelt in the plain of Mamre the Amorite, brother of Eſhcol, and brother of Aner: and theſe were confederate with Abram.

14 And when Abram heard that his brother was taken captive, he armed his trained ſervants, born in his own houſe, three hundred and eighteen, and purſued them unto Dan.

15 And he divided himſelf againſt them, he and his ſervants by night, and ſmote them, and purſued them unto Hobah, which is on the left hand of Damaſcus.

16 And he brought back all the goods, and alſo brought again his brother Lot, and his goods, and the women alſo, and the people.

17 ¶ And the king of Sodom went out to meet him (after his return from the ſlaughter of Chedorlaomer and of the kings that were with him) at the valley of Shaveh, which is the king's dale.

18 And Melchizedek king of Salem brought forth bread and wine: and he was the prieſt of the moſt high God.

19 And he bleſſed him and ſaid, Bleſſed be Abram of the moſt high God, poſſeſſor of heaven and earth:

20 And bleſſed be the moſt high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he gave him tithes of all.

21 And the king of Sodom ſaid unto Abram, Give me the perſons, and take the goods to thyſelf.

22 And Abram ſaid to the king of Sodom, I have lift up mine hand unto the LORD, the moſt high God, the poſſeſſor of heaven and earth,

23 That I will not take from a thread even to a ſhoe-latchet, and that I will not take any thing that is thine, leſt thou ſhouldſt ſay, I have made Abram rich:

24 Save only that which the young men have eaten, and the portion of the men which went with me, Aner, Eſhcol, and Mamre; let them take their portion.

It would be eaſy to give an account of the war related in this chapter, if the ancient tradition, in Epiphanius, be true. For he declares (Hæreſ. lxvi. n. 84.) that the country call'd Canaan, did really belong to the children of Shem, by virtue of the diviſion made among the ſons of Noah; but that the children of Canaan had diſpoſſeſs'd them. It can be no wonder then, that the kings of the eaſt, who were deſcended from Shem, ſhould lay claim to this country in general, and to this moſt lovely ſpot in particular.

Ver. 1. And it came to paſs in the days of Amraphel king of Shinar, &c.] Joſephus obſerves, that whilſt the empire of Aſia was in the hands of the Aſſyrians, in the latter end of the reign of Zameis, or Ninyas, the ſucceſſor of Semiramis, and about four years before the departure of Abraham from his native country, when Sodom was in a condition ſo rich and populous, that five kings had the adminiſtration of the government, and whilſt each of them was abſolute in his own territories; the Aſſyrians took the field with a mighty army, and marched againſt Sodom, in four ſtrong bodies, and defeated the five kings in a bloody battle. Zameis being an old unactive prince, makes Chedorlaomer, then his viceroy in Elam or Perſia, governor of this country, and lays heavy taxes upon the inhabitants, to keep them in ſubjection. Zameis dying ſoon after, was ſucceeded by Arius, who reigned thirty years, and is, in Scripture, called Tidal king of nations, or of all thoſe countries ſubject to the Aſſyrian monarchy; and the Samaritan verſion calls him the Sultan, or emperor of the Hamites, or of the empire erected by Nimrod the deſcendant from Ham, a part of which empire was Elam, where Chedorlaomer firſt governed. Arius confirms Chedorlaomer as governor over thoſe countries, makes Amraphel his deputy at Shinar, who (as the Samaritan verſion plainly intimates) dwelt at Babylon, and conſtitutes Arioch governor of Cœlo Syria, who dwelt at Elapas, or Ellas a city in thoſe parts, on the borders of Arabia.

In this poſture the Aſſyrian monarchy continued for twelve years, when all the neighbouring country near Sodom, form'd a confederacy to ſhake off the yoak: The five kings before-mentioned ſeem to be the principal, and were joined by the adjacent people, the moſt reſolute of whom were the Horites, who were a colony of the Hivites, and who had ſet up a king of their own. Chedorlaomer ſends to Tidal the emperor, and to the other governors already mentioned, to join him with their forces, to ſuppreſs this inſurrection, which they accordingly did, and then the united army marched immediately againſt the Rephaims, a warlike people of the poſterity of Canaan, who dwelt on the other ſide of Jordan, in Baſhan, or Batanea; their name ſignifies men of a gigantic ſtature, for which reaſon they are called Giants by the Septuagint; and they ſeem to have aſſembled in order to oppoſe the paſſage of their enemies into Sodom. Theſe therefore were firſt attacked, with a view to intimidate all the reſt of the confederates by their defeat. The Aſſyrian army fell next upon the Zuzims, a tall and warlike people, whom the Ammonites their neighbours called Zamzummims, from their dreadfulneſs; the word in the Arabic ſignifying a rattling like thunder. When theſe were conquer'd, the victorious army attacked the Emims, who were alſo a gigantic people, and poſſeſſed Ar and the fields of Kirjathjearim, until they were driven out by the Moabites; upon which the country was called Moab; and having ſubdued them they gave battle to the Horites, in revenge for their ſetting a new king over them, and who dwelt in Mount-Seir, until they were driven out by the children of Eſau, and then their country was called Edom. After this the Aſſyrian troops return back again, and fall upon the country of Enmiſhpat; and thus they paſs thro' the territories which afterwards belonged to the Amalekites, and from thence to the Ammorites, who dwelt in Hazazon Tamar, near the Dead Sea; ſo that now the country of Sodom lay open before them.

The king of Sodom, and the other four kings, knowing themſelves to have been the authors of theſe calamities, could expect no better fate than their neighbours, and therefore they joined all their forces with a reſolution to hazard a pitch'd battle. They were ſenſible, that all theſe conqueſts muſt coſt the Aſſyrians a great number of men, and that they were tired out with long marches; and therefore theſe kings marched into the vale of Siddim, which was full of ſlime-pits, hoping that their enemies might, in the heat heat of battle, fall into thoſe pits and periſh. But the event did not correſpond with their expectations, for they were entirely defeated after a ſharp engagement, in conſequence of which, Lot himſelf, who then dwelt in Sodom, was made a priſoner and carried off with all his effects.

Ver. 13. And there came one that had eſcaped, and told Abram the Hebrew, &c.] This is the firſt paſſage of Scripture wherein mention is made of an Hebrew, the etymology of which word has been already diſcuſſed. Some Rabbins have affirmed, that Abraham had this intelligence of his kinſman's misfortune, from the giant Gog, who was the only one of the Rephaims whom the enemy had ſpared; but however that fact may be, Abraham very generouſly undertook to reſcue Lot from the enemy.

Ver. 14. And when Abraham heard that his brother was taken captive, he armed his trained ſervants, born in his own houſe, three hundred and eighteen.] A man muſt have a large ſtock of incredulity, to find ſufficient matter in this account of Moſes, wherewith to render his integrity ſuſpected; as if it were not to be believed that Abraham, with 318 of his domeſticks, could defeat four kings. The Rabbins, indeed, anſwer that objection in ſuch a manner, as gave thoſe, who made it, occaſion to triumph yet more: They ſay, that God, for the ſake of Abraham, turned the grains of duſt into ſwords, and the ſtalks of the corn into arrows. But if theſe kings had been as powerful as thoſe of the Perſians were afterwards, and if their armies had been as numerous and formidable, we ought not to be ſurpriz'd to find them defeated by a handful of men, for whom the Lord of hoſts ſhould fight; for there is no reſtraint to the Lord to ſave by many or few, 1 Sam. xiv. 16. But there is no neceſſity to have recourſe to ſo great a miracle, for the ſolution of this ſeeming difficulty, which is ſufficiently refuted by the very circumſtances of that hiſtory to which it is objected. In thoſe days, the name of king (notwithſtanding the pompous account given by Joſephus of theſe confederate powers) was given to very little princes. Joſhua defeated one and thirty of them; and we ſee in the hiſtory before us, that mention is made of the king of Sodom, the king of Gomorrah, the king of Admah, and ſeveral more of the ſame rank, who were call'd ſo, tho' they were ſovereigns only of one city. Abraham having divided his little army into four parts, fell upon the enemy by ſurprize, when they had been harraſs'd with long marches, and the fatigues of their laſt battle; and who, as they were attack'd in the night, might naturally imagine the aſſailants to be much more numerous than they really were, many of them might be kill'd in their ſleep, and likewiſe amidſt their conſternation at their firſt awaking, at the unexpected alarm: For which reaſon, there can be nothing incredible in the victory obtain'd over them by Abraham. The cavils, therefore, that have been rais'd againſt it, are no more than ſo many proofs of the pains taken by the enemies of religion, to depreciate its divine authority, by improving ſuch trifles, as, when they are thoroughly examined, only tend to ſhew the ignorance and inſincerity of thoſe who ſtart them.

——— ——— And purſued them unto Dan.] Thoſe who aſſert that Moſes was not the author of the Pentateuch, or, at leaſt, that ſeveral paſſages in theſe books were not written by him; pretend, that it was impoſſible for him to write the words we have now cited at the cloſe of this 14th verſe. Becauſe, ſay they, Dan was a city that receiv'd its name from the tribe of Dan, after their ſettlement in Canaan; and as Moſes died many years before that event, the objection againſt his being the author of this paſſage, is repreſented as unanſwerable, but we hope to make the contrary very evident. In order to which, it will be neceſſary to obſerve, that Dan is not call'd a city in the text before us; and if the objectors will allow the principal river of Canaan to have been called Jordan in the time of Moſes, as it certainly was, they may gain an eaſy ſolution of the pretended difficulty, ſince this river derived its name from two ſprings, one of which was called Jor, and the other Dan. And this laſt ſpring was directly in Abraham's way, when he purſu'd the defeated army.

Ver. 17. And the king of Sodom went out to meet him, &c.] The king of Sodom gave Abraham publick marks of his gratitude, when he went to meet him, in order to pay him homage as his deliverer, and found him in the king's dale. The Jews ſay, that it was ſo call'd, becauſe all the kings of Canaan came thither to own Abraham for their king, and that they plac'd him upon a throne, which they had form'd of cedar-trees heaped upon each other. The Chaldee paraphraſts pretend, that this place was called the king's dale, becauſe it was us'd by them for their diverſion.

Ver. 18. And Melchizedek king of Salem brought forth bread and wine: and he was the prieſt of the moſt high God.] The ſole queſtion concerning the perſon of Melchizedek, would ſupply matter ſufficient for a large volume, were we only to recite the different opinions it has occaſion'd, and the reaſons by which each commentator has endeavour'd to eſtabliſh his own particular ſentiments of this paſſage.

Some of them have been extravagant to an incredible degree. Eutychius very gravely declares, that Adam order'd his children to take his body out of a place call'd the cave of the treaſure, where he was to remain embalm'd for a while, and to carry it to the middle of the earth; that Lamech, when he died, left the ſame commands with Noah; and that this patriarch took thoſe relicks into the ark with him, and kept them there till he died; that he order'd his ſon Shem to take the ſame, to provide bread and wine, to go along with Melchizedek, the ſon of Peleg, and to march till they came to a place, which ſhould be ſhewed them by an angel; that Noah commanded Melchizedek to fix his dwelling in the ſame place, to lead a life of celibacy, as a monk, or a religious perſon, becauſe God had choſen him to perform divine ſervice, in his preſence, but not to build any temple, ſhed the blood of any animal, nor offer up any ſacrifice but that of bread and wine.

There have likewiſe been men ridiculous enough to maintain, that the Sun was the Father, and the Moon the mother of Melchizedek. Some ancient writers likewiſe affirm, that his father was called Eraclas, and his mother Aſtecia, or Aſhteroth. There is another opinion, related by Athanaſius, that he was without a genealogy, becauſe the earth had open'd its mouth, and ſwallowed up all his relations.

But inſtead of enumerating the many trifles that have been dream'd on this occaſion, by Chriſtians as well as Jews, we ſhall relate two opinions that have been moſt generally maintained, and which chiefly deſerve the attention of our readers.

The Firſt is, that of the cloud of interpreters, both ancient and modern, who, tho' divided upon ſome particular points, are unanimous in this general proportion, that Melchizedek was an illuſtrious man, a great king, a prieſt of the true God, contemporary with Abraham, and living in Paleſtine, or ſome adjacent country.

The Second is, that related by Epiphanius, and received by Cuneus and Gaillard; according to which Melchizedek is Jeſus Chriſt himſelf.

Thoſe who favour the firſt opinion declare, that Melchizedek was ſuch a prince as thoſe kings of the plain mentioned in this chapter; that he was a worſhiper of the true God. Some Rabbins are of opinion that he was Eber; but in this they are undoubtedly miſtaken. He was a prieſt of the true God; for in old times, every one exerciſed the office of a prieſt or ſacrificer, without diſtinction of age or character; witneſs Abel and Cain. It is true, the prieſthood was chiefly annexed to the eldeſt, and to the head of the family; but Melchizedek is conſider'd as a prieſt by office, and that auguſt employment was often joined to the ſovereignty. Melchizedek, whoſe name imports the king of righteouſneſs, was ſo called, perhaps on account of his great vertues; and 'tis remarkable that we find a king of Jeruſalem (which ſome take to be the Salem mention'd in this chapter) whoſe name was Adonizedec, which has much the ſame ſignification as Melchizedek, viz. the Lord of righteouſneſs. Melchizedek brought bread and wine to Abraham; perhaps they were the remainders of the ſacrifices of thankſgiving he had before offer'd to God, to acknowledge the deliverance of the five cities of the plain, by the hand of the Patriarch. He likewiſe bleſſed Abraham Nothing is more indefinite in the Scriptures than this expreſſion to bleſs; it ſignifies almoſt equally to give thanks to one's benefactor, and to wiſh or commemorate good; but Melchizedek performed the function of a prieſt, and did, with reſpect to Abraham, what was done, in the following ages, by the prieſts, under the law, with reference to the people of God. Melchizedek likewiſe received of Abraham tithes of all, that is, of all the ſpoils that patriarch had taken from the enemy. The Hebrew text, indeed, is equivocal, and one may underſtand indifferently, either that Abraham gave tithes to Melchizedek, or that Melchizedek gave tithes to Abraham; but the nature of the tranſaction explains the true meaning.

Hitherto this ſyſtem has very little difficulty in the eſſential parts; but it begins to appear, when this ſyſtem comes to be accommodated to the idea St. Paul gives of this Melchizedek, Heb. v. 3. That he was without father or mother, without deſcent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a prieſt continually. From hence he ſhews the preference of Melchizedek to Abraham: Conſider, ſays he, ver. 4. how great this man was, unto whom even the Patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the ſpoils, and adds this general maxim, ver. 7. And without all contradiction, the leſs is bleſſed of the greater.

This idea, which St. Paul gives us of Melchizedek, is very oppoſite to the opinion of thoſe, who pretend that he was a king of Canaan; but they have uſed very extraordinary endeavours to reconcile their ſyſtem with this idea, and lay down, for a ground of their ſolutions, that Melchizedek was a type of Jeſus Chriſt, and that the whole aim of St. Paul was to repreſent the analogy of the type, with its antitype. If you ask them how the Apoſtle could affirm, of a king of Canaan, that he was without father and mother, they will anſwer, that the original text may be underſtood, he whoſe deſcent is not known; and that the Syriac tranſlation paraphraſes the text in this manner, he whoſe father or mother are not mentioned in the pedigree. They likewiſe juſtify this explanation by examples from prophane hiſtory, and affirm, 'tis in ſuch a ſenſe that Seneca (Epiſt. cviii. p. 468.) ſays of two Roman kings, that the one had no father, nor the other a mother, which he himſelf thus explains, that they doubted who was the mother of Servius. They add, that it was an ancient cuſtom, not only among the Jews, but among the Heathens alſo, ſtrictly to examine the genealogy of thoſe whom they intended to admit into the prieſthood, ſo that St. Paul had an intention to repreſent the caſe of Melchizedek as very extraordinary, ſince he was made a prieſt, notwithſtanding his pedigree was unknown. Or that he was born of ſuch parents, by whom he could lay no manner of claim to any prieſthood in the land of Canaan, no more than if he had no parents at all; and we muſt confeſs this interpretation is not altogether unnatural, and there is a very remarkable paſſage in Euripides, (Ion. ver. 109.) where we find the very words uſed by St. Paul,

——— Ως καὶ ἀμήτωρ
Ἀπάτωρ τε γεγως τὸς Δρέψανίας
Φοίβῳ ναιὸς θεραπεύω.

In which Ion acknowledges, that he was a ſervant in the temple of Apollo, and had his maintenance from thence, tho' he might be conſidered as one without father, and without mother, with reſpect to any qualifications he could derive from his birth, to the ſtation in which he was placed.

If you ask them what St. Paul meant when he ſaid, that Melchizedek had neither beginning of days, nor end of life, they will anſwer, that the Apoſtle does not ſpeak of what Melchizedek was in himſelf, but what he is, in relation to us, and that St. Paul's argument is founded not upon the nature of things, but upon the ſilence of ſcripture. Melchizedek, ſay they, is, with reſpect to us, without beginning of days, becauſe there is no mention made of his birth, and alſo without end of life, for the ſame reaſon.

If you enquire of them how St. Paul applies the type to the antitype, and how Melchizedek who was without father &c. can repreſent Jeſus Chriſt? ſome of them will tell you, that the relation conſiſted herein, that Chriſt was without father, in reſpect to his humane nature, and without mother, with reſpect to his divine nature; but there are others, who affirm, that this ſolution includes an argument of retortion againſt thoſe who propoſe it; for if Jeſus Chriſt is without father, on account of his humanity, and without mother, on account of his divinity, yet he has a father in his divine, and a mother in his human nature. This difficulty has forced the interpreters to explain thoſe words another way: They think St Paul only means, that as Melchizedek was not a prieſt, in virtue of his deſcent, or by virtue of any right hereditary to his family, ſo neither was Jeſus Chriſt a prieſt, by virtue of the Law, which annexed the prieſthood for ever to the family of Aaron, and to the tribe of Levi, but in conſequence of the eternity of his eſſence, and the eminency of his perfections.

The greater number of Jewiſh doctors believe, that Melchizedek was Shem; in which opinion they are ſeconded by the Chaldee Paraphraſt, and the Targum of Jeruſalem: St. Jerom was informed to the ſame effect, by the Jew who taught him Hebrew; and the Cabaliſts diſcover the name of Shem in that of Melchizedek. But it would be very extraordinary for Shem to be king of Salem, ſo many years after his death, for according to the chronology of the Samaritan Pentateuch, this patriarch died ſeveral hundred years before the birth of Abraham, and we think we have already proved the computations in that copy to be preferable to the Hebrew. But if Shem had really been living at the time of the tranſaction recorded in this chapter, it could never be ſaid of him, in any ſenſe, that he was without father, &c. Beſides, we find nothing in ſcripture to induce us to believe, that he left Chaldea, to come into the land of Canaan.

If there had been no mention made of Melchizedek, but in the book of Geneſis, we ſhould readily concur with thoſe who think, that ſome king of Canaan was the ſovereign of a place called Salem; and the ignorance in which we are left, with reſpect to the perſon of this king, and the place of his kingdom, would be alone ſufficient to make us not reject an hypotheſis that appears ſo natural. The great difficulties which encounter this opinion are taken from the above-cited paſſages in the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, and they ſeem to ſubſiſt in their full ſtrength, notwithſtanding all the attempts of expoſitors to remove them.

As to the ſecond opinion which maintains Melchizedek to be Jeſus Chriſt, we ſhall inſiſt the leſs upon it, becauſe it is built upon fewer principles, and encumber'd with leſs difficulties, than the other.

It is remarkable, that altho' St. Paul followed the verſion of the Septuagint, which tranſlated the text of Moſes, Melchizedek king of Salem; yet he has laid it down as a principle, that this word Melchizedek, was not deſigned to intimate the name of him who went to meet Abraham, but to deſcribe his qualities; ſo that our tranſlators ought to have kept theſe two Hebrew words Melchizedek, and Melchiſalem, or they ſhould have expounded them both, and ſaid the king of righteouſneſs, the king of peace came to meet Abraham; for there is no reaſon to be aſſigned why one of the Hebrew words ſhould be retained in the verſion when the other is tranſlated. According to St. Paul this Melchizedek is firſt by interpretation, king of righteouſneſs, and, after that, king of peace; which is the ſignification of Meleciſalem. The names belong to none ſo properly as to Jeſus Chriſt, to whom they are given in ſeveral places of Scripture. He was called (ſay the advocates for this ſecond opinion) the prieſt of the moſt high God, by way of anticipation, becauſe from all time he was deſtined to that auguſt office. In this ſenſe St. John calls him, the Lamb that was ſlain from the foundation of the world. It has been objected to this opinion. 1. That Moſes introduces Melchiſedek and the king of Sodom, without intimating any circumſtance that can incline us to ſuſpect there was ſo great a difference between thoſe two princes. 2. Abraham does not ſhew any ſurprize at the ſight of Melchizedek, nor cry out as Jacob, ſurely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not. But the Partiſans for this ſyſtem reply, that it may be ſuppoſed (without doing any violence to the ſcripture) that Abraham was very much affected when honoured with this divine appearance, and that ſuch is the meaning of Jeſus Chriſt in theſe famous words. Your father Abraham rejoiced to ſee my day, and he ſaw it and was glad, John 8. 56.

Laſtly, the defenders of the former ſyſtem ask the patrons of the latter, what ſenſe they can put upon theſe words of the prophecy, Thou art a prieſt for ever after the order of Melchizedek, Pſal. cx. 4. and it is anſwered that the Hebrew of this text may be tranſlated, Thou art a prieſt for ever, ſo far as is agreeable to a king of righteouſneſs and peace. But, as St. Paul has retained the verſion of the Septuagint, they diſcover another good meaning in that expreſſion, and underſtand the prophecy in the following ſignification, without ſtraining it at all; Thou haſt exactly the ſame prieſthood, whereof thou didſt perform ſome functions, when thou didſt appear to Abraham, as a king of peace, and righteouſneſs.

It remains now to weigh theſe different opinions, and point out that which deſerves the preference. But tho' we were capable of undertaking ſo great a province, at the cloſe of a diſſertation, which has already exceeded the bounds that were firſt intended, yet we could not, without ſome reluctance, determine upon a queſtion, in which it is impoſſible to chooſe any ſide, without being oppoſed by adverſaries of the firſt rate.

We are convinced, that we cannot entirely ſolve this queſtion, without clearing up another, which is more general, and more encumber'd with difficulties; namely, what method the Apoſtles purſued in quoting to the Jews, the prophecies of the Old Teſtament? And whatever pains the learned have taken, to unravel ſo intricate a ſubject, it ſtill leaves a vaſt ſcope for their enquiries.

Each of the two ſyſtems we have examined, appears probable to us, but neither of them ſufficiently proved. The firſt is the moſt natural, but the ſecond ſeems to correſpond better with the words of St. Paul. The firſt is more remote from that fondneſs for the wonderful, which has made ſuch havock in the ſchools: But the ſecond is attended, with that ſpirit of implicit deference and ſubmiſſion, which is juſtly due to the deciſions of Scripture. This is all we ſhall pronounce upon this famous point, and we freely own, that after having uſed our utmoſt endeavours to underſtand the text of Moſes, and St. Paul's comment upon it, we have only diſcovered how much we ſtill want greater lights, than thoſe which interpreters have yet afforded us, for comprehending both the one and the other.

CHAP. XV.

1 God encourageth Abram. 2 Abram complaineth for want of an heir. 4 God promiſeth him a ſon, and a multiplying of his ſeed. 6 Abram is juſtified by faith. 7 Canaan is promiſed again, and confirmed by a ſign, 12 and a viſion.

AFter theſe things the word of the LORD came unto Abram in a viſion, ſaying, Fear not Abram: I am thy ſhield, and thy exceeding great reward.

2 And Abram ſaid, LORD God, what wilt thou give me, ſeeing I go childleſs, and the ſteward of my houſe is this Eliezer of Damaſcus.

3 And Abram ſaid, Behold, to me thou haſt given no ſeed: and lo, one born in my houſe is mine heir.

4 And behold, the word of the LORD came unto him, ſaying, This ſhall not be thine heir, but he that ſhall come forth out of thine own bowels ſhall be thine heir.

5 And he brought him forth abroad, and ſaid, look now toward heaven, and tell the ſtars, if thou be able to number them: And he ſaid unto him, So ſhall thy ſeed be.

6 And he believed in the LORD; and he counted it unto him for righteouſneſs.

7 And he ſaid to him, I am the LORD that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it.

8 And he ſaid, LORD God, whereby ſhall I know that I ſhall inherit it?

9 And he ſaid unto him, Take me an heifer of three years old, and a ſhe-goat of three years old, and a ram of three years old, and a turtle-dove, and a young pigeon.

10 And he took unto him all theſe, and divided them in the midſt, and laid each piece one againſt another: but the birds divided he not.

11 And when the fowls came down upon the carcaſſes, Abram drove them away.

12 And when the ſun was going down, a deep ſleep fell upon Abram; and lo, an horror of great darkneſs fell upon him.

13 And he ſaid unto Abram, Know of a ſurety that thy ſeed ſhall be a ſtranger in a land that is not theirs, and ſhall ſerve them, and they ſhall afflict them four hundred years.

14 And alſo that nation whom they ſhall ſerve, will I judge: and afterward ſhall they come out with great ſubſtance.

15 And thou ſhalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou ſhalt be buried in a good old age.

16 But in the fourth generation they ſhall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full.

17 And it came to paſs, that when the ſun went down, and it was dark, behold a ſmoking furnace, and a burning lamp that paſſed between thoſe pieces.

18 In that ſame day the LORD made a covenant with Abram, ſaying, Unto thy ſeed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates:

19 The Kenites, and the Kenizzites, and the Kadmonites.

20 And the Hittites, and the Perizzites, and the Rephaims,

21 And the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Girgaſhites, and the Jebuſites.

Ver. 1. After theſe things the word of the Lord came unto Abram in a viſion, ſaying, fear not Abram, &c.] An enemy defeated is ſometimes more dangerous than a ſucceſsful one. It was to be feared leſt thoſe kings, whom Abraham had put to flight, ſhould return upon him with ſuperior ſtrength; and as intoxication, into which the joy for their victory had betray'd them, was the cauſe of their ſubſequent defeat, ſo raging deſpair, which was the effect of it, might make them recover the victory. God was therefore pleaſed to fortify his ſervant againſt that fear, by the magnificent expreſſions in this verſe.

Ver. 4. And behold the word of the Lord came to him, ſaying, this ſhall not be thine heir, &c. to the end of the 5th verſe.] This promiſe, if it had been utter'd by any but God himſelf, might naturally have been diſtruſted by Abraham, who was then fourſcore years old, and Sarah was barren. A man of eighty years of age, a barren woman, a poſterity as numerous as the ſtars in the the heaven; ſeemed to be very contradictory circumſtances.

Ver. 8. And he ſaid, Lord God whereby ſhall I know that I ſhall inherit it?] It is allowable, even to the moſt unſhaken believer, to beg of God that he would ſtrengthen him. Abraham, tho' animated with ſuch a faith as occaſioned the Apoſtle to ſay of him, that he was not weak in faith, and that againſt hope, he believed in hope. Rom. iv. 18, 19. deſired God to favour him with a ſign, whereby he might know that all theſe promiſes ſhould be accompliſhed. Thoſe who think that this prayer, made from ſuch a motive, did not correſpond very well with the faith of Abraham, ſo much extolled by the inſpired writers, imagine that this patriarch required a token, which might ſerve, not as a teſtimonial to the truth of that promiſe, but as a mark of the time of its accompliſhment.

Ver. 9. And he ſaid unto him, Take me an heifer of three years old, &c.] The Deity graciouſly complied with Abraham's requeſt, and granted him the ſign or token he deſired. Moſes has not mention'd the reaſon why God commanded that the victims, which were to be offered up to him by Abraham, ſhould be exactly three years old. Perhaps it was, becauſe that was the time of their greateſt ſtrength: The heathens ſacrificed their victims at the ſame age, and Bochart has corroborated the truth of that fact, by ſeveral proofs; one of which is taken out of Lucian, where it is ſaid, that Ganymede being taken away by Jupiter, deſired his liberty, and promiſed him the oblation of a ram of three years. But in the following ages God gave a different law to the Jews; take ye a kid of the goats for a ſin offering, and a calf and a lamb, both of the firſt year. It is not eaſy to aſſign the reaſon of this difference; perhaps ſeveral laws of the Levitical worſhip have no other foundation, but the intention of God, to direct his people in the moſt minute circumſtances of their divine ſervice, and to diſtinguiſh it from all thoſe which the idolaters rendered to their falſe Gods.

Ver. 11. And when the fowls came down upon the carcaſſes, Abram drove them away.] When Abraham was employed in executing the myſterious order he had received from God, ſome birds of prey interrupted that auguſt ceremony, and ſettled upon the fleſh of the victims; at leaſt this is the meaning aſſigned to this paſſage by moſt expoſitors, but they ought to have proved it to be the proper tranſlation, before they gave themſelves the pains to diſcover the myſteries repreſented by this incident. For the original is capable of this verſion, Abram placed the birds upon the dead beaſts, and ſeated himſelf in the midſt of them, that is to ſay, between the parts of the victims that were oppoſite to each other. Dictis of Crete relates, that Agamemnon, in confirmation of the oath he had ſworn to Achilles, ordered victims to be brought to him; after which he took one of them, and drawing his ſword, cut it aſunder, placing the pieces againſt each other, and brandiſhing the weapon ſtain'd with the blood of the victim, he paſſed between the two halves; and God did ſomething like this, with reſpect to Abraham, after having cauſed the victims to be divided in the manner repreſented in this chapter, he paſſed between them under the emblems of darkneſs, fire, and ſmoak. The ancients, when they made mutual alliances or covenants, offer'd up victims, and cut them in halves, after which they placed the pieces againſt each other; in ſhort, they did all that Abraham performed, in the inſtance before us; each of the contracting parties paſſed between the divided pieces, by which they intimated, that they ſubmitted themſelves to the ſame treatment thoſe victims had undergone, if they violated the articles ſtipulated between them. We find in Zenobius, that the people called Molotti retained ſomething of this cuſtom; for they confirmed their oaths, when they made their covenants, καλαπέλλειν εἰς τὰ μικρὰ βόϊα, by cutting oxen into ſmall pieces: and Euſtathius, in his commentary on Homer, paraphraſes upon this paſſage of that great poet, Ὅρκια πιστὰ τάμνειν (Il ii. v. 124.) cutting in two oaths of fidelity, that is, ſays the commentator, the oaths made concerning important matters were ratified by the ſection of the victims. St. Cyril derives this cuſtom from the ancient Chaldeans; others deduce the Hebrew word Bireth, which ſignifies a covenant, from the word uſed both in this paſſage, and in Jeremy, viz. Batar, which is the very ſame, by a tranſpoſition of letters, and ſignifies to divide, or cut aſunder, becauſe covenants were made by dividing a beaſt, and by the ſtipulating parties paſſing between the parts of the beaſt, ſignifying, that they who violated the compact ſhould be cut aſunder in the ſame manner. Thus Mr. Mede truly explains this rite, which was as much as if they had ſaid, Thus let me be divided and cut in pieces, if I break the oath I have now made in the preſence of my God.

Ver. 12. And when the ſun was going down, a deep ſleep fell upon Abram; and lo, an horror of great darkneſs fell upon him.] Abraham having compleated the ſacrifice, found himſelf overwhelmed with a deep ſleep, brought upon him, undoubtedly by God himſelf; and at the ſame time he was ſtruck with ſuch a fear as might juſtly affect a man, ſeized, in the darkneſs of the night, with a ſupernatural viſion.

Ver. 13. And he ſaid unto Abraham, know of a ſurety that thy ſeed ſhall be a ſtranger in a land that is not theirs, and ſhall ſerve them, and they ſhall afflict them four hundred years.] Expoſitors have given into various opinions, in order to make out theſe four hundred years. Genebrard has affirm'd, that the Iſraelites dwelt in Egypt the full number of 400 years; but his error may be eaſily confuted by the lives of Kohath, the ſon of Levi, who went down with Jacob, and died in Egypt, in the 133d year of his age, Exod. vi. 18. And by the life of his ſon Amram, the father of Moſes, who lived 137 years, ver. 20. and likewiſe by the life of Moſes, who was 80 years old when he brought Iſrael out of Egypt: All which ſeveral numbers make but 350 years; out of which we muſt ſubſtract thoſe which Korah had attain'd when he went down into Egypt, and likewiſe the time the fathers lived with their children. This has made ſome reduce the number to leſs than 210 years, and others to 200. St. Paul reckons from the firſt promiſe made to Abraham, to the promulgation of the law, in the firſt year after the Exodus, 430 years; of which 215 were already expired when Iſrael came into Egypt: (for from the time of the promiſe made to Abraham in Haran, to the birth of Iſaac, are about 25 years; thence to the birth of Jacob are 60 more, and he was 130 years old when he ſtood before Pharaoh; all which make 215 years) The laſt remaining 215 may be thus reckoned; Kohath came down with Jacob, and, according to Euſebius, begot Amram in his 70th year, and Amram begot Moſes much about the ſame age; to which, if we add the 80 years of Moſes's age, when he led them out, the whole will make 220; from which may be ſubſtracted 5 years, the ſuppoſed age of Kohath, when Jacob left Canaan, and the remainder will be the time of their abode in Egypt; namely, 215 years.

Hence it is plain that the 400 years of Abraham's ſeed ſojourning in a ſtrange land, muſt be computed not from their coming into Egypt, but from the birth of Iſaac. For all the time of their ſojourning in the land of Canaan, Gerar, or any other country, was ſtill in a ſtrange land, in which they had not a foot of ground, if we except the cave of Machpelah. As to what is added, that they ſhall likewiſe ſerve and be ill treated, it is commonly looked upon to be ſpoken circumſtantially, and might be included in a parentheſis, thus: They ſhall ſojourn and be ſtrangers, (and ſhall likewiſe ſerve and be oppreſſed) during the ſpace of 400 years, as St. Auſtin and others have fully proved. Accordingly, we find Iſaac oppreſſed in Gerar, his wells filled up by the inhabitants, and himſelf forced ſtill farther from them; and Jacob ſerved, and was oppreſſed by Laban, near 20 years. The Egyptian ſervitude did not commence till after Joſeph and all his brethren were dead. Allowing, therefore, that Levi was 44 years of age, at his firſt coming into Egypt, which is the moſt that can be ſuppoſed, he muſt have lived 93 years in that country; becauſe the text tells us, that he died in the 137th year of his age, Exod. i. 6. and theſe 93 years being ſubſtracted from 215, the time of their abode there will be but 122 years of ſervitude, even ſuppoſing it to have begun immediately after his death. The natural ſenſe, therefore, of this prophecy to Abraham, can be only this, that his ſeed from Iſaac and his poſterity ſhould be ſtrangers in a land that was not their property, for the ſpace of 400 years, during ſome part of which they ſhould be oppreſſed, afflicted, and at length reduced to a ſtate of bondage; which term being expired, they ſhould obtain a happy deliverance.

Ver.

Ver. 17. And it came to paſs, that when the ſun went down and it was dark, behold a ſmoking furnace, and a burning lamp that paſſed between thoſe pieces.] When Abraham awaked from his ſleep, a darkneſs and a vapour, like a ſmoak iſſuing out of a heated oven, and a firebrand, paſſed between the parts of the victims, which the patriarch had placed one againſt another. Thoſe who have any curioſity to ſee ſome inſtances of the deviations and chimeras into which a flying imagination may expatiate, whilſt it pretends to explain the Scriptures, need only conſult the fancies of ſeveral interpreters upon this circumſtance. If it were neceſſary to determine what events this darkneſs, ſmoak, and firebrand, repreſent, St. Auſtin can very eaſily diſcover in them, particular emblems of the final conflagration of the world. But if any one would know what the deſcent of fire from heaven, upon the ſacrifices, did anciently import, the proper anſwer is, that it was an indication that the offering was acceptable to God.

Ver. 18. In that ſame day the Lord made a covenant with Abraham, ſaying, unto thy ſeed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt, unto the great river, the river Euphrates.] The Nile is commonly called the river of Egypt, but cannot be meant in this verſe, becauſe the Iſraelites never enjoyed all the land of Egypt on the eaſtern ſide of the Nile, beſides, the Euphrates being here ſtiled the great river, it may be reaſonably ſuppoſed that the other river, mentioned with it, was ſome leſſer river, and conſequently not the Nile, there being no ſuch diſparity as to the greatneſs of the Nile, and the Euphrates (eſpecially as to that part of the latter, to which the dominion of the Iſraelites was to extend) as that one ſhould be ſtiled the great river, when mentioned with or compared to the other. And the ſame will further appear, from other places of Scripture, where mention is made of the river of Egypt, as Numb. xxxiv. 5 Joſh. xv. 4. from which places it is evident, that the river of Egypt was part of the ſouthern border of the land of Iſrael. But it is well known, that the land, divided among the twelve tribes, did not extend to the Nile, for which reaſon it evidently follows, that the river of Egypt, ſo called in Scripture, was a diſtinct river from the Nile; we are therefore to underſtand by it, that little river which came out of that branch of the Nile, called Peluſiacum Barachium; from whence a ſmall river, not navigable, ran towards Judæa, and diſcharged its ſtream into the Egyptian or Phœnician ſea. This river was the bound of Paleſtine, and is mentioned by Strabo, and others, whom Voſſius cites, L. 2. de Idolol. c. 74. It is likewiſe called the river of the wilderneſs, Amos vii. 14. becauſe it flow'd through the wilderneſs which is between Egypt and Paleſtine.

Ver. 19. The Kenites, and the Kenizzites, &c.] Theſe are numbered with the nations, whoſe country God gave to Abraham; but whether they were deſcended from any of the ſons of Canaan, we cannot tell: Nor are we certain where they dwelt. Only Euſtathius, biſhop of Antioch, ſays, the Kenites dwelt about Libanus and Amanus. And the Kenizzites, its likely, were their neighbours. But the names of theſe people were quite extinct in the interval of time between Abraham and Moſes; for we find no mention of them by Joſhua, in the partition of the land of Canaan, nor in the account he gives of the nations he conquered. We read, indeed, of the Kenezites, Numb. xxxii. 12. Joſh. xiv. 6, 14. but they were of the children of Iſrael. And of the Kenites, Judg. i. 16. iv. 11, 17. but they deſcended from the father-in-law of Moſes: And therefore thoſe who are mention'd, in this paſſage before us, by the ſacred hiſtorian, loſt their name, in all probability, by being incorporated into ſome of the ſeven nations who inhabited this country when Joſhua ſubdued it.

The Kadmonites.] Theſe are no where elſe mentioned; but are thought, by Bochart, to be the ſame with the Hivites; who, living about mount Hermon toward the eaſt of Canaan, were thence called Kadmonites, which word ſignifies orientals.

Ver. 20. And the Hittites, &c.] This people deſcended from Heth, the ſecond ſon of Canaan, and they dwelt about Hebron, and Beerſheba, in the ſouthern part of the land of Canaan. They were a very warlike people, and ſtruck a terror into their neighbours; From whence the word hittha ſeems to be derived, and which ſignifies fright, and ſudden conſternation; ſuch as came upon the Syrians, when they imagined the kings of the Hittites were marching againſt them, 2 Kings vii. 6. This was the country of the Anakims; for from Arba, who was an Hittite, deſcended Anak; and from him thoſe three giants, Ahiman, Sheſhai, and Talmai, and the reſt of the Anakims, Numb. xiii. 22, 23. Joſh. xv. 13, 14.

And the Perizzites.] They were a people inhabiting the mountainous and woody country of Canaan, as appears from Joſh. xi. 3. xvii. 10. From whence we may ſuppoſe them to have been a wild ſort of people, who lived remote from cities, in little villages; and thence, perhaps, had their name. For the Hebrew word pherazoth, ſignifies pagi, or villages: But from which of the ſons of Canaan they deſcended, there is not the leaſt intimation in the ſacred Scripture.

The Rephaims] Theſe were a part of Canaan's poſterity, ſituate, as we may infer from Joſh. xii. 4. xiii. 12. on the other ſide Jordan, in Baſhan, or Batanea. They were of a gigantic ſtature, and therefore the LXX here, and in other places, inſtead of Rephaim, have giants.

Ver. 21. And the Amorites.] They were the progeny of Emor, the fourth ſon of Canaan, and poſſeſſed the mountainous parts of Judæa: Many of them paſſed over Jordan, and making war upon the Moabites and Ammonites, ſeized upon Baſhan and Heſhbon, and all the country between the rivers of Jabbok, and Arnon, Numb. xiii. 29. Joſh. v. 1. In memory of which victory, ſome Canaanite poet made a ſong of triumph, recorded by Moſes, Numb. xxi. 27. What a mighty people theſe were, we learn from Amos ii. 9.

And the Canaanites.] Theſe were ſome of the poſterity of Canaan, who peculiarly inherited his name; they lived upon the ſea-coaſt, and upon the banks of Jordan, Numb. xiii. 30. Deut. i. 7. xi. 30. And it is a reaſonable conjecture, that they ſprung from ſuch of Canaan's ſons, as had, for a time, the greateſt power and authority in that country, and therefore had the prerogative of being called by his name; or elſe they were ſo denominated, becauſe they were merchants, and great traders by ſea, for the word has that ſignification in Scripture.

And the Girgaſhites.] There was a remnant of this people, about Geraſa, or Gadara, beyond Jordan, in our Saviour's time, Matth. viii. 28. Mark v. 1. Luke viii. 26. and they perhaps were called by this name, from the fat, clayey ſoil of the country they inhabited: For the Hebrew word garges, ſignifies white clay.

And the Jebuſites.] This people, who were ſituated near the Hittites, deſcended from Jebus, the third ſon of Canaan; and were a very warlike nation; for they kept Jeruſalem and the fortreſs of Zion, to the times of David, notwithſtanding all the power of the Benjamites.

CHAP. XVI.

1 Sarai being barren giveth Hagar to Abram. 6 Hagar being afflicted for deſpiſing her miſtreſs, runneth away: 9 An angel ſendeth her back to ſubmit herſelf, 11 and telleth her of her child. 15 Iſhmael is born.

NOW Sarai Abrams wife bare him no children: and ſhe had an handmaid an Egyptian, whoſe name was Hagar.

2 And Sarai ſaid unto Abram, Behold now the LORD hath reſtrained me from bearing: I pray thee go in unto my maid: it may be that I may obtain children by her: and Abram hearkened to the voice of Sarai.

3 And Sarai Abrams wife took Hagar her maid the Egyptian, after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan, and gave her to her husband Abram to be his wife.

4 ¶ And he went in unto Hagar, and ſhe ſhe conceived: and when ſhe ſaw that ſhe had conceived, her miſtreſs was deſpiſed in her eyes.

5 And Sarai ſaid unto Abram, My wrong be upon thee: I have given my maid into thy boſom; and when ſhe ſaw that ſhe had conceived, I was deſpiſed in her eyes: the LORD judge between me and thee.

6 But Abram ſaid unto Sarai, Behold, thy maid is in thy hand; do to her as it pleaſeth thee. And when Sarai dealt hardly with her, ſhe fled from her face.

7 ¶ And the angel of the LORD found her by a fountain of water in the wilderneſs, by the fountain in the way to Shur.

8 And he ſaid, Hagar, Sarai's maid, whence cameſt thou? and whither wilt thou go? And ſhe ſaid, I flee from the face of my miſtreſs Sarai.

9 And the angel of the LORD ſaid unto her, Return to thy miſtreſs, and ſubmit thy ſelf under her hands.

10 And the angel of the LORD ſaid unto her, I will multiply thy ſeed exceedingly, that it ſhall not be numbred for multitude.

11 And the angel of the LORD ſaid unto her, Behold, thou art with child, and ſhalt bear a ſon, and ſhalt call his name Iſhmael; becauſe the LORD hath heard thy affliction.

12 And he will be a wild man; his hand will be againſt every man, and every mans hand againſt him: and he ſhall dwell in the preſence of all his brethren.

13 And ſhe called the name of the LORD that ſpake unto her, Thou God ſeeſt me: for ſhe ſaid, Have I alſo here looked after him that ſeeth me?

14 Wherefore the well was called Beer-la-hai-roi; behold, it is between Kadeſh and Bered.

15 ¶ And Hagar bare Abram a ſon: and Abram called his ſons name, which Hagar bare, Iſhmael.

16 ¶ And Abram was fourſcore and ſix years old, when Hagar bare Iſhmael to Abram.

Ver. 1. Now Sarai Abram's wife bare him no child] Still the accompliſhment of God's promiſe was defer'd, for the greater trial of Abraham's faith, which now had held out ten years.

Ver. 3. And Sarai Abram's wife took Hagar her maid the Egyptian, after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan, and gave her to her husband Abraham to be his wife.] Sarah not imagining ſhe was to be the happy mother of the promiſed Child, and having, as ſhe ſuppoſed, convincing proofs of her being paſt all poſſibility of having any of her own, reſolved to be, at leaſt, a mother by proxy, according to the cuſtom of that age and country. The reaſon why Sarah herſelf ſhould perſuade her husband, contrary to the inclination of all women, to take another wife, could only be the ardent deſire ſhe was poſſeſſed with, of having the glorious ſeed promiſed to our firſt parents.

Ver. 7. And the angel of the Lord found her by a fountain of water, &c.] This is the firſt ſcriptural account of the appearance of an angel, by whom Maimonides will ſcarce allow us to underſtand more than a meſſenger (More Nevoch. p. ii. c. 42.) But ſome Chriſtians go ſo far into the other extream, as to underſtand hereby the eternal ΛΟΓΟΣ, or Son of God; but we think it more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that tho' the Schechinah, or Divine Majeſty, did not appear to her, yet one of the heavenly miniſters was ſent to ſtop her proceedings.

In the way to Shur.] She was flying into Egypt, her own country, upon which the wilderneſs of Shur border'd, and only reſted a while at this fountain, to refreſh herſelf.

Ver. 11. And the angel of the Lord ſaid unto her, Behold thou art with child, and ſhalt bear a ſon, and ſhalt call his name Iſhmael, becauſe the Lord hath heard thy affliction.] Iſhmael is compoſed of the words jiſhmah and el, the Lord hath heard, or will hear.

Ver. 12. And he will be a wild man, &c.] This prediction has been exactly verified in the ſeveral tribes of the Arabs, Iſhmael's deſcendants, who are generally cruel, warlike, and addicted to rapine; and whoſe habitation is in tents, within the neighbourhood of Judæa and Idumæa.

Ver. 13, 14. And ſhe called the name of the Lord that ſpake unto her, Thou God ſeeſt me: for ſhe ſaid, Have I alſo here looked after him that ſeeth me. Wherefore the well was called Beer-la-hai-roi.] The words Beer-la-hai-roi ſignify the well of him who lives and ſees me. The words are however thought very obſcure, as is the reaſon alledged by Hagar for calling the well by that name. They are both variouſly interpreted, but we chuſe to adhere to our Engliſh verſion, becauſe it ſeems the moſt lireral, and neareſt to the ſenſe of the original.

CHAP. XVII.

1 God reneweth the covenant. 5 Abram his name is changed in token of a greater bleſſing. 10 Circumciſion is inſtituted. 15 Sarai her name is changed, and ſhe bleſſed. 16 Iſaac is promiſed. 23 Abraham and Iſhmael are circumciſed.

AND when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the LORD appeared to Abram, and ſaid unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect.

2 And I will make my covenant between me, and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly.

3 And Abram fell on his face: and God talked with him, ſaying,

4 As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou ſhalt be a father of many nations.

5 Neither ſhall thy name any more be called Abram; but thy name ſhall be Abraham, for a father of many nations have I made thee.

6 And I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make nations of thee; and kings ſhall come out of thee.

7 And I will eſtabliſh my covenant between me and thee, and thy ſeed after thee, in their generations, for an everlaſting covenant; to be a God unto thee, and to thy ſeed after thee.

8 And I will give unto thee, and to thy ſeed after thee, the land wherein thou art a ſtranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlaſting poſſeſſion; and I will be their God.

9 ¶ And God ſaid unto Abraham, Thou ſhalt keep my covenant therefore, thou, and thy ſeed after thee, in their generations.

10 This is my covenant, which ye ſhall keep between me, and you, and thy ſeed after thee. Every man-child among you ſhall be circumciſed.

11 And ye ſhall circumciſe the fleſh of your fore-skin, and it ſhall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you.

12 And he that is eight days old ſhall be circumciſed among you, every man-child in your generations, he that is born in the houſe, or bought with money of any ſtranger, which is not of thy ſeed.

13 He that is born in thy houſe, and he that is bought with thy money, muſt needs be circumciſed: and my covenant ſhall be in your fleſh for an everlaſting covenant.

14 And the uncircumciſed man-child, whoſe fleſh of his fore-skin is not circumciſed, that ſoul ſhall be cut off from his people: he hath broken my covenant.

15 ¶ And God ſaid unto Abraham, As for Sarai thy wife, thou ſhalt not call her name Sarai, but Sarah ſhall her name be.

16 And I will bleſs her, and give thee a ſon alſo of her: yea, I will bleſs her, and ſhe ſhall be a mother of nations; kings of people ſhall be of her.

17 Then Abraham fell upon his face, and laughed, and ſaid in his heart, Shall a child be born unto him that is an hundred years old? and ſhall Sarah, that is ninety years old, bear?

18 And Abraham ſaid unto God, O that Iſhmael might live before thee!

19 And God ſaid, Sarah thy wife ſhall bear thee a ſon indeed; and thou ſhalt call his name Iſaac: and I will eſtabliſh my covenant with him for an everlaſting covenant, and with his ſeed after him.

20 And as for Iſhmael, I have heard thee: Behold, I have bleſſed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly: twelve princes ſhall he beget, and I will make him a great nation.

21 But my covenant will I eſtabliſh with Iſaac, whom Sarah ſhall bear unto thee at this ſet time in the next year.

22 And he left off talking with him, and God went up from Abraham.

23 ¶ And Abraham took Iſhmael his ſon, and all that were born in his houſe, and all that were bought with his money, every male among the men of Abraham's houſe; and circumciſed the fleſh of their fore-skin, in the ſelf ſame day, as God had ſaid unto him.

24 And Abraham was ninety years old and nine when he was circumciſed in the fleſh of his fore-skin.

25 And Iſhmael his ſon was thirteen years old when he was circumciſed in the fleſh of his fore-skin.

26 In the ſelf-ſame day was Abraham circumciſed, and Iſhmael his ſon.

27 And all the men of his houſe, born in the houſe, and bought with money of the ſtranger, were circumciſed with him.

Ver. 1. And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram, and ſaid unto him, I am the Almighty God, &c.] This is the firſt time that the Deity calls himſelf Almighty God, as El Shaddai is rightly render'd by our tranſlators. Others, indeed, have underſtood the words in a different ſenſe, by deriving the word Shaddai from Shad, which ſignifies the breaſt of a woman, to intimate God's tenderneſs to his creatures. Others form it from the verb Shaddad, which ſignifies to ſpoil, lay waſte, or overcome, and think that Shaddai expreſſes the irreſiſtibility of God's power, who, as they conceive, aſſumes that name in this text, becauſe he is preparing to invert the order of nature, and cauſe the aged and barren to become fruitful; but the moſt genuine etymology is from the Hebrew letter ſhin, uſed inſtead of the pronoun aſher, for qui, who, and dai, ſufficient, or ſelf-ſufficient, an expreſſion very proper to aſſure Abraham and Sarah of the certainty of his promiſe to them, which none but an omnipotent power could accompliſh.

Ver. 5. Neither ſhall thy name any more be called Abram, &c.] The name of Abraham was changed from Abram, which ſignifies high or exalted father, by inſerting only the letter h, becauſe he was to be made Ab hamon, the father of a multitude of nations. According to which etymology he ſhould rather have been called Abhamon, or Abham, (tho' we know ſome fancy the letter Reſh, which anſwers to our R, was inſerted from the word rab, many) but the name of this illuſtrious patriarch being too famous and well known in the eaſt, to admit any conſiderable change, Moſes was therefore obliged to retain it, and give the beſt etymology he could. We might offer a more plauſible one of the name of Abraham, from the Arabic, wherein Abu roham ſignifies the father of a multitude, did we not conſider, that it is one of thoſe caſual reſemblances that are not to be regarded.

Ver. 10. This is my covenant which ye ſhall keep between me, and you, and thy ſeed after thee. Every man-child among you ſhall be circumciſed.] Whether this ceremony of circumciſion was firſt introduced into the world, by the Hebrews or the Egyptians, has been much conteſted by ancient and modern hiſtorians, critics, and other writers. Herodotus, who declares he had received all his knowledge of the affairs of Egypt, from the prieſts of that country, gives it in favour of the Egyptians, but he likewiſe acknowledges, that he did not know which of the two nations had it firſt, the Egyptians or the Ethiopians, tho' he is inclinable to believe the former. As to the reſt of the ancients, who are on that ſide the queſtion, as they implicitly followed Herodotus, all their authority centers in him. However, it is certain, that neither the Egyptians, nor any other nation of which we have any knowledge, the Jewiſh excepted, did practiſe it univerſally. The prieſts were indeed obliged to be circumciſed, but the reſt of the people were left entirely to their liberty. Neither can it be render'd evident, that they practiſed it upon a religious account, account, like the Jews. Philo informs us, that thoſe nations uſed circumciſion, in order to avoid a diſtemper called a carbuncle, to which they who were not circumciſed were often ſubject; and likewiſe for the ſake of cleanlineſs, by cutting of whatſoever was apt to harbour any impurity; he adds too, that circumciſion promotes fertility. The Chriſtian writers do not abſolutely affirm that Abraham learnt it from the Egyptians, but that it is poſſible he might have ſeen it in their country, and be ſo much ſatisfied with it, that God, in compaſſion, to the infirmity of this patriarch, whoſe faith could not ſuſtain itſelf without ſome external and viſible ſymbol, might ſanctify this Egyptian ceremony, by retrenching all its ſuperfluous Circumſtances, and might give it to him and his poſte-rity as an evident token of the divine alliance with them.

Le Clerc, ſubjoins an argument which cauſes the ſcale to preponderate on the Egyptian ſide; for, ſays that author, Abraham's family, at their firſt arrival in Egypt, was ſo inconſiderable, and his poſterity were afterwards ſo much hated and contemned by the Egyptians, that it is by no means probable, that proud nation ſhould have received ſuch a ceremony from them. But might not this be the very motive that determined them in favour of it? Was it not natural for the Egyptians, who were no leſs ſuperſtitious than haughty, to infer, that ſince it procured ſuch extraordinary bleſſings to that deſpiſed people, it muſt infallibly prove more ſucceſsful to them, if once they admitted it amonſt them? Might not the time of Joſeph's miniſtry be a proper criſis to recommend it to them, and would not its being reputed a promoter of fertility, cleanlineſs, and health, be ſufficient to bring it into reputation, eſpecially among a nation where the men were govern'd by their wives, as the Egyptians, according to the teſtimony of authors, certainly were? At leaſt the notion of the Hebrews having received it from them, ſeems ſo contrary to the care and conduct of God, to preſerve them from the ſuperſtitions of other nations, that it meets with very few advocates. As for the reaſon of its being enjoined on the 8th day after the child's birth, the beſt we have met with is that of Cunœus, who declares that children were not thought ſufficiently clean or perfect during the firſt ſeven days. And this ſeems to be the reaſon of God's ordaining, that no beaſt that was offer'd to him ſhould be leſs than eight days old: Circumciſion therefore being a kind of ſolemn offering of a child to God, it ſeems highly reaſonable that the ſame law ſhould be obſerved in it as was enjoined concerning victims.

With reſpect to the reaſons for the inſtitution of circumciſion, we ſhall only mention one or two of thoſe that are thought to be moſt conſiderable. The firſt is topical; becauſe the heat of the climate required it. The ſecond was political, in order to diſtinguiſh thoſe who were in covenant with God, from their ennemies. Thirdly moral, in that it was the ſymbol and ſeal of the covenant made between God and Abraham, and his poſterity, and it was figurative of the faith that was to be in Chriſt. We may likewiſe reckon circumciſion among the trials of Abraham's faith, and it is eaſy to be obſerved, by many circumſtances in the life of that patriarch, that he was deſigned as a pattern to all the faithful. The more his faith was tried, the more illuſtrious it became; the more numerous the obſtacles were, which occurred in the accompliſhment of the promiſes made to him, the more he ſhew'd, in ſurmounting them, the great Ideas he had conceived of him, from whom they proceeded. Why did not God give him Iſaac, till ſuch time as the laws of nature ſeemed to extinguiſh for ever all his hopes of poſterity? It was to try his faith, it was to furniſh him with an opportunity of ſhewing how fully he was convinced, that God was the maſter of thoſe laws, and that it was as eaſy for him to interrupt their courſe, as to comply with it. Why did God command him to ſacrifice that very ſon, whoſe life might juſtly be conſidered as the centre of all thoſe promiſes he had received? It was even for the ſame reaſon, to prove his faith, and to furniſh him with an opportunity of teſtifying his conviction, that God held, in his omnipotent hand, the keys of death, and delivers, from its jaws, the prey it was waiting to devour. Why did God ſet ſo long an interval between the promiſe of a ſon, and the accompliſhment of that promiſe, inſomuch that Sarah thinking it impoſſible ſhe ſhould be the mother of him, gave him her maid Hagar? Why was Iſhmael born ſo many years before Iſaac, but to make new trials of his Abraham's faith? Why, then, might not God have the ſame views in enjoyning him to be circumciſed? God did not only defer, for the ſpace of twenty years, the birth of that ſon ſo ſolemnly promiſed, and ſo impatiently expected; but when that time was elapſed, and Abraham ſeem'd juſtly to hope his faith would then be crowned, God was pleaſed to croſs it anew, by requiring an act, from the patriarch, which ſeem'd the finiſhing obſtruction to all his hopes. The command of circumciſion did undoubtedly terrify thoſe who firſt received it; it was dangerous to adult perſons, in hot climates, but for an old man to receive the token of circumciſion, in ſo advanced an age, was, in all appearance, to be put out of the condition of ever ſeeing himſelf a father. The command of his having the covenant in the fleſh, ſeem'd as oppoſite to the promiſe of his having a ſon, as the injunction to ſacrifice that ſon was to the promiſe of his being the father of many nations. Notwithſtanding which, Abraham's faith glorioufly triumphed over this obſtacle alſo, being fully perſuaded, that God could not only renew the ſtrength of an old man, but alſo cauſe him to be prolific after he had ſuſtained an operation which ſeem'd ſo deſtructive to it: It is to extol this triumph that the Scripture obſerves, he was 99 years old, when he was circumciſed, and it was to preſerve the memory of it, that God enjoined the ceremony to all his poſterity.

All that needs to be added, under this article of circumciſion, is, that the Iſraelites did not afterwards underſtand the curſe pronounced againſt thoſe who had it not, ſo ſtrictly as to cut them off, or expel them, from their community, provided they kept the law of nature, worſhipped the only true God, and abſtained from blood; but if they ſubmitted to circumciſion, they were eſteemed Children of Abraham, and were bound to obſerve the law of Moſes. Theſe were called, by the Jews, proſelytes of righteouſneſs, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe of habitation, who were uncircumciſed, and only conformed to the precepts of Noah, and were therefore called Noachidæ. Theſe two ſorts of proſelytes became ſo numerous, that, in Solomon's time, there were an hundred and fifty thouſand and ſix hundred of them in his kingdom, 1 Chron. ii. 17.

Ver. 15. And God ſaid unto Abraham, as for Sarah thy wife, thou ſhalt not call her name Sarai, but Sarah ſhall her name be.] The Hebrew word Sarai had a reſtrained ſignification, and imported, my princeſs, but Sarah had a meaning much more indefinite, for it ſignifies princeſs, intimating the number of people that were to ſpring from her.

Ver 17. Then Abrakam fell upon his face and laughed, &c.] Not through any diſtruſt of the promiſe (for the Apoſtle tells us quite the contrary, Rom. iv. 19.) but out of the exceſs of joy that tranſported him.

Shall a child be born unto him that is an hundred years old?] As if he had ſaid, how agreeably aſtoniſhing is it that I and Sarah ſhould have a child in our old age! What a delightful promiſe is this! Accordingly the Chaldee tranſlated the word laughed, he rejoiced.

Ver. 18. And Abraham ſaid unto God, O that Iſhmael might live before thee!] Abraham might poſſibly have imagined that Iſhmael was the heir that had been promiſed him in the 15th chap. ſince God did not then acquaint him, that Sarah ſhould be the mother of that heir; the good Patriarch therefore, undoubtedly entertain'd tho the utmoſt fondneſs for his ſon Iſhmael, which made him naturally deſirous, that God would ſpare his life, tho' he ſhould even vouchſafe to bleſs him with another ſon by Sarah.

Ver. 19. And God ſaid, Sarah thy wife ſhall bear thee a ſon indeed; and thou ſhalt call his name Iſaac, &c.] Iſaac, or according to the Hebrew Iſchac, ſignifies he has laughed, or he ſhall laugh, and he had this appellation from Abraham's laugh of rapture, and not from Sarah's laugh of incredulity.

Ver. 20. And as for Iſhmael I have heard thee, behold I have bleſſed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly, &c.] Iſhmael, according to Mr. Bedford, is reputed to be the father of the Arabians, and particularly of the Saracens, and he adds that the Mohammedans are circumciſed, at the age of thirteen years, in conformity to the example of Iſhmael.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVIII.

1 Abraham entertaineth three angels. 9 Sarah is reproved for laughing at the ſtrange promiſe. 17 The deſtruction of Sodom is revealed to Abraham. 23 Abraham maketh interceſſion for the men thereof.

AND the LORD appeared unto him in the plains of Mamre: and he ſat in the tent-door in the heat of the day.

2 And he lift up his eyes and looked, and lo, three men ſtood by him: and when he ſaw them, he ran to meet them from the tent-door, and bowed himſelf toward the ground,

3 And ſaid, My Lord, if now I have found favour in thy ſight, paſs not away, I pray thee, from thy ſervant.

4 Let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and waſh your feet, and reſt your ſelves under the tree:

5 And I will fetch a morſel of bread, and comfort ye your hearts; after that you ſhall paſs on: for therefore are ye come to your ſervant. And they ſaid, So do as thou haſt ſaid.

6 And Abraham haſtned into the tent unto Sarah, and ſaid, Make ready quickly three meaſures of fine meal, knead it, and make cakes upon the hearth.

7 And Abraham ran unto the herd, and fetcht a calf tender and good, and gave it unto a young man; and he haſted to dreſs it.

8 And he took butter and milk, and the calf, which he had dreſſed, and ſet it before them; and he ſtood by them under the tree: and they did eat.

9 ¶ And they ſaid unto him, Where is Sarah thy wife? And he ſaid, Behold, in the tent.

10 And he ſaid, I will certainly return unto thee according to the time of life; and lo, Sarah thy wife ſhall have a ſon. And Sarah heard it in the tent-door, which was behind him.

11 Now Abraham and Sarah were old, and well ſtricken in age: and it ceaſed to be with Sarah after the manner of women.

12 Therefore Sarah laughed within her ſelf, ſaying, After I am waxed old, ſhall I have pleaſure, my lord being old alſo?

13 And the LORD ſaid unto Abraham, Wherefore did Sarah laugh, ſaying, Shall I of a ſurety bear a child, which am old?

14 Is any thing too hard for the LORD? At the time appointed will I return unto thee, according to the time of life, and Sarah ſhall have a ſon.

15 Then Sarah denied, ſaying, I laughed not: for ſhe was afraid. And he ſaid, Nay, but thou didſt laugh.

16 ¶ And the men aroſe up rom thence, and looked toward Sodom: and Abraham went with them to bring them on the way.

17 And the LORD ſaid, Shall I hide from Abraham that which I do;

18 Seeing that Abraham ſhall ſurely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth ſhall be bleſſed in him?

19 For I know him, that he will command his children and his houſhold after him, and they ſhall keep the way of the LORD, to do juſtice and judgment; that the LORD may bring upon Abraham that which he hath ſpoken of him.

20 And the LORD ſaid, Becauſe the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and becauſe their ſin is very grievous;

21 I will go down now, and ſee whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not, I will know.

22 And the men turned their faces from thence, and went toward Sodom: but Abraham ſtood yet before the LORD.

23 ¶ And Abraham drew near, and ſaid, Wilt thou alſo deſtroy the righteous with the wicked?

24 Peradventure there be fifty righteous within the city; wilt thou alſo deſtroy, and not ſpare the place for the fifty righteous that are therein?

25 That be far from thee to do after this manner, to ſlay the righteous with the wicked: and that the righteous ſhould be as the wicked, that be far from thee: Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?

26 And the LORD ſaid, If I find in Sodom fifty righteous within the city, then I will ſpare all the place for their ſakes.

27 And Abraham anſwered and ſaid, Behold now, I have taken upon me to ſpeak unto the LORD, which am but duſt and aſhes.

28 Peradventure there ſhall lack five of the fifty righteous: wilt thou deſtroy all the city for lack of five? And he ſaid, If I find there forty and five, I will not deſtroy it.

29 And he ſpake unto him yet again, and ſaid, Peradventure there ſhall be forty found there. And he ſaid, I will not do it for forties ſake.

30 And he ſaid unto him, Oh let not the LORD be angry, and I will ſpeak: Peradventure there ſhall thirty be found there.

And

And he ſaid, I will not do it, if I find thirty there.

31 And he ſaid, Behold now, I have taken upon me to ſpeak unto the LORD: Peradventure there ſhall twenty be found there. And he ſaid, I will not deſtroy it for twenties ſake.

32 And he ſaid, Oh let not the LORD be angry, and I will ſpeak yet but this once: Peradventure ten ſhall be found there. And he ſaid, I will not deſtroy it for tens ſake.

33 And the LORD went his way, aſſoon as he had left communing with Abraham: and Abraham returned unto his place.

Ver. 1. And the Lord appeared unto him in the plains of Mamre, and he ſat in the tent door in the heat of the day.] Abraham being in his tent, which he had pitched under the oaks of Mamre, (and not in the plains, as the Hebrew word is falſly tranſlated) three perſons preſented themſelves before him. Some Jews ſay, they were the three angels, Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael; but ſome of the fathers pretend, that they were the three perſons of the moſt holy Trinity: Which ſtrange conjecture occaſion'd the following ſaying, ſo famous among them; Abraham ſaw three, but he worſhipped only one. There is a maxim among the Jews, that no angel performs two miniſtries; or, in other words, is ſent on two meſſages. And that two angels are never ſent upon one embaſſy. And therefore they imagine theſe three angels were diſpatch'd for as many different purpoſes; one of which, and, indeed, the principal, was to bring a confirmation of the birth of Iſaac; another to convey Lot out of Sodom; and the third to overthrow the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. And therefore when one of theſe angels had delivered his meſſage to Abraham, there were but two who went to Sodom. But ſome Chriſtians, of great authority, have made a queſtion whether they were all created angels, one of them, at leaſt, ſeeming to be the Lord of all; and St. Hilary, in particular, is of opinion, that the ſon of God appeared with two angels attending him. And many believe this is evident from ver. 22. and 25. of this chapter. Upon the whole, it is moſt probable, that it was Chriſt himſelf who appeared to Abraham, and that he was attended by two angels.

Ver. 3. And ſaid, My Lord, if now I have found favour in thy ſight, paſs not away, I pray thee, from thy ſervant.] It ſhould ſeem, by this paſſage, that there was ſome viſible ſuperiority in the perſon to whom Abraham addreſſed his invitation. This, and the two next verſes, are an amiable picture of the ancient hoſpitality; and the repaſt which Abraham order'd to be prepar'd for his illuſtrious gueſts, is ſuitable to the innocent and ſalutary plainneſs of the primitive ages. This manner of living paſs'd down to the wiſeſt nations, and was long retain'd among them.

Ver. 9. And they ſaid unto him, where is Sarah thy wife?] One of them, ſpeaking for the reſt, asked him that queſtion, not that he was ignorant where ſhe was, but in order to introduce the ſucceeding diſcourſe.

Ver. 10. And he ſaid, I will certainly return unto thee, according to the time of life; and lo, Sarah thy wife ſhall have a ſon.] The meaning of this paſſage is not that he would really return, at leaſt we don't find, by the ſacred hiſtory, that he did; but it implies that he would accompliſh, by his infinite power, what he had promiſed; and that it ſhould be according to the time of life; that is, nine months from that time, which is the uſual period for perfecting the life of a child in the womb.

Ver. 11. It ceaſed to be with Sarah after the manner of women.] She was no longer capable of conception, according to the ordinary courſe of nature, without the divine interpoſition.

Ver. 12. Therefore Sarah laughed within her ſelf, &c.] She laugh'd, not for the Joy which that prediction ought to have created within her, and as Abraham did on the like occaſion; but becauſe of the ſeeming ſingularity of the diſcourſe ſhe over-heard.

Ver. 13. And the Lord ſaid unto Abraham, Wherefore did Sarah laugh? &c.] The ſon of God, whom we believe to be adumbrated by that expreſſion of ſuperiority, the Lord, not only ſaw the air of her countenance, but even the moſt ſecret thoughts of her heart, and he reproaches her for her indecent laughter, which intimated her incredulity, and he made her ſenſible of her crime, in doubting the veracity of a promiſe made by God himſelf to Abraham, and now repeated by his ſon. We think from hence, that it is evident, to a demonſtration, that Abraham did not laugh from the ſame motive that influenc'd Sarah; for if he had, it may naturally be ſuppos'd, he would have been reprehended for that conduct, as it would certainly have been more criminal in him than it was in Sarah, who was then unacquainted with the dignity of the perſon who ſpoke to her husband; whereas he was ſenſible that the promiſe of a ſon was made to him by the Deity himſelf.

Ver. 16. And the men roſe up from thence, &c.] Theſe celeſtial perſons are call'd men, becauſe they aſſum'd a human appearance.

Ver. 17. And the Lord ſaid, ſhall I hide from Abraham, that thing which I do?] How infinitely gracious and condeſcending is this language! and what an amiable repreſentation is it of the benevolent diſpoſition of that infinite being, who is ſlow to anger, and abundant in goodneſs and truth!

Ver. 21. And the Lord ſaid, becauſe the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and becauſe their ſin is very grievous; ver. 21. I will go down now, and ſee whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, &c.] We are not to infer from theſe words, that the auguſt perſon who ſpoke, was unacquainted with the real conduct of the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah; and they intimate nothing more, than that the Deity is never precipitate in the ſeverity he executes upon impertinent offenders. What a leſſon of moderation is this to man!

Ver. 23. And Abraham drew near, and ſaid, Wilt thou alſo deſtroy the righteous with the wicked?] It was not the fault of the good patriarch, that after having ſaved theſe cities from their enemies, by his fortitude, he did not again preſerve them by his charity and zeal; he diſcovered his humanity on this occaſion, and generouſly interceded for a people whoſe aggravated crimes had rendered them unworthy of his mediation. He had the charity to ſuppoſe there were ſo many righteous perſons among them as might influence the Divine Being, with whom he then expoſtulated, to pardon the guilty for their ſakes.

Ver. 24. Peradventure there be fifty righteous within the city, &c.] Abraham had ſo much candour as to believe there could not be leſs than that number of pious perſons in the city; and he was encouraged, by that ſuppoſition, to become an interceſſor for the reſt.

Ver. 26. And the Lord ſaid, If I find in Sodom, fifty righteous within the city, then I will ſpare all the reſt for their ſakes.] If the generous humanity of Abraham is ſo conſpicuous on this occaſion, how divinely does the mercy of the great judge ſhine forth in this moving conference! Thoſe who cannot diſcover the moſt endearing inſtances of compaſſion, in this amiable paſſage, muſt be inſenſible of ſome of the fineſt impreſſions that can poſſibly affect the heart of man.

Ver. 27. And Abraham anſwered and ſaid, Behold now I have taken upon me to ſpeak unto the Lord, which am but duſt and aſhes.] The tender complacency with which the firſt requeſt of this great patriarch was granted, wrought ſuitable impreſſions in his ſoul; and as he was conſcious of the infinite diſparity there was between himſelf, and the awful being in whoſe preſence he then ſtood; he renews his mediation in thoſe ſtrains of humility as ought to be inſeparable from prayer: And it appears, by the event, that the fervent prayer of a righteous perſon availeth much. The Lord, at laſt, declares that he would not deſtroy the city if there were only ten righteous perſons in it; upon which, Abraham durſt not intercede any longer for ſo abandon'd a people. Good men are the beſt ramparts around any place, and ten perſons of that character would have ſaved Sodom it ſelf: This is a demonſtration that a city is exalted by the bleſſing of the upright. But the inhabitants of Sodom were ſome of thoſe impious wretches who overturn ſtates, either by the nature of their own crimes, or by thoſe avenging puniſhments which they never fail to draw down from heaven.

CHAP. XIX.

1 Lot entertaineth two angels. 4 The vicious Sodomites are ſtricken with blindneſs. 12 Lot is ſent for ſafety into the mountains: 18 He obtaineth leave to go unto Zoar. 14 Sodom and Gomorrah are deſtroyed. 26 Lots wife is a pillar of ſalt. 30 Lot dwelleth in a cave. 31 The inceſtuous original of Moab and Ammon.

AND there came two angels to Sodom at even; and Lot ſat in the gate of Sodom: and Lot ſeeing them, roſe up to meet them; and he bowed himſelf with his face toward the ground;

2 And he ſaid, Behold now, my lords, turn in, I pray you, into your ſervants houſe, and tarry all night, and waſh your feet, and ye ſhall riſe up early, and go on your ways. And they ſaid, Nay, but we will abide in the ſtreet all night.

3 And he preſſed upon them greatly; and they turned in unto him, and entred into his houſe: and he made them a feaſt, and did bake unleavened bread, and they did eat.

4 ¶ But before they lay down, the men of the city, even the men of Sodom, compaſſed the houſe round, both old and young, all the people from every quarter.

5 And they called unto Lot, and ſaid unto him, Where are the men which came in to thee this night? bring them out unto us, that we may know them.

6 And Lot went out at the door unto them, and ſhut the door after him,

7 And ſaid, I pray you, brethren, do not ſo wickedly.

8 Behold now, I have two daughters which have not known man; let me, I pray you, bring them out unto you, and do ye to them as is good in your eyes: only unto theſe men do nothing; for therefore came they under the ſhadow of my roof.

9 And they ſaid, Stand back. And they ſaid again, This one fellow came in to ſojourn, and he will needs be a judge: Now will we deal worſe with thee, than with them. And they preſſed ſore upon the man, even Lot, and came near to break the door.

10 But the men put forth their hand, and pulled Lot into the houſe to them, and ſhut to the door.

11 And they ſmote the men that were at the door of the houſe with blindneſs, both ſmall and great: ſo that they wearied themſelves to find the door.

12 ¶ And the men ſaid unto Lot, Haſt thou here any beſides? ſon-in-law, and thy ſons, and thy daughters, and whatſoever thou haſt in the city, bring them out of this place.

13 For we will deſtroy this place: becauſe the cry of them is waxen great before the face of the LORD, and the LORD hath ſent us to deſtroy it.

14 And Lot went out, and ſpake unto his ſons-in-law, which married his daughters, and ſaid, Up, get ye out of this place; for the LORD will deſtroy this city: but he ſeemed as one that mocked unto his ſons-in-law.

15 ¶ And when the morning aroſe, then the angels haſtned Lot, ſaying, Ariſe, take thy wife, and thy two daughters which are here; leſt thou be conſumed in the iniquity of the city.

16 And while he lingred, the men laid hold upon his hand, and upon the hand of his wife, and upon the hand of his two daughters; the LORD being merciful unto him: and they brought him forth, and ſet him without the city.

17 And it came to paſs, when they had brought them forth abroad, that he ſaid, Eſcape for thy life; look not behind thee, neither ſtay thou in all the plain: eſcape to the mountain, leſt thou be conſumed.

18 And Lot ſaid unto them, Oh not ſo, my Lord.

19 Behold now, thy ſervant hath found grace in thy ſight, and thou haſt magnified thy mercy, which thou haſt ſhewed unto me in ſaving my life: and I cannot eſcape to the mountain, leſt ſome evil take me, and I die.

20 Behold now, this city is near to flee unto, and it is a little one: Oh let me eſcape thither, (is it not a little one?) and my ſoul ſhall live.

21 And he ſaid unto him, See, I have accepted thee concerning this thing alſo, that I will not overthrow this city, for the which thou haſt ſpoken.

22 Haſte thee, eſcape thither; for I cannot do any thing till thou be come thither: therefore the name of the city was called Zoar.

23 ¶ The ſun was riſen upon the earth when Lot entred into Zoar.

24 Then the LORD rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimſtone and fire from the LORD out of heaven.

25 And he overthrew thoſe cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground.

26 ¶ But his wife looked back from behind him, and ſhe became a pillar of ſalt.

27 ¶ And Abraham gat up early in the morning morning to the place where he ſtood before the LORD.

An Angel leads Lot out of Sodom, & destroys y^e City.

28 And he looked toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and toward all the land of the plain, and beheld, and lo, the ſmoak of the country went up as the ſmoak of a furnace.

29 ¶ And it came to paſs, when God deſtroyed the cities of the plain, that God remembred Abraham, and ſent Lot out of the midſt of the overthrow, when he overthrew the cities in the which Lot dwelt.

30 ¶ And Lot went up out of Zoar, and dwelt in the mountain, and his two daughters with him; for he feared to dwell in Zoar: and he dwelt in a cave, he and his two daughters.

31 ¶ And the firſt-born ſaid unto the younger, Our father is old, and there is not a man in the earth to come in unto us after the manner of all the earth.

32 Come, let us make our father drink wine, and we will lie with him, that we may preſerve ſeed of our father.

33 And they made their father drink wine that night: and the firſt-born went in, and lay with her father; and he perceived not when ſhe lay down, nor when ſhe aroſe.

34 And it came to paſs on the morrow, that the firſt-born ſaid unto the younger, Behold, I lay yeſternight with my father: let us make him drink wine this night alſo; and go thou in, and lie with him, that we may preſerve ſeed of our father.

35 And they made their father drink wine that night alſo: and the younger aroſe, and lay with him; and he perceived not when ſhe lay down, nor when ſhe aroſe.

36 Thus were both the daughters of Lot with child by their father.

37 And the firſt-born bare a ſon, and called his name Moab: the ſame is the father of the Moabites unto this day.

38 And the younger, ſhe alſo bare a ſon, and called his name Ben-ammi: the ſame is the father of the children of Ammon unto this day.

Ver. 1. And there came two angels to Sodom at even, &c.] The deſtruction of the cities of the plain was render'd inevitable by the impenitent conduct of the inhabitants. But God heard the prayer of Abraham, who had implored him not to involve the righteous in the perdition of the wicked. The two angels, who had attended the Son of God, went to Sodom, and preſented themſelves before Lot, whom they found ſitting at the gate of that city.

Some doctors have thought, that Lot was the chief of the three magiſtrates, who, they ſay, governed Sodom at that time. And it is certain, that ſuch officers uſed, in early ages, to render juſtice at the gates of the cities. But it ſeems more probable to ſuppoſe, that Lot waited there for ſtrangers, to ſave them from the diſſolute paſſions of the men of Sodom, who not only denied them the rights of hoſpitality, but likewiſe made it their practice to offer violence to their perſons. When theſe angels appeared to Lot, they aſſumed the ſame form in which they had viſited Abraham, and the nephew fell into the ſame miſtake with his uncle. Like him, he took them for ſtrangers, and received them with equal civility. He invited them to be his gueſts that night, and found his reward in the performance of that pious action, having, according to the expreſſion of the Apoſtle, entertained angels unawares.

Ver. 2. And they ſaid, Nay, but we will abide in the ſtreets all night.] They, at firſt, declined the offer Lot made them of his houſe, and when they told him they would paſs the night in the ſtreets, there was nothing ſurpriſing in that anſwer, for it was cuſtomary, in thoſe hot climates, to lie in the open air; nor was there any contradiction, in what they ſaid, to the laws of truth, for it may reaſonably be preſumed, that thoſe angelic perſons would not have enter'd Lot's houſe, if their refuſal had not cauſed him to renew his importunity.

Ver. 4. But before they lay down, the men of the city, even the men of Sodom, compaſſed the houſe round, &c.] The bodies aſſumed by theſe heavenly ſpirits were, in all probability, graced with a ſingular beauty, the brightneſs of which ſtruck the eyes of the inhabitants of Sodom, and excited their criminal paſſion. Theſe abominable men immediately ſurrounded Lot's houſe, and were not aſhamed to acquaint him with the impurity of their intentions. Iſaiah alludes to their deteſtable conduct, when he affirms of the Jews of his age, that they declare their ſin as Sodom, they hide it not.

Ver. 6. And Lot went out at the door unto them, and ſhut the door after him.] His firſt thoughts, in this preſſing conjuncture, were thoſe of the laws of hoſpitality, and he imagined he might lawfully have recourſe to any expedient to ſave his gueſts, who had ſhelter'd themſelves under his roof; but if it were laudable in him, to undertake the protection of ſtrangers, he could by no means be excuſed for the method by which he intended to accompliſh that deſign; and he ought not to have offered his daughters, to gratify the deſires of thoſe execrable creatures, notwithſtanding any thing which the zeal of St. Ambroſe, and St. Chryſoſtom, has ſuggeſted in his vindication. The firſt of theſe fathers extols the conduct of Lot, in ſacrificing the chaſtity of his daughters, for the prevention of a greater ſin; and the other applauds the virtue of this holy man, for not ſparing his own daughters, in order to ſave the ſtrangers he had received into his houſe. But if Lot really intended ſuch a ſacrifice, he ſtretch'd, to an extreme degree, the notions of paternal power, and the rites of hoſpitality; and perhaps the language he uſed, to his abandon'd fellow-citizens, was rather the firſt ſally, of an inconſiderate zeal for the preſervation of his gueſts, than any deliberate intention to proſtitute the honour of his daughters, which ought to have been ſo dear to him. But whatever Lot's purpoſe might be, we ſhould always pity the condition of a man, whom the view of ſome preſent and dreadful danger renders incapable of ſedate reflections.

Ver. 10,11. But the men put forth their hand, and pulled Lot into the houſe to them, and ſhut to the door. And they ſmote the men that were at the door of the houſe with blindneſs, &c.] That which the falſe prudence of Lot was unable to effect, was accompliſhed by an immediate ſtroke of that avenging power, with which God had armed thoſe angels. They ſmote the Sodomites with blindneſs, but whether it was a perpetual deprivation of ſight, or only a temporal ſuſpenſion of it, has been the ſubject of different opinions. It ſeems probable, that thoſe men were ſtruck, not with actual blindneſs, but with a dizzineſs, which diſturbed their ſight, and repreſented objects falſely and in confuſion; as were the Syrians who were ſent to ſieze Eliſha, 2 Kings vi. 18, 19, 20. and this is the ſenſe of the Septuagint. The author of the book of Wiſdom ſuppoſes ſome change in the air, and declares, that they were compaſſed about with horrible great darkneſs; which he compares to that with which Moſes plagued the Egyptians: He adds, that they could not even find their way home, but every one ſought the paſſage of his own door, Wiſd. xix. 17.

Such

Such were the inhabitants of Sodom, and there are few hiſtories more reproachful to mankind, than this which is now related from Moſes. 'Tis amazing that men, who had any light of reaſon, could be capable of committing ſuch infamous ſins. But how comes it to paſs, that there have been found, in the ages of the Goſpel, and among Chriſtian communities, ſuch wretches, as have not only perpetrated the like abominations, but who have even devoted their pens to the vindication of their conduct, and with a view to infect others with a pernicious inclination to indulge themſelves in the like crime!

Ver. 13. —— We will deſtroy this place: becauſe the cry of them is waxen great before the face of the Lord, and the Lord hath ſent us to deſtroy it.] The two angels revealed themſelves to Lot at laſt, and acquainted him with the formidable commiſſion they had received from heaven, adviſing him, at the ſame time, if he had any relations and friends, for whoſe ſafety he was anxious, that he would immediately inform them of their danger, and warn them to depart in time.

Ver. 14. And Lot went out, and ſpake unto his ſons-in-law, which married his daughters, and ſaid, Up, get ye out of this place; for the Lord will deſtroy this city: but he ſeemed as one that mocked unto his ſons-in-law.] This circumſtance is the only one which Moſes mentions of Lot's admoniſhing his fellow-citizens; tho' it is highly probable, this juſt perſon omitted no opportunity of attempting their reformation; for it is ſaid, that in ſeeing and hearing, he vexed his righteous ſoul, from day to day, with their unlawful deeds. Which words give ſome countenance to the traditions adopted afterwards by Mohammed, of Lot's being ſent to preach to the inhabitants of Sodom. Koran. c. vii. ver. 81. c xxvi. ver. 159. c. xxvii. ver. 55. c. xxix. ver. 28, &c.

Ver. 15. And when the morning aroſe, then the angels haſtned Lot, ſaying, Ariſe, take thy wife, and thy two daughters which are here, &c.] Theſe laſt words, which are here, are not without emphaſis, and they are paraphraſed thus, by the Chaldee interpreter, which are found faithful with thee, are not corrupted by the common impieties of the place, or, who believe the truth of what we threaten.

Ver. 20. Behold now this city is near to flee unto, and it is a little one, &c.] Lot's requeſt was granted, and the city which he deſired might be his Aſylum, and which was then called Belah, has ſince been diſtinguiſhed by the name of Zoar, which ſignifies a little one; becauſe Lot had made its ſmalleſs an Argument for its Preſervation. The Septuagint and the Vulgate after them, tranſlate it Segor. Some jewiſh doctors have called it Saliſſe, by a ſingular miſtake: for Iſaiah had ſaid, that the Fugitives of Moab fled to Zoar, as a Heifer of three years old; and the Hebrew word Saliſſé, ſignifying three years, they thought that Saliſſe was the name of the city of Zoar. St. Jerom has likewiſe fallen into the ſame miſtake. Tom. 3. Queſt. Hæbr. p. 208. and 211.

Ver. 24. Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah, brimſtone and fire from the Lord out of Heaven.] The jewiſh interpreters are very much divided, as well as the Chriſtians, upon the meaning of this expreſſion, the Lord rained from the Lord. The Rabbins, Aben Ezra, and Solomon, repreſents it as an elegancy in the ſacred language to uſe the noun ſometimes inſtead of the pronoun, and among other paſſages of ſcripture cited by them on this occaſion, they alledge one out of the 82d Pſalm v. 1. God ſtands in the Congregation of the mighty, which, according to them, ſignifies his own Congregation. But there is another text which comes nearer to the Point. Exod. xxiv. v. 3. And he (i. e. the Lord) ſaid unto Moſes, come up unto the Lord. It is the opinion therefore of theſe Rabbins, that theſe words, the Lord rained from the Lord, ſignifies no more than, that he rained from himſelf. The council of Sirmium, indeed, anathematizes thoſe who thus interpret theſe words, and who do not ſay the Son, rained from the Father. Socrat. l. ii. c. 30. And yet St. Chryſoſtome did not fear to affirm that this is an idiom of the ſcripture language, which intended only to ſhew ὅτι Κύριος τὴν τιμωρίαν ἐπήγαγε, that the Lord brought this puniſhment upon them, which, we confeſs, ſeems to us to be the genuine meaning of this paſſage.

Brimſtone and fire ſignifies brimſtone inflamed, and, in the Hebrew ſtile, inflamed brimſtone ſignifies Lightning. This Lightning penetrated ſo far into the veins of Bitumen, with which the plain of Sodom was impregnated, that the combuſtable matter being kindled by the fire from Heaven, ſoon communicated its heat and flame to all the country, and by conſuming all that was capable of ſuch a deſtruction, formed the lake Aſphaltites, which was afterwards called the dead ſea, from the large expaſion and ſtillneſs of its Waters; for, as Juſtin obſerves, it cannot be moved by the Winds, by reaſon of the large quantity of Bitumen immerſed in it, and which renders it incapable of being navigated.

Prophane hiſtory has tranſmitted to us ſeveral monuments of the ſubverſion of theſe Cities of the plain. We are informed by Tacitus, (Hiſt. l. 5. p. 427.) that the traces of the fire which conſumed them, were viſible even in his Days. Philo agrees with the Roman Hiſtorian in this particular (Philo de vita Moſis, p. 662.) Diodorus Siculus, (l. 19. p. 731.) Pliny, (Hiſt. l. v. 16. p. 71.) Strabo, (l. 16. p. 763.) among the ancients; Biſſelius, among the moderns in his Treatiſe upon illuſtrious ruins, and a great number of Travellers, have deſcribed this memorable Lake. The author of the Book of Wiſdom, (c. 10. v. 6. 7.) affirms, that of the wickedneſs of the five cities, even the waſt that ſmoketh is a teſtimony, and plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeneſs; and a ſtanding pillar of ſalt, is a monument of an unbelieving ſoul. The duration of theſe diſmal monuments, perhaps, inclined St. Jude to call the fire which conſumed Sodom, an eternal fire; that is to ſay, a fire of which the marks were to be perpetuated to the end of ages.

Ver. 26. But his wife looked back from behind him, and ſhe became a pillar of ſalt.] It is not agreed by commentators, what was the crime for which this unfortunate woman was ſo ſeverely puniſhed. Some are of opinion ſhe deſerved it, meerly for diſobeying the command of the angel, and expreſſing too much concern for a people who deſerved no compaſſion. But as ſhe was probably a native of Sodom, and had ſeveral friends and near relations who were dear to her in that city, common humanity would incline her to lament their fatal condition; and we cannot think that any impreſſions of this nature, and which may be conſidered as the indications of a kind and gentle diſpoſition, could irritate the God of tender mercies, to ſuch a degree, as to condemn her to ſo ſtrange a transformation, and to fix her, as a monument of wrath, on that fatal plain. And as to her diſobeying the angel; if ſhe linger'd behind to behold the ſad cataſtrophe of her native city, after ſhe had been ordered to quit that place with the greateſt expedition, ſhe might indeed be blaſted with the lightning that ſhot from heaven, or elſe be ſuffocated with the peſtilential vapours that ſprung from the flaming ſoil; but why ſhe ſhould be ſuddenly transformed into a pillar of ſalt, rather than into ſtone, or any other ſubſtance, ſeems very difficult to be comprehended. Others ſay, that being anxious for her daughters, who were married there, and turning about to ſee whether they followed her, ſhe ſaw the divine Shechina, or the majeſtic appearance of God, deſcending to deſtroy the place, and that this was the occaſion of her Metamorphoſis. This dream may perhaps be agreeable to a rabbinical head, and we therefore leave it to lull thoſe who are delighted with ſtupidity. Mohammed was no friend to the memory of this unhappy wife of Lot, for he has repreſented her as rebellious to her husband; and the expoſitors of the Koran were reſolved to exceed their maſter in defamation, for they tell us ſhe was in confederacy with the Sodomites, giving them to underſtand that her husband was diſtracted, and informing them when any ſtrangers come to lodge with him, by a ſignal of ſmoke in the day time, and of fire by night, or, according to others, by knocking at the wall, and crying, give me ſome ſalt.

Others who are more candid in their conſtructions of this affair, think the ſacred hiſtorian has not repreſented the fate ſhe met with, as a puniſhment for any crime ſhe had committed, but ſuppoſe it meerly accidental, as will be obſerved immediately.

The manner of her transformation, or death, has alſo been the ſubject of various conjectures. A commentator whoſe manuſcript works are in the French king's library and in that of the fathers of the oratory at Paris, lays down a general Maxim which he applies to this paſſage, namely, that in the tranſlation of ſeveral parts of the ſacred writings, writings, the word as, or like ought to be ſupplied. Thus it is ſaid Gen. xvi. 12. That Iſhmael will be a wild man, but it is plain, according to this author, that it ſhould be there rendered, he will be like a wild man. Accordingly, it ſhould have been tranſlated that the wife of Lot became as, or like a pillar of ſalt. He thinks her body, being dried and hardened by the heat of the inflamed air, remain'd fix'd and immoveable upon the place, like a ſtatue, or pile of ſalt. See Rich. Simon, under the name of Sainjore, Bibl. Crit. T. 4. Let. 53. p. 417.

Monſieur Le Clerc departs much farther from the notion which the text of Moſes ſeems to offer at the firſt view; and declares, that the ſenſe of the hiſtorian is ſufficiently anſwer'd, by a ſuppoſition that Lot's wife died of grief, when ſhe caſt her eyes upon the plains of Sodom. Herman Witſius has oppos'd the opinion of this learned man, and we believe the reader will not be diſpleas'd with the ſubſtance of their diſpute, in the following compendium.

The firſt of theſe authors declares, it is much better to ſtrain the words of Moſes (which, however, continues he, we are not oblig'd to do in this place) than make him relate an abſurd ſtory. His antagoniſt exclaims againſt this propoſition, and ſays, it tends to make us ſhake off the yoke of faith, to place reaſon upon the throne; to give it the authority of deciding what is abſurd, and what is not, in the ſacred writings, and to diminiſh the number of thoſe miracles God has wrought in favour of religion, under pretence of allowing none, without an apparent neceſſity. But what neceſſity there was for transforming the wife of Lot into a pillar of ſalt, by an immediate miracle, or what part of religion is favour'd by ſuch a transformation, we muſt confeſs ourſelves incapable of diſcovering.

Monſieur Le Clerc aſſerts, that the word ſalt often implies perpetuity of time; and adds, that, in this ſenſe, an everlaſting covenant is called a covenant of ſalt, Num. xviii. 19. intimating, that as ſalt has a tendency to preſerve bodies from corruption, ſo that covenant ſhould always be render'd inviolable by the fidelity of the contracting parties. We are, therefore, to underſtand, according to this author, that when it is ſaid of Lot's wife, ſhe became a pillar of ſalt, no more is meant than that ſhe always continued in that ſtate of immobility, to which ſhe was then reduc'd. His adverſary replies, that tho' this criticiſm ſhould even be admitted, yet the whole phraſe, She became a pillar of ſalt, can never be brought to ſignify that ſhe was taken out of the world by a ſudden and unexpected death.

The former of theſe authors affirms, that it is uſual for the ſacred ſtile, as well as the prophane, to repreſent, in a metaphorical manner, perſons who were become immoveable, under the notion of a ſtone, or ſtatue; that, accordingly, it is ſaid, in the firſt book of Samuel, chap. xxv. ver. 37. that when the wine was gone out of Nabal, his heart died within him, and he became as a ſtone. In like manner, the fable relates, that Niobe, after her children were murder'd, was transform'd into a ſtone; which, according to Cicero, means no more than the ſtupifying ſilence into which her dejection had thrown her. But his oppoſer replies, that all theſe expreſſions are within the rules of a figurative ſtile; that no one who ever read them, could underſtand them literally: Whereas there is nothing like this in the words of Moſes, nothing that determines the reader to a metaphorical meaning, or that can induce him to admit of any other than a proper and literal ſignification.

This is the ſubſtance of the diſpute between Le Clerc and Witſius. But, without undertaking to pronounce upon the differences between thoſe two great men, we ſhall only obſerve, that if the opinions which the latter oppoſes are really miſtaken notions, as he pretends, yet they are ſuch as ſhew the penetrating genius, and profound learning, of him who conceiv'd them, and which every man is not capable of refuting with ſolidity.

Joſephus, indeed, expreſly declares, that he ſaw this pillar of ſalt. But he likewiſe declares, as poſitively, that Titus ſaw the ſabbatical river, in Syria. The paſſage, as we tranſlate it from the Greek, is as follows: It preſents a copious ſtream to the view, when it flows, and is not deſtitute of rapidity in its progreſs. Its waters are afterwards exhauſted from its fountain, and a dry channel is viſible for the ſpace of ſix days. After which, it flows anew on the ſeventh day, as if it had never ſuſtain'd any change; and it is certain that the river was always ſubject to theſe viciſſitudes. If Joſephus ſaw the ſtatue of ſalt with no more reality than Titus beheld the ſabbatical river, we believe there are not many who will be inclin'd to credit his evidence in that particular.

Some late commentators think there was no miraculous metamorphoſis in the caſe; but that ſhe either turned back, out of curioſity, to ſee the conflagration, and ſo periſhed, either in the dreadful ſhower, or by ſome poiſonous vapour; or elſe, that the horror of the ſight, when ſhe looked back, and beheld the terrifying deſtruction of a place ſhe had juſt quitted, ſtruck her ſtiff, and motionleſs, like a ſtatue; and that ſhe died of the fright.

Upon the whole, we are inclined to think, with the learned biſhop Patrick, that this unhappy woman, ſtanding ſtill too long, ſome of that dreadful ſhower overtook her, and wrapt her body in a ſheet of nitro-ſulphureous matter, which congeal'd into a cruſt around her, as hard as ſtone, and made her appear like a pillar of ſalt; her body being, as it were, candied in it.

As to ſome travellers who pretend they have ſeen this ſtatue; we are of opinion, tha they, as well as Joſephus, might be deceiv'd by ſome ar al people of that country, who were deſirous of profiting by their credulity; becauſe the more intelligent and credible travellers declare they never could ſee it.

Ver. 30. And Lot went up out of Zoar, &c.] It appears from hence, that this good man was very timorous, and had not ſo ſtrong a faith as his uncle Abraham. For he who had lately obtain'd a pardon for this place, becauſe he was apprehenſive that he ſhould not have time enough to get to the mountain; now forſakes it, probably for fear a new ſhower ſhould deſcend from heaven, and deſtroy it, becauſe the inhabitants continued unreform'd. If his fear to dwell in Zoar, proceeded from this cauſe, it was the more reaſonable, becauſe he might think, tho' God had ſpar'd them for the preſent, yet, they taking no warning from the calamity of their neighbours, would ſhortly periſh, like them. Accordingly, Theodoret, and others, think this city was afterwards deſtroy'd; of which, however, there is no certain record.

Ver. 32. Come, let us make our father drink wine, and we will lie with him, that we may preſerve ſeed of our father.] It cannot be denied that Lot, having follow'd Terah and Abraham, when God call'd the latter out of Chaldea, might thence ſuppoſe, that this heavenly vocation did ſeparate and diſtinguiſh him from the reſt of the poſterity of Shem, and gave him a right, as well Abraham, to claim the privilege of fulfilling the promiſe of the Meſſiah, or, at leaſt, to ſee it accompliſh'd in his poſterity. This we may infer, from the inceſt of his daughters, recorded in this chapter; and which, in any other view, preſents us with a monſtrous aſpect: But we conceive it to be a clear proof that they were ſtrongly poſſeſs'd with this hope, which their father had rais'd in them.

We are ſenſible ſome interpreters ſuppoſe, that they were induced to commit this inceſt, from a pious intention to preſerve mankind, as imagining, that as the deluge had drown'd every mortal, beſides Noah and his family, ſo the flames which deſtroy'd Sodom, had conſum'd all human race but their father and themſelves. But, indeed, it may be conſider'd as proceeding from a very different motive, the Jewiſh doctors plainly averring, that this was done by them, in hopes of bringing forth the promiſed redeemer.

And if we look upon this action of theirs, in this view, with reference to the promiſe of the Meſſiah, which was the grand object of the hopes of all thoſe who fear'd God; it is natural to conceive, that, conſidering their father, as one whom God had peculiarly choſen from amongſt the poſterity of Shem, to execute the promiſe of the Meſſiah; and ſeeing they had loſt their mother by an untimely death, they conceived themſelves, in ſome ſort, privileged to ſurprize their father, in the manner they did, and the rather, becauſe they were ſenſible, on the one hand, that none of the Canaanites, having any part in this capital bleſſing, could ever marry them, after God had ſo manifeſtly ſeparated, and called forth their father from amongſt them: And, on the other hand, ſuppoſing that God would not be offended at the irregularity of this action, in conſideration of the extremity to which they were then reduced.

There are three circumſtances which greatly confirm this remark, on the motive to their inceſtuous proceeding.

1. Thoy are repreſented to us as thoſe who had behaved themſelves very chaſtly amidſt the impurities of Sodom, and we likewiſe find they had no ſuch intentions as they now diſcover'd, till after the death of their mother.

2. We ſee them contriving the ſcheme together, and that in a matter which is naturally apt to ſeparate the neareſt friends, when the motive proceeds from a ſpirit of uncleanneſs: Nor indeed do we find that they repeated this inceſt.

3. They were ſo far from being aſhamed of an action, in itſelf ſo criminal, or concealing it from poſterity, that they gave ſuch names to the children born of this their inceſt, as might perpetuate and divulge the memory of their conduct; the one calling her ſon Moab, which ſignifies born of my father; and the other Ben-ammi, which ſignifies the ſon of my people, 'tis true this laſt appellation is not ſo plain an acknowledgement as the other, that this ſon was begotten by her father, but it intimates that he was the offspring of one of her own nation or kindred. The obſervations we have made are neceſſary, becauſe theſe two ſons became the heads of two great people, the Moabites, and the Ammonites, whoſe kingdoms laſted above 1300 years, and lived on the borders of the holy land, and were jealous of Abraham and his poſterity; pretending that he could not be choſen before Lot their father, who being the ſon of Abraham's elder brother, was to be conſidered as the firſt born of Terah, and they undoubtedly were apt to take it for granted, that if God brought Abraham out of Chaldea, and reſcued him from Ur, or the city conſecrated to Fire, he had, in a more peculiar manner, ſaved Lot from the conflagration of Sodom, by the miniſtry of angels; and that Abraham and Lot being equally deſcended from Terah, the right of accompliſhing the promiſe did equally appertain to them.

CHAP. XX.

1 Abraham ſojourneth at Gerar, 2 denieth his wife, and loſeth her. 3 Abimelech is reproved for her in a dream. 9 He rebuketh Abraham, 14 Reſtoreth Sarah, 16 and reproveth her. 17 He is healed by Abrahams prayer.

AND Abraham journeyed from thence toward the ſouth-country, and dwelled between Kadeſh and Shur, and ſojourned in Gerar.

2 And Abraham ſaid of Sarah his wife, She is my ſiſter: And Abimelech king of Gerar ſent and took Sarah.

3 But God came to Abimelech in a dream by night, and ſaid to him, Behold, thou art but a dead man, for the woman which thou haſt taken: for ſhe is a mans wife.

4 But Abimelech had not come near her: and he ſaid, LORD, wilt thou ſlay alſo a righteous nation?

5 Said he not unto me, She is my ſiſter? and ſhe, even ſhe herſelf ſaid, He is my brother: in the integrity of my heart, and innocency of my hands have I done this.

6 And God ſaid unto him in a dream, Yea, I know that thou didſt this in the integrity of thy heart; for I alſo withheld thee from ſinning againſt me: therefore ſuffered I thee not to touch her.

7 Now therefore reſtore the man his wife; for he is a prophet, and he ſhall pray for thee, and thou ſhalt live: and if thou reſtore her not, know thou that thou ſhalt ſurely die, thou, and all that are thine.

8 Therefore Abimelech roſe early in the morning, and called all his ſervants, and told all theſe things in their ears: and the men were ſore afraid.

9 Then Abimelech called Abraham, and ſaid unto him, What haſt thou done unto us? and what have I offended thee, that thou haſt brought on me and on my kingdom a great ſin? thou haſt done deeds unto me that ought not to be done.

10 And Abimelech ſaid unto Abraham, What ſaweſt thou, that thou haſt done this thing?

11 And Abraham ſaid, Becauſe I thought, Surely the fear of God is not in this place; and they will ſlay me for my wifes ſake.

12 And yet indeed ſhe is my ſiſter; ſhe is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother: and ſhe became my wife.

13 And it came to paſs, when God cauſed me to wander from my fathers houſe, that I ſaid unto her, This is thy kindneſs which thou ſhalt ſhew unto me; At every place whither we ſhalt come, ſay of me, He is my brother.

14 And Abimelech took ſheep, and oxen, and men-ſervants, and women-ſervants, and gave them unto Abraham, and reſtored him Sarah his wife.

15 And Abimelech ſaid, Behold, my land is before thee: dwell where it pleaſeth thee.

16 And unto Sarah he ſaid, Behold, I have given thy brother a thouſand pieces of ſilver: behold, he is to thee a covering of the eyes, unto all that are with thee, and with all others: thus ſhe was reproved.

17 ¶ So Abraham prayed unto God: and God healed Abimelech, and his wife, and his maid-ſervants; and they bare children.

18 For the LORD had faſt cloſed up all the wombs of the houſe of Abimelech, becauſe of Sarah Abrahams wife.

Ver. 1. And Abraham —— ſojourned in Gerar.] Gerar was, at that time, the metropolis of Paleſtine, and, as ſome compute it, not much above ſix miles from Mamre.

Ver. 2. And Abraham ſaid of Sarah his wife, ſhe is my ſiſter; and Abimelech king of Gerar ſent and took Sarah.] Neither the pregnancy nor advanced age of Sarah, had deprived her of all her beauty, and Abimelech ſaw charms enough in her, to invite her to his bed.

The name Abimelech ſignifies, my father the king, and it was the name of all the kings of Paleſtine, as Pharaoh was of the kings of Egypt.

Ver. 5.

Ver. 5. Said he not unto me, ſhe is my ſiſter, and ſhe, even ſhe herſelf ſaid, he is my brother: In the integrity of my heart, and innocency of my hands have I done this.] It appears, by this whole hiſtory of Abimelech, that he was a man of great vertue, and not an idolater, but a worſhipper of the true God. He was afraid, as became a good prince, leſt his people ſhould ſuffer upon his account, and declares that he did not take Sarah from Abraham, by any act of violence, but only with an innocent intention to eſpouſe her, ſince he had reaſon to think her the ſiſter of that Patriarch, by the confeſſion of them both.

Ver. 7. Now therefore reſtore the man his wife, for he is a prophet, &c.] This is the firſt time we meet with the word Nabi, a prophet: And Abraham is the firſt who is honoured with this name in Scripture. It ſignifies one familiar with God; and who might conſult him on all occaſions, and be authorized to declare, God's mind and will to others; and alſo prevail with him, by prayer, to beſtow a bleſſing upon them.

Ver. 12. And yet indeed ſhe is my ſiſter; ſhe is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother.] According to the Scripture language, ſhe might be conſidered as his ſiſter, ſince ſhe was the grand-daughter of his father, being the daughter of Haran, Abraham's elder brother; and ſuch perſons are frequently ſtiled, in the ſacred books, the children of their grandfathers.

It ſeems Terah had two wives, by one of whom he had Haran, the father of Lot and Sarah; and, by the other, Abraham. Sarah, therefore, was daughter to his brother, by the father's ſide, but not by his mother: And with ſuch a niece they thought it not unlawful then to marry. No regard being had to conſanguinity by the father's ſide (if we may believe R. Solomon Jarchi) before the law of Moſes, but only by the mother's.

The more received opinion, indeed, of the Hebrew doctors, is, as Mr. Selden obſerves, l. 5. De Jure, N. & G. cap. 2. that Sarah was really the daughter of Terah by his ſecond wife, and ſo Abraham's half ſiſter. And Said Batrichides informs us, in his Arabic hiſtory, that the name of Terah's firſt wife was Jona, and the name of his ſecond Tevitha; by whom he had Sarah: But there is no ſufficient authority for this conjecture.

Ver. 16. And unto Sarah he ſaid, Behold, I have given thy brother a thouſand pieces of ſilver: Behold, he is to thee a covering of the eyes, unto all that are with thee, and with all other: Thus was ſhe reproved.] There are few paſſages in the ſacred books, which have tortured the imagination of expoſitors more than this. Biſhop Patrick declares, that the Hebrew relative hu may refer either to the ſilver, and be tranſlated this; or to Abraham, and be rendered he, as it is by our tranſlators: If we make it relative to the former, then, continues that prelate, the ſenſe is, I have given him that ſum of money to buy thee a veil, that all who converſe with thee here, or in any other country, may know thee to be a married woman. Others interpret it thus: This money will be a covering to thine eyes, that is, a defence to thy modeſty, it being a teſtimony that Abimelech paid dear for taking thee into his houſe. Another author has obſerved, that there ſeems to be a double miſtake, in our Engliſh tranſlation, of Abimelech's ſpeech to Sarah: For, ſays he, it is plain, the king was purchaſing Abraham's friendſhip, and not quarrelling with him, or his wife; and Abraham had already juſtified himſelf and her, to the king's ſatisfaction. And therefore the word nochahhath, ſhould not have been tranſlated rebuked, or reproved, as it is by Kimki, and others, who think ſhe was blamed for the falſhood ſhe told. Pagninus renders it erudivit ſe, i.e. ſhe learned more wit; whereas, tho' it be generally tranſlated, to reprove, yet it often ſignifies to ſearch, or enquire thoroughly into an affair, till the truth be diſcovered. Abimelech, therefore, according to this author, means no more, than that ſhe is acquitted after a full hearing: And the Chaldee paraphraſe hath tranſlated it accordingly. The ſame writer further obſerves, that the other miſtake, in our tranſlation, is Abraham's being ſaid to be a covering to her eyes; whereas the king ſeems to ſpeak of the thouſand pieces of ſilver which he gave them, as a token of their juſtification, the veil being always a ſymbol of womens modeſty.

We have carefully examined all theſe expoſitions of the paſſage under conſideration, and cannot conceive any of them adequate to the true meaning of the ſacred hiſtorian; at leaſt we think the preſent of a thouſand pieces of ſilver was ſo far from being a demonſtration that the chaſtity of Sarah had not been violated by Abimelech, that the people of that age might rather be apt to deem it a gratuity for the favours ſhe had granted him; for there is certainly no natural connection between the gift and her innocence. As to her being rebuked by the king, it ſeems to be very conſiſtent with the circumſtances of that tranſaction; that prince had ſufficient reaſon to be diſpleaſed with Abraham and Sarah, for their diſingenuous concealment of the true relation between them, becauſe it had created in him an inclination to eſpouſe her, in conſequence of which, the Deity had afflicted him and his family with a ſevere indiſpoſition of body. Tho' he afterwards acknowledged that what Abimelech had done, was altogether in the integrity of his heart, and without any criminal intention of invading the property of any man.

Theſe conſiderations incline us, therefore, to think our tranſlation very expreſſive of the ſacred hiſtorian's meaning; and we will now venture to paraphraſe this 16th verſe in the following manner: Behold, I have given thy brother a thouſand pieces of ſilver, to make him ſome reparation for the diſquietude he has ſuſtained by my conduct, tho' I never intended to offer him the leaſt injury, nor ſhould ever have entertain'd a thought of taking you to my bed, had you ſincerely acquainted me that he was your husband. I am ſenſible that he is a good man, and that his piety will always protect you from the violation of your chaſtity, ſince God himſelf condeſcends to interpoſe in his favour. Were he not a man of ſo much virtue, you could derive but little ſecurity from your own diſpoſition, ſince you did not diſcover any repugnance to gratify my deſires of eſpouſing you; and therefore your eſcaping the diſhonour you was in danger of incurring by your prevarication with me, is to be aſcribed to his ſanctity of mind, which ſecures you from the conſequences of any paſſion your beauty may kindle in other men, as effectually as if the amiableneſs of your perſon were always to be concealed, by a veil, from their view.

CHAP. XXI.

1 Iſaac is born: 4 he is circumciſed. 6 Sarahs joy. 9 Hagar and Iſhmael are caſt forth. 15 Hagar in diſtreſs. 17 The angel comforteth her. 22 Abimelechs covenant with Abraham at Beer-ſheba.

AND the LORD viſited Sarah as he had ſaid, and the LORD did unto Sarah as he had ſpoken.

2 For Sarah conceived, and bare Abraham a ſon in his old age, at the ſet time of which God had ſpoken to him.

3 And Abraham called the name of his ſon that was born unto him, whom Sarah bare to him, Iſaac.

4 And Abraham circumciſed his ſon Iſaac, being eight days old, as God had commanded him.

5 And Abraham was an hundred years old, when his ſon Iſaac was born unto him.

6 ¶ And Sarah ſaid, God hath made me to laugh, ſo that all that hear will laugh with me.

7 And ſhe ſaid, Who would have ſaid unto Abraham, that Sarah ſhould have given children ſuck? for I have born him a ſon in his old age.

8 And the child grew, and was weaned: and Abraham made a great feaſt the ſame day that Iſaac was weaned.

9 ¶ And

9 ¶ And Sarah ſaw the ſon of Hagar the Egyptian, which ſhe had born unto Abraham, mocking.

10 Wherefore ſhe ſaid unto Abraham, Caſt out this bond-woman, and her ſon: for the ſon of this bond-woman ſhall not be heir with my ſon, even with Iſaac.

11 And the thing was very grievous in Abrahams ſight, becauſe of his ſon.

12 ¶ And God ſaid unto Abraham, Let it not be grievous in thy ſight, becauſe of the lad, and becauſe of thy bond-woman; in all that Sarah hath ſaid unto thee, hearken unto her voice: for in Iſaac ſhall thy ſeed be called.

13 And alſo of the ſon of the bond-woman will I make a nation, becauſe he is thy ſeed.

14 And Abraham roſe up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar (putting it on her ſhoulder) and the child, and ſent her away: and ſhe departed, and wandred in the wilderneſs of Beer-ſheba.

15 And the water was ſpent in the bottle, and ſhe caſt the child under one of the ſhrubs.

16 And ſhe went, and ſat her down over againſt him, a good way off, as it were a bow-ſhot: for ſhe ſaid, Let me not ſee the death of the child. And ſhe ſat over againſt him, and lift up her voice, and wept.

17 And God heard the voice of the lad: and the angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven, and ſaid unto her, What aileth thee, Hagar? fear not; for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is.

18 Ariſe, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hand: for I will make him a great nation.

19 And God opened her eyes, and ſhe ſaw a well of water: and ſhe went and filled the bottle of water, and gave the lad to drink.

20 And God was with the lad, and he grew, and dwelt in the wilderneſs, and became an archer.

21 And he dwelt in the wilderneſs of Paran: and his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt.

22 ¶ And it came to paſs at that time, that Abimelech, and Phicol the chief captain of his hoſt ſpake unto Abraham, ſaying, God is with thee in all that thou doeſt.

23 Now therefore ſwear unto me here by God, that thou wilt not deal falſly with me, nor with my ſon, nor with my ſons ſon: but according to the kindneſs that I have done unto thee, thou ſhalt do unto me, and to the land wherein thou haſt ſojourned.

24 And Abraham ſaid, I will ſwear.

25 And Abraham reproved Abimelech becauſe of a well of water, which Abimelechs ſervants had violently taken away.

26 And Abimelech ſaid, I wot not who hath done this thing: neither didſt thou tell me, neither heard I of it but to day.

27 And Abraham took ſheep and oxen, and gave them unto Abimelech: and both of them made a covenant.

28 And Abraham ſet ſeven ew-lambs of the flock by themſelves.

29 And Abimelech ſaid unto Abraham, What mean theſe ſeven ew-lambs, which thou haſt ſet by themſelves?

30 And he ſaid, For theſe ſeven ew-lambs ſhalt thou take of my hand, that they may be a witneſs unto me, that I have digged this well.

31 Wherefore he called that place Beer-ſheba: becauſe there they ſware both of them.

32 Thus they made a covenant at Beer-ſheba: then Abimelech roſe up, and Phicol the chief captain of his hoſt, and they returned into the land of the Philiſtines.

33 ¶ And Abraham planted a grove in Beer-ſheba, and called there on the name of the LORD, the everlaſting God.

34 And Abraham ſojourned in the Philiſtines land many days.

Ver. 1. And the Lord viſited Sarah as he had ſaid, &c.] The time for the accompliſhment of the great promiſe being come, ſhe that was barren brought forth; and an old man, of a hundred years of age, finds himſelf the father of a ſon, whom he circumciſed, according to the command of God, and gave him the name of Iſaac, which ſignifies laughter; becauſe Sarah, when he came into the world, ſaid, God hath made me to laugh, &c. or greatly to rejoice, as it might be render'd.

Ver. 8. And the child grew, and was weaned.] It is not eaſy to determine how long they gave ſuck in thoſe days; and the ancient Hebrews are divided about it: Some holding that Iſaac was weaned at the age of five; others, not till the end of twelve years; and ſome, at the end of twenty-four months. But if we may judge by what the mother of the young Maccabee ſaid to him, (Maccab. vii. 27.) My ſon, remember I have ſuckled thee three years, that time will appear moſt probable.

Ver. 9. And Sarah ſaw the ſon of Hagar the Egyptian, which ſhe had born unto Abraham, mocking.] The birth of Iſaac was, undoubtedly, a mortification both to Hagar and her ſon Iſhmael, and ſhe might, probably ſpirit him up, to treat the young heir with ſome contemptuous indignity, when the great feſtival of his circumciſion was celebrating; at leaſt his conduct, on this occaſion, conſiſted in ſomething more than meer deriſion, ſince the great Apoſtle St. Paul calls its perſecution, Gal. iv. 29. And it muſt be remember'd that Iſhmael, according to the angels prediction, in the ſixteenth chapter of this book, v. 29. was to be a fierce and cruel man, and conſequently could not but begin to diſcover ſome indications of his ſavage diſpoſition, to the ſon of Sarah, who had ſupplanted him from the hopes hopes he had entertained while Abraham had no child but himſelf.

Ver. 14. And Abraham roſe up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar (putting it on her ſhoulder,) &c.] It may ſeem difficult to conceive, how Abraham, ſo rich as he was, and ſo very fond of this unfortunate mother and child, ſhould ſend them away, without any attendance; and with ſuch ſlender proviſions. To ſay, that theſe words of Moſes, bread and water, comprehend every accommodation neceſſary for Hagar and Iſhmael, is to arraign the credit of this hiſtory, which informs us, That both the mother and child were in danger of periſhing by hunger and thirſt, in the wilderneſs. Perhaps Sarah, amidſt her reſentment at Iſhmael's behaviour to her ſon, might prevail upon Abraham to act in this manner; and he might be the more inclinable to comply with her importunity, becauſe he was authorized by God himſelf to hearken unto her voice, ver. 12. and the Deity added, that he would make a nation of the ſon of the bond-woman, becauſe he was Abraham's ſeed. From which the patriarch might infer, that neither Hagar, nor her ſon, would be left deſtitute of the providential care of that God, who never fails to accompliſh all his promiſes in their due ſeaſon. Mr. Le Clerc conjectures, that Abraham did not ſend Hagar and her ſon, to ſeek their fortunes with nothing but a loaf of bread, and a bottle of water; but that he directed her to abide at a certain well, whither he would ſend her proper accommodations, fearing perhaps to diſoblige Sarah, in caſe he had then done what he thought neceſſary on that occaſion. But that Hagar miſtaking the place, and the water failing, Iſhmael and ſhe were reduced to the unhappy condition repreſented in this chapter. But being afterwards ſupplied by Abraham, they ſettled in the wilderneſs of Paran, and lived proſperouſly enough. We think this opinion not improbable.

Ver. 20. And God was with the lad, and he grew, and dwelt in the wilderneſs, and he became an archer.] He grew an expert hunter, and handled the bow with dexterity. Am. Marcellinus (L. xiv.) tells us, that the Saracens, who were of the poſterity of Iſhmael, never ſet their hands to the plough, but got their living, for the moſt part, by the bow. Their diet was veniſon, and ſuch wild fowl as the wilderneſs afforded, together with herbs and milk.

Ver. 21. And he dwelt in the wilderneſs of Paran.] This wilderneſs, in the large acceptation of the word, ſeems to have denoted all the deſart and mountainous tract lying between the wilderneſs of Shur, weſtward, or towards Egypt; and mount Seir, or the land of Edom, eaſtward, and between the land of Canaan, to the north, and the red Sea, to the ſouth. In this ſenſe it ſeems to have comprehended the wilderneſs of Sin, and the wilderneſs of Sinai, as alſo the adjoining tract, wherein lay Kibroth-hattaavah, and Hazeroth; and in this ſenſe we may underſtand that paſſage in Deut. i. 19. where it is ſaid, When we departed from Horeb, we went thro' all that great and terrible wilderneſs, which you ſaw by the way of the mountain of the Amorites. Where by that great and terrible wilderneſs, is probably to be underſtood the wilderneſs of Paran, in its larger acceptation. For, in a ſtricter ſenſe, it ſeems not to have been ſo great and terrible a wilderneſs, namely, as it is taken to denote, more peculiarly, that part of the deſart of ſtony Arabia, which lies between mount Sinai, and Hazeroth to the weſt, and mount Seir, to the eaſt. And ſince we find a city in theſe parts, near the red Sea, called Pharan; it may be probably ſuppoſed, that the wilderneſs of Paran took its denomination from it.

And his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt.] The Jewiſh doctors ſay, he had two wives, whoſe names were Aiſach, and Phatimah: The firſt of which received Abraham churliſhly, when he went to viſit his ſon; and therefore he put her away, and took the other, who proved more obliging, when the patriarch made a ſecond journey thither: Which tho' it has the air of a fiction, yet in all probability, he might ſometimes have the curioſity to ſee how his ſon lived, and Iſhmael might ſometimes wait upon him, for we cannot think they were ſo unnatural as never to have any correſpondence with each other: Eſpecially ſince we read that Iſhmael, as well as Iſaac, took care of Abraham's funeral, chap. xxx. 19.

Ver. 22. And it came to paſs at that time, that Abimelech and Phicol, the chief captain of his hoſt ſpake unto Abraham, &c.] It is evident, by this paſſage, that Abraham ſtill lived not far from Gerar: And God had bleſſed him with ſo much proſperity, that Abimelech and his ſubjects began to be apprehenſive he would ſoon become potent enough to moleſt them, if he ſhould happen to entertain any ſuch deſign. For the prevention of which, he propoſed an alliance between himſelf and Abraham; and to which the patriarch agreed.

Ver. 25. And Abraham reproved Abimelech becauſe of a well of water, which Abimelech's ſervants had violently taken away.] In that thirſty ſoil, a well of excellent water muſt have been extremely valuable, Abraham therefore had ſufficient reaſon to complain of his being diſpoſſeſſed of ſo uſeful a property, and to inſiſt upon a reſtitution, previous to the alliance propoſed by Abimelech.

Ver. 33. And Abraham planted a grove in Beerſheba, &c.] That he intended this plantation for a place of prayer, is evident from the following words, and called there on the name of the Lord. Groves were conſecrated to religion, even in the early ages of the world; and Servius obſerves, in his notes on the 9th Æneid; nunquam eſt lucus ſine religione, there never was a grove without religion.

From hence ſome think the cuſtom of planting groves was derived into all the Gentile world, who ſo profaned them, by Idols and other abominations, that God commanded them, by the law of Moſes, to be cut down.

CHAP. XXII.

1 Abraham is tempted to offer Iſaac: 3 He giveth proof of his faith and obedience: 11 The angel ſtayeth him. 13 Iſaac is exchanged with a ram. 14 The place is called Jehovah-jireh. 15 Abraham is bleſſed again. 20 The generation of Nahor unto Rebekah.

AND it came to paſs after theſe things, that God did tempt Abraham, and ſaid unto him, Abraham. And he ſaid, Behold, here I am.

2 And he ſaid, Take now thy ſon, thine only ſon Iſaac, whom thou loveſt, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt-offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of.

3 ¶ And Abraham roſe up early in the morning, and ſaddled his aſs, and took two of his young men with him, and Iſaac his ſon; and clave the wood for the burnt-offering, and roſe up, and went unto the place of which God had told him.

4 Then on the third day Abraham lift up his eyes, and ſaw the place afar off.

5 And Abraham ſaid unto his young men, Abide you here with the aſs; and I and the lad will go yonder and worſhip, and come again to you.

6 And Abraham took the wood of the burnt-offering, and laid it upon Iſaac his ſon; and he took the fire in his hand, and a knife: and they went both of them together.

7 And Iſaac ſpake unto Abraham his father, and ſaid, My father; and he ſaid, Here am I, my ſon. And he ſaid, Behold the fire and the wood: but where is the lamb for a burnt-offering?

8 And Abraham ſaid, My ſon, God will provide himſelf a lamb for a burnt-offering: ſo they went both of them together.

9 And they came to the place which God had told him of, and Abraham built an altar there, and laid the wood in order, and bound Iſaac his ſon, and laid him on the altar upon the wood.

10 And Abraham ſtretched forth his hand, and took the knife to ſlay his ſon.

11 And the angel of the LORD called unto him out of heaven, and ſaid, Abraham, Abraham. And he ſaid, Here am I.

12 And he ſaid, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him: for now I know that thou feareſt God, ſeeing thou haſt not withheld thy ſon, thine only ſon from me.

13 And Abraham lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold, behind him a ram caught in a thicket by his horns: and Abraham went and took the ram, and offered him up for a burnt-offering, in the ſtead of his ſon.

14 And Abraham called the name of that place Jehovah-jireh: as it is ſaid to this day, In the mount of the LORD it ſhall be ſeen.

15 ¶ And the angel of the LORD called unto Abraham out of heaven the ſecond time,

16 And ſaid, By my ſelf have I ſworn, ſaith the LORD, for becauſe thou haſt done this thing, and haſt not withheld thy ſon, thine only ſon:

17 That in bleſſing I will bleſs thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy ſeed as the ſtars of the heaven, and as the ſand which is upon the ſea ſhore: and thy ſeed ſhall poſſeſs the gate of his enemies;

18 And in thy ſeed ſhall all the nations of the earth be bleſſed: becauſe thou haſt obeyed my voice.

19 So Abraham returned unto his young men, and they roſe up, and went together to Beer-ſheba, and Abraham dwelt at Beer-ſheba.

20 ¶ And it came to paſs after theſe things, that it was told Abraham, ſaying, Behold Milcah, ſhe hath alſo born children unto thy brother Nahor;

21 Huz his firſt born, and Buz his brother, and Kemuel the father of Aram, 22 And Cheſed, and Hazo, and Pildaſh and Jidlaph, and Bethuel.

23 And Bethuel begat Rebekah: theſe eight Milcah did bear to Nahor Abraham's brother.

24 And his concubine, whoſe name was Reumah, ſhe bare alſo Tebah, and Gaham, and Thahaſh, and Maachah.

Ver. 1. And it came to paſs after theſe things that God did tempt Abraham, &c.] We muſt leave out of this expreſſion, every thing that is odious in the ſenſe of it, when we apply it to God. To tempt, ſometimes ſignifies, to lead a perſon into a crime; but, in this ſenſe God never tempteth any man; and as he has an eternal averſion to evil, it would be blaſphemy to affirm, or ſuppoſe, that he can poſſibly ſeduce any of his creatures into the commiſſion of it. But to tempt ſignifies alſo, to try a man, and in this ſenſe God may be ſaid to tempt men; ſometimes in his wrath, and ſometimes in love. When, by an effect of his juſtice, he leaves men to themſelves; when he permits them to fall, as a puniſhment for their abuſe and miſapplication of the faculties he beſtowed upon them, and ſuffers them to be betray'd into ſin and error, in vengeance for their willful inattention to the dictates of virtue and right reaſon; then it is, that he tempts them in his wrath. But when he permits his children to be involved in any dangers, from which he can extricate them with honour to his attributes, and when, in order to render their virtue more amiable and conſpicuous, and to crown their perſeverance, in an arduous courſe of integrity; he at any time ſuffers thoſe virtues to be aſſaulted, and that integrity to be attended with any diſcouraging circumſtances, then it is that he tempts them in his love; and thus he tempted Abraham.

Ver. 2. And he ſaid, take now thy ſon, thine only ſon Iſaac, whom thou loveſt, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering, upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of.] What a dreadful gradation is this! It looks as if the Deity had intended to aggravate the ſeverity of the command, by the manner in which he utters it. This is one of the moſt violent conflicts in which human creature can well be engaged, and it would be natural for a man to have recourſe to every conſideration that could poſſibly ſoften and mitigate ſuch an order: Abraham might have been induced by ſeeming reaſon, and ſpecious arguments, to have heſitated in his obedience to the divine command. Nature it ſelf might have been oppoſed againſt its execution, that endearing nature which unites a father and his child by the moſt tender bands. There might likewiſe have been oppoſed, an appearing contradiction, between this command, and the former promiſe, and Abraham might have ſaid to himſelf. O my ſoul! that art now ſo diſtreſſed and ſtraiten'd, how canſt thou underſtand in a literal ſenſe, the command thou haſt ſo lately received! How canſt thou, on the one hand, perſuade thy ſelf, that the promiſes of God are faithful, when he ſeems to ſelect thee as the inſtrument of their fruſtration! And how canſt thou believe, that Iſaac will be the ſolace of thine old age, when thou art compelled to make him the unhappy cauſe of thy greateſt affliction! By what means can this promiſed ſeed become as numerous as the ſtars in the firmament, when thou thy ſelf art called to ſacrifice with Iſaac, upon the ſame altar, all the nations that were to ſpring from his loins!

Abraham triumphed over all theſe conſiderations and difficulties; the faithful Patriarch believed and obeyed. He had enjoyed a late experience of the goodneſs of God, when he interceded for Sodom, and was permitted to argue from the divine juſtice in that caſe But he had likewiſe a full knowledge of the Goſpel diſpenſation; he ſaw the day of Chriſt and was glad, John viii. 56. and St. Paul aſſures us, that the Goſpel was preached unto Abraham, Gal. iii. 8. He knew that the Meſſias was to be born and ſuffer; he was ſenſible, that all ſacrifices were types of the ſacrifice of Chriſt; he knew that the birth of Iſaac was typical of the Redeemer's; and he likewiſe ſuppoſed, that God call'd him to be made a type of his death; and firmly believed, that he ſhould receive him again from the dead, as a type of his reſurrection. By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Iſaac; and he that had received the promiſes, offer'd up his only begotten ſon, of whom it was ſaid, that in Iſaac, ſhall thy ſeed be called: accounting that God was able to raiſe him up even from the dead; from whence alſo he received him in a figure. Heb. xi. 17.

The readineſs of Abraham's obedience, is a demonſtration that God revealed himſelf to the faithful of the firſt ages, in ſuch a manner as left them no room to doubt that he ſpoke to them. The law which obliged Abraham to be careful for the preſervation of his ſon, in whom all the divine promiſes concenter'd, might have prevailed over a ſuſpicious and uncertain revelation; but the moment he was convinced, that God himſelf commanded the immolation of Iſaac, he prepared himſelf for obedience, and reſolved that faith ſhould triumph over nature.

Ver. 7. And Iſaac ſpake unto Abraham his father, and ſaid, My father: and he ſaid, Here am I, my ſon: And he ſaid, behold the fire and the wood: but where is the lamb for a burnt offering?] Nothing but the heart can be a comment on theſe words: one muſt be a father; one muſt be a tender father; one muſt have an only ſon; one muſt ſuppoſe one ſelf preparing to ſlay him, in order to be truly ſenſible of the pathetic energy of this queſtion, and the impreſſion it created in the ſoul of Abraham.

Ver. 11. And he ſaid, lay not thine hand on the lad, &c.] In one moment the victim would have been ſmitten, had not God interpoſed for his preſervation.

For now I know that thou feareſt God ſeeing thou haſt not withheld thy ſon, thine only ſon from me.] Theſe words from me, do not ſignify that Abraham ſacrificed his ſon to an angel; we may therefore ſupply theſe words, ſaith the Lord, and tho' we are not allowed to make ſuch kinds of ſupplement in paſſages where we find nothing to authorize us therein; yet we think we have a right to do it here, becauſe the angel himſelf makes uſe of this expreſſion, ſaith the Lord, in the 16th verſe.

Ver. 16. By my ſelf have I ſworn ſaith the Lord, &c.] God inlarged his mercies to Abraham proportionable to his obedience; and this is apparent in this great and laſt trial, which was rewarded by the ratification of God's former promiſe, or covenant, by a moſt ſolemn oath: beſide, the promiſe is now couched in more affectionate language; in bleſſing I will bleſs thee, &c.

Ver. 20. —— Milcah hath born children, &c.] The following genealogy is ſet down, to ſhew whence Rebekah the wife of Iſaac was deſcended.

Ver. 21. Huz his firſt born, &c.] There were two others of this name, one the ſon of Aram ch. x. 23. another of the poſterity of Eſau, ch. xxxvi. 28. But this Uz here mentioned, is he from whom Job deſcended, whoſe country was called Auſitis (ſo the Septuagint tranſlate Uz) and his poſterity called Auſitæ, by Ptolemy, and they were a people of Arabia Deſerta, near Chaldea, not far from Babylon.

And Buz his brother.] From whom was deſcended Elihu the Buzite, Job. xxxii. 2. whoſe tribe was ſeated in the ſame country, or in ſome adjacent part.

Ver. 22. And Cheſed.] He was the father of the Chaldeans (according to Biſhop Patrick) who are called Chaſdim in Scripture from this Cheſed; where the reſt, whoſe names were Hazo, Pildath, and Jidlap, ſettled, or whether they had any poſterity, is uncertain.

Ver. 24. And his concubine, &c.] This was not a name of infamy in thoſe early ages, but ſignified a wife who was not the miſtreſs of the family, but only taken into it in order to increaſe it by her children.

CHAP. XXIII.

1 The age and death of Sarah. 3 The purchaſe of Machpelah, 19 where Sarah was buried.

AND Sarah was an hundred and ſeven and twenty years old: theſe were the years of the life of Sarah.

2 And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba; the ſame is Hebron in the land of Canaan: and Abraham came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her.

3 ¶ And Abraham ſtood up from before his dead, and ſpake unto the ſons of Heth, ſaying,

4 I am a ſtranger and a ſojourner with you: give me a poſſeſſion of a burying-place with you, that I may bury my dead out of my ſight.

5 And the children of Heth anſwered Abraham, ſaying unto him,

6 Hear us, my lord; thou art a mighty prince amongſt us; in the choice of our ſepulchres bury thy dead: none of us ſhall withhold from thee his ſepulchre, but that thou mayeſt bury thy dead.

7 And Abraham ſtood up, and bowed himſelf to the people of the land, even to the children of Heth.

8 And he communed with them, ſaying, If it be your mind that I ſhould bury my dead out of my ſight, hear me, and intreat for me to Ephron the ſon of Zohar:

9 That he may give me the cave of Machpelah, which he hath, which is in the end of his field; for as much money as it is worth he ſhall give it me, for a poſſeſſion of a burying-place amongſt you.

10 And Ephron dwelt amongſt the children of Heth. And Ephron the Hittite anſwered Abraham in the audience of the children of Heth, even of all that went in at the gates of his city ſaying, 11 Nay, my lord, hear me: the field give I thee, and the cave that is therein, I give it thee; in the preſence of the ſons of my people give I it thee: bury thy dead.

12 And Abraham bowed down himſelf before the people of the land.

13 And he ſpake unto Ephron in the audience of the people of the land, ſaying; But if thou wilt give it, I pray thee hear me: I will give thee money for the field; take it of me, and I will bury my dead there.

14 And Ephron anſwered Abraham ſaying unto him,

15 My lord, hearken unto me: the land is worth four hundred ſhekels of ſilver; what is that betwixt me and thee? bury therefore thy dead.

16 And Abraham hearkned unto Ephron, and Abraham weighed to Ephron the ſilver, which he had named in the audience of the ſons of Heth, four hundred ſhekels of ſilver, currant money with the merchant.

17 ¶ And the field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah, which was before Mamre, the field and the cave which was therein, and and all the trees that were in the field, that were in all the borders round about, were made ſure

18 Unto Abraham for a poſſeſſion in the preſence of the children of Heth, before all that went in at the gate of his city.

19 And after this, Abraham buried Sarah his wife in the cave of the field of Machpelah, before Mamre: the ſame is Hebron in the land of Canaan.

20 And the field and the cave that is therein were made ſure unto Abraham, for a poſſeſſion of a burying-place, by the ſons of Heth.

Ver. 2. And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba.] As all temporal felicity has its appointed period, and is frequently ſucceeded by ſorrow; we may ſuppoſe Abraham to have been deeply affected at the death of Sarah, the endearing partner of his conjugal happineſs, and the faithful companion of his travels. This afflictive diſpenſation of providence happened about twelve years after he had rendered his faith ſo illuſtrious at mount Moriah

The ſame is Hebron.] It has been objected, that theſe words could not be written by Moſes, becauſe it appears by the book of Judges, ch. i. ver. 10. that this city was called Hebron long after the time of that great law-giver; and the conſideration of that paſſage has induced ſome interpreters to ſuppoſe that this expreſſion, the ſame is Hebron, is a gloſs that was added to the Moſaic text, ſeveral years after it was penn'd by the ſacred hiſtorian. Since, according to them, this city was call'd Kirjath-arba, as long as the Canaanites were in poſſeſſion of Paleſtine, and did not receive the name of Hebron, till it became the portion of the grandſon of Caleb.

To this we anſwer, that nothing can be more ſuſpicious and uncertain, than the criticiſms that are founded on the names of places; ſince it is evident, that there are ſeveral perſons and places in the ſacred Scripture, which are called by the ſame name. And therefore it is very eaſy for perſons to be miſtaken in their conjectures on this article. Thus there are two Gideons, one mentioned in the book of Numbers, and the other of the tribe of Manaſſeh, who delivered and judged Iſrael. There are, likewiſe, two Dans, the one a city, and the other a ſource of the river Jordan. There are, alſo, two Eglons, one a city, mentioned in the 10th chapter of Joſhua, and the other a king of the Moabites. It is likewiſe certain, that there were two Hebrons, one the grand-child of Levi, and the head of the Hebronites; and the other a deſcendant from Caleb: Which is a ſufficient proof that perſons ought to be cautious of deriving bold conſequences from the proper names that occur in Scripture.

The objectors to this paſſage, are pleaſed to ſuppoſe, without alledging the leaſt proof, that Kirjath-arba received the name of Hebron from the grandſon of Caleb; but it would have been decent in them to have advanced ſuch a propoſition, with better evidence than they have been pleaſed to afford us: For the firſt chapter of Chronicles, from whence they pretend to derive their ſuppoſition, preſents us with nothing that has any tendency to corroborate ſuch an aſſertion. We may add, too, that the ſacred books mention a valley of Hebron, and likewiſe take notice of a mountain and a city of the ſame name; and it is remarkable, that the king of Hebron was one of thoſe princes who are recorded to have been vanquiſhed by Joſhua. Why, therefore, might not his territories give the name of Hebron to the city which was anciently called Kirjath-arba?

And Abraham came to mourn for Sarah.] Sarah is ſaid to die at Arba, and yet no previous mention is made of Abraham's removal, from Beerſheba, thither; and it is only recorded, that he came to this place to mourn for her. Some, therefore, are of opinion, that they might be parted on ſome occaſion, and that Sarah went to Arba, while her husband continued in his old place of reſidence. Others, not being able to reconcile themſelves to ſuch a ſeparation, imagine, he only came from his own tent into that of Sarah; for they had ſeparate tents.

The great age of Sarah was a ſufficient cauſe of her death, without making it neceſſary to have recourſe to doubtful or fabulous ſtories on that ſubject. Some Rabbins have advanced, that ſhe died of grief, at the news of the ſacrifice of Iſaac; and, to render that circumſtance the more extraordinary, they are pleaſed to acquaint us, that the devil, to revenge himſelf, becauſe Iſaac did not die by the knife of the patriarch, told Sarah that this dear ſon was actually ſacrificed.

The age of Sarah, at her death, is related as a peculiar honour to her memory, ſince the years of any other woman are not recorded in the books of Scripture. We have many proofs of her fidelity, obedience, and other conjugal virtues, from the hiſtory of her life; and the apoſtle Peter gives her very juſt commendations, 1 Ep. iii. 6. ſo that as ſhe was full of years, bleſſed with a ſon, in a peculiar manner, from the favour of God, and wanted nothing which a reaſonable mind could require, we may well conclude that her conduct was pleaſing to the Deity, and ſhe worthy of being called the mother of the faithful, as Abraham was the father.

Ver. 4. I am a ſtranger and a ſojourner with you: give me a poſſeſſion of a burying-place with you, that I may bury my dead out of my ſight.] One would imagine, that this paſſage could not need any explication; and yet ſome commentators have gravely debated the queſtion, why Abraham deſired to bury his dead, expreſſing the ſame in the maſculine gender, as it is in the original, and not in the feminine? They have been even divided into different opinions on this article, ſome affirming, that my dead, in the maſculine gender, implied, my dead wife; and, to prove it, they cite St. Auſtin, who maintains, that the text ought to be underſtood in that ſenſe. Others pretend, that this expreſſion ſignifies, my dead corpſe; and thereupon quote Vatablus, who entertained that opinion. Such is the ſpirit of mankind, that, in their expoſitions of Scripture, they often expatiate into diſcuſſions upon matters that have no relation to our happineſs and duty, and amuſe themſelves and others with fanciful conjectures, that rather tend to depreciate, than promote the reſpect due to thoſe divine and venerable books.

Ver. 6. Hear us my Lord; thou art a mighty prince amongſt us, &c.] The manner in which the Hittites anſwered Abraham, ſhews, that tho' he had no land among them, yet he had great riches, and was univerſally eſteem'd by them. Thou art a prince of God among us, for ſo it is in the original. 'Tis true, the title of prince ought not here to be underſtood in ſo large an extent, as it was in the following ages; tho' the Septuagint have tranſlated it, thou art a mighty king. But we may, however, infer from the expreſſion us'd by theſe perſons, that the patriarch was one of the greateſt men among the Canaanites. Trogus Pompeius ſays, that Abraham and Iſrael were kings.

In the choice of our ſepulchres bury thy dead.] Perhaps it was then eſtabliſh'd, by a law of hoſpitality, that the natural inhabitants of a country ſhould receive, into their own burying-places, ſuch ſtrangers as died among them.

Ver. 9. That he may give me the cave of Machpelah.] Machpelah, in Hebrew, ſignifies double; whence it is ſuppos'd by ſome, that there was a cave within another, or two or more contiguous to each other, in one of which Sarah was buried, and Abraham, afterwards, in the other. Others think it is the name of the field, and that it ſhould be render'd, the cave which is in Machpelah. Calmet tells us of a perſon well skill'd in the Arabic, who ſays that the word Machpelah, in that language, ſignifies ſhut, or walled up; it being cuſtomary to wall up theſe tombs, to prevent robbers from ſheltering themſelves therein.

If we might believe the accounts of ſome credulous travellers, we have helps enow to form an exact idea of the cave of Machpelah. Several pretend to have ſeen it, and are very particular in their deſcriptions of it; but theſe accounts, which are generally ſuſpected, ought chiefly to be ſo, in what concerns thoſe places which the holy Scriptures have render'd remarkable. What is it that the people of the country do not pretend to ſhew, to ſuch as travel into Paleſtine? And what do they not produce to make amends for their fatigue? The houſe of Joachim, the father of the holy Virgin; the chamber in which ſhe conceiv'd; ceived; the ſtone ſhe ſat upon when ſhe received the Salutation of the angel; the grotto in which ſhe ſuckled her divine infant; the fig-tree which he curſed, and which, according to them, is unproductive of figs to this day: All theſe, with a variety of other antiquities, are pretended to be diſtinctly ſhewn; and there is even a traveller who declares he had ſeen the ſtone which the builders refuſed, and which is become the head ſtone of the corner. P. Belon. l. 2. c. 83.

It is of more importance to reconcile, if poſſible, Moſes with St. Stephen, and to find out the reaſon, why the firſt of them ſays expreſsly, that Abraham bought the ſepulchre, in which Sarah was interred, of Ephron the Hittite; whereas the latter declares, that Abraham bought it for a ſum of money, of the ſons of Emmor, the father of Sichem. Acts vii. 16.

Some interpreters, and even thoſe who are leaſt diſpoſed to acknowledge any fault of the tranſcribers to have ſlipt into the ancient copies of the canon, acknowledge, upon this occaſion, that ſome ignorant copier had confounded the purchaſe made by Abraham, with the account of that which was made by Jacob in the 33d chap. of this book. That tranſcriber, ſay they, might have wrote in the margin of his copy, the word Abraham, inſtead of Jacob, and ſo this laſt word might have ſlipt from the margin into the text of the acts of the Apoſtles. Now tho' we are not of the ſame mind with thoſe, who are always ſcrupulous of admitting ſolutions of this nature; yet we cannot but obſerve, that they who offer this, do not cite any one copy for their voucher; and Dr. Mills, who has collected ſo many different readings, does not produce any that can ſupport the opinion of theſe expoſitors.

However, tho' this conjecture be not founded upon any critical remark, it ſeems preferable to the opinion of thoſe who have atteſted, that either St. Stephen, or St. Luke have, for want of memory, alter'd the Moſaic account.

Perhaps there are fewer inconveniencies in the opinion of thoſe who think, that Jacob did likewiſe bear the name of Abraham; and it was not uncuſtomary to give the father's name to the children. Bochart has collected ſeveral inſtances to this effect; and in this caſe the words of St. Srephen have no difficulty in them.

But however the fact may be, it ſeems demonſtrable that we ought not to confound the ſepulchre here mention'd with that of which St. Stephen ſpeaks. The firſt was purchaſed by Abraham, the laſt by Jacob; the firſt was ſold by Ephron the Hittite, the ſecond by the ſons of Hamor; the former was at Hebron, the latter at Sychem. In the firſt of theſe ſepulchres were buried Abraham, and Sarah, Iſaac, Rebecca and Leah; in the laſt Joſeph and the other patriarchs. But it is time to conclude this digreſſion.

Ver. 11. Nay, my Lord, hear me: The field give I thee, and the cave that is therein.] Ephron would have given his field to Abraham, without receiving any equivalent for it, which generoſity in offering it, the patriarch equalled by his refuſal: Reſolving not to accept the field without paying the full value. St. Jerom unjuſtly cenſures it as an act worthy of blame, to ſell a burying place, and adds, as an inſtance of Ephron's ſordidneſs, that his name was changed from Ephron, to Hephran; but the remark of that father deſerves, perhaps, to be cenſured more than the conduct of the Canaanite.

Ver. 16. ——— And Abraham weighed to Ephron the ſilver, which he had named in the audience of the ſons of Heth, four hundred ſhekels of ſilver, current money with the merchant.] The learned Prideaux, who has given us the laſt and beſt eſtimation of the Hebrew and Attic coins, reckons a ſhekel to be equivalent to three ſhillings of our engliſh money; ſo that the ſum which Abraham paid for his purchaſe, will amount to ſixty pounds ſterling.

It is remarkable, that this paſſage is the moſt ancient monument of buying and ſelling, performed by money; nor is it to be doubted, that the riches of men did originally conſiſt of ſuch things as were uſeful and neceſſary in themſelves, and particularly cattle. And it may not be improper to obſerve, in favour of this opinion, that the ancient words which denote the principal things by which commerce was tranſacted among mankind, are derived from the names of ſeveral animals. Thus the Greek word ἀρνύσθαι, which ſignifies to change or barter, came from ἄρνος a lamb. The word πολεῖν, which imports to ſell, is a derivative from πῶλος a young horſe or colt. The word ὠνεῖσθαι, to buy, is formed from ὄνος, an aſs,. That which has been ſince called rent, or revenue, was termed, by the Grecians Πρόβατα, and comes from the ſubſtantive Πρόβατον, which ſignifies a ſheep.

But without debating that dark and unanſwerable queſtion, concerning the particular period of time in which mankind firſt introduced money into the buſineſs of trade, it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that it was current in the time of Abraham, who was very rich in cattle, in ſilver and gold, Gen xiii. 2.

St. Epiphanius pretends, that Abraham brought into Canaan the art of coining and ſtamping money; and ſome commentators have carried the opinion of that father into a more ridiculous extream, thinking we have ſtill ſome of thoſe old coins, repreſenting, on one ſide, the heads of an old man and woman, which theſe gentlemen pretend are Abraham and Sarah; and another impreſſed with the heads of a young man and woman, which of courſe, muſt be Iſaac and Rebecca. We rank under the ſame claſs, thoſe that bear the heads of Moſes, David, Abſolom, Eſther, &c. and it is ſurpriſing that any of the learned can ſuffer themſelves to be impoſed upon by ſuch medals: All that we can conclude from the pains they have taken to prove and defend the genuine antiquity of theſe coins is, that a profound erudition is not always attended with a faculty of reaſoning in a juſt manner.

CHAP. XXIV.

1 Abraham ſweareth his ſervant. 10 The ſervants journey: 12 His prayer: 14 His ſign. 15 Rebekah meeteth him, 18 fulfilleth his ſign, 22 receiveth Jewels, 23 ſheweth her kindred, 25 and inviteth him home. 26 The ſervant bleſſeth God: 29 Laban entertaineth him. 34 The ſervant ſheweth his meſſage. 50 Laban and Bethuel approve it. 58 Rebekah conſenteth to go: 62 Iſaac meeteth her.

AND Abraham was old and well ſtricken in age: and the LORD had bleſſed Abraham in all things.

2 And Abraham ſaid unto his eldeſt ſervant of his houſe, that ruled over all that he had, Put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh:

3 And I will make thee ſwear by the LORD, the God of heaven and the God of the earth, that thou ſhalt not take a wife unto my ſon of the daughters of the Canaanites amongſt whom I dwell:

4 But thou ſhalt go unto my country, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my ſon Iſaac.

5 And the ſervant ſaid unto him, Peradventure the woman will not be willing to follow me unto this land: muſt I needs bring thy ſon again unto the land from whence thou cameſt?

6 And Abraham ſaid unto him, Beware thou, that thou bring not my ſon thither again.

7 ¶ The LORD God of heaven which took me from my fathers houſe, and from the land of my kindred, and which ſpake unto me, and that ſware unto me, ſaying, Unto thy ſeed will I give this land; he ſhall ſend his angel before thee, and thou ſhalt take a wife unto my ſon from thence.

8 And if the woman will not be willing to follow thee, then thou ſhalt be clear from this my oath: only bring not my ſon thither again.

9 And the ſervant put his hand under the thigh of Abraham his maſter, and ſware to him concerning that matter.

10 ¶ And the ſervant took ten camels, of the camels of his maſter, and departed (for all the goods of his maſter were in his hand:) and he aroſe, and went to Meſopotamia, unto the city of Nahor.

11 And he made his camels to kneel down without the city, by a well of water, at the time of the evening, even the time that women go out to draw water.

12 And he ſaid, O LORD God of my maſter Abraham, I pray thee ſend me good ſpeed this day, and ſhew kindneſs unto my maſter Abraham.

13 Behold, I ſtand here by the well of water, and the daughters of the men of the city come out to draw water:

14 And let it come to paſs, that the damſel to whom I ſhall ſay, Let down thy pitcher, I pray thee, that I may drink; and ſhe ſhall ſay, Drink, and I will give thy camels drink alſo: let the ſame be ſhe that thou haſt appointed for thy ſervant Iſaac; and thereby ſhall I know that thou haſt ſhewed kindneſs unto my maſter.

15 ¶ And it came to paſs before he had done ſpeaking, that behold, Rebekah came out, who was born to Bethuel ſon of Milcah the wife of Nahor Abrahams brother, with her pitcher upon her ſhoulder.

16 And the damſel was very fair to look upon, a virgin, neither had any man known her: and ſhe went down to the well, and filled her pitcher, and came up.

17 And the ſervant ran to meet her, and ſaid, Let me (I pray thee) drink a little water of thy pitcher.

18 And ſhe ſaid, Drink, my lord: and ſhe haſted, and let down her pitcher upon her hand, and gave him drink.

19 And when ſhe had done giving him drink, ſhe ſaid, I will draw water for thy camels alſo, until they have done drinking.

20 And ſhe haſted, and emptied her pitcher into the trough, and ran again unto the well to draw water, and drew for all his camels.

21 And the man wondring at her, held his peace, to wit, whether the LORD had made his journey proſperous or not.

22 And it came to paſs as the camels had done drinking, that the man took a golden ear-ring, of half a ſhekel weight, and two bracelets for her hands, of ten ſhekels weight of gold;

23 And ſaid, Whoſe daughter art thou? tell me, I pray thee: is there room in thy fathers houſe for us to lodge in?

24 And ſhe ſaid unto him, I am the daughter of Bethuel the ſon of Milcah, which ſhe bare unto Nahor.

25 She ſaid moreover unto him, We have both ſtraw and provender enough, and room to lodge in.

26 And the man bowed down his head, and worſhipped the LORD.

27 And he ſaid, Bleſſed be the LORD God of my maſter Abraham, who hath not left deſtitute my maſter of his mercy and his truth: I being in the way, the LORD led me to the houſe of my maſters brethren.

28 And the damſel ran, and told them of her mothers houſe theſe things.

29 ¶ And Rebekah had a brother, and his name was Laban: and Laban ran out unto the man, unto the well.

30 And it came to paſs when he ſaw the ear-ring and bracelets upon his ſiſters hands, and when he heard the words of Rebekah his ſiſter, ſaying, Thus ſpake the man unto me; that he came unto the man, and behold, he ſtood by the camels at the well.

31 And he ſaid, Come in, thou bleſſed of the LORD, wherefore ſtandeſt thou without? for I have prepared the houſe, and room for the camels.

32 ¶ And the man came into the houſe: and he ungirded his camels, and gave ſtraw and provender for the camels, and water to waſh his feet, and the mens feet that were with him.

33 And there was ſet meat before him to eat: but he ſaid, I will not eat, until I have told mine errand. And he ſaid, Speak on.

34 And he ſaid, I am Abrahams ſervant.

35 And the LORD hath bleſſed my maſter greatly, and he is become great: and he hath given him flocks, and herds, and ſilver, and gold, and men-ſervants, and maid-ſervants, and camels, and aſſes.

36 And Sarah my maſters wife bare a ſon to my maſter when ſhe was old: and unto him hath he given all that he hath.

37 And my maſter made me ſwear, ſaying, Thou ſhalt not take a wife to my ſon of the daughters of the Canaanites, in whoſe land I dwell:

38 But thou ſhalt go unto my fathers houſe, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my ſon.

39 And

39 And I ſaid unto my maſter, Peradventure the woman will not follow me.

40 And he ſaid unto me, The LORD before whom I walk, will ſend his angel with thee, and proſper thy way; and thou ſhalt take a wife for my ſon of my kindred, and of my fathers houſe.

41 Then ſhalt thou be clear from this my oath, when thou comeſt to my kindred; and if they give not thee one, thou ſhalt be clear from my oath.

42 And I came this day unto the well, and ſaid, O LORD God of my maſter Abraham, if now thou do proſper my way which I go:

43 Behold, I ſtand by the well of water; and it ſhall come to paſs, that when the virgin cometh forth to draw water, and I ſay to her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water of thy pitcher to drink;

44 And ſhe ſay to me, Both drink thou, and I will alſo draw for thy camels: let the ſame be the woman whom the LORD hath appointed out for my maſters ſon.

45 And before I had done ſpeaking in mine heart, Behold, Rebekah came forth with her pitcher on her ſhoulder; and ſhe went down unto the well, and drew water: and I ſaid unto her, Let me drink, I pray thee.

46 And ſhe made haſte, and let down her pitcher from her ſhoulder, and ſaid, Drink, and I will give thy camels drink alſo; ſo I drank, and ſhe made the camels drink alſo.

47 And I asked her, and ſaid, Whoſe daughter art thou? And ſhe ſaid, The daughter of Bethuel, Nahors ſon, whom Milcah bare unto him: and I put the ear-ring upon her face, and the bracelets upon her hands.

48 And I bowed down my head, and worſhipped the LORD, and bleſſed the LORD God of my maſter Abraham, which had led me in the right way to take my maſters brothers daughter unto his ſon.

49 And now if you will deal kindly and truly with my maſter, tell me: and if not, tell me; that I may turn to the right hand, or to the left.

50 Then Laban and Bethuel anſwered, and ſaid, The thing proceedeth from the LORD: we cannot ſpeak unto thee bad or good.

51 Behold, Rebekah is before thee, take her, and go, and let her be thy maſters ſons wife, as the LORD hath ſpoken.

52 And it came to paſs, that when Abrahams ſervant heard their words, he worſhipped the LORD, bowing himſelf to the earth.

53 And the ſervant brought forth jewels of ſilver, and jewels of gold, and raiment, and he gave them to Rebekah: He gave alſo to her brother and to her mother precious things.

54 And they did eat and drink, he and the men that were with him, and tarried all night: and they roſe up in the morning, and he ſaid, Send me away unto my maſter.

55 And her brother and her mother ſaid, Let the damſel abide with us a few days, at the leaſt ten; after that ſhe ſhall go.

56 And he ſaid unto them, Hinder me not, ſeeing the LORD hath proſpered my way: ſend me away, that I may go to my maſter.

57 And they ſaid, We will call the damſel, and enquire at her mouth.

58 And they called Rebekah, and ſaid unto her, Wilt thou go with this man? And ſhe ſaid, I will go.

59 And they ſent away Rebekah their ſiſter, and her nurſe, and Abrahams ſervant, and his men.

60 And they bleſſed Rebekah, and ſaid unto her, Thou art our ſiſter, be thou the mother of thouſands of millions, and let thy ſeed poſſeſs the gate of thoſe which hate them.

61 ¶ And Rebekah aroſe, and her damſels, and they rode upon the camels, and followed the man, and the ſervant took Rebekah, and went his way.

62 And Iſaac came from the way of the well Lahai-roi; for he dwelt in the ſouth-country.

63 And Iſaac went out to meditate in the field at the even-tide: and he lift up his eyes, and ſaw, and behold the camels were coming.

64 And Rebekah lift up her eyes, and when ſhe ſaw Iſaac, ſhe lighted off the camel.

65 For ſhe had ſaid unto the ſervant, What man is this that walketh in the field to meet us? And the ſervant had ſaid, It is my maſter: therefore ſhe took a vail and covered herſelf.

66 And the ſervant told Iſaac all things that he had done.

67 And Iſaac brought her into his mother Sarahs tent, and took Rebekah, and ſhe became his wife; and he loved her: and Iſaac was comforted after his mothers death.

CHAP.

The death of Sarah was an inducement to Abraham to think of his own; and the temporal cares that chiefly engroſſed his attention, related to his beloved Iſaac, for whom he was deſirous of procuring a wife who might be a comfort to him, in lieu of the mother he had loſt, and of the father who was ſoon to follow her.

Ver. 2, 3. And Abraham ſaid unto his eldeſt ſervant of his houſe, that ruled over all that he had, put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh. And I will make thee ſwear by the Lord, the God of heaven, &c.] Grotius affirms, that all the myſtery of this ceremony is, that anciently they wore the ſword upon the thigh; ſo that to ſwear, by putting the hand under that limb, was, according to this learned perſon, I am content to be pierced through by this ſword, if I break my promiſe. Some of the Hebrew doctors ſay, it was ſwearing by the covenant of circumciſion; and that a perſon falſifying an oath ſo made, loſt all title to the privileges flowing from that covenant. There is a variety of other interpretations of this paſſage, but as none of them are attended with any degree of demonſtration, we think it needleſs to inſert them.

That thou ſhalt not take a wife unto my ſon of the daughters of the Canaanites amongſt whom I dwell.] Abraham was deſirous to prevent Iſaac's marrying a Canaanitiſh woman, who, by her example, might ſeduce him to idolatry.

Ver. 4. But thou ſhalt go unto my country, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my ſon Iſaac.] The taking a wife out of that family, would not effectually prevent an alliance with idolaters; but tho' it was not entirely free from that crime, yet it was far from being involved therein, like the reſt of the Chaldeans, or Canaanites. Some commentators have thought, that Abraham intended, by theſe precautions, to prevent the Meſſiah from reckoning, in the catalogue of his anceſtors, any perſon deſcended from thoſe nations whom God had curſed: And if no more is meant, than that it was the duty of the Iſraelites to obviate this circumſtance, we readily ſubſcribe to that opinion; but if they pretend, that it was the care of providence to prevent it, experience will contradict them, and ſoon make it evident that idolatrous women entred into the family of Judah.

Ver. 5. And the ſervant ſaid unto him, peradventure the woman will not be willing to follow me into this land, &c.] He deſires, like a conſcientious man, to underſtand the full obligation of his oath, before he took it, and his doubt was, whether, if a woman would not come with him into Canaan, he ſhould be obliged to go a ſecond time, thither, and carry Iſaac to her.

Ver. 6. And Abraham ſaid unto him, beware that thou bring not my ſon thither again.] He would by no means conſent that his ſon ſhould go into that country, which God had commanded him to forſake; and that command not only obliged him, but his poſterity likewiſe.

Ver. 7. The Lord God of heaven;——he ſhall ſend his angel before thee, and thou ſhalt take a wife from thence.] Good men were ſenſible, that God govern'd all events by his providence, and frequently proſpered their lawful proceedings, by the miniſtration of angels.

Ver. 10. And the ſervant took ten camels, &c.] Camels were very uſeful in thoſe countries, as they are at this time. Some of them being made for carrying burdens, and ſome for ſwift travelling; which latter ſort were call'd by a peculiar name, Δρομαδες, dromedaries, or runners.

And he aroſe and went to Meſopotamia, unto the city of Nahor.] It is thought, that the city of Nahor was the ſame with the city Haran or Charran, whoſe ſituation we have already deſcribed; but ſome ſuppoſe it to denote Ur of the Chaldees: For when Terah left that place, we only read, that he took with him Abraham his ſon, and Lot his grandſon, of the male iſſue; and therefore it may reaſonably be concluded, that Nahor, his other ſon, continu'd in Ur. But if Haran is to be underſtood by the city of Nahor, then Nahor muſt have removed thither ſome time after the departure of his father: And, indeed, we read, Gen. xxvii. 43. that Laban, the brother of Rebecca, and grandſon of Nahor, did live at Haran; and therefore, upon the whole, it is probable, that tho' at firſt when Abraham removed with his father Terah, Nahor ſtay'd behind at Ur; yet afterwards, when his own family was grown up, he might leave his other Sons at Ur, and he, with his younger ſon (as it ſeems) Bethuel, the father of Laban and Rebecca, might remove to Haran.

Ver. 12. And he ſaid, O Lord God of my maſter Abraham, &c.] The pious fidelity of this excellent ſervant, is very affecting. His prayer is of an extraordinary nature, and we muſt form a judgment of it, from the particular diſpenſations of God to the faithful in thoſe ages. It is not for us to preſcribe to providence the means of ſignifying to us, whether our deſigns ſhall be ſucceſsful, or not. But God was pleaſed to ſhew ſuch great condeſcenſion to the pious men of thoſe times, and Scripture preſents us with ſeveral inſtances of that nature. What has been practiſed under the true religion, has been mimicked by the falſe one, nothing being more common, among the Heathens, than to require ſuch ſort of ſigns, and to regulate their greateſt undertakings by preſages. Accordingly, the Philiſtines ſaid, that they ſhould know, by the way which the ark of God would take, whether the great evil which befel them, proceeded from the hand of God; or whether it was an accidental calamity. Thus Nebuchadnezzar, being doubtful, whether he ſhould commence a war againſt the Jews, or the Ammonites, took two arrows, and wrote upon one of them, the word Rabbath, which was the chief city of the Ammonites, and upon the other, that of Jeruſalem, the capital of Judea; and then, putting them together, drew out one, which bearing the name of Jeruſalem, determined him to make war againſt the Jews.

Ver. 15. And it came to paſs, before he had done ſpeaking, that behold Rebecca came out, &c.] God hearkened to the prayer of this faithful ſervant, even before he had concluded it, and he ſaw a virgin of engaging beauty coming out of the city. Moſes has deſcribed her chaſtity by two ſynonymous words; upon which, ſome Jews, and, after them, Origen, who ſeems to affect ſurpaſſing them in ſingularities, preſent us with a ſet of obſervations, which the ſolemnity of this work, and even the laws of decency, would ſcarce allow us to relate, or found reaſon to eſpouſe.

Ver. 16. And ſhe went down to the well, and filled her pitcher, and came up.] This was an employment which the plain way of life of the firſt ages allowed them to conſign to maidens of the greateſt diſtinction; and we have ſeveral inſtances of it, both in ſacred and prophane hiſtory.

Ver. 19. And when ſhe had done giving him drink, ſhe ſaid I will draw water for thy camels alſo, until they have done drinking.] How is it poſſible that any of the Rabbins, who could not be ignorant that Rebecca had given drink to Eleazar, Abraham's ſervant, and likewiſe to ten camels, could believe, that ſhe was but three years old!

Ver. 22. And it came to paſs as the camels had done drinking, that the man took a golden ear-ring of half a ſhekel weight, and two bracelets for her hands, of ten ſhekels weight of gold.] It is impoſſible to be certain of the value of theſe preſents, without knowing what proportion gold bore to ſilver in thoſe days; but if we compute them according to the preſent value, which is as ſixteen to one, they will be worth 27 l. 6 s.

The reſt of this chapter is ſufficiently plain, without any further explication.

Chap. XXV.

1 The ſons of Abraham by Keturah: 5 The diviſion of his goods: 7 His age and death: 9 His burial. 12 The generations of Iſhmael: 17 His age and death. 21 Iſaac prayeth for Rebekah being barren: 22 The children ſtrive in her womb. 24 The birth of Eſau and Jacob: 27 Their difference. 29 Eſau ſelleth his birth-right.

THEN again Abraham took a wife, and her name was Keturah.

2 And ſhe bare him Zimran, and Jokſhan, and Medan, and Midian, and Iſhbak, and Shuah.

3 And Jokſhan begat Sheba, and Dedan. And the ſons of Dedan were Aſhurim, and Letuſhim, and Leummim.

4 And

G. Hoet delin. Hen. Fletcher Sculp.

Esau sells his birth-right for pottage of Lentiles.

4 And the ſons of Midian; Ephah, and Epher, and Hanoch, and Abidah, and Eldaah. All theſe were the children of Keturah.

5 ¶ And Abraham gave all that he had unto Iſaac.

6 But unto the ſons of the concubines which Abraham had, Abraham have gifts, and ſent them away from Iſaac his ſon (while he yet lived) eaſt-ward, unto the eaſt-country.

7 And theſe are the days of the years of Abrahams life which he lived, an hundred threeſcore and fifteen years.

8 Then Abraham gave up the ghoſt, and died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years; and was gathered to his people.

9 And his ſons Iſaac and Iſhmael buried him in the cave of Machpelah, in the field of Ephron the ſon of Zohar the Hittite, which is before Mamre;

10 The field which Abraham purchaſed of the ſons of Heth: there was Abraham buried, and Sarah his wife.

11 ¶ And it came to paſs after the death of Abraham, that God bleſſed his ſon Iſaac: and Iſaac dwelt by the well Lahai-roi.

12 ¶ Now theſe are the generations of Iſhmael Abrahams ſon, whom Hagar the Egyptian, Sarahs handmaid, bare unto Abraham.

13 And theſe are the names of the ſons of Iſhmael, by their names, according to their generations: The firſt-born of Iſhmael, Nebajoth; and Kedar, and Adbeel, and Mibſam,

14 And Miſhma, and Dumah, and Maſſa,

15 Hadar, and Tema, Jetur, Naphiſh, and Kedemah.

16 Theſe are the ſons of Iſhmael, and theſe are their names, by their towns, and by their caſtles; twelve princes according to their nations.

17 And theſe are the years of the life of Iſhmael; an hundred and thirty and ſeven years: and he gave up the ghoſt and died, and was gathered unto his people.

18 And they dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt, as thou goeſt towards Aſſyria: and he died in the preſence of all his brethren.

19 ¶ And theſe are the generations of Iſaac Abrahams ſon: Abraham begat Iſaac.

20 And Iſaac was forty years old when he took Rebekah to wife, the daughter of Bethuel the Syrian of Padan-aram, the ſiſter to Laban the Syrian.

21 And Iſaac intreated the LORD for his wife, becauſe ſhe was barren: and the LORD was intreated of him, and Rebekah his wife conceived.

22 And the children ſtruggled together within her: and ſhe ſaid, If it be ſo, why am I thus? and ſhe went to enquire of the LORD.

23 And the LORD ſaid unto her, Two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people ſhall be ſeparated from thy bowels: and the one people ſhall be ſtronger than the other people; and the elder ſhall ſerve the younger.

24 ¶ And when her days to be delivered were fulfilled, behold, there were twins in her womb.

25 And the firſt came out red, all over like an hairy garment: and they called his name Eſau.

26 And after that came his brother out, and his hand took hold on Eſau's heel; and his name was called Jacob: and Iſaac was threeſcore years old when ſhe bare them.

27 And the boys grew: and Eſau was a cunning hunter, a man of the field; and Jacob was a plain man dwelling in tents.

28 And Iſaac loved Eſau, becauſe he did eat of his veniſon: but Rebekah loved Jacob.

29 ¶ And Jacob ſod pottage: and Eſau came from the field, and he was faint.

30 And Eſau ſaid to Jacob, Feed me, I pray thee, with that ſame red pottage: for I am faint: therefore was his name called Edom.

31 And Jacob ſaid, Sell me this day thy birth-right.

32 And Eſau ſaid, Behold, I am at the point to die: and what profit ſhall this birth-right do to me?

33 And Jacob ſaid, Swear to me this day; and he ſware unto him: and he ſold his birth-right unto Jacob.

34 Then Jacob gave Eſau bread and pottage of lentiles; and he did eat and drink, and roſe up, and went his way: thus Eſau deſpiſed his birth-right.

Ver. 1. Then again Abraham took a wife, and her name was Keturah.] The Jews pretend that this Keturah was the ſame with Hagar, whom Abraham ſent for again, after his wife's death, and by whom he had all the children whoſe names are enumerated in the following verſes. The reaſons they alledge in favour of this opinion are, 1. Becauſe the Pſalmiſt calls the Midianites, which came of Keturah, Hagarens, Pſalm lxxxiii. 6. 2. It is ſaid they made war with the Hagarens, with Jethur.

Naphiſh, and Nadab, (1 Chron. ix.) who were the ſons of Iſhmael. And, 3. Becauſe Iſhmael Hagar's ſon is ſaid to have aſſiſted Iſaac at the funeral obſequies of their father Abraham. To which they add, that Hagar being Abraham's lawful wife, it was juſter for him to marry her than another. But theſe reaſons, and the change of her name from Hagar to Keturah, which ſignifies incenſe, and is ſaid to be the emblem of continency, in which ſhe had lived, ever ſince ſhe had been diſmiſſed from Abraham, are rabbinical dreams, for ſhe is ſtill called Hagar in the 12th verſe of this chapter. Beſides, the text is plain againſt them, it being ſaid, that Abraham added, or proceeded to take another wife, which is inconſiſtent with recalling one he had already diſmiſſed. Add to this, that Hagar was only a concubine, and is no where called a wife. As to the two paſſages of Scripture quoted above, we need only anſwer, that they prove not the Midianites, or any of Keturah's ſons to be called Hagarens; but that this laſt name was ſometimes expreſſive of all the poſterity of Iſhmael, ſome of whom were called Iſhmaelites, ſome Itureans, ſome Nebeans, &c.

Perhaps Keturah had been born and educated in Abraham's houſe, as Eliezer his ſteward was; and ſhe might probably have been the chief of the women as he was of the men-ſervants.

Ver. 2. And ſhe bare him Zimram, &c.] To the truth of this part of the hiſtory, we have the teſtimony of Pagan writers: For Alexander Polyhiſtor (mentioned by Joſephus, and by Euſebius L. 9. præpar Evang cap. 20.) tells us, that Cleodemus, called by ſome Malchas, writing the hiſtory of the Jews, reports juſt as Moſes doth, Ὅτι ἐκ Χετούρας Ἀβραάμῳ ἐγένοντο παῖδες ἱκανοί, that Abraham had ſeveral children by Keturah; three of whom he mentions by name.

Zimram with the reſt of his brethren, were ſent by Abraham their father into the Eaſt country, as appears by verſe 6. and therefore we muſt ſeek for them in thoſe parts; namely, Arabia and the adjacent countries, where ſome traces of them have remained for many Ages, particularly of Zimram; from whom we may well conclude the Zamareni were deſcended; a people mention'd by Pliny, with their town in Arabia Felix. L. vi. c. 28.

And Jockſhan.] We can find nothing concerning him but this; Theophanes a Chronographer, in the beginning of the ninth century, after he had treated of the Iſhmaelites and Madianites (the latter of whom came from one of Keturah's children;) and the parts of Arabia where Mohammed was born; immediately adds, that there were other people, ἐνδότερον, more in the bowels of Arabia, deſcended from Jectan, and called Amanitæ, that is Homeritæ, Perhaps it ſhould be written Jochſhan, not Jectan: for Philoſtorgius expreſly ſays of the Homeritæ, Ἐστὶ δὲ τὸ ἔθνος τοῦτο ἐκ Χετούρας, they are one of the nations deſcended from Keturah, L. iii. Hiſt. Eccles. § 4. where he relates a famous embaſſy which Conſtantius ſent to win them to Chriſtianity, and the good ſucceſs that attended it. And there is this ſtrong proof of their deſcent from ſome of Abraham's family, that they retained the rites of circumciſion, even when they were idolaters; for he declares expreſsly, that it was a circumciſed nation καὶ τὴν ὀγδόην περιτεμνομένων ἡμέραν, and circumciſed alſo on the eighth day, which was not the cuſtom of the Arabians, if we may believe Joſephus, L. i. antiq. c. 23. And Euſtathius in Hexameron, &c. who ſays, the Arabians ſtaid till they were thirteen years old, before they were circumciſed.

And Medan.] From whom the country called Madiana, in the ſouthern part of Arabia Felix, probably derived its name.

And Midian.] From whom Midianitis, in Arabia Petræa, received its denomination.

And Iſhbak.] We find no traces of his poſterity, unleſs it be in Bacaſcami, which Pliny ſays was one of the towns of the Zamareni; who deſcended from his eldeſt brother Zimram.

And Shuah.] Perhaps he had no children, or, ſo few that they were mixt with ſome of their other brethren, and left no name behind them. Yet Pliny mentions a town called Suaſa, in that part of Arabia which is next to Egypt.

Ver. 3. And Jokſhan begat Sheba.] There are four of this name, all comprehended by the Greek and Roman writers, under the name of Sabœans. One of them, the ſon of Raamah, had a brother called Dedan, as this Sheba had. But they were the fathers of a diſtinct people, as is evident from Scripture and other authors. For, beſides the Sabœi, in the remoteſt part of Arabia, near the Perſian and the Red Sea, there were alſo a people of that name (deſcended in all probability, from this ſon of Jokſhan,) in the very entrance of Arabia Felix, as Strabo informs us, who ſays, that they and the Nabatœi were the people next to Syria, and were wont to make excurſions upon their neighbours. By which we may underſtand (which otherwiſe could not be made out,) how the Sabœans broke into Jacob's country, and carried away his cattel: For it is not credible, that they could come from the Arabian or Perſian ſea; but from this country there was an eaſy paſſage, thro' the deſarts of Arabia, into the land of Uz, or Auſitis, which lay on the borders of Euphrates.

And Dedan.] There was one of his name, the ſon of Rhegma, Gen. x. 7. who gave name to a city upon the Perſian ſea, now called Dadan. Beſides that, there was an inland city, called Dedan, in the country of Idumea; mentioned by Jeremiah, xxv. 23. whoſe inhabitants are called Dedanim, Iſa. xxi. 13. and this Dedan, here mentioned, may well be thought to have been the founder of it.

And the ſons of Dedan were Aſhurim, and Letuſhim, and Leummim.] If theſe were heads of nations, or families, the memory of them is loſt.

Ver. 4. And the ſons of Midian, Ephah.] The name Ephah, the eldeſt ſon of Midian, continued a long time, for theſe two are mentioned as neighbours, by Iſa. lx. 6. and not only Joſephus, Euſebius, and Jerom, but the Nubienſian geographer alſo, tells us of a city called Madian, on the ſhore of the Red ſea; near to which was Ephah, in the province of Madian. Ephah, or Hipha is the ſame with that place the Greeks call Ἵππος, and Ptolemy mentions both a mountain and a village of this name, on the ſame ſhore, a little below Madiane, which is the Madian here mentioned.

And Epher.] We cannot find any remainders of this family, unleſs it be among the Homeritæ already mentioned, whoſe metropolis was called Τάφαρον, which city is mentioned by many other authors, particularly by Arrianus in his Periplus of the Red Sea, where he calls the capital of the Homeritæ, expreſly by the name of Ἀφάρ, Aphar, which, one cannot well doubt, came from this Epher.

And Hanoch.] In that part of Arabia Felix, where the Adranitæ were ſeated, was a great trading town called Cane, as Ptolemy informs us, and he points out its diſtance from Alexandria. Pliny alſo mentions a country in Arabia, which he calls Regio Canauna, which may be thought to have received its name from this perſon and his poſterity.

And Abidah.] The relicks of this name remain (if the two laſt ſyllables, as uſual, be inverted,) in the people called Ἀβηνοὶ, who lived in an iſland called Ἀβὼ or Ἀβῶς, which lay between Arabia, and India. But Pliny, reckoning up the tracts of Arabia, places the iſle called Devadæ (which we take to be this) over-againſt the region already mentioned, called Canauna, and Strabo, as Gothofred obſerves, Agatharcides; others call it Ἀέβαι.

And Eldaah.] We are unable to diſcover any remains of this name, unleſs it be in the city Elana, (which might eaſily be formed from Eldaah, by leaving out the Hebrew letter Daleth, and turning the Ain into Nun, than which nothing is more common) which was ſeated in the Arabian Gulph towards the Eaſt; called by others Αἰλάνα, Ælana. from whence the gulph itſelf was called Elanites, and the people that border'd on it Elanitæ.

Ver. 6. But unto the ſons of the concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, &c.] The concubines here mentioned, were Hagar and Keturah, who indeed were wives, but of an inferior claſs, according to the manner of thoſe times, and countries; Keturah is expreſly called his concubine, 1 Chron. i. 32.

And ſent them away ——— unto the Eaſt country.] Into Arabia, and the adjacent countries, as was intimated before; for the Midianites are called the children of the Eaſt. Judg. vi. 3, 33. vii. 12. viii. 10.

Ver. 8. And Abraham gave up the ghoſt, and died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years; and was gathered to his people.] One perceives nothing here, that can can either ſtrike the eyes or ſhock our reaſon. Abraham dies: What can be more common? He dies at the age of 175 years: There is more cauſe to be ſurpriſed, that he attained to ſuch an age, than that he did not exceed it. But this event, (in which, at the firſt view, there appears nothing extraordinary) opens, either a ſource of difficulties that ſeem to run counter to the greateſt truths of religion, or it affords us a fruitful ſource of evidences for eſtabliſhing the ſame, according to the different views in which it happens to be conſidered.

This Abraham, whom we ſee expiring, and afterwards lodged in the earth, was the favourite of heaven, to whom God himſelf was pleaſed to ſay, I am thy ſhield, and thy exceeding great reward; and yet we find nothing in all the temporal bleſſings of this excellent patriarch, comparable either with the greatneſs of that God who made the promiſe, or with the faithfulneſs of that ſervant, to whom it was pronounced. Shall a few oxen; a few ſheep; a few acres of land; and a few years of life, exhauſt the liberality of a God ſo mighty and ſo bountiful!

The ſervant to whom the promiſe was made, was a man; and conſequently a ſinner, and therefore in no condition to pretend to a reward ſtrictly ſo called; but on the other hand, he is the father of believers, and the model of faith and obedience to all ages. For God, he forſook his native land, his eſtate and family: For God, he believed that which was above belief, and hoped againſt hope. For the ſame God, he prepared to ſacrifice his ſon Iſaac, and ſurmounted the uſual tenderneſs of parents for their children. He prepared the funeral pile; he lifted up his arm, and would have pierced the innocent victim, if the God, who pronounced the decree, had not himſelf revoked it. Who can ſuppoſe, after all this, that the land of Canaan alone (tho' flowing with milk and honey) was all the bleſſing wherewith a God ſo mighty and ſo beneficent, did crown the vertue of a ſervant ſo faithful and ſo obedient.

Nay more, that promiſe made by God to Abraham, to give him the poſſeſſion of the land of Canaan, was not even accompliſhed in the literal acceptation. 'Tis true, Abraham had great riches, but his life was croſſed with a variety of afflictions: the diviſion of his kindred, domeſtic diſagreements, and continual fatigues in his travels. Let a man ſearch the life of that patriarch, for a period in which the promiſe made to him was compleatly fulfilled; he will find none. He will indeed diſcover that Abraham was a ſtranger, dwelling in tabernacles, with Iſaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the ſame promiſe, Heb. xi. 9. 16. teſtifying thereby that they waited for a better country than that of which the poſſeſſion had been promiſed them. He poſſeſſed no more of the land of Canaan, than a ſmall portion of ground for a ſepulchre, and even this he was obliged to purchaſe for a ſum of money. But are not all theſe difficulties convincing proofs of the immortality of Abraham's ſoul, and perhaps of the reſurrection of his body? I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob. This cannot be fulfilled in the grave, among worms and putrefaction; it muſt therefore be Abraham, immortal in his ſoul, and renovated in his body, that muſt verify the prediction. Since God is not the God of the dead, but of the living.

We acknowledge, that this way of reaſoning may be thought to prove, in ſome meaſure, the immortality of Abraham's ſoul, but not the reſurrection of his body. In anſwer to which, we ſhall only obſerve, that men are not pure ſpirits; like thoſe who are capable of perfect felicity, without the concurrence of matter. The two ſubſtances which compoſe men, ſeem to intimate, that the one cannot be compleatly happy without the other. Accordingly it is to be preſumed, that whatever happineſs may be enjoyed by good men, in the interval between their death and reſurrection, tho' it may greatly exceed all the felicity they ever experienced on earth, yet it will not be compleat till after the re-union of the ſoul and the body.

'Tis upon this account, that ſo many paſſages of ſcripture refer the perfections of our bliſs to that period. Such as 2 Tim. i, 12. and 4, 8. 1 John iii 2. Col. iii. 4. Pſal. xvii. 15. Theſe paſſages have puzled ſome commentators, who have made them the foundation of various ſyſtems that are not to be maintained. Some of them pretending from hence, that the ſoul is inſenſible after death, others, that it is entirely annihilated. But as theſe ſuppoſitions preſent us with a fair opportunity of vindicating the immateriality and immortality of the ſoul, and conſequently its ſenſibility after death, we ſhall endeavour to demonſtrate thoſe great and important points, in ſuch a manner, as we hope will be ſatisfactory and inſtructive to our readers; and we think ſuch a diſſertation the more neceſſary, becauſe theſe doctrines are denied by ſeveral perſons, who would willingly have mankind eſteem them much greater maſters of reaſon and literature, than thoſe who believe theſe noble points.

The ſoul cannot be meer matter, for if it is, then either all matter muſt think, or the difference muſt ariſe from the different modification, magnitude, figure, or motion, of ſome parcels of matter, in reſpect of others: Or a faculty of thinking muſt be ſuper-added to ſome ſyſtems of it, which is not ſuper-added to others. But that poſition, which makes all matter cogitative, is contrary to all the apprehenſions and knowledge we have of the nature of it; nor can it be true, unleſs our ſenſes and faculties be contrived to deceive us. We perceive not the leaſt ſymptom of cogitation, or ſenſe, in our tables, chairs, &c.

Why doth the ſcene of thinking lie in our heads, and all the miniſters of ſenſation make their reports to ſomething there, if all matter be apprehenſive, and cogitative? For, in that caſe, there would be as much thought and underſtanding in our heels, and every where elſe, as in our heads.

If matter be cogitative, then it muſt be ſo as matter, and thinking muſt be of the eſſence and definition of it: Whereas, by matter, no more is meant but a ſubſtance extended, and impenetrable to other matter; and ſince, for this reaſon, it cannot be neceſſary for matter to think (becauſe it may be matter without this property); it therefore cannot think as matter only.

If thinking, ſelf-conſciouſneſs, &c. were eſſential to matter, every part of it muſt have them: and then no ſyſtem could have them. For a ſyſtem of material parts would be a ſyſtem of things conſcious, every one by itſelf of its own exiſtence and individuality, and conſequently thinking by itſelf: But there could be no one act of ſelf conſciouſneſs, or thought, common to the whole. Juxtapoſition, in this caſe, could ſignify nothing: The diſtinction and individuation of the ſeveral particles, would be as much retained in their vicinity, as if they were ſeparated by miles.

In the next place, the faculties of thinking, &c. cannot ariſe from the ſize, figure, texture, or motion of matter; becauſe bodies, by the alteration of theſe, only become greater or leſs; round or ſquare, &c. rare, or denſe, tranſlated from one place to another, with this or that new direction, or velocity, or the like: all which ideas are quite different from that of thinking: And there cannot be any relation between them. Theſe modifications of matter are ſo far from being principles or cauſes of thinking and acting, that they are themſelves but effects, proceeding from the action of ſome other matter or thing upon it, and are proofs of its paſſivity, deadneſs, and utter incapacity of becoming cogitative. This is evident to ſenſe.

Let the materialiſt examine well, whether he does not feel ſomething within himſelf, that acts from an internal principle: Whether he doth not experience ſome liberty, ſome power of governing himſelf, and chooſing: Whether he does not enjoy a kind of inviſible empire, in which he commands his own thoughts, ſends them to this or that place, employs them about this or that buſineſs, forms ſuch and ſuch deſigns and ſchemes: And whether there is any thing like this in bare matter, however faſhion'd and proportion'd; and which, if nothing could protrude or communicate motion to it, would for ever remain fixt to the place where it happens to be; an eternal monument of its own being dead. Can ſuch an active being as the ſoul can, the ſubject of ſo many powers, be itſelf nothing but an accident?

When I begin to move myſelf, I do it for ſome reaſon, and with reſpect to ſome end, the means to effect which I have, if there be occaſion for it, concerted within myſelf: and this doth not look like motion meerly material, or in which matter is only concerned, which is all mechanical. Who can imagine matter to be moved by arguments, or ever placed ſyllogiſms and demonſtrations among levers and pullies?

They who fancy, that matter may come to live, think, and act ſpontaneouſly, by being reduced to a certain magnitude, or having its parts placed after a certain manner, or being being inveſted with ſuch a figure, or excited by ſuch a particular motion; would do well to diſcover to us that degree of fineneſs, that alteration in the ſituation of its parts, &c. at which matter may begin to find itſelf alive and cogitative; and to let us know which is the critical minute that introduces theſe important properties; if they cannot do this, nor have their eye upon any particular criſis, it is a ſign they have no good reaſon for what they ſay. For if they have no reaſon to charge this change upon any particular degree or difference, one more than another, they have no reaſon to charge it upon any degree or difference at all; and then they have no reaſon, by which they can prove that ſuch a change is made at all. Beſides all which, ſince magnitude, figure, motion, are but accidents of matter, not matter itſelf, and only the ſubſtance is truly matter; and ſince the ſubſtance of any one part of matter, does not differ from that of another, if any matter can be by nature cogitative, all muſt be ſo: But this we have ſeen cannot be.

If, therefore, there is any ſuch thing as matter that thinks, &c. this muſt be a particular privilege granted to it: that is, a faculty of thinking muſt be ſuperadded to certain parts or parcels of it. But the truth is, matter ſeems not capable of ſuch improvement, of being made to think. For ſince it is not of the eſſence of matter, it cannot be made to be ſo, without making it another kind of ſubſtance from what it is. Nor can it be made to ariſe from any of the modifications or accidents of matter; and in reſpect of what elſe can any matter be made to differ from other matter?

The accidents of matter are ſo far from being made by any power to produce cogitation, that ſome even of them ſhew it incapable of having a faculty of thinking ſuperadded. The very diviſibility of it does this. For that which is made to think, muſt either be one part, or more parts joined together. But we know no ſuch thing as a part of matter purely one, or indiviſible. It may indeed have pleaſed the author of nature, that there ſhould be atoms, whoſe parts are actually indiſcerpible and which may be the principles of other bodies: But ſtill they conſiſt of parts, tho' firmly adhering together. And if the ſeat of cogitation be in more parts than one (whether they lie cloſe together or are looſe, or in a ſtate of fluidity, it is the ſame thing) how can it be avoided, but that either there muſt be ſo many ſeveral minds, or thinking ſubſtances, as there are parts; or elſe that there muſt be ſomething elſe ſuper-added for them to center in, to unite their acts and make their thoughts to be one? And then what can this be but ſome other ſubſtance which is purely one?

Matter by itſelf can never entertain abſtracted and general ideas, ſuch as many in our minds are. For could it reflect upon what paſſes within itſelf, it could poſſibly find there nothing but material and particular impreſſions; abſtractions and metaphyſical ideas could not be imprinted upon it. How could one abſtract from matter who is himſelf nothing but matter? And then as to material images themſelves, which are uſually ſuppoſed to be impreſt upon the brain, or ſome part of it, and ſtock the phantaſy and memory, that which peruſes the impreſſions and traces there, or any where, muſt be ſomething diſtinct from the brain, or that upon which thoſe impreſſions are made: Otherwiſe it muſt contemplate it ſelf, and be both reader and book. And this other diſtinct contemplating being, cannot be meerly corporeal, any more than the body can perceive and think without a ſoul. For ſuch a corporeal being muſt require ſenſe, and ſuitable organs, to perceive and read thoſe characters and veſtigia of things; and ſo another organiſed body would be introduced, and the ſame queſtions and difficulties redoubled, concerning the ſoul of that body, and its faculties.

The faculty of thinking ſo much talked of by ſome, as ſuper-added to certain ſyſtems of matter, muſt in reality amount to the ſame thing as another ſubſtance endued with the faculty of thinking. For a faculty of thinking alone, will not make up the idea of a human ſoul, which is endued with many faculties; and therefore, whatever it is that is ſuperadded, it muſt be ſomething which is endued with all thoſe faculties. And whether that can be a faculty of thinking; and ſo the other faculties be only faculties of a faculty; or whether they muſt not all be rather the faculties of ſome ſubſtance, which being (by their own conceſſion) ſuper-added to matter, muſt be different from it, we leave the unprejudiced to determine.

If men would but ſeriouſly look into themſelves, we are perſuaded the ſoul would not appear to them as a faculty of the body, or kind of appurtenance to it; but rather, as ſome ſubſtance, properly placed in it, not only to uſe it as an inſtrument, and act by it, but alſo to govern it according to its own reaſon. For it is plain enough, that the mind, tho' it acts under great limitations, doth however, in many inſtances, govern the body arbitrarily: And it is monſtrous to ſuppoſe this governour to be nothing but ſome fit diſpoſition, or accident, (ſuper-added) of that matter which is governed. A ſhip, it is true, would not be fit for navigation, if it was not built and provided in a proper manner: But then, when it has its proper form, and is become a ſyſtem of materials fitly diſpoſed, it is not this diſpoſition that governs it. It is the man, that other ſubſtance, who ſits at the Helm, and they, who manage the ſails and tackle, that do this. So our veſſels, without a proper organization and conformity of parts, would not be capable of being acted upon as they are; but ſtill it is not the ſhape, or modification, or any other accident, that can govern them. The capacity of being governed or uſed, can never be the governor, applying and uſing that capacity. No, there muſt be at the Helm, ſomething diſtinct, that commands the body, and without which it would run adrift, or rather ſink.

The immateriality of the ſoul being thus proved, we may ſafely affirm, that the ſoul of man ſubſiſts after the diſſolution of his body: Or is immortal. For 1. If it is immaterial, it is indiſcerpible, and therefore incapable of being diſſolved, or demoliſhed as bodies are. Such a being can only periſh by annihilation: That is, it will continue to ſubſiſt and live, if ſome other being, able to do this, doth not, by a particular act, annihilate it. And if there is any reaſon to believe, that, at the death of every man, there is always ſuch a particular annihilation, let him that knows it produce it. Certainly to reduce any ſubſtance into nothing, requires juſt the ſame power, as to convert nothing into ſomething: And we believe thoſe, who deny the immortality of the ſoul, will be cautious how they admit any ſuch power.

To introduce matter with a faculty of thinking, or a thinking matter, is to introduce matter with a new and oppoſite property: And that is to introduce a new ſpecies of matter, which will differ as eſſentially from the other common unthinking kind, as any ſpecies whatſoever doth from its oppoſite, and even as body from ſpirit. For thinking, and unthinking, differ as corporeal and incorporeal: And if ſo, this thinking matter muſt always continue to think, till either it is annihilated, or there is a tranſmutation of one ſpecies into another; and to take refuge in either of theſe expectations, is, at leaſt, to expect omnipotence ſhould interpoſe to help out a bad cauſe.

If any one ſhould ſay, that God might, by virtue of his omnipotence, ſuperadd, to certain parcels of matter, a fourth dimenſion, we ſhould not diſpute the divine power; but we might ſay, that ſuch matter, exiſting under four dimenſions, would eſſentially differ from that which cannot exiſt under four, or which can exiſt but only under three; and that this four-dimenſion'd matter muſt always remain ſuch, becauſe no ſubſtance can be changed into, or become another, eſſentially different; nor do we know of any, that, by the courſe of nature, ceaſes totally to be, or is reduced to nothing.

The next argument ſhall proceed by way of objection and anſwer; becauſe a removal of the principal objection againſt any thing, is a good argument for it. Object. It ſeems as if thinking was not eſſential to the ſoul, but rather a capacity of thinking under certain circumſtances; for it doth not think, when it lies concealed in the primitive rudiment of the man, in the womb, perhaps in the beginning of infancy, in ſleep, in a ſwoon: And the reaſon of this ſeems to lie in the circumſtances of the body, which either is not ſufficiently extended, and prepared, or, for a while, employs the ſpirits wholly in the digeſtion of its aliment, and other offices in the animal œconomy; or by ſome external attack, or the working of ſome enemy got into it, hath its parts diſorder'd, and the paſſages ſo poſſeſſed, that the blood, and other fluids, can ſcarce break through; or after ſome ſuch manner is preternaturally affected. And therefore the queſtion to be reſolv'd is not, Whether the ſoul is material or immaterial; and much leſs, whether it will be annihilated at death; but whether whether that ſoul (be it what it will), which ceaſes to think, when the body is not fitly diſpoſed, can think at all, when the body is quite diſſolved, and leaves the ſoul no opportunity of actuating it any more, or operating by it. Anſ. If this objection cannot be fully anſwer'd, till we know more of the nature of ſpiritual beings, and of that band by which the ſoul and body are connected, than we do at preſent; it muſt not be looked upon as certainly unanſwerable in itſelf. It may, perhaps, be poſſible to turn it even into an argument for the immortality of the ſoul.

The ſoul, it cannot be denied, is a limited being, or a being which acts under limitations. Theſe limitations, at different times, are different, its activity and faculties being more obſtructed or clogg'd at one time, than another, and moſt of all in ſleep, or a ſwoon: As theſe obſtructions are remov'd, it acts more clearly and freely; and therefore if the ſtate of the ſoul in the body (its confinement here) may be conſidered as one general and great limitation, why, when this limitation ſhall be taken off, this great obſtruction remov'd, may it not be allow'd to act with ſtill greater freedom and clearneſs; the greateſt it is capable of? Whilſt it remains in the brain, it can, as it were, look out at a few apertures; that is, receive the notices of many things by thoſe nerves and organs, which are the inſtruments of ſenſation: But if any of thoſe avenues to it be ſtopt, that branch of its knowledge is, for a time, cut off. If thoſe tracks, in the brain, or thoſe marks, whatever they are, and wherever they are imprinted, upon which our memory, and images of things, ſeem to depend, are filled up, or overcaſt by any vapour, or otherwiſe darken'd, it can read them no more, till the cloud is diſpers'd (for it can't read what is not legible, and, indeed, for the preſent, not there). And ſince, even in abſtracted reflexions, the mind is obliged to make uſe of words, or ſome kind of ſigns, to fix its ideas, and to render them tractable and ſtable enough to be perus'd, compar'd, &c. and this kind of language depends upon memory; whilſt this is intermitted, the uſe of the other is taken away, with all that depends upon it. This is the preſent ſtate of the ſoul; and from hence the reaſon appears, in ſome meaſure, why we do not think in profound ſleep, &c. but it does not follow from hence, that the ſoul cannot ſubſiſt and act under more enlarged circumſtances. That which, being confined to the body, and able to act only according to the opportunities this affords, can now perceive viſible objects only with two eyes (at two windows), becauſe there are no more, might doubtleſs ſee with four, if there were ſo many, properly plac'd and diſpos'd; or if its habitation were all eye (window all round) might ſee all round. And ſo, in general, that which now can know many things by the impreſſions made at the end of the nerves, or by the intervention of our preſent organs, and in this ſituation and incloſure, can know them no other way, may, for all that, when it comes to be loos'd out of that priſon, know them immediately, or by ſome other medium. That, which is now forc'd to make ſhift with words and ſigns of things in its reaſonings, may, when it ſhall be ſet at liberty, and can come at them, reaſon upon the intuition of things themſelves, or uſe a language more ſpiritual or ideal. We ſay, it is not impoſſible, that this ſhould be the caſe; and therefore no one can ſay, with reaſon, that it is not. This ſuffices to remove the force of the objection. But further.

A man, when he wakes, or comes to himſelf (which phraſe implies what we are going to ſay) immediately knows this, and knows himſelf to be the ſame ſoul that he was before his ſleep, or fainting away. We will ſuppoſe, that he is alſo conſcious to himſelf, that, in thoſe intervals, he thought not at all (which is the ſame the objector muſt ſuppoſe): That is, if his body had been cut to pieces, or moulder'd to duſt, he could not have thought leſs: For there is no thinking leſs than not thinking at all. From hence, then, we gather, that the ſoul preſerves a capacity of thinking under thoſe circumſtances and indiſpoſitions of the body, in which it thinks no more than if the body was deſtroyed; and, if ſo, what can this capacity be preſerved for? Certainly not, that it may never be exerted. The author of nature doth not uſe to act after that manner. So that here is this dilemma to be oppoſed to the objection: In ſleep and ſwoonings the ſoul doth either think, or not; if it does, the objection has no foundation; and if it does not, then all that will follow which we have juſt now ſaid.

If we ſhould ſuppoſe the ſoul to be a being by nature made to inform ſome body, and that it cannot exiſt and act in a ſtate of total ſeparation from all body; it would not follow from hence, that what we call death, muſt therefore reduce it to a ſtate of abſolute inſenſibility and inactivity, which, to it, would be equal to non-exiſtence. For that body, which is ſo neceſſary to it, may be ſome fine vehicle, that dwells with it in the brain, and goes off with it at death. Neither the anſwer to the objection, nor the caſe after death, will be much altered by ſuch a ſuppoſition; and ſince we can ſee no abſurdity in it, we will try to explain it a little further. We are ſenſible of many material impreſſions (impreſſions made upon us by material cauſes, or bodies): That there are ſuch, we are ſure; therefore there muſt be ſome matter within us, which being mov'd or preſs'd upon, the ſoul apprehends it immediately. And therefore, again, there muſt be ſome matter to which it is immediately and intimately united and related, in ſuch a manner, as it is not related to any other. Let us now ſuppoſe this matter to be ſome refined and ſpirituous vehicle, which the ſoul doth immediately inform; with which it ſympathizes, by which it acts, and is acted upon, and to which it is vitally and inſeparably united: And that this animated vehicle has its abode in the brain, among the heads and beginnings of the nerves. Suppoſe we, alſo, that when any impreſſions are made upon the organs or parts of the body, the effects of them are carried, by the nerves, up to their fountain, and the place where the ſoul in its vehicle is; and there they communicate their ſeveral motions and tremors to this material vehicle; ſo that the ſoul, which inhabits it in a peculiar manner, and is thoroughly poſſeſſed of it, ſhall be apprehenſive of theſe motions or preſſures: And, moreover, that this vehicle, ſo guarded, and encompaſſed by the body as it is, can be come at, or mov'd by external objects, no other way but by the mediation of the nerves; nor the ſoul, by conſequence, have any direct intelligence concerning them, or correſpondence with them, any other way. And as we ſuppoſe the ſoul to receive notices of things from without, in this manner; ſo let us ſuppoſe, on the other ſide, that, by moving its own vehicle, it may produce motion in the contiguous ſpirits and nerves, and ſo move the body: We mean when nothing renders them unfit to be mov'd. Let us ſuppoſe, further, that the ſoul, by means of this vehicle, feels or finds thoſe prints and portraits, or thoſe effects and remains, left by objects on the mind, in ſome manner or other, which cauſe the remembrance of words and things: We mean again, when they are not filled up, or obſcured by any thing; or when there are any ſuch to be felt. And, laſtly, let us ſuppoſe, that if the ſoul, in its more abſtracted and purer reaſonings, or more ſpiritual acts, has any occaſion for matter, to ſerve it, the matter of this vehicle is that which is always with it, and ſerves it; all which it is eaſy to underſtand, and perhaps not very difficult to ſuppoſe. On the contrary, by many ſymptoms it appears moſt probable, that that matter, to which the mind is immediately preſent, and in which is its true Shekinah, is not the whole groſs body, but ſome ſubtile body, placed in the region of the brain. For there all the conveyances of ſenſible ſpecies conſpire to meet, and there, in reflexion, we find our ſelves: When a limb is loſt, the ſoul, 'tis true, loſes an opportunity of receiving intelligence from, or by, it, and of uſing it, but perceives no loſs in it ſelf: And tho' the body, many parts of it at leaſt, are in a perpetual flux, and continually altering; yet I know that the ſubſtance, which thinks within me now (or rather, which is I) is, notwithſtanding all the changes my body has undergone, the very ſame which thought many years ago, and ever ſince. Now, to anſwer the objection, and apply all this to our purpoſe; Why do we not perceive external objects in our ſleep, or in a ſwoon? Becauſe the paſſages are become impracticable, the windows ſhut, and the nerves, being obſtructed, or ſome how rendered, for the time, uſeleſs, can tranſmit no information to it. Why, however, does the ſoul not reaſon and think about ſomething or other? Becauſe, all the marks by which things are remember'd, being, for the preſent, choak'd up, or diſorder'd, the remembrance of thoſe objects, about which it is wont to employ it ſelf, and even of the words, or other ſigns, in which it uſes to reaſon, and to preſerve the deductions and concluſions it makes, is all ſuſpended and loſt for the time; and ſo its tables being cover'd, its books cloſed, and its tools locked up, the requiſites for reaſoning are wanting, and no ſubject offers itſelf, to exerciſe its thoughts, it having yet had little or no opportunity to take in higher objects, and more refined matter for contemplation. And, to conclude, if it be demanded, why any one ſhould imagine, that the ſoul may think, perceive, act after death, when it doth not do this in ſleep, &c. the anſwer is; becauſe thoſe incloſures and impediments, which occaſioned the fore-mentioned intermiſſions, and thoſe great limitations under which it now labours, will be removed, with its inlargement, out of the body. When it ſhall, in its proper vehicle, be let go, and take its flight into the open fields of heaven, it will then be bare to the immediate impreſſions of objects: And why ſhould not thoſe impreſſions, which affected the nerves, that moved and affected the vehicle and ſoul in it, affect the vehicle immediately, when they are immediately made upon it, without the interpoſition of the nerves? The hand, which feels an object at the end of a ſtaff, may certainly be allowed to feel the ſame much better by immediate contact, without the ſtaff. Nay, why ſhould we not think, that it may admit of more objects, and the knowledge of more things, than it can now; ſince being expoſed all round to the influences of them, it may be moved not only by viſible objects, juſt at the extremities of the optic nerves, by ſounds at the ends of the auditory, &c. but become, as it were all eye to viſible objects, all ear to audible, and ſo on? And why ſhould we not think this the rather, becauſe then the ſoul may be alſo perceptive of finer impreſſions and etherial contacts, and conſequently of more kinds of objects, ſuch as we are now incapable of knowing? And, this being ſo, why ſhould we not preſage, that other indowments, faculties of reaſoning, communicating thoughts, and the like, will be proportionable to ſuch noble opportunities of knowledge?

Having thus proved, as we hope, the immateriality and immortality of the ſoul (tho' there are other arguments which likewiſe appear to us, demonſtrative of this great truth, and which we ſhall have occaſion to offer to our readers, in the courſe of this work;) we may juſtly conclude, that death was ſo far from reducing the ſoul of Abraham to a ſtate of inſenſibility, that, on the contrary, it opened to him a happy paſſage into a nobler ſtate of exiſtence, and conducted him to that glorious reward of his faith, which he did not experience on this ſide the grave; and that he is now adoring the God in whom he truſted; and is rejoycing in the fruition of that happineſs, which is reſerved for the ſpirits of juſt men made perfect.

We ſhall not, at preſent, enter upon the proof of the reſurrection of the body, as being unwilling to draw this diſſertation into too great a length, but we ſhall hereafter have an opportunity of conſidering this great article of faith, and hope to eſtabliſh it by ſuch arguments as may be thought to have ſome weight. For the preſent, therefore, we ſhall cloſe our account of this illuſtrious father of the faithful, with obſerving, that his hiſtory has been embelliſhed with many extraordinary fictions, by the Jews, Arabians, and Indians. Such as his teaching aſtronomy and other ſciences in Egypt; his inventing the Hebrew characters and language; his compoſing ſeveral books, and in particular, the famous work called Jetzirah; or the the creation, mentioned in the Talmud, and highly valued by ſeveral learned Rabbies. There is alſo an Apocalypſe aſcribed to him, by the Sethians, a ſect of Heretics, that ſprung up in the earlieſt times of Chriſtianity. His aſſumption is mentioned by Athanaſius; and Origen tells us of an apocryphal book, pretended to be written by Abraham, wherein a good and a bad angel are introduced diſputing about his ſalvation. The Jews make him the compoſer of ſome prayers, and of the 90th Pſalm; and likewiſe of a treatiſe againſt idolatry. The Indian worſhippers of fire, who think him to have been the ſame with their great Zoroaſter, attribute to him the books of the latter, which they call Zend, Pazend, and Voſtah, containing all the principles of their religion. The learned Dr. Prideaux mentions them as one book, or perhaps, three books in one volume, which he calls Zendeviſti, which name he informs us, ſignifies a fire kindler, and was given it by the author, to inſinuate, that it would kindle a brighter fire in thoſe who ſhould read it with attention and devotion.

The death of Abraham is related in this chapter by way of anticipation, for Eſau and Jacob were born before he died, and were fifteen years of age at that time. For Iſaac was but ſixty years old when they were born, and ſeventy-five at the death of Abraham, who was in the 100 year of his age, at Iſaac's birth, and lived one hundred and ſeventy-five years.

Ver. 12. Now theſe are the generations of Iſhmael.] Moſes having, in the preceding verſe, mentioned the bleſſing of God which attended Iſaac, after his father's death, takes this occaſion to ſhew, that God was not unmindful of his promiſe made to Abraham, concerning Iſhmael.

Ver. 13. ——— The firſt born of Iſhmael, Nebajoth.] The poſterity of Nebajoth gave the denomination to the whole country of Arabia Petræa (the beſt tract of which they inhabited) and which Pliny, Strabo, and Ptolemy, call Nabatæa, and ſome other authors Nabathis. Theſe are commonly called in Scripture Iſhmaelites, and they dwelt near to the Midianites, their half brethren; for in the ſtory of Joſeph, he is ſaid, in one place, to be ſold to the Iſhmaelites, and, in another, to the Midianites, they being neighbours and copartners in traffick.

Kedar.] His poſterity, called Kadareni, and by Pliny, Cedreni, were alſo ſeated in Arabia Petræa, and their name was ſo famous, that ſome authors call the whole country Kedar. For the language of Kedar, is called the Arabian language; and when David complains that he had dwelt long in the tents of Kedar, the Chaldee expounds it, in the dwelling of the Arabians; and thoſe Arabians called Scenitæ, were properly the people of Kedar. We mean, thoſe of the Arabians who dwelt in Arabia Petræa; for there were other tribes of them, ſome in Arabia Felix, and others near the Euphrates.

Ver. 14. Dumah.] He ſeems, by Iſa. xxi. 11. to have been ſeated near Idumea.

Ver. 15. Hadar.] Some think the Athritæ, in Arabia Felix, deſcended from him, and there was a city, in that country, called Tema, from the next ſon of Iſhmael, and Jetur the next ſon to him, may well be thought to have been the father of the Ituræi in Cœlo Syria. Kedemah, the laſt of Iſhmael's ſons ſeems to have dwelt near his brother Kedar: for ſo Jacobus Capellus expounds thoſe words, Jer. xlix. 28. Go up to Kedar, and ſpoil the men of Kedem (which we tranſlate, the men of the Eaſt.) There are ſome other people, in thoſe countries, whoſe names have ſome ſimilitude to thoſe of the reſt of Iſhmael's ſons, but we omit any further enquiry after them, enough having been ſaid, to ſhew the truth of this account given by Moſes of Iſhmael's poſterity.

Ver. 16. Twelve princes, according to their nations.] Or rather, twelve heads of ſo many ſeveral houſes, tribes, or clans, which form of government continued among them till 400 years after Chriſt.

Ver. 18. And they dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, &c.] Joſephus ſays, that the Iſhmaelites poſſeſſed the whole tract between Euphrates and the Red ſea; which appears, to be a miſrepreſentation. For between them and the Euphrates, were the Amalekites, and Moabites, who did not themſelves extend ſo far as the Euphrates. The Iſhmaelites therefore, inhabited the country, which, in that eaſtward part, which was next to the Amalekites, was called the wilderneſs of Havilah; and in that part next to Egypt, was called the wilderneſs of Shur. And in other places of Scripture it is called Kedar, the wilderneſs of Paran, and the wilderneſs of ſin; all which were afterwards comprehended under the name of Arabia.

And he died in the preſence of all his brethren.] He dwelt, till death, in the preſence, or in the neighbourhood of all his brethren, and was in a flouriſhing condition.

Ver. 20. And Iſaac was forty years old when he took Rebekah to wife, the daughter of Bethuel the Syrian of Padan-aram, &c.] Bethuel and Laban are called Aramites, or Syrians; not becauſe they were of that nation, but becauſe they lived in the country of Aram, or Syria, that is, in Padan-aram, as it is here explained, and appears more fully from Rebekah's diſcourſe with her ſon Jacob, when ſhe ſent him thither chap. xxxviii. 2, 5. and where he, living twenty years with his uncle Laban, was upon that that account, called a Syrian, tho' born in Canaan. Deut. xxvi. 5. Padan-aram was a part of Meſopotamia; we ſay a part of it; for Meſopotamia itſelf was called Aram-Naharaim, or Syria between the rivers, which were Euphrates and Tigris. This country was divided into two parts, one toward the North, from the mountains of Armenia to the river Chaboras, or Araxes, from whence Balaam ſeems to have been invited by Balak, Numb. xxiii. 7. and which was exceeding fruitful, and upon that account called Padan, which ſignifies the ſame in Arabia, that Sede doth in Hebrew, i. e. a field. And therefore what Moſes calls going to Padan-aram, Gen. xxviii. 2. The Prophet Hoſea calls fleeing to Sede Aram, into the country or field of Syria. Hoſea xii. 12. The other part of Meſopotamia was ſoutherly, from the fore-named river, unto Babylon, and was very ſtony and unfertile. The Syrians lived in the former, and the Arabians in the latter, as Bochart obſerves, L. ii. Phaleg. c. 6.

Ver. 21. And Iſaac intreated the Lord for his wife, becauſe ſhe was barren.] The Hebrew word Atar, ſignifies to beſeech with earneſtneſs and importunity; the ardent deſire of obtaining the promiſed Meſſiah, cauſing barrenneſs to be conſidered as one of the greateſt calamities.

Ver. 22. And the children ſtruggled together in her womb, and ſhe ſaid, If it be ſo, why am I thus?] If I am not likely to be delivered of my burden, to what purpoſe did I conceive?

And ſhe went to enquire of the Lord.] There was ſome appointed place, where the divine Majeſty condeſcended to appear to his people, and which was the ſtated place of their worſhip. Thither did Rebekah reſort, in the intermiſſion of her throws, to conſult the Deity, with relation to the event.

Ver. 25. —— And they called his name Eſau.] The meaning of this name is ſomething obſcure; if we derive it, as ſome do, from the Hebrew word Haſſah, to make, it may denote his being born in a more perfect ſtate, than children uſually are, for he was as hairy as others are at man's eſtate. But we think it may as well denote the activity of his genius, which his parents might naturally preſage from his appearance.

Ver. 26. And after that came his brother out, and his hand took hold on Eſau's heel, and his name was called Jacob.] Jacob ſignifies a ſupplanter, being derived from the Hebrew word Hekeb, which denotes, a heel. And the future conduct of this ſon perfectly correſponded with the ſignification of his name.

Ver. 30. And Eſau ſaid to Jacob, feed me, I pray thee, with that ſame red pottage.] The Lentils of which the context inform us this pottage was made, were, according to St. Auſtin, of the Egyptian kind, which were much eſteemed, and it is probable they imparted a red tincture, to the pottage in which they were infuſed. Some are of opinion, that Eſau did not know what it was, and therefore calls it only by its colour, asking for that red, as it is in the Hebrew.

Therefore his name was called Edom.] His repeated eager deſire of he knew not what, and for which he ſold his birthright, gave him the name of Edom, which ſignifies red; whence the city which he founded, and the whole country his poſterity inhabited, was called by the ſame name; and by the Greeks, Idumea; bordering, toward the South, upon Judea, Arabia, and Egypt.

Ver. 31. And Jacob ſaid, ſell me this day thy birthright.) Jacob eſtimated his Lentil food at ſuch an exceſſive price, as hath ſtarted one of the greateſt difficulties that occur in the ſacred writings. Jacob requires his brother to ſell him his birthright for a meſs of that pottage; and what ſeems more ſurprizing, his propoſal was accepted by Eſau. Moſes, however, ſeems to furniſh us with a ſolution of this difficulty, by declaring, that he ſold his birthright, becauſe he deſpiſed it. The Scripture relates this action of Eſau, as prophane, Heb. xii. 16. and if it was a crime in him to diſpoſe of it in that manner, it may be asked, whether Jacob could be innocent in purchaſing it? Perhaps the priviledges of an elder brother, in thoſe times, may let in ſome light upon this tranſaction; and we ſhall juſt mention ſuch as are declared by authors to have been annexed to the primogeniture.

1. The pre-eminency and government over the reſt of the family. Unto thee ſhall be his deſire, ſays the Deity, ſpeaking to Cain, concerning Abel.

2. A double portion of the paternal inheritance, which perhaps is the meaning of Eliſha's requeſt, Let a double portion of thy Spirit be upon me, 2 Chron. ii. 13.

3. The prieſthood; this is undeniable with reſpect to thoſe who lived after the promulgation of the law; but ſeems not to be ſo before that period, ſince Abel offered ſacrifices as well as Cain.

4 The father's bleſſing: Or a profuſion of extraordinary wiſhes for the welfare of the eldeſt ſon. But this bleſſing, ſays a modern author, muſt only be underſtood of the bleſſed ſeed, that is to ſay, of the vows and prayers which were made for the eldeſt child, and which implied, that the Meſſiah was to be born of his race.

If it could be proved, that all or any of theſe privileges were appropriated to the primogeniture, there would be no difficulty in acknowledging, that Eſau was very criminal in deſpiſing it, and we ſhould have no occaſion to ſuppoſe, with the Targum of Jeruſalem, that he denied the reſurrection, and diſdain'd the ſhare he had in the world to come.

As to what relates to Jacob, we freely confeſs, that if his conduct is to be judged by the rules of the Goſpel morals, it will appear incapable of vindication. But we ſhould be induced to ſuſpend our conſtruction of this proceeding, if we conſider that the Moſaic hiſtory is extreamly conciſe in this, as well as in ſeveral other particulars, and that his ſilence, therefore is ſufficient to diſqualify us from forming any compleat notion of the fact before us.

Joſephus has ſuppreſſed the chief part of this tranſaction, but from what motive we ſhall not take upon us to determine; but he has evidently corrupted another part of this chapter, by placing the delivery of Rebekah, after the death of Abraham; an Anachroniſm, whereof the leaſt attention to the Moſaic relation, was ſufficient to have made him ſenſible.

CHAP. XXVI.

1 Iſaac becauſe of famine went to Gerar: 2 God inſtructeth and bleſſeth him: 7 He is reproved by Abimelech for denying his wife: 12 He groweth rich: 18 He diggeth Eſek, Sitnah, and Rheoboth: 26 Abimelech maketh a covenant with him at Beer-ſheba. 34 Eſau's wives.

AND there was a famine in the land, beſides the firſt famine that was in the days of Abraham. And Iſaac went unto Abimelech king of the Philiſtines unto Gerar.

2 And the LORD appeared unto him, and ſaid, Go not down into Egypt: dwell in the land which I ſhall tell thee of.

3 Sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee and will bleſs thee: for unto thee and unto thy ſeed I will give all theſe countries, and I will perform the oath which I ſware unto Abraham thy father.

4 And I will make thy ſeed to multiply as the ſtars of heaven, and will give unto thy ſeed all theſe countries: and in thy ſeed ſhall all the nations of the earth be bleſſed:

5 Becauſe that Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my ſtatutes, and my laws.

6 ¶ And Iſaac dwelt in Gerar.

7 And the men of the place asked him of his wife; and he ſaid, She is my ſiſter: for he feared to ſay, She is my wife; leſt ſaid he,

he, the men of the place ſhould kill me for Rebekah, becauſe ſhe was fair to look upon.

8 And it came to paſs when he had been there a long time, that Abimelech king of the Philiſtines looked out at a window, and ſaw, and behold, Iſaac was ſporting with Rebekah his wife.

9 And Abimelech called Iſaac, and ſaid, Behold of a ſurety ſhe is thy wife: and how ſaidſt thou, She is my ſiſter? And Iſaac ſaid unto him, Becauſe I ſaid, Leſt I die for her.

10 And Abimelech ſaid, What is this thou haſt done unto us? one of the people might lightly have lien with thy wife, and thou ſhouldſt have brought guiltineſs upon us.

11 And Abimelech charged all his people, ſaying, He that toucheth this man or his wife, ſhall ſurely be put to death.

12 Then Iſaac ſowed in that land, and received in the ſame year an hundred-fold; and the LORD bleſſed him.

13 And the man waxed great, and went forward, and grew until he became very great.

14 For he had poſſeſſion of flocks, and poſſeſſion of herds, and great ſtore of ſervants. And the Philiſtines envied him.

15 For all the wells which his fathers ſervants had digged in the days of Abraham his father, the Philiſtines had ſtopped them, and filled them with earth.

16 And Abimelech ſaid unto Iſaac, Go from us: for thou art much mightier than we.

17 ¶ And Iſaac departed thence, and pitched his tent in the valley of Gerar, and dwelt there.

18 And Iſaac digged again the wells of water, which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father; for the Philiſtines had ſtopped them after the death of Abraham: and he called their names after the names by which his father had called them.

19 And Iſaac's ſervants digged in the valley, and found there a well of ſpringing water.

20 And the herdmen of Gerar did ſtrive with Iſaac's herdmen ſaying, The water is ours: and he called the name of the well Eſek, becauſe they ſtrove with him.

21 And they digged another well, and ſtrove for that alſo: and he called the name of it Sitnah.

22 And he removed from thence, and digged another well; and for that they ſtrove not: and he called the name of it Rehoboth; and he ſaid, For now the LORD hath made room for us, and we ſhall be fruitful in the land.

23 And he went up from thence to Beer-ſheba.

24 And the LORD appeared unto him the ſame night, and ſaid, I am the God of Abraham thy father: fear not, for I am with thee, and will bleſs thee, and multiply thy ſeed for my ſervant Abrahams ſake.

25 And he builded an altar there, and called upon the name of the LORD, and pitched his tent there: and there Iſaac's ſervants digged a well.

26 ¶ Then Abimelech went to him from Gerar, and Ahuzzath one of his friends, and Phicol the chief captain of his army.

27 And Iſaac ſaid unto them, Wherefore come ye to me, ſeeing ye hate me, and have ſent me away from you?

28 And they ſaid, We ſaw certainly that the LORD was with thee: and we ſaid, Let there be now an oath betwixt us, even betwixt us and thee, and let us make a covenant with thee;

29 That thou wilt do us no hurt, as we have not touched thee, and as we have done unto thee nothing but good, and have ſent thee away in peace: thou art now the bleſſed of the LORD.

30 And he made them a feaſt, and they did eat and drink.

31 And they roſe up betimes in the morning, and ſware one to another; and Iſaac ſent them away, and they departed from him in peace.

32 And it came to paſs the ſame day, that Iſaac's ſervants came and told him concerning the well which they had digged, and ſaid unto him, We have found water.

33 And he called it Shebah: therefore the name of the city is is Beer-ſheba unto this day.

34 ¶ And Eſau was forty years old when he took to wife Judith the daughter of Beeri the Hittite, and Baſhemah the daughter of Elon the Hittite:

35 Which were a grief of mind unto Iſaac and to Rebekah.

Ver. 1. And there was a famine in the land, beſides the firſt famine that was in the days of Abraham, And Iſaac went unto Abimelech king of the Philiſtines, unto Gerar.] A ſecond famine raged in the land of Canaan, and reduc'd Iſaac to the ſame extremities as had diſtreſſed his father Abraham: He had an inclination to retire, from that calamity, into Egypt; but God commanded him, in a viſion, not to go thither, but to direct his courſe to Gerar, the capicapital city of Paleſtine, as we formerly obſerved. Abimelech reigned, at that time, over the Philiſtines; and Joſephus pretends, that he was the ſame prince with whom Abraham had enter'd into a ſtrict alliance; and that Iſaac was, for that reaſon, directed by the Deity, to reſide in thoſe territories. But this opinion ſeems to be without any foundation, becauſe ſeventy-five years were elapſed, ſince Abraham's journey to Gerar.

Ver. 7. And the men of the place asked him of his wife, and he ſaid, ſhe is my ſiſter, &c.] Iſaac finding himſelf in a ſtrange land, fell into the ſame weakneſs which, perhaps, was a blemiſh in the conduct of Abraham: He was afraid, that the beauty of his wife would be fatal to him, if he ſhould be known to be her husband, and therefore deſired her to ſay ſhe was his ſiſter. Iſaac's apprehenſions, in this conjuncture, ſeem the leſs excuſeable, becauſe God had ordered him to continue in that land, and had promiſed to bleſs him.

Ver. 8. And it came to paſs when he had been there a long time, that Abimelech king of the Philiſtines looked out at a window, and ſaw, and behold Iſaac was ſporting with Rebekah his wife.] Actions are altogether as expreſſive as words; and Abimelech, when he beheld Iſaac taking conjugal liberties with Rebekah, preſently knew her to be his wife. If it be objected, that ſhe might have been his miſtreſs, or a harlot; we anſwer, that ſo ſhe might have been, tho' Iſaac had told him, by words, that ſhe was his wife. Abimelech gave greater credit to that information which paſſed through his eye, than to that which he received by the ear, and to what Iſaac did, than to what he ſaid. For Iſaac had told him, that ſhe was not his wife, but his ſiſter; and that prince could not have diſcover'd that Rebekah was the wife of Iſaac, if he had not conducted himſelf in ſuch a manner as did not become a man who was not her husband.

Ver. 10. And Abimelech ſaid, what is this thou haſt done unto us?] The vertue of this prince makes a very amiable appearance, and ſhews him to have been actuated by principles that are not always ſo prevalent in courts at this day. He thought the rites of marriage were too ſacred to be violated on any account whatever, and he reſented the indignity with which Iſaac had treated him and his people, by thinking it neceſſary to have recourſe to an untruth, for his preſervation among them.

Ver. 12. Then Iſaac ſowed in that land, and received in the ſame year an hundred fold.] Iſaac enjoyed the effect of thoſe bleſſings which God frequently beſtows on the children of religious parents; but thoſe very bleſſings expoſed him to the misfortunes common to ſuch as proſper in a ſtrange country; for we read, in the following verſes, that the Philiſtines envied him, and ſtopp'd up the wells, which had been dug by his father's ſervants; and Abimelech himſelf was deſirous of his departure from that country. The impreſſion he had formerly receiv'd from Iſaac's diſowning his wife, might poſſibly incline him to be jealous of his proſperity, as believing he might be ambitious as well as diſtruſtful; and, indeed, mankind are too apt to form the worſt conſtructions of every circumſtance that relates to thoſe perſons of whom they have once conceived an unfavourable opinion. But it is to be obſerved, that whatever apprehenſions Abimelech might entertain of Iſaac's growing power, he was not mean enough to deſtroy him, in conſequence of a meer ſuſpicion, but had the generoſity to deſire him, in a friendly manner, to retire from his dominions.

Ver. 19, 20. And Iſaac's ſervants digged in the valley, and found there a well of ſpringing water. And the herdmen of Gerar did ſtrive with Iſaac's herdmen, ſaying, the water is ours: And he called the name of the well Eſek, becauſe they ſtrove with him.] Springs of running water were an invaluable treaſure in a dry country, where they had often no other water than that which fell from heaven, and which they alſo were obliged to preſerve moſt carefully in ciſterns. The ſhepherds of Gerar thought a well, leſs owing to the induſtry of Iſaac's ſervants, than to the nature of the ſoil, did juſtly belong to the natives of the country; and the contention that aroſe upon this occaſion, made Iſaac call that well by the name of Eſek, which ſignifies ſtrife; for names were formerly given agreeably to the circumſtances of ſome remarkable event.

Ver. 21. And they digged another well, and ſtrove for that alſo; and he called the name of it Sitnah.] This well occaſioned a new diſagreement between Iſaac and the Philiſtines; for which reaſon, he called it Sitnah, which ſignifies hatred.

Ver. 22. And he removed from thence, and digged another well; and for that they ſtrove not: and he called the name of it Rehoboth, &c.] Iſaac having ſought for a retreat, in a place at a greater diſtance from the city and valley of Gerar, dug another well, which he call'd Rehoboth, that is to ſay, room; for he ſaid, now the Lord hath made room for us. Now we are ſufficiently remote from the people whoſe jealouſy we excited, and ſhall, at laſt, have the happineſs of living unmoleſted.

Ver. 25. And he builded an altar there, &c.] God honour'd him, with a new viſion; and it was uſual, in the firſt ages, to conſider the places where God condeſcended to communicate himſelf in that manner, as the moſt proper to be devoted to his worſhip.

Ver. 26. Then Abimelech went to him from Gerar, &c.] As Abimelech was not deſirous to have Iſaac for a neighbour, ſo neither was he willing he ſhould be his enemy; and therefore he went to viſit him at Beerſheba, in order to contract an alliance with him, and was attended by Phicol, the chief captain of his army, and who, perhaps, was the ſon of that Phicol who commanded under the other Abimelech, who was contemporary with Abraham.

Ver. 33. And he called it Shebah; therefore the name of the city is Beerſheba unto this day.] The name Beerſheba which ſignifies the well of the oath, is revived by Iſaac; for Abraham had given the ſame appellation to the place where the covenant was ſtipulated between him and the former Abimelech. It may likewiſe be probable, that the diſcovery of this new well led Iſaac into another alluſion to the Hebrew word ſhabah, which ſignifies not only to ſwear, but likewiſe to ſatisfy, or ſatiate, whereby he might intimate, that he now had a ſufficient number of wells, and would reſt contented with them; but we only offer this as a conjecture.

Ver. 34. And Eſau was forty years old, when he took to wife Judith the daughter of Beeri the Hittite, and Baſhemath the daughter of Elon the Hittite.] According to Joſephus, theſe two men, whoſe daughters Eſau married, were Dynaſtæ, or perſons of great rank and power among the Hittites, which is not improbable. But it may likewiſe be ſuppos'd, that his father had given the ſame charge, as he himſelf had received from Abraham, in relation to his marriage; and if ſo, Eſau was guilty of a very undutiful action, in contracting ſo intimate an alliance with thoſe people who were under the diſpleaſure of God; and the Scripture might well call him profane, ſince he ſeem'd not to have regarded either the curſe, or the bleſſing of the Almighty.

Ver. 35. Which were a grief of mind unto Iſaac, and to Rebekah.] His marriage was a great affliction to his parents, who, according to ſome expoſitors, were extremely grieved at the idolatry, and other acts of irreligion, which they ſaw committed by the wives of Eſau, and poſſibly by him too, in complacency to them.

CHAP. XXVII.

1 Iſaac ſendeth Eſau for veniſon. 6 Rebekah inſtructeth Jacob to obtain the bleſſing. 15 Jacob under the perſon of Eſau obtaineth it. 30 Eſau bringeth veniſon. 33 Iſaac trembleth. 34 Eſau complaineth, and by importunity obtaineth a bleſſing: 41 He threatneth Jacob: 42 Rebekah diſappointeth it.

AND it came to paſs that when Iſaac was old, and his eyes were dim, ſo that he could not ſee, he called Eſau his eldeſt ſon, and ſaid unto him, My ſon: and he ſaid unto him, Behold, here am I.

2 And he ſaid, Behold, now, I am old, I know not the day of my death.

3 Now therefore take, I pray thee, thy weapons, thy quiver, and thy bow, and go out to the field, and take me ſome veniſon;

4 And make me ſavoury meat, ſuch as I love, and bring it to me, that I may eat; that my ſoul may bleſs thee before I die.

5 And Rebekah heard when Iſaac ſpake to Eſau his ſon: and Eſau went to the field to hunt for veniſon, and to bring it.

6 ¶ And Rebekah ſpake unto Jacob her ſon, ſaying, Behold, I heard thy father ſpeak unto Eſau thy brother, ſaying,

7 Bring me veniſon, and make me ſavoury meat, that I may eat, and bleſs thee before the LORD before my death.

8 Now therefore my ſon, obey my voice, according to that which I command thee.

9 Go now to the flock, and fetch me from thence two good kids of the goats; and I will make them ſavoury meat for thy father, ſuch as he loveth.

10 And thou ſhalt bring it to thy father, that he may eat, and that he may bleſs thee before his death.

11 And Jacob ſaid to Rebekah his mother, Behold, Eſau my brother is a hairy man, and I am a ſmooth man.

12 My father peradventure will feel me, and I ſhall ſeem to him as a deceiver; and I ſhall bring a curſe upon me, and not a bleſſing.

13 And his mother ſaid unto him, Upon me be thy curſe, my ſon: only obey my voice, and go fetch me them.

14 And he went, and fetched, and brought them to his mother: and his mother made ſavoury meat, ſuch as his father loved.

15 And Rebekah took goodly raiment of her eldeſt ſon Eſau, which were with her in the houſe, and put them upon Jacob her younger ſon.

16 And ſhe put the skins of the kids of the goats upon his hands, and upon the ſmooth of his neck.

15 And ſhe gave the ſavoury meat, and the bread which ſhe had prepared, into the hand of her ſon Jacob.

18 ¶ And he came unto his father, and ſaid, My father: and he ſaid, Here am I; who art thou, my ſon?

19 And Jacob ſaid unto his father, I am Eſau thy firſt-born; I have done according as thou badeſt me: ariſe, I pray thee, ſit and eat of my veniſon, that thy ſoul may bleſs me.

20 And Iſaac ſaid unto his ſon, How is it that thou haſt found it ſo quickly, my ſon? And he ſaid, Becauſe the LORD thy God brought it to me.

21 And Iſaac ſaid unto Jacob, Come near, I pray thee, that I may feel thee my ſon, whether thou be my very ſon Eſau, or not.

22 And Jacob went near unto Iſaac his father; and he felt him and ſaid, The voice is Jacobs voice, but the hands are the hands of Eſau.

23 And he diſcerned him not, becauſe his hands were hairy, as his brother Eſau's hands: ſo he bleſſed him.

24 And he ſaid, Art thou my very ſon Eſau? And he ſaid, I am.

25 And he ſaid, Bring it near to me, and I will eat of my ſons veniſon, that my ſoul may bleſs thee. And he brought it near to him, and he did eat: and he brought him wine, and he drank.

26 And his father Iſaac ſaid unto him, Come near now, and kiſs me, my ſon.

27 And he came near, and kiſſed him: and he ſmelled the ſmell of his raiment, and bleſſed him, and ſaid, See, the ſmell of my ſon is as the ſmell of a field which the LORD hath bleſſed.

28 Therefore God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatneſs of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine.

29 Let people ſerve thee, and nations bow down to thee; be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mothers ſons bow down to thee: Curſed be every one that curſeth thee, and bleſſed be he that bleſſeth thee.

30 ¶ And it came to paſs, aſſoon as Iſaac had made an end of bleſſing Jacob, and Jacob was yet ſcarce gone out from the preſence of Iſaac his father, that Eſau his brother came in from his hunting.

31 And he alſo had made ſavoury meat, and brought it unto his father; and ſaid unto his father, Let my father ariſe, and eat of his ſons veniſon, that thy ſoul may bleſs me.

32 And Iſaac his father ſaid unto him, Who art thou? And he ſaid, I am thy ſon, thy firſt-born Eſau.

33 And Iſaac trembled very exceedingly, and ſaid, Who, where is he that hath taken veniſon, and brought it me, and I have eaten of all before thou cameſt, and have bleſſed him? yea, and he ſhall be bleſſed.

34 And when Eſau heard the words of his father, he cried with a great and exceeding bitter cry, and ſaid unto his father, Bleſs me, even me alſo, O my father, 35 And he ſaid, Thy brother came with ſubtilty, and hath taken away thy bleſſing.

36 And he ſaid, Is not he rightly named Jacob? for he hath ſupplanted me theſe two times:

G. Hoet del. Hen. Fletcher Sculp

Iſaac bleſseth his ſon Jacob —— times: he took away my birth-right; and behold, now he hath taken away my bleſſing. And he ſaid, Haſt thou not reſerved a bleſſing for me?

37 And Iſaac anſwered and ſaid unto Eſau, Behold, I have made him thy lord, and all his brethren have I given to him for ſervants; and with corn and wine have I ſuſtained him: and what ſhall I do now unto thee, my ſon?

38 And Eſau ſaid unto his father, Haſt thou but one bleſſing, my father? bleſs me, even me alſo, O my father. And Eſau lift up his voice, and wept.

39 And Iſaac his father anſwered, and ſaid unto him, Behold, thy dwelling ſhall be the fatneſs of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above.

40 And by thy ſword ſhalt thou live, and ſhalt ſerve thy brother: and it ſhall come to paſs when thou ſhalt have the dominion, that thou ſhalt break his yoke from off thy neck.

41 ¶ And Eſau hated Jacob, becauſe of the bleſſing wherewith his father bleſſed him: and Eſau ſaid in his heart, The days of mourning for my father are at hand, then will I ſlay my brother Jacob.

42 And theſe words of Eſau her elder ſon were told to Rebekah: and ſhe ſent and called Jacob her younger ſon, and ſaid unto him, Behold, thy brother Eſau, as touching thee, doth comfort himſelf, purpoſing to kill thee.

43 Now therefore, my ſon, obey my voice: and ariſe, flee thou to Laban my brother to Haran.

44 And tarry with him a few days, until thy brothers fury turn away;

45 Until thy brothers anger turn away from thee, and he forget that which thou haſt done to him: then I will ſend, and fetch thee from thence. Why ſhould I be deprived alſo of you both in one day?

46 And Rebekah ſaid to Iſaac, I am weary of my life, becauſe of the daughters of Heth: if Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth, ſuch as theſe which are of the daughters of the land, what good ſhall my life do me?

Ver. 1. And it came to paſs, that when Iſaac was old, and his eyes were dim, ſo that he could not ſee, he called Eſau his eldeſt ſon, &c.] It appears, by this chapter, that tho' Eſau had diſpleaſed his father by his marriage, yet the good old man ſtill retain'd for him the tender affection of a parent; and if he was not unacquainted with the ſale he had made of his birth-right, he probably might only conſider it as a youthful indiſcretion, and the meer effect of hunger and fatigue. As he, therefore, imagined himſelf nearer death than he really was, he was deſirous of beſtowing the patriarchal bleſſing on his eldeſt ſon.

The bleſſings of theſe extraordinary men are not to be conſidered as nothing more than the efforts of a ſoul that diffuſes it ſelf in impotent wiſhes, ſince they really were ſo many prophetic oracles, that denoted infallible events, and extended to the remoteſt periods of time.

Ver. 4. ——— That I may bleſs thee before I die.] Iſaac, at that inſtant, when he was preparing, as it were, to decide the deſtiny of his children, did not ſtrictly attend to thoſe prophecies that had been pronounc'd, concerning Eſau and Jacob, and which, perhaps, he himſelf had never thoroughly underſtood: And as he followed no other guide but the motions of his own heart, he was willing to beſtow on the eldeſt of his two ſons, thoſe tokens of a ſuperior affection, or preference of love, which he had always entertained for him. In order, therefore, to the accompliſhment of his deſign, he commanded Eſau to prepare him a diſh of veniſon, that, being thereby ſtrengthened for his intended ſpeech, which could not be utter'd without ſome emotion, he might the more eaſily excite that attention which was due to the ſolemnity of the prediction he was about to deliver.

Ver. 6. And Rebekah ſpake unto Jacob her ſon, ſaying, &c.] Rebekah, whoſe fondneſs for Jacob made her vigilant for his welfare, acquainted him with the orders that Eſau had receiv'd from his father, and undoubtedly repreſented to him the beneficial effects which that rival in the bleſſing would derive from the execution of thoſe orders. She therefore order'd him to get the ſtart of his brother, and preſent his father, as ſoon as poſſible, with a delicious repaſt, which ſhe would prepare in ſuch a manner as to make it paſs upon the good old man for the veniſon Eſau was to provide.

Ver. 12. My father, peradventure, will feel me, and I ſhall ſeem to him as a deceiver, &c.] Jacob had ſome reluctance to comply with his mother's deſire, and repreſented to her, that, if his father ſhould diſcover the propos'd illuſion, he would thunder out curſes againſt him, inſtead of thoſe bleſſings ſhe was ſo deſirous to procure him. Rebekah replied, that ſhe conſented to take all the conſequences of thoſe curſes upon her ſelf; and, in order to ſecure Jacob from the detection he apprehended, ſhe cover'd his hands and neck with the ſkins of the kids ſhe had kill'd, and then cloath'd him with the beſt habit of his elder brother. It is obſerv'd, by Bochart, that, in the eaſtern countries, goats hair very much reſembled that of men; ſo that Iſaac might eaſily be deceiv'd, when his eyes were dim, and his feeling, in all probability, as imperfect as his ſight.

Ver. 18. And he came unto his father and ſaid, My father: And he ſaid, here am I, who art thou; my ſon?] As Jacob's conference with his father, on this occaſion, can be ſo turn'd, as either to make him chargeable with groſs falſhood, or to vindicate him from that imputation; every interpreter has explain'd them, according as he is more or leſs inclin'd to accuſe or defend that patriarch. But thoſe who conſider Jacob's expreſſions, without any other deſign than to diſcover the natural ideas they excite in the mind, will find it difficult not to obſerve a ſeries of propoſitions directly oppoſite to truth, through the whole train of Jacob's diſcourſe. Some expoſitors underſtand theſe words, I am Eſau thy firſt-born, in this manner, viz. I am in his ſtead, becauſe he has ſold me his birth-right. St. Auſtin explains it, I am Eſau of right, and pretends it is a figure like that in the Goſpel, where St. John Baptiſt is called Elias; but theſe are mental reſervations, that arraign the integrity of thoſe who eſpouſe them, and ſuch methods of vindicating Jacob, only tend to make us ſenſible how ſtrong the expreſſions of Moſes are, which tax him with falſhood. Rebekah, therefore, ſeems to us to be unjuſtifiable, in ſuggeſting ſuch advice to her ſon; and that he is a little to be excus'd for ſuffering himſelf to be prevail'd upon in ſuch a manner; ſince they both acted as if they preſum'd to limit the power of God, by thinking a complication of falſhood neceſſary for the accompliſhment of a divine prediction.

Jacob was in ſome meaſure puniſh'd for this fraud, when he himſelf was afterwards deceiv'd by Laban, in his marriage, when Leah was impos'd upon him inſtead of Rachel. The Hebrew doctors, likewiſe, obſerve, that as he deceiv'd his father by the ſkins of the kid of the goats; ſo he himſelf was betray'd into a belief that his ſon Joſeph ſeph was kill'd, by his brethren dipping his coat in the blood of a kid of the goats.

Ver. 27. ——— And he ſmelled the ſmell of his raiment, and bleſſed him.] As he embraced his ſon, he was revived with the fragrancy of his garments, of which he was inſenſible, while he was more remote from him. The Jews fancy theſe were the very garments wherein Adam miniſtred, and that they retain'd the perfumes with which they were impregnated in Paradiſe; ſo ſagacious are thoſe perſons in their illuſtrations of the ſacred Scriptures.

See the ſmell of my ſon is as the ſmell of a field which the Lord hath bleſſed.] Behold, or obſerve, no field that God hath adorned with a variety of the moſt fragrant flowers, can diffuſe more pleaſing odours than the garments of my ſon!

Ver. 28. Therefore God give thee of the dew of heaven, &c.] As if Iſaac had ſaid, I take the fragrancy of thy garments to be an indication that God will give thee of the dew of heaven, &c. For this paſſage may be tranſlated as a prophecy, as well as a prayer. The dews of heaven, which refreſhed the earth and greatly contributed to its fertility, in thoſe countries, are repreſented in Scripture, as a divine gift, Job xxxviii. 28. Micah v. 7. and God ſometimes threatens to withold them as a puniſhment for men's offences, 1 Kings xvii. 1. The dew fell ſo plentifully in the land of Canaan, that it ſupplied the want of rain, which commonly deſcended but twice a year, viz. in the month of March or April, and which was called the rain of the former ſeaſon, and in the month of October, when it was ſtyled the rain of the latter ſeaſon.

Ver. 29. Let people ſerve thee.] As the former part of the bleſſing relates to plenty, ſo this includes dominion and empire; and it was fulfilled, very ſignally, in the reign of David, when the Moabites, Ammonites, Philiſtines, Edomites and Syrians, were ſubdued by that monarch.

Let thy mother's ſons bow down to thee.] This is a third benediction, and it gives him a prerogative in his own family, who were to conduct themſelves with reverence and ſubmiſſion to him.

Ver. 33. And Iſaac trembled very exceedingly, &c.] Scarce had the good patriarch finiſhed his diſcourſe, when Eſau approached him with the veniſon he had prepared, and found he had been circumvented in his abſence; upon which a moving ſcene enſued between the aſtoniſhed father, and the dejected ſon. The tender old man ſhudder'd with horror to think how his intention, was fruſtrated by the artifice of Jacob. His heart melted within him, and he ſeem'd as one expiring with the paternal pangs that oppreſt him. The Jewiſh expoſitors ſay he fell into a trance.

Who is he that hath taken veniſon and brought it me, and I have eaten of all before thou cameſt, and I have bleſſed him? Yea, and he ſhall be bleſſed.] It has been thought amazing by ſome, that the patriarch did not recal the bleſſing and beſtow it on Eſau, for whom he intended it; but the Jews have found out an expedient, as they imagine, to account for his conduct on this occaſion; for they declare, that hell opened its mouth before the eyes of this trembling father, and that the horrors it preſented to his view, hindred him from pronouncing any benedictions contrary to the will of heaven; but tho' their opinion is entirely chimerical, we may ſuppoſe, that ſome ſupernatural inſpiration prevailed in the mind of Iſaac, in this conjuncture. He had already bleſſed Jacob, in the moſt ſolemn and affectionate manner, and might now be confident that it was with the approbation of God; he therefore cries out, yea, and he ſhall be bleſſed.

Ver. 38. And Eſau ſaid unto his father, haſt thou but one bleſſing, my father? Bleſs me, even me alſo, O my father. And Eſau lift up his voice and wept.] Has my treacherous brother then, exhauſted all thy tenderneſs for me? Hadſt thou but one bleſſing to beſtow? Surely that ſeems impoſſible; and therefore let me intreat thee, O my father, to bleſs me, even me, who muſt now be deſtitute, indeed, if I am not permitted to enjoy this dear inſtance of thy affection for me! The unfortunate Eſau ſaid all that could excite his father's compaſſion, till his agony at laſt began to grow unutterable, and he then burſt into tears.

Ver. 39. And Iſaac his father anſwered and ſaid unto him, Behold thy dwelling ſhall be the fatneſs of the earth and the dew of heaven from above.] It was impoſſible for the aged parent to be inexorable on this melancholy occaſion; he therefore proceeded to bleſs Eſau in a very affectionate manner. Some expoſitors interpret this part of the benediction, in a ſenſe very different from that of our Engliſh tranſlation in this verſe, and will have it that Eſau's lot was to be in a barren land, and that his living would be by rapine and violence; and they add, that Edom was an ungrateful ſoil, and not refreſhed with ſeaſonable rains. But it is obſerv'd, on the other hand, that if we follow our tranſlation, which is directly in the ſenſe of the Vulgate, and likewiſe of St. Jerome, there will ſtill be a very conſiderable difference between Jacob's bleſſing, and that of Eſau; ſince, in the latter, there is no mention made of corn and wine, no ſuch dominion promiſed as in Jacob's, and that laſtly, whatſoever fatneſs or fertility was in the ſoil of his country, it did not continue long. But we cannot think there is much foundation for this laſt part of that opinion; ſince Moſes ſeems to acquaint us, that the land of Edom was not ſo deſtitute as ſome have imagined; when he promiſes the king of that country, that if he would permit the children of Iſrael to paſs through it, they ſhould not injure either the fields, or the vineyards: the fields may perhaps have rather been arable than paſture land, and if this ſuppoſition be true, the Edomites might have had their corn, as well as their wine. As to what the prophet Malachi relates, concerning the infertility and deſolation of the kingdom of Edom, Mal. i. 3. We think that muſt be rather attributed to the fatal effects of their unfortunate wars, than to any natural failure in the uſual product of the ſoil

Ver. 40. By thy ſword ſhalt thou live, and ſhall ſerve thy brother; and it ſhall come to paſs, when thou ſhalt have the dominion, that thou ſhalt break his yoke from off thy neck.] That viciſſitude which Iſaac foretold, and according to which, Eſau was to be in ſubjection to Jacob for ſome time, and afterwards to ſhake off his yoke, was exactly fulfilled in the perſons of their deſcendants. For the ſame Idumeans (Eſau's poſterity) who had been ſubject to the Jews (the offspring of Jacob) in the time of David, rebell'd againſt them in the reign of Jehoram (2 Kings viii. 20.) and threw off their yoke for the ſpace of 800 years and until the time of Hircanus who conquer'd them again: And they, likewiſe in their turn might be ſaid to have ſubdued the Jews; namely, when Herod the Idumean reigned over the latter, and when the poſterity of that foreign king, poſſeſſed the throne for a century and a half.

CHAP. XXVIII.

1 Iſaac bleſſeth Jacob, and ſendeth him to Padan-aram.
9 Eſau marrieth Mahalath the daughter of Iſhmael.
12 The viſion of Jacobs ladder. 18 The ſtone of Beth-el.

AND Iſaac called Jacob, and bleſſed him, and charged him, and ſaid unto him, Thou ſhalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan.

2 Ariſe, go to Padan-aram, to the houſe of Bethuel thy mothers father; and take thee a wife from thence of the daughters of Laban thy mothers brother.

3 And God Almighty bleſs thee, and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, that thou mayeſt be a multitude of people.

4 And give thee the bleſſing of Abraham, to thee, and to thy ſeed with thee; that thou mayeſt inherit the land wherein thou art a ſtranger, which God gave unto Abraham.

5 And Iſaac ſent away Jacob, and he went to Padan-aram unto Laban, ſon of Bethuel the Syrian, the brother of Rebekah, Jacob's and Eſau's mother.

6 ¶ When

6 ¶ When Eſau ſaw that Iſaac had bleſſed Jacob, and ſent him away to Padan-aram, to take him a wife from thence; and that as he bleſſed him, he gave him charge, ſaying, Thou ſhalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan;

7 And that Jacob obeyed his father and his mother, and was gone to Padan-aram;

8 And Eſau ſeeing that the daughters of Cannaan pleaſed not Iſaac his father:

9 Then went Eſau unto Iſhmael, and took unto the wives which he had, Mahalath the daughter of Iſhmael Abrahams ſon, the ſiſter of Nebajoth, to be his wife.

10 ¶ And Jacob went out from Beerſheba, and went toward Haran.

11 And he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, becauſe the ſun was ſet: and he took of the ſtones of that place, and put them for his pillows, and lay down in that place to ſleep.

12 And he dreamed, and behold, a ladder ſet upon the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and behold, the angels of God aſcending and deſcending on it.

13 And behold, the LORD ſtood above it, and ſaid, I am the LORD God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Iſaac: the land whereon thou lieſt, to thee will I give it, and to thy ſeed.

14 And thy ſeed ſhall be as the duſt of the earth; and thou ſhalt ſpread abroad to the weſt, and to the eaſt, and to the north, and to the ſouth: and in thee and in thy ſeed ſhall all the families of the earth be bleſſed.

15 And behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goeſt, and will bring thee again into this land: for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have ſpoken to thee of.

16 ¶ And Jacob awaked out of his ſleep, and he ſaid, Surely the LORD is in this place; and I knew it not.

17 And he was afraid and ſaid, How dreadful is this place! this is none other but the houſe of God, and this is the gate of heaven.

18 And Jacob roſe up early in the morning, and took the ſtone that he had put for his pillows, and ſet it up for a pillar, and poured oil upon the top of it.

19 And he called the name of that place Beth-el: but the name of that city was called Luz at the firſt.

20 And Jacob vowed a vow, ſaying, If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on;

21 So that I come again to my fathers houſe in peace: then ſhall the LORD be my God.

22 And this ſtone, which I have ſet for a pillar, ſhall be Gods houſe: and of all that thou ſhalt give me, I will ſurely give the tenth unto thee.

Ver. 1. And Iſaac called Jacob, and bleſſed him, and charged him, and ſaid unto him, Thou ſhalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan.] Iſaac thought it not ſufficient to beſtow his bleſſings on Jacob, but likewiſe gave him proper inſtructions for his conduct, and charg'd him not to marry a Heathen woman, but to join himſelf to the family of Laban, the brother of Rebekah his mother, who dwelt at Haran in Meſopotamia; and the patriarch did, in ſome meaſure, make all the favours promis'd to his ſon, the condition of his obedience. And Jacob immediately prepar'd for the performance of his father's commands.

Ver. 9. Then went Eſau to Iſhmael, and took unto the wives which he had, Mahalath the daughter of Iſhmael, Abraham's ſon, the ſiſter of Nebajoth, to be his wife.] Eſau went to the family of Iſhmael, for he himſelf had been dead fourteen years, and therefore Nebajoth, his eldeſt ſon, is here mention'd as the preſent head of the family.

Ver. 10. And Jacob went out from Beerſheba, and went towards Haran.] Jacob, in his journey, arriv'd at Luz, a city of the Heathens, which was afterwards one of the ſouthern frontiers of the tribe of Benjamin. Some of the ancients have call'd it Olam Luz, through a miſtake hardly pardonable in the interpreters of Scripture; becauſe the Hebrew expreſſion, Olam Luz, ſignifies, formerly Luz. The Septuagint, who had tranſlated it Lammaus, in Geneſis, corrected that miſtake, in the firſt chapter of Judges. Jacob did not enter this city, becauſe the night overtook him, and he perhaps was unwilling to paſs it among idolaters: He therefore lodg'd in a ſolitary grove, which he found commodious for his purpoſe. But a believer is never alone; he maintains an intercourſe with his God, in the ſilence of the night, and in the hurry of travelling, in the tumult of the moſt buſy towns, and in the ſolitude of the moſt frightful deſart.

Ver. 12. And he dreamed a dream, &c.] God us'd to reveal himſelf in an extraordinary manner to the ancient believers, by dreams; and that of Jacob was undoubtedly of this kind. He ſaw a ladder, one end of which reach'd to heaven, and the other reſted on the earth, angels aſcending and deſcending the ſame: God alſo appeared there, and renewed, to his ſleeping ſervant, the promiſes he had formerly made to Abraham.

God undoubtedly intended by the ſeries of theſe wonderful tokens, to aſſure Jacob of his protection, and to promiſe him exactly that ſame aſſiſtance which he wanted in his preſent circumſtances. Jacob finds himſelf alone in a wilderneſs; God ſhews him a numerous company of heavenly ſpirits attending on him. Jacob apprehends the reſentment of Eſau, God lets him ſee that he is defended by angels. Jacob is projecting a marriage, God promiſes him a poſterity, no more to be number'd than the duſt of the earth. The ladder, therefore, which was repreſented to Jacob in his ſlumber, may be conſider'd as an emblem of God's general providence and direction over the whole earth; but, at the ſame time, denoting chiefly the particular care God took of his ſervant. Thus far all commentators are agreed: But when it is ask'd, whether this ladder did not intimate ſome greater myſteries; above all, when the queſtion is agitated, what particular myſteries are repreſented by it; the difference of opinions is numberleſs; there is no refin'd metaphyſical nicety, no abſtracted opinion in divinity; no quinteſſence of morality; no event ever ſo uncertain, or remote, which is not diſcovered in Jacob's ladder.

The Rabbins have form'd a thouſand chimerical viſions out of it. One pretends, that the aſcending angels were thoſe who had the care of Jacob in this journey to Laban, and that the duty of the deſcending was to bring him back. Another diſcovers thereby, the four monarchies.

A third is of opinion, that God intended to ſhew the place where he would have the temple built in proceſs of time; and, to accommodate this notion with geography, he aſſirms, that God annihilated the ſpace between Luz and Jeruſalem, or, at leaſt, that he tranſported to Luz, the hill of Sion, on which that city was founded.

St. Auſtin is poſitive that this ladder repreſents the croſs of Chriſt; the God, ſays he, who was upon that ladder, was Jeſus Chriſt faſten'd to the croſs, who from thence choſe a ſpouſe, viz. the church. We ſee, therefore, that a Chriſtian father can ſometimes make as ſtrange diſcoveries as any Jewiſh doctor whatſoever.

The myſtical divines, ſuch as Gregory the great, and, after him, St. Thomas, make this ladder the ſign of a contemplative life; and maintain, that the aſcending angels were thoſe believers whom they call perfect; as having the faculty of cauſing their meditations to ſoar up to the higheſt heaven, and that the angels who deſcended, repreſented thoſe mean and baſe ſouls, whoſe center is the earth, and the fleſh their delights.

But the myſtery of Jacob's ladder, in which commentators have moſt unanimouſly agreed, is that of the incarnation: And a paſſage in the Goſpel has given ſome colour to this opinion; Hereafter you ſhall ſee heaven open, and the angels of God aſcending, and deſcending upon the ſon of man, John i. 51. Rabbi Maimonides ſays, that the angels who aſcended the ladder, were thoſe who went to receive the commands of God; and the deſcending angels were ſuch as put them in execution. One might diſcover ſeveral relations between Jeſus Chriſt and Jacob's ladder; and as the promiſe given to that patriarch, included the greateſt myſteries of the Goſpel, it muſt be granted, likewiſe, that the emblem then offer'd to him might have repreſented the ſame.

Ver. 18. And Jacob roſe up early in the morning, and took the ſtone that he had put for his pillows, and ſet it up for a pillar, and poured oil upon the top of it.] This ſtone was held in great veneration by the Jews in future times, and was tranſlated to Jeruſalem; after the deſtruction of which, by Titus, it was cuſtomary for them, (yearly upon that day when the city was taken, and which was the only day they were permitted to come thither); with great lamentation, and rending their garments to go and anoint that ſtone.

The Heathens anointed ſtones, and worſhipp'd them, and Arnobius laments his having fallen into the ſame kind of idolatry, before he embrac'd the Chriſtian religion. But, beſides that it is uncertain whether this cuſtom was eſtabliſh'd in Jacob's time, it is very unlikely that this patriarch would have made a ſuperſtitious ceremony his model for the adoration of the true God. And therefore it is much more probable, that this action of Jacob might, in proceſs of time, have given occaſion to ſuch a ſuperſtition. Accordingly, the abuſe made of theſe pillars, or monuments, was the cauſe why God afterwards prohibited the uſe of them. The ſtones that were thus anointed by the Pagans, are call'd λιτραὶ λίθοι, ſmooth or ſhining ſtones, by Theophraſtus; and it was uſual for ſuperſtitious people, when they diſcover'd any ſuch monuments on the highways, to pour oil upon them, and then fall down and worſhip them.

The ancient Phœnicians call'd thoſe ſtones that were thus anointed, and conſecrated to divine worſhip, Betulia; perhaps from the name of Bethel, which Jacob gave to Luz.

Jacob pour'd oil on this ſtone, not in honour to it, and much leſs to any idol; but his intention was, to conſecrate it as a monument of the divine mercy to him in the celeſtial viſion that had been preſented to his mind. Oil, as it appears by this paſſage, was anciently us'd, in conſecrating things, before the Moſaic law, and external worſhip was much more arbitrary in thoſe early ages of the world, than it was after God had ſpecified every circumſtance of it by the miniſtration of Moſes.

Ver. 19. And he called the name of that place Bethel, but the name of that city was called Luz, at the firſt.] The city was originally call'd Luz, perhaps from the many almond-trees which grew there (for Luz ſignifies an almond), and among which Jacob might probably have taken up his lodging. Both this Luz, in the tribe of Benjamin, and the other among the Hittites, in the tribe of Ephraim, Judg. i. 26. were denominated from this original, according to Bochart. The heavenly viſion which had been imparted to Jacob in this grove of almond-trees, induced him to change the name of the place from Luz to Bethel, which latter appellation ſignifies the houſe of God.

Ver. 20. And Jacob vowed a vow, &c.] Jacob added a vow to the erection of this monument, and promis'd God that if he render'd his journey proſperous to him, and brought him back in ſafety, that he would devote himſelf to his worſhip; not that he made it the condition of his religion, but only meant thereby, that he ſhould be ſenſible of the freſh engagements he ſhould then lie under of adhering to God's ſervice: He likewiſe declar'd, that this ſtone ſhould be the houſe of God; not intending that it was from that time forwards to be the place where the believers ſhould meet; ſince the family of that patriarch was not in poſſeſſion of Bethel till a long time after, but that at his return he would build an altar there, and ſacrifice to God upon it.

Ver. 22. —— and of all that thou ſhalt give me, I will ſurely give the tenth unto thee.] We may conclude, from this paſſage, that vows, of ſuch a nature as Jacob's, were then cuſtomary among devout perſons; and as to the particular proportion of a tenth, in preference to any other portion, it ſeems moſt likely, that they had ſome divine direction for it, as they had for ſacrificing: And it is obſervable, that what they gave to their kings, was a tenth part, as well as what they offer'd to God. Nothing was more common, among the Gentiles, than the payment of tenths to their kings; and it appears, by 1 Sam. viii. 14, 15, 17. that it was part of the jus regium among the eaſtern people. Ariſtotle himſelf mentions it, under the name of Παλαιὸς νόμος, an ancient law, in Babylon: It was alſo eſtabliſh'd in Athens, which was a commonwealth; and tenths were, likewiſe, paid among the Romans.

CHAP. XXIX.

1 Jacob cometh to the well of Haran: 9 He taketh acquaintance of Rachel: 13 Laban entertaineth him. 18 Jacob covenanteth for Rachel: 23 He is deceived with Leah: 28 He marrieth alſo Rachel, and ſerveth for her ſeven years more. 32 Leah beareth Reuben, 33 Simeon, 34 Levi, 35 and Judah.

THEN Jacob went on his journey, and came into the land of the people of the eaſt.

2 And he looked, and behold, a well in the field, and lo, there were three flocks of ſheep lying by it; for out of that well they watered the flocks: and a great ſtone was upon the wells mouth.

3 And thither were all the flocks gathered: and they rolled the ſtone from the wells mouth, and watered the ſheep, and put the ſtone again upon the wells mouth in his place.

4 And Jacob ſaid unto them, My brethren, whence be ye? And they ſaid, Of Haran are we.

5 And he ſaid unto them, Know ye Laban the ſon of Nahor? And they ſaid, We know him.

6 And he ſaid unto them, Is he well? And they ſaid, He is well: and behold, Rachel his daughter cometh with the ſheep.

7 And he ſaid, Lo, it is yet high day, neither is it time that the cattel ſhould be gathered together: water ye the ſheep, and go and feed them.

8 And

8 And they ſaid, We cannot, until all the flocks be gathered together, and till they roll the ſtone from the wells mouth; then we water the ſheep.

9 And while he yet ſpake with them, Rachel came with her fathers ſheep: for ſhe kept them.

10 And it came to paſs, when Jacob ſaw Rachel the daughter of Laban his mothers brother, and the ſheep of Laban his mothers brother; that Jacob went near, and rolled the ſtone from the wells mouth, and watered the flock of Laban his mothers brother.

11 And Jacob kiſſed Rachel, and lifted up his voice, and wept.

12 And Jacob told Rachel that he was her fathers brother, and that he was Rebekahs ſon: and ſhe ran and told her father.

13 And it came to paſs, when Laban heard the tidings of Jacob his ſiſters ſon, that he ran to meet him, and embraced him, and kiſſed him, and brought him to his houſe. And he told Laban all theſe things.

14 And Laban ſaid to him, Surely thou art my bone and my fleſh: and he abode with him the ſpace of a month.

15 ¶ And Laban ſaid unto Jacob, Becauſe thou art my brother, ſhouldſt thou therefore ſerve me for nought? tell me, what ſhall thy wages be?

16 And Laban had two daughters: the name of the elder was Leah, and the name of the younger was Rachel.

17 Leah was tender-eyed, but Rachel was beautiful and well-favoured.

18 And Jacob loved Rachel; and ſaid, I will ſerve thee ſeven years for Rachel thy younger daughter.

19 And Laban ſaid, It is better that I give her to thee, than that I ſhould give her to another man: abide with me.

20 And Jacob ſerved ſeven years for Rachel: and they ſeemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her.

21 ¶ And Jacob ſaid unto Laban, Give me my wife (for my days are fulfilled) that I may go in unto her.

22 And Laban gathered together all the men of the place, and made a feaſt.

23 And it came to paſs in the evening, that he took Leah his daughter, and brought her to him: and he went in unto her.

24 And Laban gave unto his daughter Leah, Zilpah his maid, for an handmaid.

25 And it came to paſs, that in the morning, behold, it was Leah: and he ſaid to Laban, What is this thou haſt done unto me? Did not I ſerve with thee for Rachel? Wherefore then haſt thou beguiled me?

26 And Laban ſaid, It muſt not be ſo done in our country, to give the younger before the firſt-born.

27 Fulfil her week, and we will give thee this alſo, for the ſervice which thou ſhalt ſerve with me yet ſeven other years.

28 And Jacob did ſo, and fulfilled her week: and he gave him Rachel his daughter to wife alſo.

29 And Laban gave to Rachel his daughter Bilhah his handmaid, to be her maid.

30 And he went in alſo unto Rachel, and he loved alſo Rachel more than Leah, and ſerved with him yet ſeven other years.

31 ¶ And when the LORD ſaw that Leah was hated, he opened her womb: but Rachel was barren.

32 And Leah conceived, and bare a ſon, and ſhe called his name Reuben: for ſhe ſaid, Surely the LORD hath looked upon my affliction: now therefore my husband will love me.

33 And ſhe conceived again, and bare a ſon; and ſaid, Becauſe the LORD hath heard that I was hated, he hath therefore given me this ſon alſo: and ſhe called his name Simeon.

34 And ſhe conceived again, and bare a ſon; and ſaid, Now this time will my husband be joined unto me, becauſe I have born him three ſons: therefore was his name called Levi.

35 And ſhe conceived again, and bare a ſon; and ſhe ſaid, Now will I praiſe the LORD: therefore ſhe called his name Judah, and left bearing.

Ver. 1. Then Jacob went on his journey, and came into the land of the people of the eaſt.] Jacob being encourag'd by ſo many promiſes, purſu'd his journey, and happily arriv'd at the houſe of his uncle Laban, in Meſopotamia, call'd, in this paſſage, the land of the people of the eaſt. This has induc'd ſome expoſitors to ſuppoſe, that he travelled eaſtward, which is a miſtake; becauſe Meſopotamia, and, particularly, Haran, lay northward from Bethel. But as Babylon lay eaſtward from both, the Babylonians who were in poſſeſſion of Meſopotamia, might properly be call'd the children of the eaſt.

It is very aſtoniſhing, that the Jeruſalem Targum ſhould ſuperadd ſuch monſtrous fables to the plain narration of Moſes, in his account of Jacob's journey. The circumſtances which attended the patriarch in his way to Haran, and at his arrival there, are, according to that Targum, theſe that follow; viz. "Now our father Jacob experi"enced five miracles, in his journey to Haran. 1. The "day was ſhortened, by the ſun ſetting before its proper
"time, the angel of the Lord, who conducted Jacob, de-
"ſiring to converſe with him. 2. As ſoon as he departed
"from Beerſheba, the earth gave way in ſuch a manner,
"as to bring him to Haran immediately. 3. The ſtones

" which Jacob had placed under his head, united themſelves together, and in the morning he found them formed into a pillar which he erected as a monument of God's kindneſs to him. 4. That the ſhepherds at Haran, not being able to remove the ſtone from the well, Jacob did it alone, and watered the ſheep of Laban, his mother's brother. 5. That after the ſtone had been removed by Jacob, the water flowed out of the well in great abundance, and continued ſo to do for twenty years, i. e. all the time that Jacob remain'd in that country."

Ver. 6. —— And behold Rachel his daughter cometh with the ſheep.] The Hebrew name Rachel, ſignifies ſheep, for it was cuſtomary, in ancient times to denominate perſons, and even whoſe families, from cattel, both great and ſmall, as we are informed by Varro. lib. ii. de re ruſtica. c. i.

Ver. 7. And he ſaid, lo it is yet high day.] Much of the afternoon yet remains. It was the cuſtom of thoſe eaſtern countries, where the heat of the ſun was very intenſe in the Summer ſeaſon, to bring their flocks towards noon, into ſhady places, where there was water to refreſh them, otherwiſe they would have been deſtroyed by the exceſſive heat. In thoſe ſhady retreats they reſted till the violence of the ſun beams was abated, and then, having watered their flocks again, they led them out to feed till ſun ſet.

Ver. 9. —— Rachel came with her father's ſheep: For ſhe kept them.] Keeping ſheep was a noble employment in thoſe days; whence God himſelf is called the ſhepherd of Iſrael.

Ver. 17. Leah was tender eyed, but Rachel was beautiful and well-favoured.] Leah had ſome diſtemper in her eyes, which the equivocalneſs of the Hebrew language will not allow us to determine. Some of the Jews affirm, that ſhe had impaired her eyes with immoderate weeping, becauſe ſhe could not obtain Eſau, for her husband. The Arabic and Chaldee verſions render the firſt words of this verſe very differently from our tranſlators, and expreſs the original by theſe words, Leah had delicate eyes, and then the meaning is, all her beauty lay in her eyes.

Ver. 18. And Jacob loved Rachel; and ſaid, I will ſerve thee ſeven years for Rachel thy younger daughter.] This was the dowry Jacob offered to Laban, and he ſubmitted to a kind of ſervitude for ſeven years, which ſeemed unto him but a few days, ſo much did the love he had conceived for Rachel, render every thing eaſy, which he had undertaken, in order to obtain her.

Ver. 23. And it came to paſs in the evening that he took Leah his daughter, and brought her to him, and he went in unto her.] The time being expired, Jacob demanded his reward; Laban was induſtrious to conceal his deſign upon him, but it was only that he might accompliſh it more effectually. He accordingly prepared a feaſt, and invited to it all thoſe who had any right to be preſent at his daughter's nuptials, and at night privately conveyed Leah into Jacob's bed. If the ceremonies of marriage were ſolemnized among the Syrians, in the ſame manner as they were celebrated by the Grecians, and other nations, nothing could be more eaſy than Laban's impoſition on Jacob. The bridegroom retired to his apartment firſt, the nuptial chamber had but little light in it, the bride was covered with a veil, when ſhe was conducted to her ſpouſe. This account of the ceremonials is, at leaſt, better founded than the morality of ſome commentators, who pretend, that Jacob employed the night in prayer, and did not approach his bride till break of day, when he diſcover'd the fraudulent manner in which he had been treated.

Ver. 27. Fulfil her week, and we will give thee this alſo, for the ſervice which thou ſhalt ſerve with me yet ſeven other years.] This expreſſion, fulfil her week, has been thought to have ſome ambiguity in it, and it is certain, that ſome expoſitors, underſtand by it, a week of years, contrary to all the ancient verſions, and are of opinion, that Jacob agreed to ſerve Laban another ſeven years before he married Rachel. But it is much more natural to underſtand by Leah's week, the ſpace of ſeven days, which were allowed for the celebration of marriages; at leaſt it is certain, that in the following ages, the nuptials feaſts laſted ſeven days, as appears by the hiſtory of Sampſon. Judg. xiv, xii, xvii.

Fulfil her week, therefore ſignifies no more than, perfect this marriage with Leah, by keeping a feaſt, not of ſeven years, but, of ſeven days, and Mr. Selden ſhews this out of ſeveral authors, l. v. de Jure N. and G. cap v. where he hath this plain commentary on theſe words, viz. Marriages are to be celebrated, according to cuſtom, by a feaſt of ſeven days; compleat, therefore, the nuptials thou haſt begun with Leah, and then, upon condition of another ſeven years ſervice, thou mayſt marry Rachel alſo; and keep her wedding feaſt ſeven days.

Jacob, as the husband of two ſiſters at the ſame time; will appear both as an inceſtuous perſon, and an adulterer, to thoſe who do not conſider that God had not then declared his will with relation to polygamy, or the degrees of marriage that are prohibited by the Moſaic Law.

Ver. 31. And when the Lord ſaw that Leah was hated, he opened her womb; but Rachel was barren.] If Rachel had the advantage of Leah, by poſſeſſing the heart of her husband, Leah had another, over Rachel, on account of her fruitfulneſs. She was accordingly delivered of a ſon; and it being cuſtomary, in thoſe times, for mothers to give names to their children, not without ſome particular reaſon and meaning, ſhe called him Reuben, intimating that God had ſeen her afflictions, and had bleſſed her with a ſon, which would probably engage her husband to love her. She had another ſon ſoon after him, and ſhe called his name Simeon; becauſe ſhe ſaid the Lord had heard her complaint, her third ſhe named Levi, hoping her husband would now be joined unto her; and ſhe called her fourth Judah, thinking it her duty to praiſe God for her fruitfulneſs.

As the names of theſe four ſons, and of all the reſt that follow, were derived from the Hebrew language, it ſeems evident, that Laban's family ſpake, or at leaſt underſtood the ſame language with Abraham's, or ſome little variation, as appears afterward, chap. xxxi. 47.

Chap. XXX.

1 Rachel in grief for her barrenneſs giveth Bilhah her maid unto Jacob: 5 She beareth Dan and Napthali. 9 Leah giveth Zilpah her maid, who beareth Gad and Aſher. 14 Reuben findeth mandrakes, with which Leah buyeth her husband of Rachel. 17 Leah beareth Iſſachar, Zebulun, and Dinah. 22 Rachel beareth Joſeph. 25 Jacob deſireth to depart. 27 Laban ſtayeth him on a new covenant. 37 Jacobs Policy, whereby he became rich.

AND when Rachel ſaw that ſhe bare Jacob no children, Rachel envied her ſiſter; and ſaid unto Jacob, Give me children, or elſe I die.

2 And Jacobs anger was kindled againſt Rachel; and he ſaid, Am I in Gods ſtead, who hath withheld from thee the fruit of the womb?

3 And ſhe ſaid, Behold, my maid Bilhah, go in unto her; and ſhe ſhall bear upon my knees, that I may alſo have children by her.

4 And ſhe gave him Bilhah her handmaid to wife, and Jacob went in unto her.

5 And Bilhah conceived, and bare Jacob a ſon.

6 And Rachel ſaid, God hath judged me, and hath alſo heard my voice, and hath given me a ſon: therefore called ſhe his name Dan.

7 And Bilhah Rachels maid conceived again, and bare Jacob a ſecond ſon.

8 And Rachel ſaid, With great wreſtlings, have I wreſtled with my ſiſter, and I have have prevailed: and ſhe called his name Naphtali.

9 When Leah ſaw that ſhe had left bearing, ſhe took Zilpah her maid, and gave her Jacob to wife.

10 And Zilpah Leahs maid bare Jacob a ſon.

11 And Leah ſaid, A troop cometh: and ſhe called his name Gad.

12 And Zilpah Leahs maid bare Jacob a ſecond ſon.

13 And Leah ſaid, Happy am I, for the daughters will call me bleſſed: and ſhe called his name Aſher.

14 ¶ And Reuben went in the days of wheat-harveſt, and found mandrakes in the field, and brought them unto his mother Leah. Then Rachel ſaid to Leah, Give me, I pray thee, of thy ſons mandrakes.

15 And ſhe ſaid unto her, Is it a ſmall matter that thou haſt taken my husband? And wouldſt thou take away my ſons mandrakes alſo? And Rachel ſaid, Therefore he ſhall lie with thee to night for thy ſons mandrakes.

16 And Jacob came out of the field in the evening, and Leah went out to meet him, and ſaid, Thou muſt come in unto me, for ſurely I have hired thee with my ſons mandrakes. And he lay with her that night.

17 And God hearkened unto Leah, and ſhe conceived, and bare Jacob the fifth ſon.

18 And Leah ſaid, God hath given me mine hire, becauſe I have given my maiden to my husband: and ſhe called his name Iſſachar.

19 And Leah conceived again, and bare Jacob the ſixth ſon.

20 And Leah ſaid, God hath endued me with a good dowry; now will my husband dwell with me, becauſe I have born him ſix ſons: and ſhe called his name Zebulun.

21 And afterwards ſhe bare a daughter, and called her name Dinah.

22 ¶ And God remembred Rachel, and God hearkened to her, and opened her womb.

23 And ſhe conceived and bare a ſon; and ſaid, God hath taken away my reproach.

24 And ſhe called his name Joſeph; and ſaid, The LORD ſhall add to me another ſon.

25 ¶ And it came to paſs, when Rachel had born Joſeph, that Jacob ſaid unto Laban, Send me away, that I may go unto mine own place, and to my country.

26 Give me my wives and my children, for whom I have ſerved thee, and let me go: for thou knoweſt my ſervice which I have done thee.

27 And Laban ſaid unto him, I pray thee, if I have found favour in thine eyes, tarry: for I have learned by experience, that the LORD hath bleſſed me for thy ſake.

28 And he ſaid, Appoint me thy wages, and I will give it.

29 And he ſaid unto him, Thou knoweſt how I have ſerved thee, and how thy cattel was with me.

30 For it was little which thou hadſt before I came, and it is now increaſed unto a multitude; and the LORD hath bleſſed thee ſince my coming: and now when ſhall I provide for mine own houſe alſo?

31 And he ſaid, What ſhall I give thee? And Jacob ſaid, Thou ſhalt not give me any thing; if thou wilt do this thing for me, I will again feed and keep thy flock:

32 I will paſs through all thy flock to day, removing from thence all the ſpeckled and ſpotted cattel, and all the brown cattel among the ſheep, and the ſpotted and ſpeckled among the goats: and of ſuch ſhall be my hire.

33 So ſhall my righteouſneſs anſwer for me in time to come, when it ſhall come for my hire before thy face: every one that is not ſpeckled and ſpotted amongſt the goats, and brown amongſt the ſheep, that ſhall be counted ſtolen with me.

34 And Laban ſaid, Behold, I would it might be according to thy word.

35 And he removed that day the he-goats, that were ring-ſtraked, and ſpotted, and all the ſhe-goats, that were ſpeckled and ſpotted, and every one that had ſome white in it, and all the brown among the ſheep, and gave them into the hands of his ſons.

36 And he ſet three days journey betwixt himſelf and Jacob: and Jacob fed the reſt of Labans flocks.

37 ¶ And Jacob took him rods of green poplar, and of the haſel and cheſnut-tree; and pilled white ſtrakes in them, and made the white appear which was in the rods.

38 And he ſet the rods which he had pilled before the flocks in the gutters in the watering-troughs, when the flocks came to drink; that they ſhould conceive when they came to drink.

39 And the flocks conceived before the rods, and brought forth cattel ring-ſtraked, ſpeckled and ſpotted.

40 And Jacob did ſeparate the lambs, and ſet the faces of the flocks towards the ring-ſtraked, and all the brown in the flock of Laban: and he put his own flocks by themſelves; and put them not unto Labans cattel.

41 And it came to paſs whenſoever the ſtronger cattel did conceive, that Jacob laid the rods before the eyes of the cattel in the gutters, that they might conceive among the rods.

42 But when the cattel were feeble, he put them not in: ſo the feebler were Labans, and the ſtronger Jacobs.

43 And the man increaſed exceedingly, and had much cattel, and maid-ſervants, and men-ſervants, and camels, and aſſes.

Ver. 1. And when Rachel ſaw that ſhe bare Jacob no children, Rachel envied her ſiſter; and ſaid unto Jacob, give me children, or elſe I die.] Jacob had undoubtedly acquainted Rachel with the promiſe of the Meſſiah, and likewiſe with his own advantages and hopes, in relation to that great event. It was no wonder therefore, that her barrenneſs was ſo inſupportable to her, ſince it deprived her of all expectation of being the happy mother of that illuſtrious perſon.

Ver. 3. And ſhe ſaid, Behold my hand-maid Bilhah, go in unto her, &c.] Rachel follows Sarah's example, and conſigns her hand-maid to Jacob, whoſe ſon by her, Rachel adopted for her own, and gave him the name of Dan, intimating thereby, that God had judged in her favour. This proceeding was evidently grounded on the ſame principle which afterwards created thoſe diſſenſions between Leah and Rachel, with reference to their obtaining children from their husband. Rachel called Bilhah's ſecond ſon Naphtali, to expreſs the violent ſtruggles ſhe had had with her ſiſter; after which Leah imagining ſhe herſelf had left off bearing, gave her maid Zilpah alſo to Jacob, whoſe firſt ſon ſhe called Gad, a troop, expecting a numerous offſpring from this ſervant; whoſe next ſon ſhe named Aſher, to expreſs the happineſs ſhe then enjoy'd.

Ver. 14. And Reuben went in the days of wheat harveſt and found mandrakes in the field, &c.] What theſe mandrakes were, is not eaſy to determine; but they certainly could not be what is now commonly underſtood by that name. 1. Becauſe they would then have had nothing inviting, either in ſmell, taſte, or colour, to induce a child of his age to gather them; much leſs could he have choſen them for any particular virtue or quality in them. 2. The text declares, that it was then wheat-harveſt, which, in that hot climate, is about the month of May, when the apples of the common mandrake root, are far from being ripe. 3. The mandrake has a very ſtrong and ſtupifying ſmell, and is therefore called by the Arabians, Jabrokin; whereas the Dudaim, or ſcriptural mandrakes, are commended for their fragrancy, in the only paſſage of the ſacred books, where they are again mention'd. viz. Cant. vii. 13. Some commentators therefore have imagined they were violets; others, lillies; others jaſſimin. Some have tranſlated the word deſirable flowers, agreeably to the Hebrew Dudaim, which ſignifies Loves, in the dual number; or, the breaſts of a woman. Others again, and perhaps with more probability, have ſuppoſed them to be citrons. That which has induced ſo many interpreters to fancy they were mandrakes, is the virtue uſually attributed to them of promoting conception, which made Rachel deſirous of trying their efficacy, but, beſides that they were plentiful enough to have been obtain'd at a cheaper rate, it is plain that ſhe did not conceive till a long time after ſhe had acquired them. Neither is it probable, that Leah would have parted with them, if they had been known to have had ſuch a virtue. A modern author, in his hiſtory of Æthiopia, has confuted the notion of Dudaim being mandrakes, and affirms, that the word ſignifies a fruit which the Syrians call Mauz, not unlike the Banana, or Indian fig, in ſhape and taſte, and about the ſize of a cucumber, thirty or forty of which often hang upon one ſtem; but whatever theſe Dudaim were, whether a fruit or flower, it is certain, they muſt have had ſomething pleaſant and inviting to a child, either in ſmell or taſte, or perhaps both.

Ver. 15. ——— And Rachel ſaid therefore ſhall he lie with thee to night for thy ſons mandrakes.] It was cuſtomary, in thoſe countries where polygamy was allowed, for the wives to have the company of their husband, by turns; and the Kings of Perſia, if we may believe Herodotus, l. ii. cap. 75. were not exempted from that rule. This makes it more probable that Rachel ſold her turn, for that night, to her ſiſter, than that ſhe directed her husband, which of the four he ſhould make the partner of his bed.

Ver. 16. And Jacob came out of the field in the evening, and Leah went out to meet him, and ſaid, thou muſt come in unto me, &c.] Leah neglected not to inſiſt on Jacob's compliance with the agreement between her ſiſter and her ſelf, and ſhe ſucceeded in her deſires; in conſequence of which ſhe made him the father of a fifth ſon, whom ſhe called Iſſachar, which ſignifies the man of reward; alledging that he was given to her as a compenſation for reſigning her maid to Jacob. After which ſhe bore her ſixth and laſt ſon, and called him Zabulon, which ſignifies dwelling, in hopes that ſo many ſons would induce her husband to cohabit entirely with her. She had likewiſe one daughter by him, and whom ſhe named Dinah, which is the feminine of Dan; after which ſhe ceaſed from bearing any more children.

Ver. 21. And God remembred Rachel, and God hearkned to her, and opened her womb.] Rachel was at laſt, happily delivered of a ſon, whom ſhe called Joſeph, in hopes that God would add another to him, as that name imports.

Jacob became the father of all theſe children in the ſecond period of the ſeven years he paſſed in Meſopotamia; and it is ſo far from being credible, that he did not marry Rachel, till fourteen years after his arrival in that country, that one can hardly comprehend, how the ſecond period of ſeven years, could be ſufficient to furniſh out all the events which Moſes has included in that interval. For it muſt be in this laſt period of ſeven years, that all the twelve children of Jacob were born; which is not without its difficulty. 'Tis true they were the offſpring of four women, but Moſes relates their ſeveral births after ſuch a manner, as ſeems to make it doubtful, whether ſeven years were ſufficient thereto: He ſays, that Leah had four ſons ſucceſſively, which would take up about three years and an half: He afterwards relates the concern of Rachel at her barrenneſs, and adds, that to mitigate her diſgrace, ſhe gave her maid Bilhah to Jacob; who had a ſon by her named Dan; and that ſhe was afterwards the mother of Naphtali. Leah being then afflicted in her turn, that ſhe had left off bearing children, gave her maid Zilpah to Jacob, who had Gad and Aſher, by her. The births of the four children, by theſe two concubines, appear likewiſe to have comprehended the ſpace of three years and an half, which added to the former make up, already, the ſeven years already mentioned. It ſhould ſeem that we ought to allow about the like ſpace of time, for the events that (we ſay) happen'd in the ſame ſeven years. God being moved with the lamentations of Leah, gave her three children, which were likewiſe born at different times, viz. Iſſachar, Zebulon, and Dinah, and it was not till after their births, that God granted Joſeph to the earneſt prayers of Rachel.

To the difficulties that attend this calculation, add, that Reuben ought to have been of the age of five or ſix years, when he found the mandrakes, and yet that happen'd before the births of the four laſt children of Jacob.

This is not all yet; for Hezron and Hamul, the ſons of Pharez, and grand-children of Judah, are reckoned up among thoſe who went down into Egypt with Jacob. This fact, related in the 46th chapter of this book, is almoſt inexplicable, upon the ſuppoſition, that this patriarch did not marry Leah and Rachel till the completion of the firſt ſeven years of his ſervice, and the ſtrength of the objection ariſes from the following computation.

Jacob was 130 years old, when he appeared before Pharoah, Gen. xlvii. 9. and Joſeph was then paſt his 39th year, for he was thirty when he came out of Potiphar's priſon; ſeven years of plenty, and two of famine, were likewiſe paſt, which make the number 39. If we ſubſtract from the 130 years of Jacob's age, when he was preſented to Pharaoh, the 39 of Joſeph's life, and the 14 which Jacob ſpent with Laban, before Joſeph was born, Jacob will be found to have been about 76 at his arrival in Meſopotamia. Judah the fourth ſon of Jacob, muſt be four years older than Joſeph; and therefore was 43 years of age, when Jacob went into Egypt. But Moſes declares, that Hezron and Hamul, grand-children of Judah, accompanied him, in that journey. Suppoſing then, that Jacob did not marry till after the firſt ſeven years of his ſervice, Judah, at the age of 43 years was grandfather to Hezron and Hamul; but this ſuppoſition draws on others that are not eaſily maintainable: For it muſt be ſuppoſed, that Judah was married at the age of twelve years; that at thirteen, he had a ſon named Err, who was likewiſe married when he was no more than twelve years old, to Tamar; that about a year afterwards, Onan the brother of Err was alſo eſpouſed to Tamar; that Onan being dead, Tamar waited about three years, that ſhe might be married to Shelah; that this interval being paſt, ſhe had Pharez by Judah; that Pharez married at the age of twelve years, and, in a year or two after, was the father of Hezron and Hamul. Such are the ſuppoſitions that muſt inevitably be made, if Judah were no more than 43 years old, when he attended Jacob into Egypt; and it is pretended, that it is in a manner demonſtrable, he could not be older, if his father Jacob, were not married till after the firſt ſeven years ſpent in Laban's ſervice.

This difficulty is render'd ſo much the greater, in that it is ſaid, that Judah married Shuah, when Joſeph was ſold by his brethren; now Joſeph was, at that time, ſeventeen years old; and Judah four more; conſequently he muſt be 21 years old, when he married Shuah; the ſuppoſition, therefore, of his being married at the age of twelve years falls to the ground.

Theſe difficulties have made ſuch impreſſions upon the minds of ſome commentators, that, in order to ſolve them, they were of opinion, that Jacob married both Leah and Rachel, as ſoon as he came to Laban; and that he ſerved him fourteen years after he had obtained them, upon that condition; and it is pretended that we cannot, without having recourſe to ſuch a ſuppoſition, explain the words of Moſes, when he declares, that the ſeven years of ſervice, in which Jacob engaged himſelf for Rachel, ſeemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her; and that one muſt have but an indifferent knowledge of a man's heart, to imagine that the paſſion of that Patriarch for Rachel, ſhould make thoſe years appear ſhort, that paſs'd before he could obtain her; ſince, on the contrary, the height of his affection would make him think every day a year, till he had eſpouſed her, according to the remark made by Solomon, to whom the power of this kind of paſſion was as much known as to moſt men in the world; Hope deferred maketh the heart ſick. Prov. xiii. 12.

But as ſtrong as theſe objections may ſeem, they cannot ſtand againſt the text of Moſes, who declares expreſsly, that Jacob ſerved ſeven years for Rachel, after which he ſaid to Laban, Give me my wife, for my days are fulfilled. The commentators whom we oppoſe, pretend, that by my days, muſt be underſtood the age of that patriarch, and that he meant nothing more, than that he was of an age fit for marriage; or elſe that his month of probationſhip was compleated; and therefore, that it was as if he had ſaid, I have already ſerved a ſufficient time for you to judge of my ability; and ſince theſe days therefore are fulfilled, and thou art ſatisfied with my propoſal of ſerving thee for ſeven years, let my marriage be no longer delay'd. But it is demonſtrable, that by the manner of placing theſe words, in this chapter, they denote the ſeven years ſervice, which Jacob had paſſed, in order to obtain Rachel.

Tho' the objections, therefore, which we have recited in their full vigour, are difficult to be ſolv'd, they are not, however, quite unanſwerable. For, 1. When Moſes affirms, that the ſeven years ſervice ſeem'd unto Jacob but a few days, by reaſon of his love to Rachel, he means, that the condition upon which Laban promis'd his daughter to that patriarch, did not ſeem hard to him, foraſmuch as his tenderneſs for Rachel alleviated every circumſtance that was neceſſary, to be complied with, before he could obtain her. Nor ought we, in the ſecond place, to be ſtartled at the ſuppoſition that Judah, his ſons, and his grandſons, were all married at the age of twelve or thirteen years.

Some commentators have thought it more eaſy to clear up the objection, by ſuppoſing, that Moſes, in reckoning up the deſcendants of Jacob, mentions ſome perſons who were not born till after that patriarch's journey into Egypt: But thoſe who have advanc'd this opinion, have not well conſider'd the 8th, nor the 26th verſes of the 46th chapter of Geneſis, in which we are preſented with this liſt. In the firſt of them Moſes ſays, Theſe are the names of the children of Iſrael which came into Egypt. And, after a particular enumeration of them, he adds, in the 26th verſe, All the ſouls that came with Jacob into Egypt, which came out of his loins, beſides Jacob's ſon's wives, all the ſouls were threeſcore and ſix. Who can reconcile theſe two verſes with the opinion of thoſe who maintain, that mention is made, in this catalogue, of ſome perſons not born till after the arrival of the patriarch in Egypt?

But if theſe are ſolid reaſons for believing that Judah was married at the age of twelve years, there would be no occaſion to ſtop at that part of the objection where it is ſaid, that he was married at the time when Joſeph was ſold; tho' the Scripture may ſeem to refer theſe two events to the ſame period, ſince it ſays that Judah married at that time; for it often happens that this expreſſion is not to be underſtood ſtrictly, but may imply a more remote term, as might eaſily be made appear.

But if the ſuppoſition of theſe premature marriages ſhould ſeem a little too exceptionable, one may offer another anſwer to the objection taken from the deſcent of Hezron and Hamul into Egypt; and it may be denied, that Joſeph was but 39 years old, when the patriarchs arriv'd there. It is true, he was 30, when he came out of priſon; it is likewiſe true, that the ſeven years of plenty, and two of famine, were paſs'd, when his father Jacob was introduc'd to Pharaoh; but it is by no means prov'd, that the years of plenty began immediately after Joſeph was deliver'd from his priſon. Some years might have paſs'd between theſe two intervals, and all the time that is ſo allow'd, tends to leſſen the difficulty: For if Joſeph was three years older than is generally ſuppos'd, Judah's age would likewiſe be augmented by the ſame number of years: If Joſeph were four, Judah would alſo be four, and ſo on.

One may likewiſe anſwer the argument drawn from the birth of the twelve children of Jacob, and from the circumſtances related by Moſes thereupon; for inſtance, we muſt contract the time of the birth of the firſt children of Leah, and it may be ſuppos'd, that Rachel complain'd of her own inſertility, as ſoon as ſhe beheld the firſt appearance of her ſiſter's pregnancy. It was then, perhaps, that ſhe gave her maid to Jacob, and that he had Dan and Naphtali by her. 'Tis true, Moſes does not mention the complaint of Rachel, till he has firſt related the birth of the four firſt ſons of Leah; but, as we have already hinted, it often happens, that the holy Scripture repreſents in one place, a whole ſeries of events of the ſame kind, ſome of which did not come to paſs till after thoſe circumſtances of which it then gives an account. It muſt likewiſe be ſuppos'd, that as ſoon as ever Leah found ſhe had ceas'd to conceive, ſhe gave Zilpah to Jacob; and as to Reuben's being no more than five or ſix years old, when he found the mandrakes, 'tis an objection without any weight; ſince children born in the country, and brought up hardily, are robuſt and vigorous, even in the ſecond or third years of their life. Reuben, therefore, might, at the age aſſign'd him, have found mandrakes, and carried them to his mother.

Ver. 25. And it came to paſs when Rachel had born Joſeph, that Jacob ſaid unto Laban, ſend me away, that I may go unto mine own place, and to my country.] Jacob having faithfully diſcharg'd his contract with Laban, had an inclination to return to the land of Canaan, and intreated his father-in-law to consent to it. But as Laban was conscious, that Jacob's manner of proposing his departure, was a kind of reproach to him for the vexations he had sustain'd during his continuance with him, he oppos'd his return, but with the specious pretext of making him some compensation; and therefore offer'd him such wages as Jacob himself could not but approve. Jacob consented to serve him some time longer, in feeding his cattel, provided all the speckled and spotted cattel, and all the brown cattel among the sheep, and the spotted and speckled among the goats, might be his property; and he even added a proposal which seem'd to render him incapable of deriving any advantage from it: For he consented that Laban should, from that time, separate all the beasts of various colours, that were in his flocks, and that he himself would only take charge of such as were but of one colour, and would demand, for his hire, none but the spotted ones that should proceed from these last. Laban readily consented to the proposal, as not being able to comprehend what reward Jacob could obtain, and how animals, of one single colour, could produce those that would be spotted. He therefore made a separate flock of all the brown among the sheep, removing all the he-goats that were speckled, and committing the care of them to his own children; the rest he left with Jacob, and order'd that there should be the distance of three days journey between the two flocks, lest Jacob, having any communication with the other, should produce young ones of various colours.

Ver. 37. And Jacob took him rods of green poplar, and of the hasel, &c.] The Hebrew word Luz, which is translated hasel, in this verse, properly signifies an almond; and therefore St. Jerome rightly renders it, virgas amygdalinas, almond rods. And those Hebrew interpreters who will have it signify an hasel tree, confess, that they herein depart from the opinion of those who went before them. So Aben Ezra, and Kimchi, who both acknowledge that the ancient doctors expound it, almond rods.

Jacob employ'd the stratagem, describ'd in the latter part of this chapter, on the strong and vigorous sheep, (for so Bochart understands the original word, which some versions render hasty); but he omitted this precaution, with respect to the weak, whom he left to the ordinary course of nature.

Ver. 39. And the flocks conceived before the rods, &c.] The Greek fathers ascribe the manner of conception, represented in this verse, to the miraculous operation of God; but the Latin fathers, and St. Jerome in particular, look upon it as accomplish'd by the natural force of imagination; and relates instances of the same event in Spain, with respect to horses and mares; and cites Quintilian and Hippocrates to justify the same conception in women; which he corroborates with a number of authorities out of Galen, and other writers, who have obsery'd indelible marks to have been impressed upon children, by the objects that were presented to the imagination of the parent, at the time of her conception.

St. Austin affirms, that the Egyptians, by a device of the same nature with this of Jacob's, had always a new Apis, or pied bull, to succeed him that died; and to whom they render'd divine honours. But whatsoever there might be in natural imagination, to produce such effects, it must be acknowledged, that God, in the instance under consideration, gave an extraordinary blessing to this contrivance, as appears by the vision which Jacob says he had, and wherein God, who had directed him to have recourse to this invention, promis'd to crown it with success, ch. xxxi. 10, 11, 12. For beasts have very rarely such strong and vehement imaginations, as are necessary to produce such effects, unless they are excited by some unusual passion. And therefore we incline to believe, that the Deity wrought upon the imagination of Laban's cattel; for should any shepherd have the curiosity to make the same experiment, at this time, he will hardly find it so successful as Jacob's, which was under the conduct of a divine operation.

Ver. 43. And the man increased exceedingly, &c.] The behaviour of Jacob in all this transaction, has occasion'd two questions to be stated: 1. Was this stratagem a lawful proceeding. 2. Was it natural for the flocks thus to produce spotted ones, or was it a miraculous dispensation of providence? The latter of these questions has been already considered; and as to the former, we answer, that Jacob's conduct on this occasion was undoubtedly lawful, since God himself, the supreme proprietor both of the flocks of Laban and Jacob, directed him to act in this manner. "Your father, says "Jacob to his wives, hath deceived me, and changed my "wages ten times, but God suffered him not to hurt me; "for it came to pass at the time that the cattel conceived, that I lifted up mine eyes, and saw in a dream, "and behold, the rams which leaped upon the cattel, "were ring streaked, speckled and grisled: And the Angel of the Lord spake unto me in a dream, saying, Jacob; and I said, here am I; and he said, lift up now "thine eyes, and see all the rams, which leap upon the "cattel are ring streaked, speckled and grisled; for I have "seen all that Laban doth unto thee."

In a word, Jacob having by indefatigable labour, and a long course of integrity, in the station wherein he was entrusted by Laban, deserved a better return from him, than the patriarch experienced; the all-wise God, who knew the secrets of both hearts, authorized Jacob, to render himself justice, since it had been so long refused him by Laban. In this sense, therefore, no immoral act can, with any propriety of speech, be said to have been committed by Jacob.

CHAP. XXXI.

1 Jacob upon displeasure departeth secretly. 19 Rachel stealeth her fathers images: 22 Laban pursueth after him, 26 and complaineth of the wrong. 34 Rachels policy to hide the images. 36 Jacobs complaint of Laban. 43 The covenant of Laban and Jacob at Galeed.

AND he heard the words of Labans sons, saying, Jacob hath taken away all that was our fathers; and of that which was our fathers hath he gotten all this glory.

2 And Jacob beheld the countenance of Laban, and behold, it was not toward him as before.

3 And the LORD said unto Jacob, Return unto the land of thy fathers, and to thy kindred; and I will be with thee.

4 And Jacob sent and called Rachel and Leah to the field unto his flock,

5 And said unto them, I see your fathers countenance, that it is not toward me as before: but the God of my father hath been with me.

6 And ye know that with all my power, I have served your father.

7 And your father hath deceived me, and changed my wages ten times: but God suffered him not to hurt me.

8 If he said thus, The speckled shall be thy wages; then all the cattel bare speckled: and if he said thus, The ring-straked shall be thy hire; then bare all the cattel ring-straked.

9 Thus God hath taken away the cattel of your father, and given them to me.

10 And it came to pass at the time that the cattel conceived, that I lifted up mine eyes, and saw in a dream, and behold, the rams which leaped upon the cattel tel were ring-ſtraked, ſpeckled, and griſled.

11 And the angel of God ſpake unto me in a dream, ſaying, Jacob: And I ſaid, Here am I.

12 And he ſaid, Lift up now thine eyes and ſee, all the rams which leap upon the cattel are ring-ſtraked, ſpeckled, and griſled: for I have ſeen all that Laban doeth unto thee.

13 I am the God of Beth-el, where thou anointedſt the pillar, and where thou vowedſt a vow unto me: now ariſe, get thee out from this land, and return unto the land of thy kindred.

14 And Rachel and Leah anſwered, and ſaid unto him, Is there yet any portion or inheritance for us in our fathers houſe?

15 Are we not counted of him ſtrangers? for he hath ſold us, and hath quite devoured alſo our money.

16 For all the riches which God hath taken from our father, that is ours, and our childrens: now then whatſoever God hath ſaid unto thee, do.

17 ¶ Then Jacob roſe up, and ſet his ſons and wives upon camels.

18 And he carried away all his cattel, and all his goods which he had gotten the cattel of his getting, which he had gotten in Padan-aram; for to go to Iſaac his father in the land of Canaan.

19 And Laban went to ſhear his ſheep: and Rachel had ſtolen the images that were her fathers.

20 And Jacob ſtole away unawares to Laban the Syrian, in that he told him not that he fled.

21 So he fled with all that he had, and he roſe up, and paſſed over the river, and ſet his face toward the mount Gilead.

22 And it was told Laban on the third day, that Jacob was fled.

23 And he took his brethren with him, and purſued after him ſeven days journey; and they overtook him in the mount Gilead.

24 And God came to Laban the Syrian in a dream by night, and ſaid unto him, Take heed that thou ſpeak not to Jacob either good or bad.

25 ¶ Then Laban overtook Jacob. Now Jacob had pitched his tent in the mount; and Laban with his brethren pitched in the mount of Gilead.

26 And Laban ſaid to Jacob, What haſt thou done, that thou haſt ſtolen away unawares to me, and carried away my daughters as captives taken with the ſword?

27 Wherefore didſt thou flee away ſecretly, and ſteal away from me? and didſt not tell me, that I might have ſent thee away with mirth, and with ſongs, with tabret, and with harp?

28 And haſt not ſuffered me to kiſs my ſons and my daughters? thou haſt now done fooliſhly in ſo doing.

29 It is in the power of my hand to do you hurt, but the God of your father ſpake unto me yeſternight, ſaying, Take thou heed that thou ſpeak not to Jacob either good or bad.

30 And now though thou wouldſt needs be gone, becauſe thou ſore longedſt after thy father's houſe; yet wherefore haſt thou ſtolen my Gods?

31 And Jacob anſwered and ſaid to Laban, Becauſe I was afraid: for I ſaid, Peradventure, thou wouldſt take by force thy daughters from me.

32 With whomſoever thou findeſt thy gods, let him not live: before our brethren diſcern thou what is thine with me, and take it to thee: for Jacob knew not that Rachel had ſtolen them.

33 And Laban went into Jacobs tent, and into Leahs tent, and into the two maid-ſervants tents; but he found them not. Then went he out of Leahs tent, and entred into Rachels tent.

34 Now Rachel had taken the images, and put them in the camels furniture, and ſat upon them: and Laban ſearched all the tent, but found them not.

35 And ſhe ſaid to her father, Let it not diſpleaſe my lord that I cannot riſe up before thee; for the cuſtom of women is upon me: and he ſearched, but found not the images.

36 ¶ And Jacob was wroth, and chode with Laban: and Jacob anſwered, and ſaid to Laban, What is my treſpaſs? what is my ſin, that thou haſt ſo hotly purſued after me?

37 Whereas thou haſt ſearched all my ſtuff, what haſt thou found of all thy houſhold-ſtuff? ſet it here before my brethren and thy brethren, that they may judge betwixt us both.

38 Theſe twenty years have I been with thee; thy ews and thy ſhe-goats have not caſt their young, and the rams of thy flock have I not eaten.

39 That which was torn of beaſts, I brought not unto thee, I bare the loſs of it; of my hand didſt thou require it, whether ſtolen by day, or ſtolen by night.

40 Thus I was, in the day the drought conſumed me, and the froſt by night; and my ſleep departed from mine eyes.

41 Thus have I been twenty years in thy houſe; I ſerved thee fourteen years for thy two daughters, and ſix years for thy cattel: and thou haſt changed my wages ten times.

42 Except the God of my father, the God of Abraham, and the fear of Iſaac had been with me, ſurely thou hadſt ſent me away now empty: God hath ſeen mine affliction and the labour of my hands, and rebuked thee yeſternight.

43 ¶ And Laban anſwered, and ſaid unto Jacob, Theſe daughters are my daughters, and theſe children are my children, and theſe cattel are my cattel, and all that thou ſeeſt is mine: and what can I do this day unto theſe my daughters, or unto their children which they have born?

44 Now therefore come thou, let us make a covenant, I and thou; and let it be for a witneſs between me and thee.

45 And Jacob took a ſtone, and ſet it up for a pillar.

46 And Jacob ſaid unto his brethren, Gather ſtones; and they took ſtones, and made an heap: and they did eat there upon the heap.

47 And Laban called it Jegar-ſahadutha: but Jacob called it Galeed.

48 And Laban ſaid, This heap is a witneſs between me and thee this day. Therefore was the name of it called Galeed:

49 And Mizpah; for he ſaid, the LORD watch between me and thee, when we are abſent one from another.

50 If thou ſhalt afflict my daughters, or if thou ſhalt take other wives beſides my daughters, no man is with us; See, God is witneſs betwixt me and thee.

51 And Laban ſaid to Jacob, Behold this heap, and behold this pillar, which I have caſt betwixt me and thee;

52 This heap be witneſs, and this pillar be witneſs, that I will not paſs over this heap to thee, and that thou ſhalt not paſs over this heap and this pillar unto me, for harm.

53 The God of Abraham, and the God of Nahor, the God of their father, judge betwixt us. And Jacob ſware by the fear of his father Iſaac.

54 Then Jacob offered ſacrifice upon the mount, and called his brethren to eat bread: and they did eat bread, and tarried all night in the mount.

55 And early in the morning Laban roſe up, and kiſſed his ſons and his daughters, and bleſſed them: and Laban departed, and returned unto his place.

Ver. 2. And Jacob beheld the countenance of Laban, and behold it was not toward him, as before.] The proſperity of Jacob became inſupportable to Laban, whoſe ſons were ſo far from endeavouring to reſtrain the iniquity and avarice of their father, that they endeavoured to render him ſtill more criminal in thoſe particulars. Jacob ſoon obſerved that he had incurred the diſpleaſure of Laban and his family; and therefore reſolved to depart privately from a houſe where he could not continue to reſide, without manifeſt danger to his perſon and effects.

Ver. 7. And your father hath deceived me, and changed my wages ten times, &c.] We think biſhop Patrick's expoſition of this paſſage preferable to any we have yet ſeen: According to that learned prelate, Jacob ſerved Laban ſix years, after he had made the agreement, mentioned in the preceding chapter, ver. 31. and Laban acquieſced with his bargain the firſt year. But when he beheld his ſon-in-law exceeding proſperous, he altered the form of their covenants, at the end of that year: And in like manner, every half year, when the ewes brought forth their young, (which they did twice a year) and he ſaw them ſpotted; he broke his contract, and made a new one, leſs advantageous to Jacob: Sometimes reſtraining it to one ſort of cattel, ſometimes to another; and not permitting him to enjoy the whole benefit of his contract. Which, as the biſhop adds, is not improbable: For Jacob mentions his ill dealing with him in the very ſame words, ver. 41. And in the next verſe he relates, how Laban would ſometimes ſuffer him to have only the ſpeckled; at another time, none but the ring-ſtraked; and ſo we may ſuppoſe of the reſt.

Ver. 19. And Laban went to ſhear his ſheep: and Rachel had ſtolen the images that were her fathers.] Jacob's wives were ſenſible of the juſtice of his complaints, and recollected the ungenerous manner in which their father had diſpoſed of them in marriage to him; by obliging him to ſerve ſeven years, like a ſlave, for each of them: They ſubmitted therefore to their husband's pleaſure, and conſented to retire from that country, privately, with him.

Rachel, before her departure, ſtole her father's idols: Moſes calls them Teraphim. The name of theſe images; their figure; the manner of conſulting them; with ſeveral other particulars, have opened a vaſt field for the imagination of commentators to expatiate in; but we ſhall offer thoſe opinions only, to our readers, which ſeem to lay the beſt claim to probability.

Teraphim is, by all the Jewiſh Rabbies, acknowledged to be a word of no Hebrew etymology. The Septuagint tranſlate it ſometimes an oracle, and ſometimes vain idols. Some think it to be an Egyptian word, and the ſame with Serapis; they likewiſe affirm, that Ham and his ſon Mizraim were the firſt who introduced idolatry; and that the latter, who was the founder of Egypt, filled that country with idols, inſomuch that there was neither town nor village, houſe or road, where they were not to be ſeen. As to their figure, the moſt probable opinion is, that it was human, or bearing ſome ſimilitude to that form; tho' the Jews pretend, that it was the head of a firſt-born ſon, ſever'd from the neck, and embalmed; under the tongue of which, a golden plate was faſten'd, and inſcribed with the name of ſome falſe deity. Which head being placed in a niche, or upon a ſhelf, gave vocal anſwers; but theſe are fables not worth confuting; and the figure which Michol placed in David's bed, and which the Hebrew original calls by the name of Teraphim, makes it evident, that it muſt have had a human ſhape.

Theſe Teraphim were afterwards univerſally known by the name of Taliſmans, as they are, to this day, all over India. The Perſians call them Teleſim, a name not unlike Teraphim. They were made of different metals, and ſizes, caſt under certain conſtellations, with the figures of ſome planets, and magic characters engraven upon them. As for their uſe, it was chiefly to give anſwers, to foretel future future events, to diſcover what was hid or loſt, with other ſervices of the like nature. They were likewiſe addreſſed to for temporal bleſſings, and to avert calamities of all kinds. They were to be conſulted and prayed to at certain times, and under particular aſpects of the planets, from which, according to the Jews, they partly derived their power, and partly from the characters impreſſed upon them. Another Rabbi goes farther, and declares their anſwers were delivered in audible expreſſions, and juſtifies that opinion from the words of the prophet Zachariah, chap. x. 2. The Teraphims have ſpoken vain things. However, we are not to ſuppoſe, that all the Teraphims were of the ſame make, or for the ſame uſes, even among the Jews. We ſhall have occaſion to mention ſome other kinds of them when we offer our remarks on that of Micah, mentioned Judg. xvii. Beſides, as they came in proceſs of time to be more univerſal, they were made agreeably to the fancy of each perſon who was deſirous to poſſeſs them; but the generality of them had at leaſt a human head.

Our laſt enquiry ſhall be into Rachel's inducement to ſteal her father's Gods. Some think, that ſhe acted in this manner, to repay herſelf for the damage ſhe and her husband had ſuſtain'd from her father's injuſtice; and if theſe images were made of gold, or even ſilver, as ſome have ſuppoſed, the richneſs of the metal might be a temptation to her to ſteal theſe coſtly idols. But not to enumerate the various conjectures with which the commentaries on this paſſage are crowded to very little purpoſe. We are inclined to believe, that as Rachel had been educated in the ſuperſtitions of her father's family, the impreſſions they had created in her mind, might not have then been entirely worn off even by the inſtructions ſhe had received from her husband with relation to the true religion; for numberleſs inſtances have made it evident, that when ſuperſtitious principles have been early infuſed into the minds of perſons, they are not eaſily eradicated. Rachel therefore, might ſteal theſe idols, to prevent her father from conſulting them, with reference to Jacob's flight, and from receiving any information from them of the road he had taken, or the place to which he intended to direct his courſe.

Ver. 20. And Jacob ſtole away unawares to Laban the Syrian, &c.] The Hebrew phraſe of Moſes is, Jacob ſtole away the heart of Laban, &c. which is thus paraphraſed by Abarbanel; ſtole away the heart; that is to ſay, Jacob acted with ſo much prudence, and ſo much policy, that Laban was unable to fathom his deſign.] But we think this cannot be the meaning of the ſacred hiſtorian, ſince Laban was very ſenſible that Jacob intended to withdraw himſelf and his effects, from a place where he had been treated with ſo much rigour. Our tranſlators therefore, ſeem to have given us the true ſignification of this expreſſion.

Ver. 22, 23. And it was told Laban on the third day, that Jacob was fled. And he took his brethren with him, and purſued after him ſeven days journey; and they overtook him in the mount Gilead.] Laban, at the news of Jacob's flight, was undoubtedly affected with all the emotions of a covetous and inſatiable man, regretting the prey ſnatched out of his hands. His anger gave him wings, ſo that he purſued Jacob, and overtook him, on the ſeventh day, at mount Gilead, ſo called from what was afterwards tranſacted there between Jacob and Laban. This mount riſes on the eaſt of the ſea of Galilee, being part of the ridge of mountains, running from mount Libanus, ſouthwards, on the eaſt of the holy land, and it included the mountainous region, called, in the New Teſtament, Trachonitis.

Ver. 24. And God came to Laban the Syrian by night, &c.] This ſudden overtaking might have been fatal to Jacob and his family, had not God condeſcended to interpoſe for their preſervation, in the manner repreſented by Moſes: For when a man's ways pleaſe the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him, Prov. xvi. 17. Laban ſubmitted to the commands of heaven, but tho' he durſt not ſatisfy his vengeance, he was reſolved to vent his fury in complaints and reproaches. Accordingly, he upbraided Jacob with his clandeſtine flight, and that falſe prudence which cauſed him to prefer a ſecret deſertion, to an open departure, that might have been accorded to him, and which, as he was then pleaſed to intimate, would have been attended with all the marks and demonſtrations of paternal tenderneſs and love. And as the exceſs of ſuperſtition, is frequently blended with the greateſt ſallies of vice, and the more mens paſſions are violent and irregular, the greater is their zeal for a religion that either encourages or tollerates ſuch paſſions; Laban chiefly complained, that Jacob had ſtolen his Gods from him. Excellent deities indeed, that could be thus carried off by theft!

Ver. 31, 32. And Jacob anſwered and ſaid to Laban, Becauſe I was afraid: for I ſaid, peradventure thou wouldſt take, by force, thy daughters from me. With whomſoever thou findeſt thy Gods let him not live, &c.] 'Tis no good maxim to anſwer the reproaches, tho' never ſo unjuſt, of an enemy who is ſtrongeſt, and to make him ſenſible, that they proceed from a cauſe which has its foundation in unrighteouſneſs Jacob endeavoured to excuſe himſelf, by alledging his apprehenſions, that Laban's fondneſs for his daughters, might render him averſe to their departure. But, above all, he proteſted his innocence, as to the theft charged upon him, and in order to make it the more evident, he conſented to the infliction of death, on the perſon who ſhould be detected in that action. The Jews ſay, that this imprecation had its effect, and was the cauſe that Rachel died ſoon after.

Jacob deſired his father-in-law, himſelf, to make the neceſſary ſearch, in an affair of ſo nice and odious a nature; and his requeſt was punctually executed, tho' not to the effect that Laban expected. Rachel had concealed her father's idols in the furniture of one of the camels, and ſat upon them when Laban entered her tent, pretending to be render'd incapable of riſing, in conſequence of an infirmity which a daughter might own to her father.

Ver. 36. And Jacob was wroth, and chode with Laban, &c.] Jacob, then perceiving that he had all the ſuperiority on his ſide, which reſulted from reaſon, and his firm confidence in the protection of heaven, gave a free vent to his expoſtulations. He was contented, that the perſons who were leaſt liable to Laban's ſuſpicions, and were moſt devoted to him, ſhould be judges of this diſpute. He recapitulated all the occurrences of the twenty years he had ſpent in Laban's ſervice, and repeated the long ſeries of labour he had ſuſtained. Thus, ſays he, I was, in the day the drought conſumed me, and the froſt by night, and my ſleep departed from mine eyes. This was a kind of life capable of exhauſting the ſtrength of the youngeſt and moſt vigorous man, and which could not but be heavy on Jacob, who drew near to his hundredth year. He then repreſented to Laban, the injuſtice he had offer'd to ſo faithful and ſedulous a ſervant, together with what he had then been preparing for him, and which he was on the point of executing, if God, who had ſo powerfully aſſiſted Abraham, and Iſaac, had not inceſſantly watched for the preſervation of their poſterity.

Ver. 44. Now therefore come thou, let us make a covenant, &c.] Laban being, at laſt, ſoften'd by Jacob's diſcourſe, propoſed an unchangeable covenant between them. theſe daughters are my daughters, ſaid he in the verſe preceding this, and theſe children are my children, and theſe cattel are my cattel, &c. By which he would either ſhew his condeſcenſion, in yielding up thoſe properties to which he pretended an unalienable right, or his tenderneſs in ſharing all the injury, he, in the firſt raſhneſs of his paſſion, might have offer'd to Jacob and his family.

Ver. 46. And Jacob ſaid unto his brethren, gather ſtones &c.] The contending parties having ended their mutual complaints, every one was diligent to raiſe a monument of the covenant, which the father and ſon-in-law were preparing to ratify. Laban called the heap of ſtones, by the Syrian words, Jegar-Sahadutha, which ſignified the heap of teſtimony; and Jacob gave it the Hebrew appellation of Galeed, which had the ſame import.

Theſe words of Laban, in the 49th verſe, The Lord watch between me and thee this day; cauſed the monument to be likewiſe called Mizpah, which ſignifies a beacon. Some commentators confound this place, with that where a city of the ſame name was built, and afterwards allotted to the tribe of Benjamin.

Ver. 53 ——— And Jacob ſwear by the fear of his father Iſaac.] This treaty was confirmed by an oath, and each of the contracting parties ſwore by the God he adored. Laban was an idolater, and he accordingly adjured the gods which Abraham and his anceſtors had formerly worſhipped in Chaldea; but Jacob ſware by the fear of his father Iſaac. This is that emphatical and majeſtic expreſſion of Moſes, which the Jews have retained in their prayers; but of which ſome of them have not rightly perceived the weight and ſublimity: For they pretend, that this fear of Iſaac was the dread that ſeiz'd him, when he was apprehenſive of being ſacrificed by Abraham. Others weaken the expreſſion, and underſtand by it, the reſpect that Jacob bore to his father. The Chaldee paraphraſt enters much better into the deſign of Jacob, explaining the Hebrew words thus; The God who is the object of the fear of Iſaac. The prophet Iſaiah ſeems to allude to this paſſage, and to point out its moſt natural ſignification: Sanctify the Lord of hoſts himſelf, and let him be your fear, and let him be your dread, Iſa. viii. 13. We are therefore to underſtand, by the fear of Iſaac, that God who was the object of his reverential worſhip.

the

CHAP. XXXII.

1 Jacobs viſion at Mahanaim: 3 His meſſage to Eſau: 6 He is afraid of Eſau's coming: 9 He prayeth for deliverance: 13 He ſendeth a preſent to Eſau: 24 He wreſtleth with an angel at Peniel, where he is called Iſrael: 31 He halteth.

AND Jacob went on his way, and the angels of God met him.

2 And when Jacob ſaw them, he ſaid, This is Gods hoſt: and he called the name of that place Mahanaim.

3 And Jacob ſent meſſengers before him to Eſau his brother, unto the land of Seir, the country of Edom.

4 And he commanded them ſaying, Thus ſhall ye ſpeak unto my lord Eſau; Thy ſervant Jacob ſaith thus, I have ſojourned with Laban, and ſtayed there until now.

5 And I have oxen, and aſſes, flocks, and men-ſervants, and women-ſervants: and I have ſent to tell my lord, that I may find grace in thy ſight.

6 ¶ And the meſſengers returned to Jacob, ſaying, We came to thy brother Eſau, and alſo he cometh to meet thee, and four hundred men with him.

7 Then Jacob was greatly afraid, and diſtreſſed: and he divided the people that was with him, and the flocks, and herds, and the camels into two bands;

8 And ſaid, If Eſau come to the one company, and ſmite it, then the other company which is left ſhall eſcape.

9 ¶ And Jacob ſaid, O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Iſaac, the LORD which ſaidſt unto me, Return unto thy country, and to thy kindred, and I will deal well with thee:

10 I am not worthy of the leaſt of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which thou haſt ſhewed unto thy ſervant; for with my ſtaff I paſſed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands.

11 Deliver me, I pray thee, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Eſau: for I fear him, leſt he will come and ſmite me, and the mother with the children.

12 And thou ſaidſt, I will ſurely do thee good, and make thy ſeed as the ſand of the ſea, which cannot be numbred for multitude.

13 ¶ And he lodged there that ſame night; and took of that which came to his hand, a preſent for Eſau his brother;

14 Two hundred ſhe-goats, and twenty he-goats, two hundred ews and twenty rams, 15 Thirty milch camels with their colts, forty kine and ten bulls, twenty ſhe-aſſes and ten foles.

16 And he delivered them into the hand of his ſervants, every drove by themſelves; and ſaid unto his ſervants, Paſs over before me, and put a ſpace betwixt drove and drove.

17 And he commanded the foremoſt, ſaying, When Eſau my brother meeteth thee, and asketh thee, ſaying, Whoſe art thou? And whither goeſt thou? And whoſe are theſe before thee?

18 Then thou ſhalt ſay, They be thy ſervant Jacobs; it is a preſent ſent unto my lord Eſau: and behold alſo he is behind us.

19 And ſo commanded he the ſecond, and the third, and all that followed the droves, ſaying, On this manner ſhall you ſpeak unto Eſau, when you find him.

20 And ſay ye moreover, Behold, thy ſervant Jacob is behind us: for he ſaid, I will appeaſe him with the preſent that goeth before me, and afterward I will ſee his face; peradventure he will accept of me.

21 So went the preſent over before him: and himſelf lodged that night in the company.

22 And he roſe up that night, and took his two wives, and his two women-ſervants, and his eleven ſons, and paſſed over the ford Jabbok.

23 And he took them, and ſent them over the brook, and ſent over that he had.

24 ¶ And Jacob was left alone: and there wreſtled a man with him, until the breaking of the day.

25 And when he ſaw that he prevailed not againſt him, he touched the hollow of his thigh: and the hollow of Jacobs thigh was out of joynt, as he wreſtled with him.

26 And he ſaid, Let me go, for the day breaketh: And he ſaid, I will not let thee go, except thou bleſs me.

27 And he ſaid unto him, What is thy name? And he ſaid, Jacob.

28 And he ſaid, Thy name ſhall be called no more Jacob, but Iſrael: for as a prince prince haſt thou power with God and with men, and haſt prevailed.

29 And Jacob asked him, and ſaid, Tell me, I pray thee, thy name: And he ſaid, Wherefore is it, that thou doſt ask after my name? And he bleſſed him there.

30 And Jacob called the name of the place Peniel: for I have ſeen God face to face, and my life is preſerved.

31 And as he paſſed over Penuel the ſun roſe upon him, and he halted upon his thigh.

32 Therefore the children of Iſrael eat not of the ſinew which ſhrank, which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day: becauſe he touched the hollow of Jacobs thigh, in the ſinew that ſhrank.

Ver. 1. And Jacob went on his way, and the angels of God met him.] Altho' the patriarchs were the moſt tender objects of God's care and love, yet their lives were not exempted from diſquietude and afflictions. Theſe diſpenſations, were, however, attended with a gracious deſign; for God was pleas'd thereby to raiſe the ſouls of thoſe pious ſufferers to objects more ſolid than any the earth could afford, and to make them ſeek, in heaven, for the fulneſs of thoſe glorious promiſes that he had given them. Jacob had hardly been deliver'd from one formidable enemy, but he ſaw himſelf in danger of falling into the hands of another who was much more to be dreaded. There is oftentimes no bounds to hatred and revenge: Time, which wears and ſoftens marble and rocks, cannot mollify the heart of a revengeful perſon. Jacob was apprehenſive that his twenty years abſence in Meſopotamia, had only ſuſpended, but not extinguiſhed the wrath of Eſau his brother againſt him.

The intimidated patriarch was revolving theſe thoughts in his mind, when a band of celeſtial angels preſented themſelves to his view; forming, as it were, two camps around him. The Jewiſh doctors, who are frequently ſo extravagant in their fondneſs for the falſe marvelous, are oftentimes as diſregardful of the true. Some among them pretend, that theſe angels were only meſſengers, or men coming to give Jacob ſeaſonable notice of his brother's approach. But it is much more natural to give a literal interpretation to this account of Moſes, and to reſt perſuaded, that God, who had formerly aſſured Jacob of his protection, by the viſion of the ladder, did now vouchſafe to ſend ſome of the ſame angelic ſpirits to him, to encourage him, by their preſence, againſt all dangers, in his return to his native country.

Ver. 2. And when Jacob ſaw them, he ſaid, This is God's hoſt; and he called the name of that place Mahanaim.] Jacob was deſirous that the place where he then was, ſhould be diſtinguiſh'd by a name that might for ever commemorate the glorious viſion he had there beheld: He therefore call'd it Mahanaim, which ſignifies two hoſts, or camps. Hence the city, near this place, was afterwards denoted by the ſame name. It was ſeated between mount Gilead, and the river Jabbok, not far from this latter. Adjacent to it, were the confines of the tribe of Gad, and likewiſe of the half tribe of Manaſſeh, on the eaſt of Jordan. It was a place of great ſtrength, and ſeems, for that reaſon, to have been choſen, by Abner, for the reſidence of Iſhboſheth, the ſon of Saul, during the war between him and David; who likewiſe retir'd thither to ſecure himſelf from the rebellion of his ſon Abſalom.

Ver. 3. And Jacob ſent meſſengers before him to Eſau his brother, &c.] The authentic warrants of the protection of heaven, did not render Jacob either indolent, or too ſecure; and he had recourſe to all the human means that prudence could ſuggeſt to him for his ſecurity, and in hopes that providence would graciouſly co-operate with thoſe endeavours. He therefore ſent to notify his return, to Eſau, who dwelt no longer in Canaan, but was then in Idumea, in the country of Seir, which lay on the ſouth of the Salt or Dead Sea, and extended from thence to the Red Sea, or Arabian gulph.

Ver. 6. And the meſſengers returned to Jacob, ſaying, we came to thy brother Eſau, and alſo he cometh to meet thee, and four hundred men with him.] An affectionate brother at the head of ſuch a troop would not have alarmed Jacob, but he could not help ſuſpecting and fearing Eſau. Accordingly his ſoul was ſeized with terror, he poured out his cares into the boſom of the deity, and diſpoſed himſelf for the reception of Eſau.

Ver. 13. And he lodged there that ſame night; and took of that which came to his hand, a preſent for Eſau his brother.] Jacob directed the five ſorts of preſents he prepared for Eſau, ſhould be ranged into as many diſtinct claſſes; that there ſhould be a certain diſtance between each of them; and that when Eſau met any of them, and inquired the meaning of what he ſaw, he ſhould be anſwered, that they were preſents from his brother Jacob. Thus Eſau was to be met at proper diſtances, by objects, whoſe remoteneſs from each other might give him time to reflect, and be pacified.

Ver. 24. And Jacob was left alone; and there wreſtled a man with him, until the breaking of the day.] The patriarch, after having taken thoſe ſteps which prudence ſuggeſted to him, was deſirous to ſpend a few moments in retirement; perhaps to betake himſelf once again to prayer. In this ſolitude Jacob had that famous wreſtling, every circumſtance whereof abounds with ſuch myſterious difficulties, as induced ſome of the ancient fathers to think this whole tranſaction was to be underſtood not in a literal, but a ſpiritual ſenſe. Some Jews are of opinion, that this conflict was performed in a dream, and that Jacob's halting was occaſioned either by fatigue, the chilling air of the night, or the particular poſture he ſlept in. But the apprehenſions he entertained of his brother gave him, in all probability, but little inclination to ſleep; we may add to, that the circumſtances of the ſtory, the impoſition of a new name, and, above all, the teſtimony of the prophet Hoſea, who declares, he had power over the angel, and prevailed, and that he wept and prayed to him, Hoſ. xii. 4. ſeem to make it more than a dream, if it was not a real and corporal wreſtling. As to the perſon who maintained this encounter with Jacob, Origen has been ſo ſtrangely particular in his ſentiments, as to affirm, that the patriarch undoubtedly wreſtled with ſome of the wicked angels, the enemies of mankind. (Orig. de Principiis, l. 3. p. 819.) But could this father poſſibly ſuppoſe, that Jacob would have asked a bleſſing of an evil angel? And would he have called the place where the combat paſſed between him and ſuch a ſpirit, the face of God?

Some Commentators have imagined this perſon to have been an angel, only becauſe Hoſea calls him by that name, in the paſſage above cited; but what follows in the very next verſe of the ſame prophet, plainly refutes that notion, he found him in Bethel, even the LORD GOD of hoſts. That God himſelf met Jacob in Bethel, is evident by his ſaying, I am the God of Bethel, Gen. xxxi. 13. The moſt general opinion, therefore, of ancient and modern expoſitors is, that this angel was Chriſt; 1. Becauſe he bleſſed Jacob. 2. Becauſe the patriarch ſays, I have ſeen God face to face, and therefore he called the name of the place Peniel, ver. 30. of this chapter.

Ver. 25. And when he ſaw that he prevailed not againſt him, he touched the hollow of his thigh: and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint, as he wreſtled with him.] This touch made Jacob ſenſible, that his antagoniſt was a heavenly perſon, and only ſuffered himſelf to be overcome.

Ver. 28. And he ſaid, thy name ſhall be called no more Jacob, but Iſrael.] Iſrael ſignifies a prince with God, or one who has prevailed with God.

For as a prince haſt thou power with God and with men, and haſt prevailed.] Theſe words explain the intention of this combat, which was to denote, that Jacob, having ſuch power, had no cauſe to fear his brother Eſau. So the Vulgar Latin expreſſes it: If thou haſt been ſtrong againſt God, how much more ſhalt thou prevail with men!

Moſt verſions, as well as ours, render the laſt words of the angel to Jacob, in this verſe, as if the patriarch had prevailed over men, as well as over him, whereas he had been ſo far from prevailing over the only two enemies he ever had, namely, Eſau and Laban, that he had been compelled to flie from them both, for his own preſervation. This therefore makes it neceſſary to have recourſe to a better tranſlation of thoſe words, if the original can bear us out in it, which it will do, without ſuffering the leaſt violence; or rather, the ſtrict and literal ſenſe of it is moſt pertinent to our purpoſe. For it runs thus, Thou haſt acted prince-like with God, and thou ſhalt alſo prevail over men. And, indeed, what could be better accommodated to Jacob's condition, at that time, than ſuch a promiſe? Or what can more naturally account for this conflict, than the ſuppoſition that it was offered to him, in order to diſſipate his fears? This verſion is likewiſe more agreeable to the Chaldee paraphraſe, the Septuagint, and the Vulgate, which render it thus; If thou haſt been thus far able to prevail with God, how much more wilt thou be able to prevail over men?

This hiſtorical fact, as it is related by Moſes, may poſſibly have given occaſion to the fable related by Lycophron, that Jupiter took upon him the form of a wreſtler, and contended a whole night with Hercules, who overcame that imaginary father of the gods.

Ver. 30. And Jacob called the name of the place Peniel, &c.] Peniel ſignifies the face of God, and it became afterwards a city of ſome note; for we find that Gideon demoliſhed one of its towers, becauſe the inhabitants had denied him bread, Judges viii. 17. but it was rebuilt by Jeroboam, 1 Kings xii. 25. Joſephus relates, that this prince likewiſe built a palace there. Peniel was ſeated by the river Jordan, and belonged to the tribe of Gad. Strabo mentions a city adjoining to Tripolis, which was called the face of God, at one end of mount Libanus. (Strabo, l. 16.)

Ver. 32. Therefore the children of Iſrael eat not of the ſinew which ſhrank, which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day, &c.] Joſephus informs us, that neither Jacob, nor any of his poſterity ever ſince, did eat that part of any creature; and tho' our text mentions only the ſinew that ſhrank, yet ſo ſcrupulous have ſome of the Jews been, even to this day, that, for want of knowing which particular ſinew it was, they abſtain from the whole hind-quarter; tho' others, who are leſs rigid, abſtain from the thigh only: Some, again, will even eat that, and think it ſufficient to draw the ſinew out of it.

CHAP. XXXIII.

1 The kindneſs of Jacob and Eſau at their meeting. 17 Jacob cometh to Succoth. 18 At Shalem he buyeth a field, and buildeth an altar called El-elohe-iſrael.

AND Jacob lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold, Eſau came, and with him four hundred men. And he divided the children unto Leah, and unto Rachel, and unto the two handmaids.

2 And he put the handmaids and their children foremoſt, and Leah and her children after, and Rachel and Joſeph hindermoſt.

3 And he paſſed over before them, and bowed himſelf to the ground ſeven times, until he came near to his brother.

4 And Eſau ran to meet him, and embraced him, and fell on his neck, and kiſſed him: and they wept.

5 And he lift up his eyes, and ſaw the women and the children; and ſaid, Who are thoſe with thee? And he ſaid, The children which God hath graciouſly given thy ſervant.

6 Then the handmaidens came near, they and their children, and they bowed themſelves.

7 And Leah alſo with her children came near, and bowed themſelves: and after came Joſeph near and Rachel, and they bowed themſelves.

8 And he ſaid, What meaneſt thou by all this drove, which I met? And he ſaid Theſe are to find grace in the ſight of my lord.

9 And Eſau ſaid, I have enough; my brother, keep that thou haſt unto thy ſelf.

10 And Jacob ſaid, Nay, I pray thee, if now I have found grace in thy ſight, then receive my preſent at my hand: for therefore I have ſeen thy face, as though I had ſeen the face of God, and thou waſt pleaſed with me.

11 Take I pray thee, my bleſſing that is brought to thee; becauſe God hath dealt graciouſly with me, and becauſe I have enough: and he urged him, and he took it.

12 And he ſaid, let us take our journey, and let us go, and I will go before thee.

13 And he ſaid unto him, My Lord knoweth that the children are tender, and the flocks and herds with young are with me; and if men ſhould overdrive them one day, all the flock will die.

14 Let my lord, I pray thee, paſs over before his ſervant: and I will lead on ſoftly, according as the cattel that goeth before me, and the children be able to endure; until I come unto my lord unto Seir.

15 And Eſau ſaid, Let me now leave with thee ſome of the folk that are with me: and he ſaid, What needeth it? Let me find grace in the ſight of my lord.

16 ¶ So Eſau returned that day on his way unto Seir.

17 And Jacob journeyed to Succoth, and built him an houſe, and made booths for his cattel: therefore the name of the place is called Succoth.

18 ¶ And Jacob came to Shalem a city of Shechem, which is in the land of Canaan, when he came from Padan-aram; and pitched his tent before the city.

19 And he bought a parcel of a field, where he had ſpread his tent, at the hand of the children of Hamor Shechem's father, for an hundred pieces of money.

20 And he erected there an altar, and called it El-elohe-iſrael.

Ver. 1. And Jacob lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold, Eſau came, and with him four hundred men, &c.] Jacob having received the promiſes mentioned in the laſt chapter, immediately beheld part of their happy accompliſhment. He diſcovered Eſau with his numerous attendants; upon which, he divided his wives and children into three companies; Bilhah and Zilpah, with their children, found found the first; Leah and her off-spring, the second; his beloved Rachel and Joseph, the third; to the end, that if they also must perish, it should not be till last of all. He exposed himself first to the danger, in hopes to mollify Esau by the powerful eloquence of homage and submission; and did not speak to him, till after he had prostrated himself seven times before him.

Ver. 4. And Esau ran to meet him, and embraced him, and fell on his neck, and kissed him, and they wept.] It appears very evident, from the circumstances that attended this interview, between Jacob and his elder brother, that the latter was not so bad as some have unreasonably represented him. He seems, on the contrary, to have been a plain, generous, and honest man, nor does he appear to have been more wicked than the other men of his age and times. His generous and good temper was manifested, by his affectionate deportment towards his brother, and his utter oblivion of the injuries he had received from him; and tho' St. Paul calls him the prophane Esau, and says he was hated by God, it cannot thence be gathered, that God's aversion to him, was occasion'd by any remarkable immorality in his life. Nor was it a hatred which induced the Deity to punish him with temporal calamities, for he was as happy in the blessings of this life, as Abraham, Isaac, or Jacob, if not more. His children became masters of the land of their possession, much sooner than the Israelites; and God was pleased to command these latter not to disturb them in their rights. And if his earthly felicity was such, why should we despair of his being a partaker of the heavenly? If he was excluded from being the heir of the blessing, (in which deprivation God's hatred to him, mention'd by St. Paul, seems to have consisted) so was Lot, and Job, with many other vertuous men. And St. Paul means no more than to shew the Jews, that God had all along bestowed the favours which led to the Messiah, on whom he pleased; to Abraham, not to lot; to Jacob not to Esau: And tho' Esau be called βέβηλος, or prophane, he is never called ἀσεβής, or ἁμαρτωλὸς, wicked, or immoral, So that the only defect in his character is, that he did not seem to have been so mindful of the promises made to his family, as his brother Jacob was; from whence he was not quite so fit to be the heir of the mercies peculiar to that family.

The Mazorites and Cabalists observe, that there is a large point over the Hebrew word, vaishakehu, render'd by our translators, and kissed him, which, say these penetrating persons, implies, that Esau did not design to kiss his brother, but to bite him; for the word has also that signification; but they add, that Jacob's neck was immediately turned into marble, wherefore the text, according to them, says they both wept; Jacob for the surprizing change in his neck, and Esau, because he had almost shatter'd his teeth upon it, and that this prevented his inhuman design against his brother. But as we shall not degrade this work so far as to attempt the refutation of such an unworthy conjecture to say no worse of it; it is highly probable, that Isaac and Rebekah had been careful to convince Esau, during the absence of his brother, that what Jacob and his mother had done was by the approbation of God himself, who had decreed the inversion of the succession, before they were born; that it would, therefore be, not only a vain attempt, but an unpardonable crime for him to oppose the determination of providence; and that instead of recovering his brother's blessing, he would bring an inevitable curse on his own head: By which, and other such like representations, they had wholly persuaded Esau to acquiesce in the divine will, and to lay aside all future animosity against Jacob.

Ver. 11. Take, I pray thee, my blessing that is brought to thee; because God hath dealt graciously with me, and because I have enough; and he urged him, and he took it.] The generosity of Esau is very conspicuous, in his reluctance to diminish his brother's substance, by accepting of the large presents that were offered him by Jacob, whose repeated importunities at last prevailed upon him to receive them.

Jacob, notwithstanding the obliging reception his brother afforded him, still continued suspicious of his integrity, and distrusted even his very tears; and when Esau offer'd to accompany him, through the remainder of his journey, he had recourse to a plausible pretext, in order to evade it. Esau was satisfied with the excuse, and then desired that he at least might leave him some of his own attendants to conduct him in safety, but Jacob grew apprehensive that those guards would be intended rather to enslave than defend him: He therefore gave his brother to understand, that such a convoy would be needless, and that nothing could now appear dreadful to him, since he had so happily obtain'd the favour of his brother Esau. He likewise promis'd to visit him at Seir, but we are not inform'd by the Scripture that he ever did.

As much reason as Esau might have to be dissatisfied with the distrustful manner in which Jacob declin'd his civilities, he yet complied with every particular of his request, and retir'd as obligingly as he came.

Ver. 18. And Jacob came to Shalem, a city of Shechem, &c.] We think the Hebrew might be more properly render'd, he came safe, or peaceably, to Shechem; for the word Shalem has that signification: And there are no remains of any place near Shechem, that is call'd by the name of Shalem. For which reason, some exp sitors have thought it to be that Salem, of which Melchizedek was king; the ruins of whose palace were pretended to be seen even in Jerome's time: Which shew'd it, says that father, to have been a magnificent structure, and which, he thinks, was the same with the Shalem in this verse. But it is not probable that the former (if there had ever been such a place) was so near Shechem, any more than the Salem frequented by John the Baptist, John iv. 5. and which was near Jordan; whereas Shechem was at a distance from it. Besides, Josephus tells us, that the old Salem was the same as Jerusalem; and some have thought that the Psalmist intimates the same, when he declares, At Salem was his tabernacle, Psal. lxxvi. 2. Others have sought for Salem in Shiloh, which is about half way between Jerusalem and Shechem, and have thought that they were the same. But, besides that Shiloh is not near Shechem, it is plain, from Judges xxi. 19. that they were two distinct places. Wherefore, upon the whole, we are of opinion, that Shalem, in this verse, should be render'd, safe, or in peace; intimating thereby, that Jacob was reliev'd from his fears, and had not incurr'd any of the dangers he apprehended from the resentment of his brother Esau; and not because he was cur'd of his lameness, as the Jews imagine.

Ver. 19. And he bought a parcel of a field, where he had spread his tent, at the hand of Hamor, Shechem's father, for an hundred pieces of money.] The word keshitah, which is here render'd a piece of money, signifies, also, a lamb; from whence Onkelos, the Septuagint, Vulgate, Oleaster, and others, have translated it, an hundred lambs, as they have, also, that place in Job, where every one of his friends gave him a keshitah. But all the Jewish interpreters, except Onkelos, and the Septuagint, render it by a word which signifies a piece of money of about the value of a penny; and tell us, that the Arabians call'd money keshitah. It is more probable, therefore, that it was a small coin stamp'd with the impression of a lamb, from which it receiv'd its name; as the piece of money we call an angel, was so denominated from the figure of one impressed upon it.

Ver. 20. And he erected there an altar, and called it El-elohe-israel.] The Hebrew names of this altar signify the mighty God of Israel. This, in all probability, was the place where Abraham had formerly erected an altar, soon after his first arrival in the land of Canaan. And perhaps Jacob's well was likewise here, near mount Gerizim, where our blessed Saviour talked with the woman of Samaria, for that mountain stood in the country of the Shechemites.

CHAP. XXXIV.

1 Dinah is ravished by Shechem: 4 He sueth to marry her. 13 The sons of Jacob offer the condition of circumcision to the Shechemites: 20 Hamor and Shechem persuade them to accept it: 25 The sons of Jacob upon that advantage slay them, 27 and spoil their city. 30 Jacob reproveth Simeon and Levi.

AND Dinah the daughter of Leah, which she bare unto Jacob, went out to see the daughters of the land.

2 And when Shechem the son of Hamor the the Hivite, prince of the country ſaw her, he took her, and lay with her, and defiled her.

3 And his ſoul clave unto Dinah the daughter of Jacob, and he loved the damſel, and ſpake kindly unto the damſel.

4 And Shechem ſpake unto his father Hamor, ſaying, Get me this damſel to wife.

5 And Jacob heard that he had defiled Dinah his daughter, (now his ſons were with his cattel in the field:) and Jacob held his peace until they were come.

6 ¶ And Hamor the father of Shechem went out unto Jacob to commune with him.

7 And the ſons of Jacob came out of the field when they heard it, and the men were grieved, and they were very wroth: becauſe he had wrought folly in Iſrael, in lying with Jacobs daughter; which thing ought not to be done.

8 And Hamor communed with them, ſaying, The ſoul of my ſon Shechem longeth for your daughter: I pray you give her him to wife.

9 And make ye marriages with us, and give your daughters unto us, and take our daughters unto you.

10 And ye ſhall dwell with us: and the land ſhall be before you; dwell and trade you therein, and get you poſſeſſions therein.

11 And Shechem ſaid unto her father, and unto her brethren, Let me find grace in your eyes, and what ye ſhall ſay unto me I will give.

12 Ask me never ſo much dowry and gift, and I will give according as ye ſhall ſay unto me: but give me the damſel to wife.

13 And the ſons of Jacob anſwered Shechem and Hamor his father deceitfully, and ſaid, (becauſe he had defiled Dinah their ſiſter.)

14 And they ſaid unto them, We cannot do this thing, to give our ſiſter to one that is uncircumciſed: for that were a reproach unto us.

15 But in this will we conſent unto you: If ye will be as we be, that every male of you be circumciſed.

16 Then will we give our daughters unto you, and we will take your daughters to us, and we will dwell with you, and we will become one people.

17 But if ye will not hearken unto us, to be circumciſed; then will we take our daughter, and we will be gone.

18 And their words pleaſed Hamor, and Shechem Hamors ſon.

19 And the young man deferred not to do the thing, becauſe he had delight in Jacobs daughter: and he was more honourable than all the houſe of his father.

20 ¶ And Hamor and Shechem his ſon came unto the gate of their city, and communed with the men of their city, ſaying,

21 Theſe men are peaceable with us, therefore let them dwell in the land and trade therein; for the land, behold it is large enough for them: let us take their daughters to us for wives, and let us give them our daughters.

22 Only herein will the men conſent unto us for to dwell with us, to be one people, if every male among us be circumciſed, as they are circumciſed.

23 Shall not their cattel, and their ſubſtance, and every beaſt of theirs be ours? Only let us conſent unto them, and they will dwell with us.

24 And unto Hamor and unto Shechem his ſon hearkned all that went out of the gate of his city: and every male was circumciſed, all that went out of the gate of his city.

25 ¶ And it came to paſs on the third day, when they were ſore, that two of the ſons of Jacob, Simeon and Levi, Dinahs brethren, took each man his ſword, and came upon the city boldly, and ſlew all the males.

26 And they ſlew Hamor and Shechem his ſon with the edge of the ſword, and took Dinah out of Shechems houſe, and went out.

27 The ſons of Jacob came upon the ſlain, and ſpoiled the city, becauſe they had defiled their ſiſter.

28 They took their ſheep and their oxen, and their aſſes, and that which was in the city, and that which was in the field,

29 And all their wealth, and all their little ones, and their wives took they captive, and ſpoiled even all that was in the houſe.

30 And Jacob ſaid to Simeon and Levi, Ye have troubled me to make me to ſtink among the inhabitants of the land, amongſt the Canaanites, and the Perizzites: and I being few in number, they ſhall gather themſelves together againſt me, and ſlay me, and I ſhall be deſtroyed, I and my houſe.

31 And they ſaid, Should he deal with our ſiſter, as with an harlot?

Ver. 1. And Dinah, the daughter of Leah, which ſhe bare unto Jacob, went out to ſee the daughters of the land.] Joſephus, Joſephus, and ſome Rabbins after him, have advanc'd, but without any proof, that Dinah was attracted by the preparations for a ſolemn feſtival; but, however the fact may be, it is certain, that her curioſity was fatal to her honour. Sichem, ſon of the prince of that country, ſaw her, and the paſſion which her beauty had kindled in his breaſt, became ſo inordinate, that he defil'd her, as Moſes repreſents.

Ver. 3. And his ſoul clave to Dinah, &c.] His paſſion was not extinguiſh'd by its gratification, and he reſolv'd to repair, by a lawful marriage, the injurious action he had committed. He imparted his deſign to Hamor, his father, and prevail'd upon him to propoſe it to Jacob. The Hivite prince was eaſily induc'd to contribute his beſt endeavours towards his ſon's ſatisfaction; he accordingly made his overtures to Jacob, and, in order to facilitate the treaty, Shechem premis'd to give the patriarch an honourable and ample dowry for his daughter.

Ver. 13. And the ſons of Jacob anſwered Shechem, and Hamor his father, deceitfully, &c.] The ſons of Jacob were determin'd to render the paſſion of Shechem ſubſervient to their revenge for thoſe exceſſes into which it had betray'd him. They cover'd their deſign with the cloak of religion, and repreſented to Hamor, that they were not permitted by their law to contract alliances of that nature with an uncircumcis'd people; they therefore propos'd to him, to receive the token of circumciſion for himſelf, and to oblige all his people to ſubmit to the ſame.

Ver. 18. And their words pleaſed Hamor and Shechem, Hamor's ſon.] What cannot a ſon do with a tender father! Nothing appear'd difficult to Hamor, in order to gratify his ſon Shechem; and nothing ſeem'd impracticable to Shechem, in order to ſatisfy his love. They ſubmitted, therefore, to the moſt rigorous ceremony of the Iſraelites; the courtiers follow'd the example of their prince, and all the people imitated the courtiers.

Ver. 25. And it came to paſs, on the third day, when they were ſore, that two of the ſons of Jacob, Simeon and Levi, Dinah's brethren, took each man his ſword, and came upon the city boldly, and ſlew all the males.] The operation of circumciſion was very painful to all, but eſpecially to adult perſons. Three days were paſt ſince the Shechemites had ſubmitted to it; their wounds were ſtill freſh, their minds free from ſuſpicion, and their bodies deſtitute of defence. Simeon and Levi improv'd this opportunity; they enter'd the town of Shechem, barbarouſly murder'd all the males, and carried off all the riches. The Jews pretend, that theſe ſons of Jacob choſe the third day for the execution of their revenge, becauſe the wound of circumciſion is then moſt inflam'd. They certainly are beſt acquainted with the nature of that operation, but their opinion concerning it cannot be founded on the hiſtory before us. Moſes takes no notice, that the Shechemites were ſenſible of the greateſt pain on the third day; as the Septuagint, and ſeveral other verſions after them, have render'd it; and only ſay, that they were then ſore.

Ver. 30. And Jacob ſaid to Simeon and Levi, ye have troubled me, &c.] Jacob deteſted the barbarity of his ſons; and the ſharpneſs of the reproaches he utter'd againſt them, his remembrance of that tranſaction to the end of his life, and his care to recapitulate it upon his death-bed, give us a much livelier idea of its malignity, than the opinion of ſome Rabbins, who have not only undertaken to excuſe, but to commend it alſo. They pretend, that Levi and Simeon did an act of juſtice in deſtroying thoſe people, who merited death for ſuffering Shechem to be guilty of ſo unpardonable a violation of Dinah's chaſtity. But religion knows nothing of that diſtinction (ſo famous among the maxims of worldly honour) between pardonable and unpardonable injuries: And if Simeon and Levi were really excuſeable for avenging their ſiſter's rape, can they be juſtified for diſguiſing it with a pretence of religion, and for having involv'd the innocent in the puniſhment of the guilty?

The Scripture makes no future mention of this daughter of Jacob, who was rather unfortunate than criminal. Some interpreters are pleas'd, indeed, to inform us, but without any other proof than their own evidence, that ſhe was afterwards married to Job.

The Moſaic account of the unhappy fate of Dinah, and the Shechemites, has no difficulty in it, but what ariſes from the time, when theſe tranſactions may be ſuppos'd to have happened. The ſacred hiſtorian relates the affair immediately after his account of Jacob's departure for Canaan. But it is demonſtrable, that Dinah was but eight years old when that patriarch left Meſopotamia; and it is equally certain, that Simeon and Levi were but twelve or thirteen. The Moſaic relation, therefore, has greatly embarraſſed the generality of commentators, ſome of whom think, that Dinah ſuffer'd the recorded violence, in a very tender age, and that Simeon and Levi committed, in their childhood, an action which ſuppoſes age and ſtrength. Others pretend, that Jacob dwelt in Canaan, at Salem, eight or ten years: But neither of theſe opinions are maintainable. It is therefore better to ſuppoſe, that Moſes relates, immediately after Jacob's departure for Canaan, an event which did not happen till long after his arrival in that country. It is ſaid, in the account of the ſale of Joſeph, that his brethren went to feed their father's flocks in Shechem, Gen. xxxvii. 12. when Jacob was in Canaan; Dinah was, perhaps, with them, at the ſame time. Joſeph was then ſeventeen years old; his ſiſter was born before him. It is probable, therefore, that this is the true epocha of the ſlaughter committed by Simeon and Levi, upon the Shechemites.

10 And God ſaid unto him, Thy name is Jacob: thy name ſhall not be called any more Jacob, but Iſrael ſhall be thy name; and he called his name Iſrael.

11 And God ſaid unto him, I am God Almighty: be fruitful and multiply, a nation and a company of nations ſhall be of thee, and kings ſhall come out of thy loyns.

12 And the land which I gave Abraham and Iſaac, to thee I will give it, and to thy ſeed after thee will I give the land.

13 And God went up from him, in the place where he talked with him.

14 And Jacob ſet up a pillar in the place where he talked with him, even a pillar of ſtone: and he poured a drink-offering thereon, and he poured oil thereon.

15 And Jacob called the name of the place where God ſpake with him, Beth-el.

16 ¶ And they journeyed from Beth-el: and there was but a little way to come to Ephrath: and Rachel travailed, and ſhe had hard labour.

17 And it came to paſs when ſhe was in hard labour, that the midwife ſaid unto her, Fear not; thou ſhalt have this ſon alſo.

18 And it came to paſs as her ſoul was in departing (for ſhe died) that ſhe called his name Ben-oni: but his father called him Benjamin.

19 And Rachel died, and was buried in the way to Ephrath, which is Beth-lehem.

20 And Jacob ſet a pillar upon her grave: that is the pillar of Rachels grave unto this day.

21 And Iſrael journeyed and ſpread his tent beyond the tower of Edar.

22 And it came to paſs when Iſrael dwelt in that land, that Reuben went and lay with Bilhah his fathers concubine: and Iſrael heard it. Now the ſons of Jacob were twelve.

23 The ſons of Leah; Reuben Jacobs firſt-born, and Simeon, and Levi, and Judah, and Iſſachar, and Zebulun.

24 The ſons of Rachel; Joſeph, and Benjamin.

25 And the ſons of Bilhah, Rachels handmaid; Dan, and Naphtali.

26 And the ſons of Zilpah, Leahs handmaid; Gad, and Aſher. Theſe are the ſons of Jacob, which were born to him in Padan-aram.

27 ¶ And Jacob came unto Iſaac his father unto Mamre, unto the city of Arbah (which is Hebron) where Abraham and Iſaac ſojourned.

28 ¶ And the days of Iſaac were an hundred and fourſcore years.

29 And Iſaac gave up the ghoſt and died, and was gathered unto his people, being old and full of days: and his ſons Eſau and Jacob buried him.

Ver. 1. And God ſaid unto Jacob, ariſe, go up to Bethel, and dwell there, &c.] There are ſeveral ways, as Maimonides obſerves, whereby God communicated himſelf to the prophets: Sometimes by an angel, in a dream, as he did to Jacob, chap. xxxi. 11. ſometimes by an angel, without any mention of the particular manner, of which that author takes this paſſage to be an inſtance. In other places no notice is taken of an angel, but of God alone, who is repreſented as ſpeaking, but in a viſion or dream. And, laſtly, God is ſaid to ſpeak abſolutely, neither in a dream, nor viſion, nor by any angel. In which claſs, we think, Maimonides might have ranked this apparition to Jacob.

The Deity, by directing Jacob to go to Bethel, manifeſted his tender care of that patriarch, and delivered him from the apprehenſions he had entertain'd of the Canaanites and Perizzites, who, one would imagine, deteſted the conduct of Hamor's ſon; otherwiſe it may ſeem ſtrange that they did not immediately deſtroy Jacob and his family, who had inflicted ſuch a dreadful revenge on that prince, and his people. But Moſes aſſigns the true cauſe of this pacific behaviour of the Canaanites, &c. in the fifth verſe of this chapter, where he declares, that God interpos'd for the preſervation of this family, by ſtriking all the cities around them with a panic fear.

Ver. 2. Then Jacob ſaid unto his houſhold, and to all that were with him, Put away the ſtrange Gods that are among you, &c.] Rachel had her father's Teraphim, which now, it is to be ſuppos'd, ſhe confeſs'd. Jacob, likewiſe, might naturally ſuſpect, that there were ſome among the ſervants he brought with him out of Meſopotamia, where ſuperſtition prevail'd to a great degree. He might alſo imagine, that, in the ſacking of Shechem, they had brought away ſome images, for the ſake of the gold and ſilver, of which they were form'd, and that they kept theſe ſecretly among them.

———And be clean.] Waſh your bodies, as Aben Ezra juſtly interprets it; for this was the ancient rite of cleanſing. This expoſitor ſeems to have follow'd Jonathan, who thus paraphraſes this paſſage: Purify yourſelves from the pollution of the ſlain, whom ye have touched; alluding to the late ſlaughter of the Shechemites.

———And change your garments.] Array yourſelves in clean habits. This was a very proper injunction, ſince they were to preſent themſelves before the divine majeſty, in whoſe ſacred preſence it would have been highly irreverent to have appear'd in a ſordid attire; eſpecially as they had defil'd themſelves by a barbarous ſlaughter. All nations retain'd the waſhings, and likewiſe white raiment, when they perform'd the ſolemn offices of religion; and theſe cuſtoms were not deriv'd from idolaters, but from the pureſt antiquity.

Ver. 4. And they gave unto Jacob all the ſtrange gods which were in their hand.] It ſhould ſeem by this expreſſion of the divine hiſtorian, that the idols among them were very numerous. Jacob's injunction requir'd a punctual obedience, for he juſtly thought it would be an unpardonable inſtance of impiety for him and his houſhold to approach the altar, he was commanded to raiſe, till all his family had purified themſelves from the pollutions they had contracted, either by ſuperſtition, or any other iniquitous behaviour.

———And all their ear-rings that were in their ears.] In the ears of the idols, according to ſome expoſitors, who think there was nothing criminal in the ear-rings worn by any of Jacob's family. But theſe writers did not conſider, that, beſides the ear-rings that were worn meerly for ornament, there were others which were us'd in the nature of amulets, and were mark'd with the effigies of ſome falſe falſe god, or ſome ſymbolical notes which they imagined were efficacious to preſerve thoſe, who wore ſuch rings, from all kind of injury. Maimonides, in his book of Idolatry, chap. vii. mentions rings of this nature, and veſſels mark'd with the image of the Sun, the Moon, or a Dragon; all which were ſymbols of divinity among the Pagans, who, likewiſe, impreſſed ſuperſtitious characters on ſeveral parts of their bodies.

———And Jacob hid them under the oak which was by Shechem.] The oak under which theſe rings and idols were depoſited, was ſo much unknown, that there is no foundation for the opinion of thoſe who think this was the ſame oak mention'd Joſh. xxiv. 26. For Jacob intended to aboliſh the memory of theſe idols, and therefore hid them where he had good reaſon to believe none would afterwards find them.

Ver. 8. But Deborah, Rebekah's nurſe, died, and ſhe was buried beneath Bethel, under an oak: and the name of it was called Allon-bachuth.] Deborah attended Rebekah when ſhe was married to Iſaac, and this circumſtance has perplex'd the Jews in their endeavours to account for her being now found in Jacob's retinue. R. Solomon fancies, that Rebekah having promis'd Jacob, when he departed from his father's houſe, to ſend for him again; perform'd this promiſe by Deborah, whom ſhe ſent to Padan-aram to invite him home. Calvin, and others, are of opinion, that ſhe accompanied Jacob into Meſopotamia, as being deſirous to reviſit her native land and relations; and that when ſhe heard of his ſudden departure for the land of Canaan, her inclination to ſee Rebekah made her follow him thither. But it ſeems very improbable, that Rebekah ſhould diſpatch a woman of her advanc'd age, to ſo diſtant a country as that where Jacob reſided, in his abſence from his father's houſe, ſince a younger meſſenger would have been much more proper; or that ſhe ſhould have any curioſity to undertake ſuch a long and tedious journey: For if we ſuppoſe her to have been forty years old when ſhe was taken into Laban's family, to be Rebekah's nurſe (and her age could not well be much leſs than that, becauſe ſhe was not taken in to ſuckle her, but to bring her up, as a governeſs), ſhe muſt have been near an hundred and ſeventy years old when ſhe died. We are, therefore, inclin'd to think, that, as ſeveral years had paſs'd ſince Jacob's return to the land of Canaan, he undoubtedly had been to viſit his aged father Iſaac, tho' the ſacred hiſtorian has not recorded that inſtance of filial reſpect, as not being material to his principal intention in writing his hiſtory. And as Rebekah had now been dead for ſome time, Deborah, her nurſe, might naturally be deſirous of being admitted into Jacob's family, to paſs the remainder of her days with perſons of her only country, and the near relations of her late miſtreſs.

Jacob interr'd this aged ſervant under an oak, and called it Allon-bachuth, which ſignifies the oak of mourning; from whence we may ſuppoſe, that the death of this good old perſon was greatly lamented by the patriarch and his two wives.

Ver. 10. And God ſaid unto him, Thy name is Jacob: thy name ſhall not be called any more Jacob, but Iſrael ſhall be thy name; and he called his name Iſrael.] This is a much more honourable name than Jacob, which was given him becauſe he ſupplanted his brother; but he was now call'd Iſrael, from his prevalence with God.

Ver. 11. And God ſaid unto him, I am God Almighty; be fruitful and multiply, &c.] God renews his promiſe to Jacob, as he had often done to Abraham; he firſt bleſſed him by Iſaac, chap. xxviii. 3. when he ſent him from home. He bleſſed him, afterwards, himſelf, when he appeared to him the firſt night of his journey from Galeed: And now again, when he was come back to the ſame place where he bleſſed him before; and he ſpeaks to him by the name of El-ſhaddai, God Almighty; the very ſame whereby his father had bleſſed him, chap. xxviii. 3. and whereby God bleſſed Abraham, chap. xvii. 1.

Ver. 14. And Jacob ſet up a pillar in the place where he talked with him, &c.] This pillar was erected by the patriarch, as a monument of the divine goodneſs that was manifeſted to him in that place; and likewiſe to ſerve as an altar for ſacrifice, for ſo the Hebrew word Matzebath ſignifies, Hoſea iii. 4. and therefore Iſaiah ſeems to repreſent an altar and a pillar as the ſame thing, Iſa. ch. xix. 19.

And he poured a drink offering thereon.] To conſecrate it to the ſolemn ſervice of God. For which end he likewiſe poured oil upon it, as he had done upon the ſtone, ch. xxviii. 18. which in all probability was a principal part of this pillar.

Ver. 15. And Jacob called the name of the place where God ſpake with him, Beth-el.] Bethel ſignifies the houſe of God, and this was the uſe to which the patriarch had formerly promiſed to devote that place, chap. xxviii. 22. He therefore renews the name he had conferred upon it thirty years before, when he firſt went to Meſopotamia.

Ver. 16. And they journeyed from Beth-el, and there was but a little way to come to Ephrath.] Various opinions have been ſtarted, with relation to the name of this place, and when it was firſt impoſed. Many have imagined, without any tolerable reaſon, that it was later than the time of Moſes; but as it may very properly be derived from Pharoh, which ſignifies to bear fruit, and as it is likewiſe called Bethlehem, i. e. the houſe of Bread, we think, that the excellency of its ſoil being always apparent, it might naturally have received its denomination of Ephrath, before the Moſaic hiſtory was compiled. As to its ſituation, it lay ſouth of Bethel, between it and Hebron, and was the place that the bleſſed Saviour of the world honoured with his birth. At a ſmall diſtance from this place, Rachel the beloved wife of Jacob was ſeized with the pangs of labour that proved fatal to her.

Ver. 18. And it came to paſs as her ſoul was in departing (for ſhe died) that ſhe called his name Benoni: but his father called him Benjamin.] Rachel was ſenſible that the birth of this ſon would deprive her of her own life, and therefore ſhe called him Benoni, which ſignifies the ſon of my ſorrow; but Jacob, in order to animate and comfort his expiring wife, and to avert the ſiniſter omen, which ſeem'd to be intimated in the melancholy name ſhe had given her child, immediately changed it into that of Benjamin, which ſignifies the ſon of my right hand, or of my ſtrength.

Names are oftentimes ſtrangely adapted to events, and the preſages of parents, were anciently obſerved to have exactly fulfilled, in many inſtances, but in none more than in this child, whoſe poſterity ſhared two very different fates, that correſponded with the import of the names given him by his father and mother. No tribe in Iſrael was more valiant and martial than that of Benjamin, and none ſo obnoxious to diſaſters and calamities. It was almoſt extirpated in the time of the Judges, chap. xx. 25. and yet, before the concluſion of that age, Benjamin became the head of his brethren. The firſt King of Iſrael being choſen out of that lately deſolate tribe, and tho' that king proved at laſt a Benoni, or a ſon of ſorrow, yet this tribe ſtrictly adhered to Judah, when all the reſt revolted to that of Joſeph.

Ver. 20. And Jacob ſet a pillar upon her grave: that is the pillar of Rachel's grave unto this day.] Jacob was undoubtedly affected with a deep ſorrow at the deceaſe of his darling Rachel, and he render'd all poſſible honour to her memory, by erecting, over the place where he interred her, in the road to Ephrath, a pillar or monument, which remained for ſeveral ages after. And it is mentioned, 1 Sam. x. 2. not only as then ſtanding, but as a boundary to the tribe of Benjamin. Near this tomb the young children were ſlaughtered by the barbarous command of Herod, when he vainly thought to fruſtrate the decree of God, by his wickedneſs and inhumanity.

Among the remarkable places now ſhewn to ſtrangers in the road from Bethlehem to Jeruſalem, the neareſt to Bethlehem is Rachel's tomb; but tho' that may probably be the real place of her interment, yet the preſent monument can't be that which Jacob erected, ſince it plainly appears to be modern and a Turkiſh ſtructure.

Ver. 21. And Iſrael journeyed, and ſpread his tent beyond the tower of Edar.] Some tranſlate it the tower of the flocks, and think there was ſuch a tower near Jeruſalem, from a paſſage in Micah, chap. iv. 8. O tower of the flock, the ſtrong hold of the daughter of Zion!

Ver. 22. And it came to paſs when Iſrael dwelt in that land, that Reuben went and lay with Bilhah his father's concubine.] She is called his wife, chap. xxx. 4. and, according to the laws of thoſe times, was truly ſo.

And Iſrael heard it.] And he highly reſented that indignity, chap. xlxix. 4. But Moſes in this ſhort hiſtory paſſes over Iſrael's cenſure of this inceſt, till he lay on his death-bed, which ſufficiently ſhews how much he was affected ſcted, when the fact was firſt committed. Or, perhaps theſe words, Iſrael heard it, may ſignify, That tho' Reuben thought to have committed this ſin ſo ſecretly, as to have concealed it from his father's knowledge, yet all his precautions were unavailing.

Now the ſons of Jacob were twelve.] Their number being now compleated by the birth of Benjamin, Moſes thought it proper to enumerate them. And they being all (except Benjamin) born before the patriarch had the name of Iſrael conferred upon him by God, may perhaps be the reaſon of his being called Jacob in this verſe.

Ver 27. And Jacob came unto Iſaac his father, &c.] To dwell with him, in order to be the comfort of his old age: We may reaſonably ſuppoſe that he had viſited him before, ſince his return from Meſopotamia, but he now came to ſtay with him, till they ſhould be parted by death.

Ver. 29. And Iſaac gave up the Ghoſt and died, and was gathered unto his people, being old and full of days, and his ſons Eſau and Jacob buried him.] Iſaac and Iſhmael had formerly render'd the ſame filial office to the remains of Abraham. We may reaſonably conclude from this paſſage, that the friendſhip between Eſau and Jacob continued after their interview, at Jacob's return into this country.

The Jews tell us, that the maſters who taught Iſaac the law of God, were the patriarchs Shem and Heber, whom they believe were then living; and that when Abraham took him to mount Moreah, in order to ſacrifice him there, in obedience to the command of God, he told Sarah that he was going to the ſchool of Shem. They likewiſe attribute to him the noon prayers which they conſtantly uſe: For they think Abraham was the author of thoſe of the morning; Jacob of thoſe of the evening, and Iſaac of thoſe of noon.

CHAP. XXXVI.

2 Eſau's three wives: 6 His removing to mount Seir: 9 His ſons: 15 The dukes which deſcended of his ſons: 20 The ſons and dukes of Seir. 24 Anah findeth mules. 31 The kings of Edom. 40 The dukes that deſcended of Eſau.

NOW theſe are the generations of Eſau, who is Edom.

2 Eſau took his wives of the daughters of Canaan; Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite, and Aholibamah the daughter of Anah the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite:

3 And Baſhemath Iſhmaels daughter, ſiſter of Nebajoth.

4 And Adah bare to Eſau, Eliphaz: and Baſhemath bare Reuel.

5 And Aholibamah bare Jeuſh, and Jaalam, and Korah: Theſe are the ſons of Eſau, which were born unto him in the land of Canaan.

6 And Eſau took his wives, and his ſons, and his daughters, and all the perſons of his houſe, and his cattel, and all his beaſts, and all his ſubſtance which he had got in the land of Canaan; and went into the country, from the face of his brother Jacob.

7 For their riches were more than that they might dwell together: and the land wherein they were ſtrangers, could not bear them, becauſe of their cattel.

8 Thus dwelt Eſau in mount Seir: Eſau is Edom.

9 ¶ And theſe are the generations of Eſau the father of the Edomites, in mount Seir.

10 Theſe are the names of Eſau's ſons; Eliphaz the ſon of Adah the wife of Eſau; Reuel the ſon of Baſhemath the wife of Eſau.

11 And the ſons of Eliphaz were, Teman, Omar, Zepho, and Gatam, and Kenaz.

12 And Timna was concubine to Eliphaz Eſau's ſon; and ſhe bare to Eliphaz Amalek: theſe were the ſons of Adah Eſau's wife.

13 And theſe are the ſons of Reuel; Nahath, and Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah: theſe were the ſons of Baſhemath Eſau's wife.

14 ¶ And theſe were the ſons of Aholibamah, the daughter of Anah, the daughter of Zibeon Eſau's wife: and ſhe bare to Eſau, Jeuſh, and Jaalam, and Korah.

15 ¶ Theſe were dukes of the ſons of Eſau: the ſons of Eliphaz the firſt-born ſon of Eſau; duke Teman, duke Omar, duke Zepho, duke Kenaz, 16 Duke Korah, duke Gatam, and duke Amalek: Theſe are the dukes that came of Eliphaz, in the land of Edom: theſe were the ſons of Adah.

17 ¶ And theſe are the ſons of Reuel Eſau's ſon; duke Nahath, duke Zerah, duke Shammah, duke Mizzah: Theſe are the dukes that came of Reuel, in the land of Edom: theſe are the ſons of Baſhemath Eſau's wife.

18 ¶ And theſe are the ſons of Aholibamah Eſau's wife; duke Jeuſh, duke Jaalam, duke Korah: theſe were the dukes that came of Aholibamah the daughter of Anah Eſau's wife.

19 Theſe are the ſons of Eſau (who is Edom) and theſe are their dukes.

20 ¶ Theſe are the ſons of Seir the Horite, who inhabited the land; Lotan, and Shobal, and Zibeon, and Anah,

21 And Diſhon, and Ezer, and Diſhan: theſe are the dukes of the Horites, the children of Seir in the land of Edom.

22 And the children of Lotan were Hori, and Heman: and Lotans ſiſter was Timna.

23 And the children of Shobal were theſe; Alvan, and Manahath, and Ebal, Shepho, and Onam.

24 And theſe are the children of Zibeon; both Ajah, and Anah: this was that Anah, that found the mules in the wilderneſs, as he fed the aſſes of Zibeon his father.

25 And the children of Anah were theſe; Diſhon,

Diſhon, and Aholibamah the daughter of Anah.

26 And theſe are the children of Diſhon; Hemdan, and Eſhban, and Ithran, and Cheran.

27 The children of Ezer are theſe; Bilhan, and Zaavan, and Achan.

28 The children of Diſhan are theſe; Uz, and Aran.

29 Theſe are the dukes that came of the Horites; duke Lotan, duke Shobal, duke Zibeon, duke Anah,

30 Duke Diſhon, duke Ezer, duke Diſhan: theſe are the dukes that came of Hori, among their dukes in the land of Seir.

31 ¶ And theſe are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Iſrael.

32 And Bela the ſon of Beor reigned in Edom: and the name of his city was Dinhabah.

33 And Bela died, and Jobab the ſon of Zerah of Bozrah reigned in his ſtead.

34 And Jobab died, and Huſham of the land of Temani reigned in his ſtead.

35 And Huſham died, and Hadad the ſon of Bedad (who ſmote Midian in the field of Moab) reigned in his ſtead: and the name of his city was Avith.

36 And Hadad died, and Samlah of Maſrekah reigned in his ſtead.

37 And Samlah died, and Saul of Reboboth by the river reigned in his ſtead.

38 And Saul died, and Baal-hanan the ſon of Achbor reigned in his ſtead.

39 And Baal-hanan the ſon of Achbor died, and Hadar reigned in his ſtead: and the name of his city was Pau; and his wife's name was Mehetabel, the daughter of Matred, the daughter of Mezahab.

40 And theſe are the names of the dukes that came of Eſau, according to their families, after their places, by their names; duke Timnah, duke Alvah, duke Jetheth,

41 Duke Aholibamah, duke Elah, duke Pinon,

42 Duke Kenaz, duke Teman, duke Mibzar,

43 Duke Magdiel, duke Iram: theſe be the dukes of Edom, according to their habitations, in the land of their poſſeſſion; he is Eſau the father of the Edomites.

Ver. 2. Eſau took his wives of the daughters of Canaan: Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite, and Aholibamah the daughter of Anah, the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite.] It is remarkable, that the names of Eſau's wives, in this and the next verſe, are not the ſame with thoſe he is ſaid to have married, in the 26th chapter of this book, verſe 34. and in the 28th chap. ver. 9. This circumſtance might lead an unwary reader to imagine, that Eſau had more than three wives, eſpecially, becauſe the fathers of the two former are likewiſe called by different names. Thus his firſt wife, who in the paſſage before us is called Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite, is called Judith the daughter of Beeri the Hittite in the 26. chap. v. 34. and his ſecond wife, who in the ſame verſe of that chapter is called Baſhemath the daughter of Elon the Hittite, has in the ſecond verſe of this chapter, the name of Aholi-Bamah the daughter of Anah, the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite. Biſhop Patrick thinks that Eſau's former wives died without iſſue, and that he took another daughter of Elon called Adah, when Judith was dead: And that he likewiſe married the daughter of a man called Anah. But as Eſau is recorded to have had but three wives, we think it more probable, that they, as well as their parents, might have more names than one, and that it was uſual to call them ſometimes by the one, and ſometimes by the other. Thus the mother of Abijam, king of Judah, who is called Maacah, the daughter of Abiſhalom, 1 Kings xv. 2. is likewiſe called Micaiah the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah, 2 Chron. xiii. 2. We could alledge a number of parallel places were it needful; but our ſuppoſition will be ſtrengthened by the next verſe of this chapter.

Ver. 3. And Baſhemath Iſhmael's daughter, ſiſter of Nebajoth.] This wife of Eſau is called Mahalath, chap 28. ver. 9. but that one and the ſame perſon is indicated by both theſe names, ſeems very evident, ſince ſhe is called in the laſt cited paſſage, as well as in this verſe, the daughter of Iſhmael, and ſiſter of Nebajoth. It is probable that Eſau himſelf might change her name from Mahalath, which ſignifies ſickly, and infirm, into this of Baſhemath, which ſignifies aromatic, and fragrant. Either becauſe he thought this laſt name moſt agreeable, or perhaps ſhe became more healthy after marriage; either of which circumſtances was a ſufficient reaſon for changing her former name.

Ver. 8. Thus dwelt Eſau in Mount Seir:] It has been asked, how Eſau could be ſaid to have gone to dwell in Seir, upon this occation; Seeing we find him there before when Jacob returned from Meſopotamia, chap. xxxii. 3? To which it may be anſwered, That he had then only ſome part of the country, and not the beſt of it neither. And, therefore, might, probably, have had ſome of his eſtate ſtill in Canaan, while the reſt of it was in Seir. And it is remarkable, that he is not ſaid, till now, to dwell in Mount Seir; but only in the land of Seir, or barely in Seir; to which he invited Jacob, at his return, chap. xxxii. 3. xxxiii. 14. 16. This mountainous country, which was richer than the other, he got into his poſſeſſion after that time.

Ver. 9. And theſe are the generations of Eſau, the father of the Edomites, in Mount Seir.] Eſau's ſons and grandſons ſet up a form of government amongſt themſelves, and over their own families; and the perſons who ruled them were called dukes, or chiefs, not over the land of Edom, for the inhabitants were not yet ſubject to them, but they were dukes in the land, and ruled the children of Eſau, and were therefore called their dukes. The dukes in the land of Edom were, 1. Duke Teman; 2. Duke Omar; 3. Duke Zepho; 4. Duke Kenaz; 5. Duke Horah; 6. Duke Gatam; 7. Duke Amalek. Theſe ſeven were the ſons of Eliphaz the firſt born of Eſau. 8. Duke Nahath; 9. Duke Zerah; 10. Duke Hammah; 11. Duke Mizzah: Theſe four were the ſons of Reuel, the ſecond ſon of Eſau; 12. Duke Jeuſh; 13. Duke Jaalam; 14. Duke Korah: Theſe three were the ſons of Eſau himſelf, by Aholibamah, after he was an hundred and twenty years old.

Ver. 12. And Timnah was concubine to Eliphaz, Eſau's ſon; and ſhe bare to Eliphaz Amalek:] This was neceſſary to be related, that there might be a diſtinction between the Amalekites, who were to be deſtroyed, and the reſt of the poſterity of Eſau, concerning whom it is ſaid, Thou ſhalt not abhor an Edomite, becauſe he is thy Brother, Deut. xxiii. 7. For tho' the Amalekites were a diſtinct people from the Edomites, and inhabited a neighbouring country; yet they likewiſe poſſeſſed that part of mount Seir, which was near Kadeſh Barnea, as may be gather'd from Numb. xiii. 29. and xiv. 43. This verſe, therefore, may be conſider'd as a caution, ſet down by Moſes, to prevent the deſtruction of any of the family of Eſau, but only thoſe of Amalek, who deſcended from the firſt-born of Eſau, by a concubine, the ſiſter of Lotan, an Horite, one of the ancient inha-ſected, when the fact was firſt committed. Or, perhaps theſe words, Iſrael heard it, may ſignify, That tho' Reuben thought to have committed this ſin ſo ſecretly, as to have concealed it from his father's knowledge, yet all his precautions were unavailing.

Now the ſons of Jacob were twelve.] Their number being now compleated by the birth of Benjamin, Moſes thought it proper to enumerate them. And they being all (except Benjamin) born before the patriarch had the name of Iſrael conferred upon him by God, may perhaps be the reaſon of his being called Jacob in this verſe.

Ver 27. And Jacob came unto Iſaac his father, &c.] To dwell with him, in order to be the comfort of his old age: We may reaſonably ſuppoſe that he had viſited him before, ſince his return from Meſopotamia, but he now came to ſtay with him, till they ſhould be parted by death.

Ver. 29. And Iſaac gave up the Ghoſt and died, and was gathered unto his people, being old and full of days, and his ſons Eſau and Jacob buried him.] Iſaac and Iſhmael had formerly render'd the ſame filial office to the remains of Abraham. We may reaſonably conclude from this paſſage, that the friendſhip between Eſau and Jacob continued after their interview, at Jacob's return into this country.

The Jews tell us, that the maſters who taught Iſaac the law of God, were the patriarchs Shem and Heber, whom they believe were then living; and that when Abraham took him to mount Moreah, in order to ſacrifice him there, in obedience to the command of God, he told Sarah that he was going to the ſchool of Shem. They likewiſe attribute to him the noon prayers which they conſtantly uſe: For they think Abraham was the author of thoſe of the morning; Jacob of thoſe of the evening, and Iſaac of thoſe of noon.

CHAP. XXXVI.

2 Eſau's three wives: 6 His removing to mount Seir: 9 His ſons: 15 The dukes which deſcended of his ſons: 20 The ſons and dukes of Seir. 24 Anah findeth mules. 31 The kings of Edom. 40 The dukes that deſcended of Eſau.

NOW theſe are the generations of Eſau, who is Edom.

2 Eſau took his wives of the daughters of Canaan; Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite, and Aholibamah the daughter of Anah the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite:

3 And Baſhemath Iſhmaels daughter, ſiſter of Nebajoth.

4 And Adah bare to Eſau, Eliphaz: and Baſhemath bare Reuel.

5 And Aholibamah bare Jeuſh, and Jaalam, and Korah: Theſe are the ſons of Eſau, which were born unto him in the land of Canaan.

6 And Eſau took his wives, and his ſons, and his daughters, and all the perſons of his houſe, and his cattel, and all his beaſts, and all his ſubſtance which he had got in the land of Canaan; and went into the country, from the face of his brother Jacob.

7 For their riches were more than that they might dwell together: and the land wherein they were ſtrangers, could not bear them, becauſe of their cattel.

8 Thus dwelt Eſau in mount Seir: Eſau is Edom.

9 ¶ And theſe are the generations of Eſau the father of the Edomites, in mount Seir.

10 Theſe are the names of Eſau's ſons; Eliphaz the ſon of Adah the wife of Eſau; Reuel the ſon of Baſhemath the wife of Eſau.

11 And the ſons of Eliphaz were, Teman, Omar, Zepho, and Gatam, and Kenaz.

12 And Timna was concubine to Eliphaz Eſau's ſon; and ſhe bare to Eliphaz Amalek: theſe were the ſons of Adah Eſau's wife.

13 And theſe are the ſons of Reuel; Nahath, and Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah: theſe were the ſons of Baſhemath Eſau's wife.

14 ¶ And theſe were the ſons of Aholibamah, the daughter of Anah, the daughter of Zibeon Eſau's wife: and ſhe bare to Eſau, Jeuſh, and Jaalam, and Korah.

15 ¶ Theſe were dukes of the ſons of Eſau: the ſons of Eliphaz the firſt-born ſon of Eſau; duke Teman, duke Omar, duke Zepho, duke Kenaz,

16 Duke Korah, duke Gatam, and duke Amalek: Theſe are the dukes that came of Eliphaz, in the land of Edom: theſe were the ſons of Adah.

17 ¶ And theſe are the ſons of Reuel Eſau's ſon; duke Nahath, duke Zerah, duke Shammah, duke Mizzah: Theſe are the dukes that came of Reuel, in the land of Edom: theſe are the ſons of Baſhemath Eſau's wife.

18 ¶ And theſe are the ſons of Aholibamah Eſau's wife; duke Jeuſh, duke Jaalam, duke Korah: theſe were the dukes that came of Aholibamah the daughter of Anah Eſau's wife.

19 Theſe are the ſons of Eſau (who is Edom) and theſe are their dukes.

20 ¶ Theſe are the ſons of Seir the Horite, who inhabited the land; Lotan, and Shobal, and Zibeon, and Anah,

21 And Diſhon, and Ezer, and Diſhan: theſe are the dukes of the Horites, the children of Seir in the land of Edom.

22 And the children of Lotan were Hori, and Heman: and Lotans ſiſter was Timna.

23 And the children of Shobal were theſe; Alvan, and Manahath, and Ebal, Shepho, and Onam.

24 And theſe are the children of Zibeon; both Ajah, and Anah: this was that Anah, that found the mules in the wilderneſs, as he fed the aſſes of Zibeon his father.

25 And the children of Anah were theſe; Diſhon,

Diſhon, and Aholibamah the daughter of Anah.

26 And theſe are the children of Diſhon; Hemdan, and Eſhban, and Ithan, and Cheran.

27 The children of Ezer are theſe; Bilhan, and Zaavan, and Achan.

28 The children of Diſhan are theſe; Uz, and Aran.

29 Theſe are the dukes that came of the Horites; duke Lotan, duke Shobal, duke Zibeon, duke Anah,

30 Duke Diſhon, duke Ezer, duke Diſhan: theſe are the dukes that came of Hori, among their dukes in the land of Seir.

31 ¶ And theſe are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Iſrael.

32 And Bela the ſon of Beor reigned in Edom: and the name of his city was Dinhabah.

33 And Bela died, and Jobab the ſon of Zerah of Bozrah reigned in his ſtead.

34 And Jobab died, and Huſham of the land of Temani reigned in his ſtead.

35 And Huſham died, and Hadad the ſon of Bedad (who ſmote Midian in the field of Moab) reigned in his ſtead: and the name of his city was Avith.

36 And Hadad died, and Samlah of Maſrekah reigned in his ſtead.

37 And Samlah died, and Saul of Rehoboth by the river reigned in his ſtead.

38 And Saul died, and Baal-hanan the ſon of Achbor reigned in his ſtead.

39 And Baal-hanan the ſon of Achbor died, and Hadar reigned in his ſtead: and the name of his city was Pau; and his wifes name was Mehetabel, the daughter of Matred, the daughter of Mezahab.

40 And theſe are the names of the dukes that came of Eſau, according to their families, after their places, by their names; duke Timnah, duke Alvah, duke Jetheth,

41 Duke Aholibamah, duke Elah, duke Pinon,

42 Duke Kenaz, duke Teman, duke Mibzar,

43 Duke Magdiel, duke Iram: theſe be the dukes of Edom, according to their habitations, in the land of their poſſeſſion; he is Eſau the father of the Edomites.

Ver. 2. Eſau took his wives of the daughters of Canaan: Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite, and Aholibamah the daughter of Anah, the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite.] It is remarkable, that the names of Eſau's wives, in this and the next verſe, are not the ſame with thoſe he is ſaid to have married, in the 26th chapter of this book, verſe 34. and in the 28th chap. ver. 9. This circumſtance might lead an unwary reader to imagine, that Eſau had more than three wives, eſpecially, becauſe the fathers of the two former are likewiſe called by different names. Thus his firſt wife, who in the paſſage before us is called Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite, is called Judith the daughter of Beeri the Hittite in the 36. chap. v. 34. and his ſecond wife, who in the ſame verſe of that chapter is called Baſhemath the daughter of Elon the Hittite, has in the ſecond verſe of this chapter, the name of Aholi-Bamah the daughter of Anah, the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite. Biſhop Patrick thinks that Eſau's former wives died without iſſue, and that he took another daughter of Elon called Adah, when Judith was dead: And that he likewiſe married the daughter of a man called Anah. But as Eſau is recorded to have had but three wives, we think it more probable, that they, as well as their parents, might have more names than one, and that it was uſual to call them ſometimes by the one, and ſometimes by the other. Thus the mother of Abijam, king of Judah, who is called Maacah, the daughter of Abiſhalom, 1 Kings xv. 2. is likewiſe called Micaiah the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah, 2 Chron. xiii. 2. We could alledge a number of parallel places were it needful; but our ſuppoſition will be ſtrengthened by the next verſe of this chapter.

Ver. 3. And Baſhemath Iſhmael's daughter, ſiſter of Nebajoth.] This wife of Eſau is called Mahalath, chap. 28. ver. 9. but that one and the ſame perſon is indicated by both theſe names, ſeems very evident, ſince ſhe is called in the laſt cited paſſage, as well as in this verſe, the daughter of Iſhmael, and ſiſter of Nebajoth. It is probable that Eſau himſelf might change her name from Mahalath, which ſignifies ſickly, and infirm, into this of Baſhemath, which ſignifies aromatic, and fragrant. Either becauſe he thought this laſt name moſt agreeable, or perhaps ſhe became more healthy after marriage; either of which circumſtances was a ſufficient reaſon for changing her former name.

Ver. 8. Thus dwelt Eſau in Mount Seir:] It has been asked, how Eſau could be ſaid to have gone to dwell in Seir, upon this occaſion; Seeing we find him there before when Jacob returned from Meſopotamia, chap. xxxii. 3? To which it may be anſwered, That he had then only ſome part of the country, and not the beſt of it neither. And, therefore, might, probably, have had ſome of his eſtate ſtill in Canaan, while the reſt of it was in Seir. And it is remarkable, that he is not ſaid, till now, to dwell in Mount Seir; but only in the land of Seir, or barely in Seir; to which he invited Jacob, at his return, chap. xxxii. 3. xxxiii. 14. 16. This mountainous country, which was richer than the other, he got into his poſſeſſion after that time.

Ver. 9. And theſe are the generations of Eſau, the father of the Edomites, in Mount Seir.] Eſau's ſons and grandſons ſet up a form of government amongſt themſelves, and over their own families; and the perſons who ruled them were called dukes, or chiefs, not over the land of Edom, for the inhabitants were not yet ſubject to them, but they were dukes in the land, and ruled the children of Eſau, and were therefore called their dukes. The dukes in the land of Edom were, 1. Duke Teman; 2. Duke Omar; 3. Duke Zepho; 4. Duke Kenaz; 5. Duke Horah; 6. Duke Gatam; 7. Duke Amalek. Theſe ſeven were the ſons of Eliphaz the firſt born of Eſau. 8. Duke Nahath; 9. Duke Zerah; 10. Duke Hammah; 11. Duke Mizzah: Theſe four were the ſons of Reuel, the ſecond ſon of Eſau; 12. Duke Jeuſh; 13. Duke Jaalam; 14. Duke Korah: Theſe three were the ſons of Eſau himſelf, by Aholibamah, after he was an hundred and twenty years old.

Ver. 12. And Timnah was concubine to Eliphaz, Eſau's ſon; and ſhe bare to Eliphaz Amalek:] This was neceſſary to be related, that there might be a diſtinction between the Amalekites, who were to be deſtroyed, and the reſt of the poſterity of Eſau, concerning whom it is ſaid, Thou ſhalt not abhor an Edomite, becauſe he is thy Brother, Deut. xxiii. 7. For tho' the Amalekites were a diſtinct people from the Edomites, and inhabited a neighbouring country; yet they likewiſe poſſeſſed that part of mount Seir, which was near Kadeſh Barnea, as may be gather'd from Numb. xiii. 29. and xiv. 43. This verſe, therefore, may be conſider'd as a caution, ſet down by Moſes, to prevent the deſtruction of any of the family of Eſau, but only thoſe of Amalek, who deſcended from the firſt-born of Eſau, by a concubine, the ſiſter of Lotan, an Horite, one of the ancient inhabitants bitants of Seir. The descendants of Amalek were to be destroy'd by an express decree of God, Exod. xvii. 14, 16. but the divine justice took effectual care of the rest, by distinguishing them thus exactly from him, that they might not perish under the name of Amalekites.

Ver. 20. These are the sons of Seir the Horite, who inhabited the land; Lotan, and Shobal, &c.] The land of Seir was, at this time, possessed by the Horites, or Horim, and these were the inhabitants of it in the days of Abraham: For Chedorlaomer, out of whose hand Abraham rescued Lot, found them here when he brought his armies to subdue the nations of Canaan. Seir, the Horite, was contemporary with Abraham and Chedorlaomer; tho' probably something older than Abraham. If he was king of the Horites, he might fall in battle; for Chedorlaomer smote the Horites in their mount Seir, unto El paran, chap. xiv. 6. Under the sons of Seir, the Horites recover'd some strength, and were govern'd by those sons of Seir, who became dukes of the land, either ruling jointly, or setting up several little sovereignties; and in the time of these dukes, Esau came to live at Seir. His full determination of settling there, was at Isaac's death, and toward the decline of his own life; for Isaac was 60 years old when Esau was born, and he liv'd to be 180; so that Esau, at the death of his father, was 120. And this must be in the time of the third generation from Seir, when the children of Lotan, and of Zibeon, and of Shobal, and of Anah, the sons of Seir, rul'd the land. There were seven of these dukes over the possession of the descendants of Seir: 1. Duke Lotan; 2. Duke Shobal; 3. Duke Zibeon; 4. Duke Anah; 5. Duke Dishon; 6. Duke Ezer; 7. Duke Dishan. But as the dukes of Esau's line, in the land of Edom, were more numerous, they, in all probability, were also more potent than those of the Horites: It is therefore not unnatural to suppose, that these last were expell'd by the former, who seized on the land by the Preordination of God. At the same time, Amalek, or his spurious offspring, may have likewise been driven out.

Ver. 24 ——— This was that Anah, that found the mules in the wilderness, as he fed the asses of Zibeon his father.] This remarkable event is the subject of various interpretations, of which that of our translation seems as improbable as any. The Hebrew word is hajjemim, which the Septuagint, together with Theodotion, Aquila, and Symmachus, have retain'd in their translations, in the word ἰαμεὶν, or rather, (as they perhaps wrote it at first) ἰαμεὶμ, Jamim. And they seem to have consider'd it as a proper name of a people. The Jews have several traditions with relation to this fact. Some thought, that by the Hebrew word above-mention'd, must be understood seas, or large collections of waters; because the same letters are observable in the word which bears that import. And they will have it, that while he fed his father's asses in the wilderness, he discovered a collection of waters, or seas, according to the Hebrew idiom; which was a very uncommon discovery in a desart: And therefore they think it worthy of notice. Others are of opinion, that Jemim, or Jamim, is a Punic word; and that it signifies hot springs. Some, again, that he effected a copulation of wild asses with his tame ones, and that the swiftest breed of those creatures, call'd Jammim, sprang from thence. But the generality of the Rabbins suppose, that this Anah was the first who procur'd a conjunction of asses with mares, in the wilderness; in consequence of which, the unnatural breed of mules was produc'd. But these interpretations may be justly oppos'd. For, 1. In order to make the Hebrew word signify seas, it must be written Jammim, not Jemim. But such an alteration as this cannot be justified by the authority of any Hebrew copy; and therefore ought to be rejected. And as the Hebrews call great ponds, or lakes, seas; there could be nothing so extraordinary in his discovering these, as to deserve such a particular commemoration as is recorded by Moses, had the fact been really of this nature. For what peculiarity is there in a man's seeing a pond, or even a large expanse of water, as he was wandering in a wilderness? 2. Those who render the word, hot springs, or baths, as the Vulgate, according to the Phœnician signification, seem to have read khemim, and to have believ'd it was synonimous with khammim, which signifies hot baths. But this, likewise, is not countenanc'd by any reading or interpretation that bears the least authority. Those who affirm him to have first found out the breed of mules, have little or no foundation for that conjecture: 1. Because mules were never call'd by the Hebrew name in this verse. 2. The word matza, imports, the discovery of what exists already, and not the invention of what was never in being before. 3. The Scripture makes no mention of mules till the time of David.

The Septuagint, as we have already intimated, retain the Hebrew word in their version, as if they took it for a proper name; and we are of opinion, that Moses himself meant by it, the people call'd Emim, which is perfectly made out from the Samaritan reading. These Emims were a gigantic sort of people, mention'd Deut. ii. 10. and next neighbours to the Horites. These Anah is said to have found, that is, to meet with, and encounter'd, or rather to have fallen upon them unexpectedly, and on a sudden; and the Hebrew word matza, which signifies to find, frequently imports an attack by surprizal. It must, however, be acknowledged, that some learned men have thought, hajjemim was the name of some useful plant, or herb; which was first discover'd by Anah; but they seem to us not to have supported this conjecture by any satisfactory proofs, for which reason we adhere to the preceding opinion.

Ver. 31. And these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom before there reigned any king over the children of Israel.] The number of these kings, and the words which compose the latter part of this verse, have caus'd it to be thought by many, an interpolation inserted long after the time of Moses. The great dean Prideaux observes, "That "the words in the 31st verse of this chapter, And these "are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before "there reigned any king over the land of Israel, could not "have been said till after there had been a king in Israel, "and therefore cannot be Moses's words, but must have "been interpolated afterwards." Connect. part I. book v. p. 492. The learned Mr. Shuckford, likewise, declares, that "It is hard to conceive that the list of kings, men- "tioned in this chapter, could be inserted by Moses, "when all, except the first, reigned after that historian "was dead. If this be the case, continues that author, "if I could have the authority of any learned writer, to "suppose that Ezra, or whoever was the inspired writer "that inserted them, might at first insert these kings af- "ter the dukes, at the end of the chapter, but that "some careless transcribers have misplaced them, I should "readily embrace it." Shuckford's Connect. vol. II. p. 174.

The veneration we entertain for the works of these two learned men, would make it impossible for us to dissent from their opinions, without the greatest reluctance, were we not persuaded, that a sincere attempt to discover the genuineness, and true meaning, of the sacred Scripture, should be preferable to all other considerations; for which reason we shall offer our sentiments of this passage, with all imaginable deference to those who think in a different manner.

There are three sorts of government to be distinguished in the family of Esau, namely, the paternal, the royal, and the ducal. The first was that particular authority which was exercised by the fathers or patriarchs over their children, with the appellation of dukes, whose names are recorded in the former part of this chapter. The second was the dominion of kings, who united all the separate families under the government of one man, who was distinguished by the name of king. The third was the sovereignty of dukes, among whom the land of Edom was parcelled out into several jurisdictions, after the dissolution of the regal authority exercised by the eight kings, whose names are mentioned from the 31st to the 39th verse of this chapter inclusively. That there were several of these dukes at the same time, is evident from Exod. xv. 15. Then the dukes of Edom shall be amazed, &c. The monarchy of Edom had been changed into ducal governments, when the children of Israel were brought out of Egypt, and the country was then govern'd by eleven dukes whose names are enumerated by Moses in the latter part of this chapter, as we before observed. But these sovereigns being struck with a consternation, at the approach of so formidable a body of Israelites, who were then in quest of a settlement, were apprehensive, for their own country, as not knowing that the Israelites were under a strict injunction not to molest leſt them, in any inſtance whatever. As they were, therefore, ſenſible of the imperfection and weakneſs of the ducal regulation, which they had founded on the ruins of the late monarchy, they again united under one head or king, and prepared to maintain their ground againſt any invaſion. To this king, or perhaps his ſucceſſor, meſſengers were ſent by Moſes, then drawing near the end of his days, to entreat a paſſage thro' his country, Numb. xx. 14, 21.

The ſpace of 400 years intervened between the birth of Iſaac, and the departure of Jacob's poſterity out of Egypt, out of which period we will allow the laſt two hundred and forty years, for the eſtabliſhment of the Edomites, under the eight kings mentioned by Moſes, and it will, upon any reaſonable computation, be found to have been a ſufficient time for thoſe reigns. For there are few, if any, authentic hiſtories of any monarchy in the world, wherein the reign of eight kings ever comprehended more than 240 years.

As to the objection, that theſe words, Theſe are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Iſrael, were inſerted long after the time of Moſes, the anſwer is not difficult. For Moſes having in the xxxv. chap. of this book, ver. 11. mentioned the promiſe of God, That kings ſhould come out of the loins of Jacob, remarks it as a circumſtance to exerciſe their faith, that Eſau's poſterity ſhould have ſo many kings, before any one had reigned over Iſrael. There is therefore no reaſon to ſuppoſe this 31ſt verſe to be an interpolation long after the death of Moſes, ſince we might rather affirm, if it were needful, that the meaning of this ſacred hiſtorian is, that all theſe were kings in Edom before his own time, who was the firſt king in Iſrael, Deut. xxxiii. 5. For he truly exerciſed royal authority over them, as Mr. Selden obſerves, L. II. de Synedr. c. i. 2.

It likewiſe appears, by this liſt of kings, that the kingdom was elective; for the ſon did not ſucceed the father, which might probably have been the reaſon why the regal government was ſo ſoon changed for the ducal, tho' it was re-aſſumed about the time that the Iſraelites were advancing to the land of Canaan, under the conduct of Moſes, as has been already obſerved.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Joſeph is hated of his brethren: 5 His two dreams: 13 Jacob ſendeth him to viſit his brethren: 18 His brethren conſpire his death: 21 Reuben ſaveth him: 26 They ſell him to the Iſhmaelites: 31 His father, deceived by the bloody coat, mourneth for him: 36 He is ſold to Potiphar in Egypt.

AND Jacob dwelt in the land wherein his father was a ſtranger, in the land of Canaan.

2 Theſe are the generations of Jacob; Joſeph being ſeventeen years old, was feeding the flock with his brethren, and the lad was with the ſons of Bilhah, and with the ſons of Zilpah, his fathers wives: and Joſeph brought unto his father their evil report.

3 Now Iſrael loved Joſeph more than all his children, becauſe he was the ſon of his old age: and he made him a coat of many colours.

4 And when his brethren ſaw that their father loved him more than all his brethren, they hated him, and could not ſpeak peaceably unto him.

5 ¶ And Joſeph dreamed a dream, and he told it his brethren: and they hated him yet the more.

6 And he ſaid unto them, Hear, I pray you, this dream which I have dreamed.

7 For behold, we were binding ſheaves in the field, and lo, my ſheaf aroſe, and alſo ſtood upright; and behold, your ſheaves ſtood round about, and made obeyſance to my ſheaf.

8 And his brethren ſaid unto him, Shalt thou indeed reign over us? or ſhalt thou indeed have dominion over us? and they hated him yet the more for his dreams, and for his words.

9 ¶ And he dreamed yet another dream, and told it his brethren, and ſaid, Behold, I have dreamed a dream more: and behold, the ſun and the moon, and the eleven ſtars made obeyſance to me.

10 And he told it to his father, and to his brethren: and his father rebuked him, and ſaid unto him, What is this dream that thou haſt dreamed? Shall I and thy mother and thy brethren indeed come to bow down our ſelves to thee, to the earth?

11 And his brethren envied him: but his father obſerved the ſaying.

12 ¶ And his brethren went to feed their fathers flock in Shechem.

13 And Iſrael ſaid unto Joſeph, Do not thy brethren feed the flock in Shechem? Come, and I will ſend thee unto them. And he ſaid unto him, Here am I.

14 And he ſaid to him, Go, I pray thee, ſee whether it be well with thy brethren, and well with the flocks; and bring me word again. So he ſent him out of the vale of Hebron, and he came to Shechem.

15 ¶ And a certain man found him, and behold, he was wandring in the field: and the man asked him, ſaying, What ſeekeſt thou?

16 And he ſaid, I ſeek my brethren: tell me, I pray thee, where they feed their flocks.

17 And the man ſaid, They are departed hence: for I heard them ſay, Let us go to Dothan. And Joſeph went after his brethren, and found them in Dothan.

18 And when they ſaw him afar off, even before he came near unto them, they conſpired againſt him, to ſlay him.

19 And they ſaid one to another, Behold, this dreamer cometh.

20 Come now therefore, and let us ſlay him, and caſt him into ſome pit; and we will ſay, Some evil beaſt hath devoured him: and we ſhall ſee what will become of his dreams.

21 And Reuben heard it, and he delivered him out of their hands; and ſaid, Let us not kill him.

22 And

22 And Reuben ſaid unto them, Shed no blood, but caſt him into this pit that is in the wilderneſs, and lay no hand upon him; that he might rid him out of their hands, to deliver him to his father again.

23 ¶ And it came to paſs when Joſeph was come unto his brethren, that they ſtript Joſeph out of his coat, his coat of many colours that was on him.

24 And they took him, and caſt him into a pit: and the pit was empty, there was no water in it.

25 And they ſat down to eat bread: and they lift up their eyes and looked, and behold, a company of Iſhmaelites came from Gilead, with their camels bearing ſpicery, and balm, and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt.

26 And Judah ſaid unto his brethren, What profit is it if we ſlay our brother, and conceal his blood?

27 Come, and let us ſell him to the Iſhmaelites, and let not our hand be upon him; for he is our brother, and our fleſh: and his brethren were content.

28 Then there paſſed by Midianites, merchant-men; and they drew and lift up Joſeph out of the pit, and ſold Joſeph to the Iſhmaelites for twenty pieces of ſilver: and they brought Joſeph into Egypt.

29 ¶ And Reuben returned unto the pit; and behold, Joſeph was not in the pit: and he rent his cloaths.

30 And he returned unto his brethren, and ſaid, The child is not; and I, whither ſhall I go?

31 And they took Joſephs coat, and killed a kid of the goats, and dipped the coat in the blood.

32 And they ſent the coat of many colours, and they brought it to their father; and ſaid, This have we found: know now whether it be thy ſons coat or no.

33 And he knew it, and ſaid, It is my ſons coat; an evil beaſt hath devoured him: Joſeph is without doubt rent in pieces.

34 And Jacob rent his cloaths, and put ſackcloth upon his loyns, and mourned for his ſon many days.

35 And all his ſons, and all his daughters roſe up to comfort him; but he refuſed to be comforted; and he ſaid, For I will go down into the grave unto my ſon, mourning: thus his father wept for him.

36 And the Midianites ſold him into Egypt unto Potiphar, an officer of Pharaohs, and captain of the guard.

Ver. 2. Theſe are the generations of Jacob, &c.] Theſe words are to be connected with the latter end of chap. xxxv. 23, 24, &c. where Moſes enumerates the ſons of Jacob, and then gives an account of the family of Eſau, in the 36th chapter; after which, he reſumes the hiſtory of Iſrael.

Ver. 3. Now Iſrael loved Joſeph more than all his children, becauſe he was the ſon of his old age, &c.] Moſt verſions, as well as ours, have repreſented Iſrael as loving Joſeph more than the reſt of his children, merely becauſe he was the ſon of his old age; which is a very remarkable miſtake, and was occaſioned by the tranſlators confounding the Hebrew words of Moſes in this verſe, viz. Ben Zekenim, which ſignify the ſon of ſenators, or elders, with Ben Ziknah, the ſon of old age. But the former, which is the Moſaic expreſſion, has a quite different meaning from that which is aſſign'd to it by our tranſlators; and it ſignifies, agreeably to the Hebrew idiom, the ſon, or diſciple of ſenators; or, in other words, a wiſe ſon: And it is certain, that Joſeph was endued with uncommon wiſdom, as is fully evident in the ſequel of his hiſtory. Accordingly, the Samaritan, Perſian, and Arabic verſions, have render'd this paſſage thus; becauſe he was a wiſe and prudent ſon: Tho' even this interpretation does not ſufficiently expreſs the energy of the Hebrew idiom. And therefore it might be more properly tranſlated, becauſe he had the wiſdom of ſenators. And as it is uſual for fathers to be extremely fond of thoſe children who diſcover a ſagacity ſuperior to their years; it was very natural for Iſrael to prefer Joſeph before the reſt of his ſons, on that account. But if his being the ſon of his old age had been the only motive to his extraordinary fondneſs for Joſeph, that preference would have been very inconſiſtent with its cauſe, becauſe he had two ſons younger than Joſeph, viz. Zebulon and Benjamin; and conſequently his ſuperior affection for Joſeph would have been no more than a common inſtance of dotage, which the great hiſtorian would have hardly thought worth recording.

Ver. 4. And when his brethren ſaw that their father loved him more than all his brethren, they hated him, &c.] Whenever a father indulges a fondneſs for ſome of his children, preferably to others, he ought to conceal it, with the utmoſt care, from the reſt, leſt he ſhould diffuſe jealouſy among them; which is certainly the moſt dangerous poiſon that can inſinuate it ſelf into a family. Iſrael had not this command over himſelf, and he diſcover'd his peculiar affection for Joſeph, by outward actions. He diſtinguiſhed him from the reſt of his children, by a coat of many colours, or, as ſome commentators will have it, by a long cloak; in which, Philo has diſcover'd myſteries, which, undoubtedly, never enter'd into the patriarch's thoughts, when he put it upon his ſon.

Ver. 5. And Joſeph dreamed a dream, and he told it his brethren, &c.] Heaven and earth ſeem'd to join together for the exaltation of Joſeph above his brethren, which redoubled their averſion to him. He had two dreams, which he related to his father in the preſence of his brethren. In the firſt he dreamt, that he and his brethren were binding ſheafs in the field; but that his was erect, and receiv'd the homage of all the reſt. He likewiſe dreamt, that the Sun, Moon, and eleven Stars, made obeiſance to him.

Jacob was perhaps ſenſible of ſome divine indications in theſe dreams; but when he perceiv'd the ſiniſter impreſſions, with which they had affected the reſt of his children, he reprov'd Joſeph for relating them; but this diſcreet proceeding of the patriarch had not the intended effect, for the prediction of Joſeph's future greatneſs, kindled ſuch a flame of envy in the minds of his brethren, that nothing but a ſevere revenge could extinguiſh, and which was only diſſembled, till a favourable opportunity of accompliſhing it, was preſented to them.

Ver. 13. And Iſrael ſaid unto Joſeph, do not thy brethren feed the flock in Sichem? Come and I will ſend thee unto them, &c.] The opportunity they deſired occurred in a ſhort time; when they were feeding their flock in the country of Shechem. Jacob ſent Joſeph to enquire after their welfare; he accordingly obeyed, but ſought them, for ſome time, in vain. A man, whom ſome will have to be the angel Gabriel, without alledging any proof to juſtify that opinion, met with Joſeph in the fields, and told him his brethren were removed to Dothan, whither he directed his courſe and found them there.

Ver. 18.

Ver. 18. And when they ſaw him afar off, even before he came near unto them, they conſpired againſt him to ſlay him.] The Hebrew expreſſion in this verſe ſignifies, they took ſubtil counſel againſt him to deſtroy him in ſuch a manner as might prevent the intended murder from being diſcovered by their aged father.

Ver. 21. And Reuben heard it, and he delivered him out of their hands, and ſaid let us not kill him.] Reuben abhorred their deſign; and whether the barbarous expedition againſt the Shechemites had cloyed him with blood, or whether, as the eldeſt of the family, he thought himſelf accountable to his father for Joſeph's fate, he oppoſed the cruel intentions of his brethren; and tho' he was unable to calm their reſentment entirely, he ſucceeded however, in his endeavours to qualify it into ſome moderation, and prevailed upon them to throw him into one of thoſe pits in the wilderneſs, which were made to receive the rain from heaven, and from whence he intended to remove him unknown to them.

Ver. 28. Then there paſſed by Midianites, merchant-men, &c.] When they had let their innocent brother down into the pit, they diſcovered a caravan of Iſhmaelitiſh merchants carrying ſpices to Egypt. It was uſual for thoſe merchants to travel in companies, the better to defend themſelves from robbers, and wild beaſts. Judah propoſed to his brethren the ſelling of Joſeph to thoſe merchants, and his opinion was agreed to, and as their intention, in this ſale was only to free themſelves from an object that was odious to them, they ſet a price upon their brother, below the purchaſe of a common ſlave, and delivered him up for twenty pieces of ſilver. The Septuagint, indeed, and ſeveral other interpreters after them, declare that he was ſold for twenty pieces of gold, but for what reaſon they departed from the Moſaic text, we are not able to determine.

Ver. 29. And Reuben returned unto the pit, &c.] It ſeems that Reuben did not aſſiſt at their laſt conſultation, and therefore thought it was ſtill in his power to accompliſh his deſign of reſtoring Joſeph to his father. His ſurprize and grief were extream, when he ſaw his hopes defeated. The reſt of Joſeph's brethren took his many-coloured coat, and after they had dipped it in blood, preſented it to Jacob, and inform'd him that a wild beaſt had devoured his ſon. The good old man fell into the ſnare, and his belief of Joſeph's death, coſt him as many tears, as if he had really periſhed in the unhappy manner that had been repreſented to him by his unnatural ſons. He ſhewed all the tokens of affliction that could be expreſſed by a tender father who had loſt a dear and favourite child.

Ver. 36. And the Midianites ſold him into Egypt unto Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh's, and captain of the guard.] The Hebrew text calls Potiphar, an Eunuch, but he was not a real one, as the Septuagint render the word ſaris, which frequently ſignifies an officer belonging to the court, and one whoſe ſtation obliges him to be near the king's perſon. Potiphar is alſo ſtyled, by Moſes, Sar Tabachim, which in its primitive import, ſignifies the prince of the butchers, from tabach, to kill, or what is beſt expreſſed by the French word egorger, to cut the throat; for which reaſon ſome have render'd it, the prince of the cooks. But as the fact is of no great importance, we chooſe to adhere to our Engliſh verſion, which agrees in this particular, with the generality of expoſitors.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

1 Judah begetteth Er, Onan, and Shelah. 6 Er marrieth Tamar. 8 The treſpaſs of Onan. 11 Tamar ſtayeth for Shelah: 13 She deceiveth Judah: 27 She beareth twins, Pharez and Zarah.

AND it came to paſs at that time, that Judah went down from his brethren, and turned in to a certain Adullamite, whoſe name was Hirah.

2 And Judah ſaw there a daughter of a certain Canaanite, whoſe name was Shuah; and he took her, and went in unto her.

3 And ſhe conceived and bare a ſon; and he called his name Er.

4 And ſhe conceived again, and bare a ſon; and ſhe called his name Onan.

5 And ſhe yet again conceived, and bare a ſon, and called his name Shelah: and he was at Chezib, when ſhe bare him.

6 And Judah took a wife for Er his firſt-born, whoſe name was Tamar.

7 And Er, Judahs firſt-born was wicked in the ſight of the LORD; and the LORD ſlew him.

8 And Judah ſaid unto Onan, Go in unto thy brothers wife, and marry her, and raiſe up ſeed to thy brother.

9 And Onan knew that the ſeed ſhould not be his: and it came to paſs, when he went in unto his brothers wife, that he ſpilled it on the ground, leſt that he ſhould give ſeed unto his brother.

10 And the thing which he did, diſpleaſed the LORD: wherefore he ſlew him alſo.

11 Then ſaid Judah to Tamar his daughter in law, Remain a widow at thy fathers houſe, till Shelah my ſon be grown; (for he ſaid, Leſt peradventure he die alſo as his brethren did:) and Tamar went and dwelt in her fathers houſe.

12 ¶ And in proceſs of time, the daughter of Shuah Judahs wife died: and Judah was comforted, and went up unto his ſheepſhearers to Timnath, he and his friend Hirah the Adullamite.

13 And it was told Tamar, ſaying, Behold, thy father in law goeth up to Timnath, to ſhear his ſheep.

14 And ſhe put her widows garments off from her, and covered her with a vail, and wrapped her ſelf, and ſat in an open place, which is by the way to Timnath: for ſhe ſaw that Shelah was grown, and ſhe was not given unto him to wife.

15 When Judah ſaw her, he thought her to be an harlot; becauſe ſhe had covered her face.

16 And he turned unto her by the way, and ſaid, Go to, I pray thee, let me come in unto thee (for he knew not that ſhe was his daughter in law) and ſhe ſaid, What wilt thou give me, that thou mayſt come in unto me?

17 And he ſaid, I will ſend thee a kid from the flock: and ſhe ſaid, Wilt thou give me a pledge till thou ſend it?

18 And he ſaid, What pledge ſhall I give thee? And ſhe ſaid, Thy ſignet, and thy bracelets, and thy ſtaff that is in thine hand: and he gave it her, and came in unto her, and ſhe conceived by him.

22 And Reuben ſaid unto them, Shed no blood, but caſt him into this pit that is in the wilderneſs, and lay no hand upon him; that he might rid him out of their hands, to deliver him to his father again.

23 ¶ And it came to paſs when Joſeph was come unto his brethren, that they ſtript Joſeph out of his coat, his coat of many colours that was on him.

24 And they took him, and caſt him into a pit: and the pit was empty, there was no water in it.

25 And they ſat down to eat bread: and they lift up their eyes and looked, and behold, a company of Iſhmaelites came from Gilead, with their camels bearing ſpicery, and balm, and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt.

26 And Judah ſaid unto his brethren, What profit is it if we ſlay our brother, and conceal his blood?

27 Come, and let us ſell him to the Iſhmaelites, and let not our hand be upon him; for he is our brother, and our fleſh: and his brethren were content.

28 Then there paſſed by Midianites, merchant-men; and they drew and lift up Joſeph out of the pit, and ſold Joſeph to the Iſhmaelites for twenty pieces of ſilver: and they brought Joſeph into Egypt.

29 ¶ And Reuben returned unto the pit; and behold, Joſeph was not in the pit: and he rent his cloaths.

30 And he returned unto his brethren, and ſaid, The child is not; and I, whither ſhall I go?

31 And they took Joſephs coat, and killed a kid of the goats, and dipped the coat in the blood.

32 And they ſent the coat of many colours, and they brought it to their father; and ſaid, This have we found: know now whether it be thy ſons coat or no.

33 And he knew it, and ſaid, It is my ſons coat; an evil beaſt hath devoured him: Joſeph is without doubt rent in pieces.

34 And Jacob rent his cloaths, and put ſackcloth upon his loyns, and mourned for his ſon many days.

35 And all his ſons, and all his daughters roſe up to comfort him; but he refuſed to be comforted; and he ſaid, For I will go down into the grave unto my ſon, mourning: thus his father wept for him.

36 And the Midianites ſold him into Egypt unto Potiphar, an officer of Pharaohs, and captain of the guard.

Ver. 2. Theſe are the generations of Jacob, &c.] Theſe words are to be connected with the latter end of chap. xxxv. 23, 24, &c. where Moſes enumerates the ſons of Jacob, and then gives an account of the family of Eſau, in the 36th chapter; after which, he reſumes the hiſtory of Iſrael.

Ver. 3. Now Iſrael loved Joſeph more than all his children, becauſe he was the ſon of his old age, &c.] Moſt verſions, as well as ours, have repreſented Iſrael as loving Joſeph more than the reſt of his children, merely becauſe he was the ſon of his old age; which is a very remarkable miſtake, and was occaſioned by the tranſlators confounding the Hebrew words of Moſes in this verſe, viz. Ben Zekenim, which ſignify the ſon of ſenators, or elders, with Ben Ziknah, the ſon of old age. But the former, which is the Moſaic expreſſion, has a quite different meaning from that which is aſſign'd to it by our tranſlators; and it ſignifies, agreeably to the Hebrew idiom, the ſon, or diſciple of ſenators; or, in other words, a wiſe ſon: And it is certain, that Joſeph was endued with uncommon wiſdom, as is fully evident in the ſequel of his hiſtory. Accordingly, the Samaritan, Perſian, and Arabic verſions, have render'd this paſſage thus; becauſe he was a wiſe and prudent ſon: Tho' even this interpretation does not ſufficiently expreſs the energy of the Hebrew idiom. CHAP. XXXVIII.

1 Judah begetteth Er, Onan, and Shelah. 6 Er marrieth Tamar. 8 The treſpaſs of Onan. 11 Tamar ſtayeth for Shelah: 13 She deceiveth Judah: 27 She beareth twins, Pharez and Zarah.

18 And he ſaid, What pledge ſhall I give thee? And ſhe ſaid, Thy ſignet, and thy bracelets, and thy ſtaff that is in thine hand: and he gave it her, and came in unto her, and ſhe conceived by him.

19 And ſhe aroſe and went away, and laid by her vail from her, and put on the garments of her widowhood.

20 And Judah ſent the kid by the hand of his friend the Adullamite, to receive his pledge from the womans hand: but he found her not.

21 Then he asked the men of that place, ſaying, Where is the harlot that was openly by the way ſide? And they ſaid, There was no harlot in this place.

22 And he returned to Judah, and ſaid, I cannot find her; and alſo the men of the place ſaid, that there was no harlot in this place.

23 And Judah ſaid, Let her take it to her, leſt we be ſhamed: behold, I ſent this kid, and thou haſt not found her.

24 ¶ And it came to paſs about three months after, that it was told Judah, ſaying, Tamar thy daughter in law hath played the harlot; and alſo behold, ſhe is with child by whoredom: and Judah ſaid, Bring her forth, and let her be burnt.

25 When ſhe was brought forth, ſhe ſent to her father in law, ſaying, By the man whoſe theſe are, am I with child: and ſhe ſaid, Diſcern, I pray thee, whoſe are theſe, the ſignet, and bracelets, and ſtaff.

26 And Judah acknowledged them, and ſaid, She hath been more righteous than I; becauſe that I gave her not to Shelah my ſon: and he knew her again no more.

27 ¶ And it came to paſs in the time of her travail, that behold, twins were in her womb.

28 And it came to paſs when ſhe travailed, that the one put out his hand: and the midwife took and bound upon his hand a ſcarlet thread, ſaying, This came out firſt.

29 And it came to paſs as he drew back his hand, that behold, his brother came out; and ſhe ſaid, How haſt thou broken forth? This breach be upon thee: therefore his name was called Pharez.

30 And afterward came out his brother that had the ſcarlet thread upon his hand; and his name was called Zarah.

Ver. 1. And it came to paſs at that time, that Judah went down from his brethren, &c.] Judah ſeparated himſelf from his brethren, and retired to the houſe of a man named Hirah, of Adullam, that city of the Canaanites whoſe kings Joſhua defeated, Joſ. xii. 15. and which afterwards fell to the ſhare of the tribe of Judah, and where the cave was, which afforded a ſafe retreat to David, from the perſecution of Saul, 1 Sam. xxii. 1. Some have thought that the ill treatment of Joſeph by his brethren, was the cauſe of Judah's leaving them.

Whatever was Judah's motive for retiring in this manner, he contracted a marriage, that ill became the great grandſon of Abraham, with the daughter of a Canaanite, by whom he had three ſons, Er, Onan, and Shelah.

It is not eaſy to gueſs, at what time Judah had theſe three ſons; but if we take the words in the firſt verſe, at that time, in a ſtrict ſenſe, as if it happened about the time that Joſeph was ſold into Egypt, he muſt have been but twenty-two years of age; for Joſeph was then ſeventeen years old, and Judah could not be above four or five years older, being the fourth ſon of Leah, and he and Joſeph were both born within the compaſs of ſeven years. So that the moſt that can be thought is, that he had married either a little before Joſeph was ſold, or about that time; and that the latter part of the hiſtorical account of his ſons marriage and death, and the affair of Tamar, happened during the twenty years that Joſeph continued in Egypt. And therefore tho' Moſes relates all theſe events in the chapter preceding that, which gives an account of Joſeph's impriſonment, it is moſt probable that he did it, to prevent intermingling the ſtory of thoſe two brothers too much, and has therefore finiſhed the relation of Judah's adventures, before he enter'd upon thoſe of Joſeph. Neither need we think it ſtrange, that Judah and his ſons ſhould marry ſo young, ſince we have another inſtance in Scripture of the like nature, namely that of Ahaz, Hezekiah's father, who was but eleven years old when that prince was born; for Ahaz was but thirty-ſix when he died, and his ſon was twenty-five when he began to reign, and he was his immediate ſucceſſor, 2 Kings xvi. 2. xviii. 2. And if a prince, in thoſe days, could have a child at that age, they certainly might, who lived in Judah's time.

Er, Judah's eldeſt ſon, being cut off for his wickedneſs, before he had any children by his wife Tamar, Judah order'd his ſecond ſon Onan to marry her, according to the cuſtom of that country, and to raiſe poſterity to his brother. Onan ſeemingly obeyed, but not being able to bear the thought, that his children ſhould be eſteemed his brothers, he had recourſe to ſuch an impious method to prevent Tamar's having any by him, that God was provoked to deſtroy him alſo.

Tho' Onan's ſin was in itſelf great enough, yet it is very probable, that it was aggravated with a worſe circumſtance, namely, an intention to prevent the birth of the Meſſiah, ſince he could not have the honour to be number'd among his anceſtors. As for the ſin of his elder brother, it is thought to have been the ſame with Onan's. but committed with a different view; namely, that Tamar might not impair her beauty and ſhape, by bearing of children; but this is only a rabbinical conjecture.

Ver. 11. Then ſaid Judah to Tamar his daughter-in-law, Remain a widow at thy father's houſe, till Shelah my ſon be grown (for he ſaid, Leſt peradventure he die alſo, as his brethren did) and Tamar went and dwelt in her father's houſe.] Shelah, Judah's third ſon, ought to have married the widow of his two elder brothers; but Judah, looking upon the untimely death of the two firſt, as an ill omen to the marriage of the third ſon, was unwilling to ſacrifice him to the danger he apprehended, and therefore, perhaps under the pretext that too familiar a correſpondence between Tamar and Shelah would be inevitable, if they continued in the ſame houſe, he perſuaded her to ſtay with her father, till Shelah ſhould have attained his marriageable age.

Ver. 13, 14. And it was told Tamar, ſaying, Behold thy father-in-law goeth up to Timnath to ſhear his ſheep. And ſhe put her widows garments off from her, and covered her with a veil, and wrapped herſelf, and ſat in an open place, which is by the way to Timnath; for ſhe ſaw that Shelah was grown, and ſhe was not given unto him to wife.] In the firſt ages, the feaſt of ſheep-ſhearing was celebrated with much ſolemnity and profuſion; and as they abandon'd themſelves to an exceſs of eating and drinking, they eaſily paſt, from thoſe extremes, to that of impurity. Tamar heard, that Judah was partaking of the pleaſures of that feaſt, and had recourſe to a ſingular ſtratagem, to revenge the affront ſhe imagined had been offer'd to her, by Judah's unpunctuality to his promiſe. She cover'd herſelf with a veil, not ſuch a one as was uſually worn by widows, as is injudiciouſly affirmed by Rabbi Abarbanel, but ſuch a one as thoſe women, who proſtituted themſelves, commonly threw over them, and to which Solomon ſeems to allude, in the firſt chapter and ſeventh verſe of his Song; where the Hebrew text imports, leſt I paſs for a veiled woman. In this equipage, very improper for a perſon of her condition, but no leſs convenient for her deſign, ſhe went and ſat in an open open place, as was cuſtomary for thoſe women whoſe part ſhe acted.

It ſhould ſeem by the conduct of Tamar, that ſhe had formerly obſerved ſome particular propenſity in Judah to an intercourſe with her ſex, for otherwiſe it is hardly probable, that ſhe could have expected any ſucceſs from the project ſhe had formed. This however is evident, that it was neither the virtue nor ſanctity of the twelve patriarchs that recommended them to the favour of God, but his covenant with Abraham, and the glorious deſigns of his divine providence on their poſterity. And this is what Moſes told the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs upon ſeveral occaſions, as appears frequently in the book of Deuteronomy.

Ver. 24. And it came to paſs about three months after, that it was told Judah, ſaying, Tamar thy daughter-in-law hath played the harlot; and alſo behold, ſhe is with child by whoredom: and Judah ſaid, Bring her forth, and let her be burnt.] Some commentators think, that Judah, as head of his own family, had power of life and death over all the perſons who belonged to it; but it is hardly probable, that the Canaanites, in whoſe country he then dwelt, would allow a ſtranger to exerciſe ſuch a prerogative. 'Tis more likely therefore, that he only meant, ſhe ſhould be brought before a court of judicature, and ſentenced according to the laws of that land. However, it is certain, that whether he aſſumed the province of a judge, or that of a proſecutor, he acted an unrighteous part; for Tamar could not be juſtly accuſed of adultery, which alone condemn'd her to be burnt, unleſs it was becauſe he had betrothed her to his ſon Shelah, by his promiſe to eſpouſe her to him. It was likewiſe very inhuman to put a woman to death, before ſhe was deliver'd; and the Romans, whatever may be objected againſt them in other particulars, with reſpect to illegitimate children, whom they uſed to expoſe when they thought fit, yet had a law to prevent the execution of a pregnant woman before her delivery. (Ælian. l. 9.) But it is probable, that his impatience to be rid of her made him ſpeak more unadviſedly than he would have done, had ſhe been a more indifferent perſon. However, it is plain, that Joſephus looked upon all the tranſactions recorded in this chapter, to be ſo little to the credit of Judah and his ſons, that he has ſuppreſſed them all; and this is one inſtance, among many others that might be mentioned, of his inclination to conceal every circumſtance that greatly redounded to the diſhonour of his nation.

Some libertines may perhaps be inclinable to reproach Moſes, for tranſmitting to us the memory of an event, that might give offence to all ages, tho' nothing but malice or ignorance can furniſh them with any pretence for ſuch a cenſure. The ſacred hiſtorian could not ſuppreſs ſuch a circumſtance, without failing in the great end he propoſed by writing his hiſtory, which was to convince us, by recording the genealogies of the patriarchs, that thoſe prophecies were fulfilled, which had foretold, that the Meſſiah ſhould ſpring from the deſcendants of Abraham, and from the family of Judah, in particular. Now, from this commerce of Judah with Tamar, proceeded Phares; from Phares, Eſrom; from Eſrom, Aram; from Aram, Aminadab; from Aminadab, Naaſſon; from Naaſſon, Salmon; from Salmon, Booz; and from Booz, Obed, the grand-father of David.

CHAP. XXXIX.

1 Joſeph advanced in Potiphars houſe: 7 He reſiſteth his miſtreſs's temptation: 13 He is falſly accuſed: 19 He is caſt in priſon: 21 God is with him there.

AND Joſeph was brought down to Egypt: and Potiphar an officer of Pharaoh, captain of the guard, an Egyptian, bought him of the hands of the Iſhmaelites, which had brought him down thither.

2 And the LORD was with Joſeph, and he was a proſperous man: and he was in the houſe of his maſter the Egyptian.

3 And his maſter ſaw that the LORD was with him, and that the LORD made all that he did to proſper in his hand.

4 And Joſeph found grace in his ſight, and he ſerved him: and he made him overſeer over his houſe, and all that he had he put into his hand.

5 And it came to paſs from the time that he had made him overſeer in his houſe, and over all that he had, that the LORD bleſſed the Egyptians houſe for Joſephs ſake: and the bleſſing of the LORD was upon all that he had, in the houſe, and in the field.

6 And he left all that he had in Joſephs hand; and he knew not ought he had, ſave the bread which he did eat: and Joſeph was a goodly perſon, and well-favoured.

7 ¶ And it came to paſs after theſe things, that his maſters wife caſt her eyes upon Joſeph; and ſhe ſaid, Lie with me.

8 But he refuſed, and ſaid unto his maſters wife, Behold, my maſter wotteth not what is with me in the houſe, and he hath committed all that he hath to my hand.

9 There is none greater in this houſe than I; neither hath he kept back any thing from me, but thee, becauſe thou art his wife: how then can I do this great wickedneſs, and ſin againſt God?

10 And it came to paſs as ſhe ſpake to Joſeph day by day; that he hearkned not unto her, to lie by her, or to be with her.

11 And it came to paſs about this time, that Joſeph went into the houſe to do his buſineſs; and there was none of the men of the houſe there within.

12 And ſhe caught him by his garment, ſaying, Lie with me: and he left his garment in her hand, and fled, and got him out.

13 And it came to paſs, when ſhe ſaw that he had left his garment in her hand, and was fled forth, 14 That ſhe called unto the men of her houſe, and ſpake unto them, ſaying, See, he hath brought in an Hebrew unto us to mock us: he came in unto me to lie with me, and I cried with a loud voice.

15 And it came to paſs, when he heard that I lifted up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled, and got him out.

16 And ſhe laid up his garment by her, until his lord came home.

17 And ſhe ſpake unto him according to theſe words, ſaying, The Hebrew ſervant which thou haſt brought unto us, came in unto me to mock me.

18 And

18 And it came to paſs, as I lift up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled out.

19 And it came to paſs, when his maſter heard the words of his wife, which ſhe ſpake unto him, ſaying, After this manner did thy ſervant to me; that his wrath was kindled.

20 And Joſephs maſter took him, and put him into the priſon, a place where the kings priſoners were bound: and he was there in the priſon.

21 ¶ But the LORD was with Joſeph, and ſhewed him mercy, and gave him favour in the ſight of the keeper of the priſon.

22 And the keeper of the priſon committed to Joſephs hand all the priſoners that were in the priſon; and whatſoever they did there, he was the doer of it.

23 The keeper of the priſon looked not to any thing that was under his hand; becauſe the LORD was with him; and that which he did, the LORD made it to proſper.

Moſes having finiſh'd his account of Judah, reſumes the hiſtory of Joſeph, which he had enter'd upon in the 37th chapter, and repeats his being ſold to Potiphar.

Ver. 2. And the Lord was with Joſeph, &c.] Joſeph was now receiv'd into Potiphar's houſe, and the bleſſing of God attended him thither. His perſon was grac'd with many engaging charms and accompliſhments, and every part of his conduct was attended with ſucceſs. Potiphar reaped the benefit of this, which induc'd him to entruſt the care of his family with ſo meritorious a ſervant; and to ſuch a degree, that, as the ſacred hiſtorian obſerves, he knew not ought he had, ſave the bread which he did eat. This is the higheſt intimation of confidence, and it implies, that he was utterly diſregardful of any thing that concern'd his eſtate, not minding what his expence or receipts were, but confiding the whole to the integrity of Joſeph, and indulging himſelf in all the ſatisfactions he was capable of enjoying, in ſuch a relaxation from his domeſtick cares.

Ver. 7. And it came to paſs after theſe things, that his maſter's wife caſt her eyes upon Joſeph, &c.] Immodeſty was the prevailing vice of the Egyptians; and the beauty of Joſeph excited criminal deſires in the wife of Potiphar. When a woman once exceeds the firſt bounds of decency and virtue, ſhe ſoon breaks through all the reſt. She ſuffer'd her ſelf to be intoxicated with her inordinate paſſion for her amiable ſervant, and finding her ſelf unable to perſuade him into a compliance with her impure deſires, ſhe had recourſe to compulſion. Joſephus ſupplies Joſeph with a number of fine arguments on this occaſion, but they are infinitely ſhort of that pathetic conciſeneſs with which Moſes repreſents him expreſſing himſelf, in the 8th and 9th verſes of this chapter. But the moſt emphatical language, in ſuch a dangerous conjuncture, was ſlight. Joſeph, therefore, had the prudence to employ this neceſſary expedient.

Ver. 16 And ſhe laid up his garment by her, until his lord came home.] Solomon ſays, The adultereſs will hunt for the precious life, Prov. vi. 26. When ſuch a one is deſpis'd, ſhe is capable of launching into the greateſt exceſs of rage and revenge. Potiphar's wife accuſed Joſeph of a crime, whereof ſhe alone was guilty. Perhaps her husband was not altogether inſenſible of her miſconduct, and Joſeph's innocence; and the moderation with which he proceeded againſt his ſervant, ſeems to ſtrengthen that conjecture. He, perhaps, was apprehenſive that the affair, with reſpect to its conſequences to himſelf, was of too delicate a nature, to bear a ſtrict examination; but as he found it neceſſary to skreen his wife's honour, for the ſake of his own, he threw Joſeph into priſon, without condemning him to die, which was the puniſhment due to the crime of which Joſeph was accuſed. Mankind, ſays Philo, tho' divided with reſpect to all other matters, are unanimous in puniſhing adulterers with death.

Ver. 21. But the Lord was with Joſeph, and ſhewed him mercy, and gave him favour in the ſight of the keeper of the priſon.] Joſeph was confined in this priſon above two years, but the God who had never forſaken him, render'd that misfortune very ſupportable, by conciliating the mind of the keeper to his priſoner, to whom he conducted himſelf in ſuch a favourable manner, as might naturally incline Joſeph to believe, that he was bleſſed with ſuch a protection as it was not in the power of man to violate; and he ſoon gained the ſame aſcendant over the ſoul of his jailor, as he lately had over that of his maſter.

CHAP. XL.

1 The butler and baker of Pharaoh in priſon: 4 Joſeph hath charge of them: 5 He interpreteth their dreams: 20 They come to paſs according to his interpretation. 23 The ingratitude of the butler.

AND it came to paſs after theſe things, that the butler of the king of Egypt and his baker had offended their lord the king of Egypt.

2 And Pharaoh was wroth againſt two of his officers, againſt the chief of the butlers, and againſt the chief of the bakers.

3 And he put them inward in the houſe of the captain of the guard, into the priſon, the place where Joſeph was bound.

4 And the captain of the guard charged Joſeph with them, and he ſerved them; and they continued a ſeaſon in ward.

5 ¶ And they dreamed a dream both of them, each man his dream in one night, each man according to the interpretation of his dream; the butler and the baker of the king of Egypt, which were bound in the priſon.

6 And Joſeph came in unto them in the morning, and looked upon them, and behold they were ſad.

7 And he asked Pharaohs officers that were with him in the ward of his lords houſe, ſaying, Wherefore look ye ſo ſadly to day?

8 And they ſaid unto him, We have dreamed a dream, and there is no interpreter of it. And Joſeph ſaid unto them, Do not interpretations belong to God? Tell me them, I pray you.

9 And the chief butler told his dream to Joſeph, and ſaid unto him, In my dream, behold, a vine was before me:

10 And in the vine were three branches: and it was as though it budded, and her bloſſoms ſhot forth; and the cluſters thereof brought forth ripe grapes.

11 And Pharaohs cup was in my hand: and I took the grapes, and preſſed them into

Pharaohs

Pharaohs cup, and I gave the cup into Pharaohs hand.

12 And Joſeph ſaid unto him, This is the interpretation of it: The three branches are three days:

13 Yet within three days ſhall Pharaoh lift up thine head, and reſtore thee unto thy place: and thou ſhalt deliver Pharaohs cup into his hand, after the former manner when thou waſt his butler.

14 But think on me when it ſhall be well with thee, and ſhew kindneſs, I pray thee, unto me; and make mention of me unto Pharaoh, and bring me out of this houſe.

15 For indeed I was ſtolen away out of the land of the Hebrews: and here alſo have I done nothing that they ſhould put me into the dungeon.

16 When the chief baker ſaw that the interpretation was good; he ſaid unto Joſeph, I alſo was in my dream, and behold, I had three white baskets on my head.

17 And in the uppermoſt basket there was of all manner of bake-meats for Pharaoh; and the birds did eat them out of the basket upon my head.

18 And Joſeph anſwered, and ſaid, This is the interpretation thereof: The three baskets are three days, 19 Yet within three days ſhall Pharaoh lift up thy head from off thee, and ſhall hang thee on a tree; and the birds ſhall eat thy fleſh from off thee.

20 ¶ And it came to paſs the third day, which was Pharaohs birth-day, that he made a feaſt unto all his ſervants: and he lifted up the head of the chief butler, and of the chief baker among his ſervants.

21 And he reſtored the chief butler unto his butlerſhip again; and he gave the cup into Pharaohs hand:

22 But he hanged the chief baker: as Joſeph had interpreted to them.

23 Yet did not the chief butler remember Joſeph, but forgat him.

Ver. 1. And it came to paſs after theſe things, that the butler of the king of Egypt, and his baker had offended their lord the king of Egypt.] Two conſiderable officers of Pharaoh's court, were caſt into the ſame priſon where Joſeph was confined. The names indeed, of butler and baker do not, at firſt, excite any great ideas in the mind. But no employment was mean or baſe in the palaces of the kings of Egypt. Slaves were not admitted into any offices there, and they were conferred on none but men who were rendered illuſtrious by their rank or birth. The moſaic hiſtory is ſilent, as to the crimes with which theſe officers were charged; but we cannot omit a moſt extraordinary obſervation of a Rabbin, who is ſo ridiculous as to declare, that the butler was impriſoned, for letting a fly drop into the king's cup, and that the baker's offence was his mixing ſand and gravel in his ſovereign's bread. There is frequently no occaſion to ſeek for any other cauſes of the ruin of perſons in publick ſtations, than the inconſtancy of thoſe princes upon whom their fortune depends.

Ver. 5. And they dreamed a dream both of them, &c.] Each of theſe ſtate-priſoners had a dream. The butler imagin'd that he ſaw a vine in which there were three branches, and it was as though it budded, and her bloſſoms ſhot forth; and the cluſters thereof brought forth ripe grapes, and Pharaoh's cup was in his hand; and he took the grapes and preſſed them into Pharaoh's cup, and gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand. Joſeph, by the aid of that divine wiſdom which was infus'd into his ſoul, by the gracious giver of every good and perfect gift, explain'd the dream of this officer, and aſſur'd him, that in three days he ſhould be reinſtated in his former poſt.

Our tranſlation has render'd the expreſſion, which Joſeph uſed to the butler, and the baker, ſhall lift up thy head, too literally. The words in the original mean, that in three days Pharaoh would have them brought forth and examin'd; for the word which is render'd, lift up the head, ſignifies to muſter, to call to an account, and to take the ſum of any thing. The ſequel ſhews this to have been the true meaning, ſince, after ſuch examination, the one was hang'd, and the other reſtor'd to his former ſtation. It ſeems, therefore, probable, by the Moſaic expreſſion, that theſe officers had been ſuſpected, or accuſed of defrauding the king; and that when their accounts had been examined, the one was found guilty, and the other innocent.

Ver. 14. But think on me when it ſhall be well with thee.] When my prediction is accompliſh'd, I ask no other reward of thee, but that thou wilt be inſtrumental to releaſe me from my impriſonment. Joſeph was not only grown expert in the interpretation of dreams, but was, likewiſe, fully ſenſible that he knew their exact meaning: Such kind of predictions by dreams were, in ancient times, frequently imparted to the Heathens, as well as to the Hebrews; tho' in after-ages they grew rare among both. For the increaſe of wickedneſs in the world, multiplicity of buſineſs, ſollicitude of mind about worldly affairs, and the immoderate dependance of men, on politic devices for their accompliſhment, occaſion'd the defect of true dreams, and other divine admonitions for the welfare of mankind.

Ver. 15. For indeed I was ſtolen away.] I was carried away by violence, without the knowledge of my father, and ſold for a ſlave. His brethren, by ſelling him in this manner, committed that crime which the Latins call Plagium. For Qui hominem liberum vendit, plagiarius eſt.

——— Out of the land of the Hebrews.] Some expoſitors would have it thought, that theſe words were added by Joſhua, or ſome other perſon, after the time of Moſes; becauſe Canaan, ſay they, was not call'd the land of the Hebrews in his days, much leſs in Joſeph's. But they ſhould have conſider'd, that Joſeph doth not call all the land of Canaan by this name, but only that part of it where Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, had long reſided, viz. about Hebron. There Abraham, who was the firſt that is call'd a Hebrew, ſettled with his family when he came out of Chaldea, chap. xiii. 17, 18. there Iſaac dwelt alſo, chap. xxxv. 27. and likewiſe Jacob, chap. xxxvii. 1, 14. where it is ſaid, indeed, that they were ſtrangers, or ſojourners, in this country: But they were ſtrangers of great note and reputation; they were treated as princes, chap. xxiii. 6. they liv'd by their own laws; made leagues, not only with private men, but with cities and kings, chap. xxi. 22, 23. xxvi. 28. xxxiv. 6. and the fame of them muſt undoubtedly have been diffuſed abroad, both by the memorable victory which Abraham obtain'd over ſeveral kings, and by the ſacking of Shechem, which the neighbouring people durſt not revenge. All which events, might well cauſe that part of the country, where they had ſettled for three generations, to be call'd the land of the Hebrews; where they were at firſt planted by the conſent of the natives who were confederated with Abraham, chap. xiv. 13.

Ver. 16. When the chief baker ſaw that the interpretation was good; he ſaid unto Joſeph, I alſo was in my dream, &c.] It, perhaps, was very providential, that the chief butler propounded his dream firſt, which had a fortunate ſignification; for he might not have been deſirous of its interpretation, had he firſt heard the fatal meaning of his fellow officer's dream.

The baker dream'd that he had three white, or wicker baskets on his head, out of the uppermoſt of which the birds eat the proviſions that were prepared for Pharaoh. Joſeph gives a very ſiniſter interpretation of this dream, and foretold that the baker ſhould be hanged within three days, and that his carcaſs ſhould be food for the birds of prey.

Both theſe predictions were exactly accompliſhed; the baker was condemned and executed, and the butler was reſtored to his former office.

Ver. 23. Yet did not the chief butler remember Joſeph, but forgat him.] Ingratitude is the vice of thoſe vain and empty courtiers who have no taſte for wiſdom or vertue, but are wholly devoted to their ſenſeleſs and unmanly pleaſures. It frequently happens among men, that thoſe who from an abject and deſtitute condition, are raiſed to any degree of eminence and proſperity, forget thoſe friends who have been the companions of their paſt miſery, and they ſet, at as great a diſtance as poſſible from their eyes and remembrance, every circumſtance that might contribute to revive the idea of their own misfortunes and obligations. The chief butler ſoon forgot Joſeph, or at leaſt did not mention him to Pharaoh, till he could make his own court by the account he gave of that excellent young man.

Chap. XLI.

1 Pharaoh's two dreams: 9 Joſeph interpreteth them. 33 He giveth Pharaoh counſel. 38 Joſeph is advanced: 50 He begetteth Manaſſeh and Ephraim. 54 The famine beginneth.

AND it came to paſs at the end of two full years, that Pharaoh dreamed: and behold, he ſtood by the river.

2 And behold, there came up out of the river ſeven well-favoured kine, and fat-fleſhed; and they fed in a meadow.

3 And behold, ſeven other kine came up after them out of the river, ill-favoured and lean-fleſhed; and ſtood by the other kine, upon the brink of the river.

4 And the ill-favoured and lean-fleſhed kine did eat up the ſeven well-favoured and fat kine. So Pharaoh awoke.

5 And he ſlept and dreamed the ſecond time: and behold, ſeven ears of corn came up upon one ſtalk, rank and good.

6 Aud behold, ſeven thin ears and blaſted with the eaſt-wind ſprung up after them.

7 And the ſeven thin ears devoured the ſeven rank and full ears: and Pharaoh awoke, and behold, it was a dream.

8 And it came to paſs in the morning, that his ſpirit was troubled: and he ſent and called for all the magicians of Egypt, and all the wiſe-men thereof: and Pharaoh told them his dream; but there was none that could interpret them unto Pharaoh.

9 ¶ Then ſpake the chief butler unto Pharaoh, ſaying, I do remember my faults this day.

10 Pharaoh was wroth with his ſervants, and put me in ward in the captain of the guards houſe, both me, and the chief baker.

11 And we dreamed a dream in one night, I and he: we dreamed each man according to the interpretation of his dream.

12 And there was there with us a young man an Hebrew, ſervant to the captain of the guard; and we told him, and he interpreted to us our dreams: to each man according to his dream he did interpret.

13 And it came to paſs, as he interpreted to us, ſo it was: me he reſtored unto mine office, and him he hanged.

14 ¶ Then Pharaoh ſent and called Joſeph, and they brought him haſtily out of the dungeon: And he ſhaved himſelf, and changed his raiment, and came in unto Pharaoh.

15 And Pharaoh ſaid unto Joſeph, I have dreamed a dream, and there is none that can interpret it: and I have heard ſay of thee, that thou canſt underſtand a dream, to interpret it.

16 And Joſeph anſwered Pharaoh, ſaying, It is not in me: God ſhall give Pharaoh an anſwer of peace.

17 And Pharaoh ſaid unto Joſeph, in my dream, behold, I ſtood upon the bank of the river.

18 And behold, there came up out of the river, ſeven kine, fat-fleſhed, and well-favoured; and they fed in a meadow.

19 And behold, ſeven other kine came up after them, poor and very ill-favoured, and lean-fleſhed, ſuch as I never ſaw in all the land of Egypt for badneſs.

20 And the lean and the ill-favoured kine did eat up the firſt ſeven fat kine.

21 And when they had eaten them up, it could not be known that they had eaten them; but they were ſtill ill-favoured, as at the beginning. So I awoke.

22 And I ſaw in my dream, and behold, ſeven ears came up in one ſtalk, full and good.

23 And behold, ſeven ears, withered, thin, and blaſted with the eaſt-wind, ſprung up after them.

24 And the thin ears devoured the ſeven good ears: and I told this unto the magicians; but there was none that could declare it unto me.

25 ¶ And Joſeph ſaid unto Pharaoh, The dream of Pharaoh is one; God hath ſhewed Pharaoh what he is about to do.

26 The ſeven good kine are ſeven years; and the ſeven good ears are ſeven years: the dream is one.

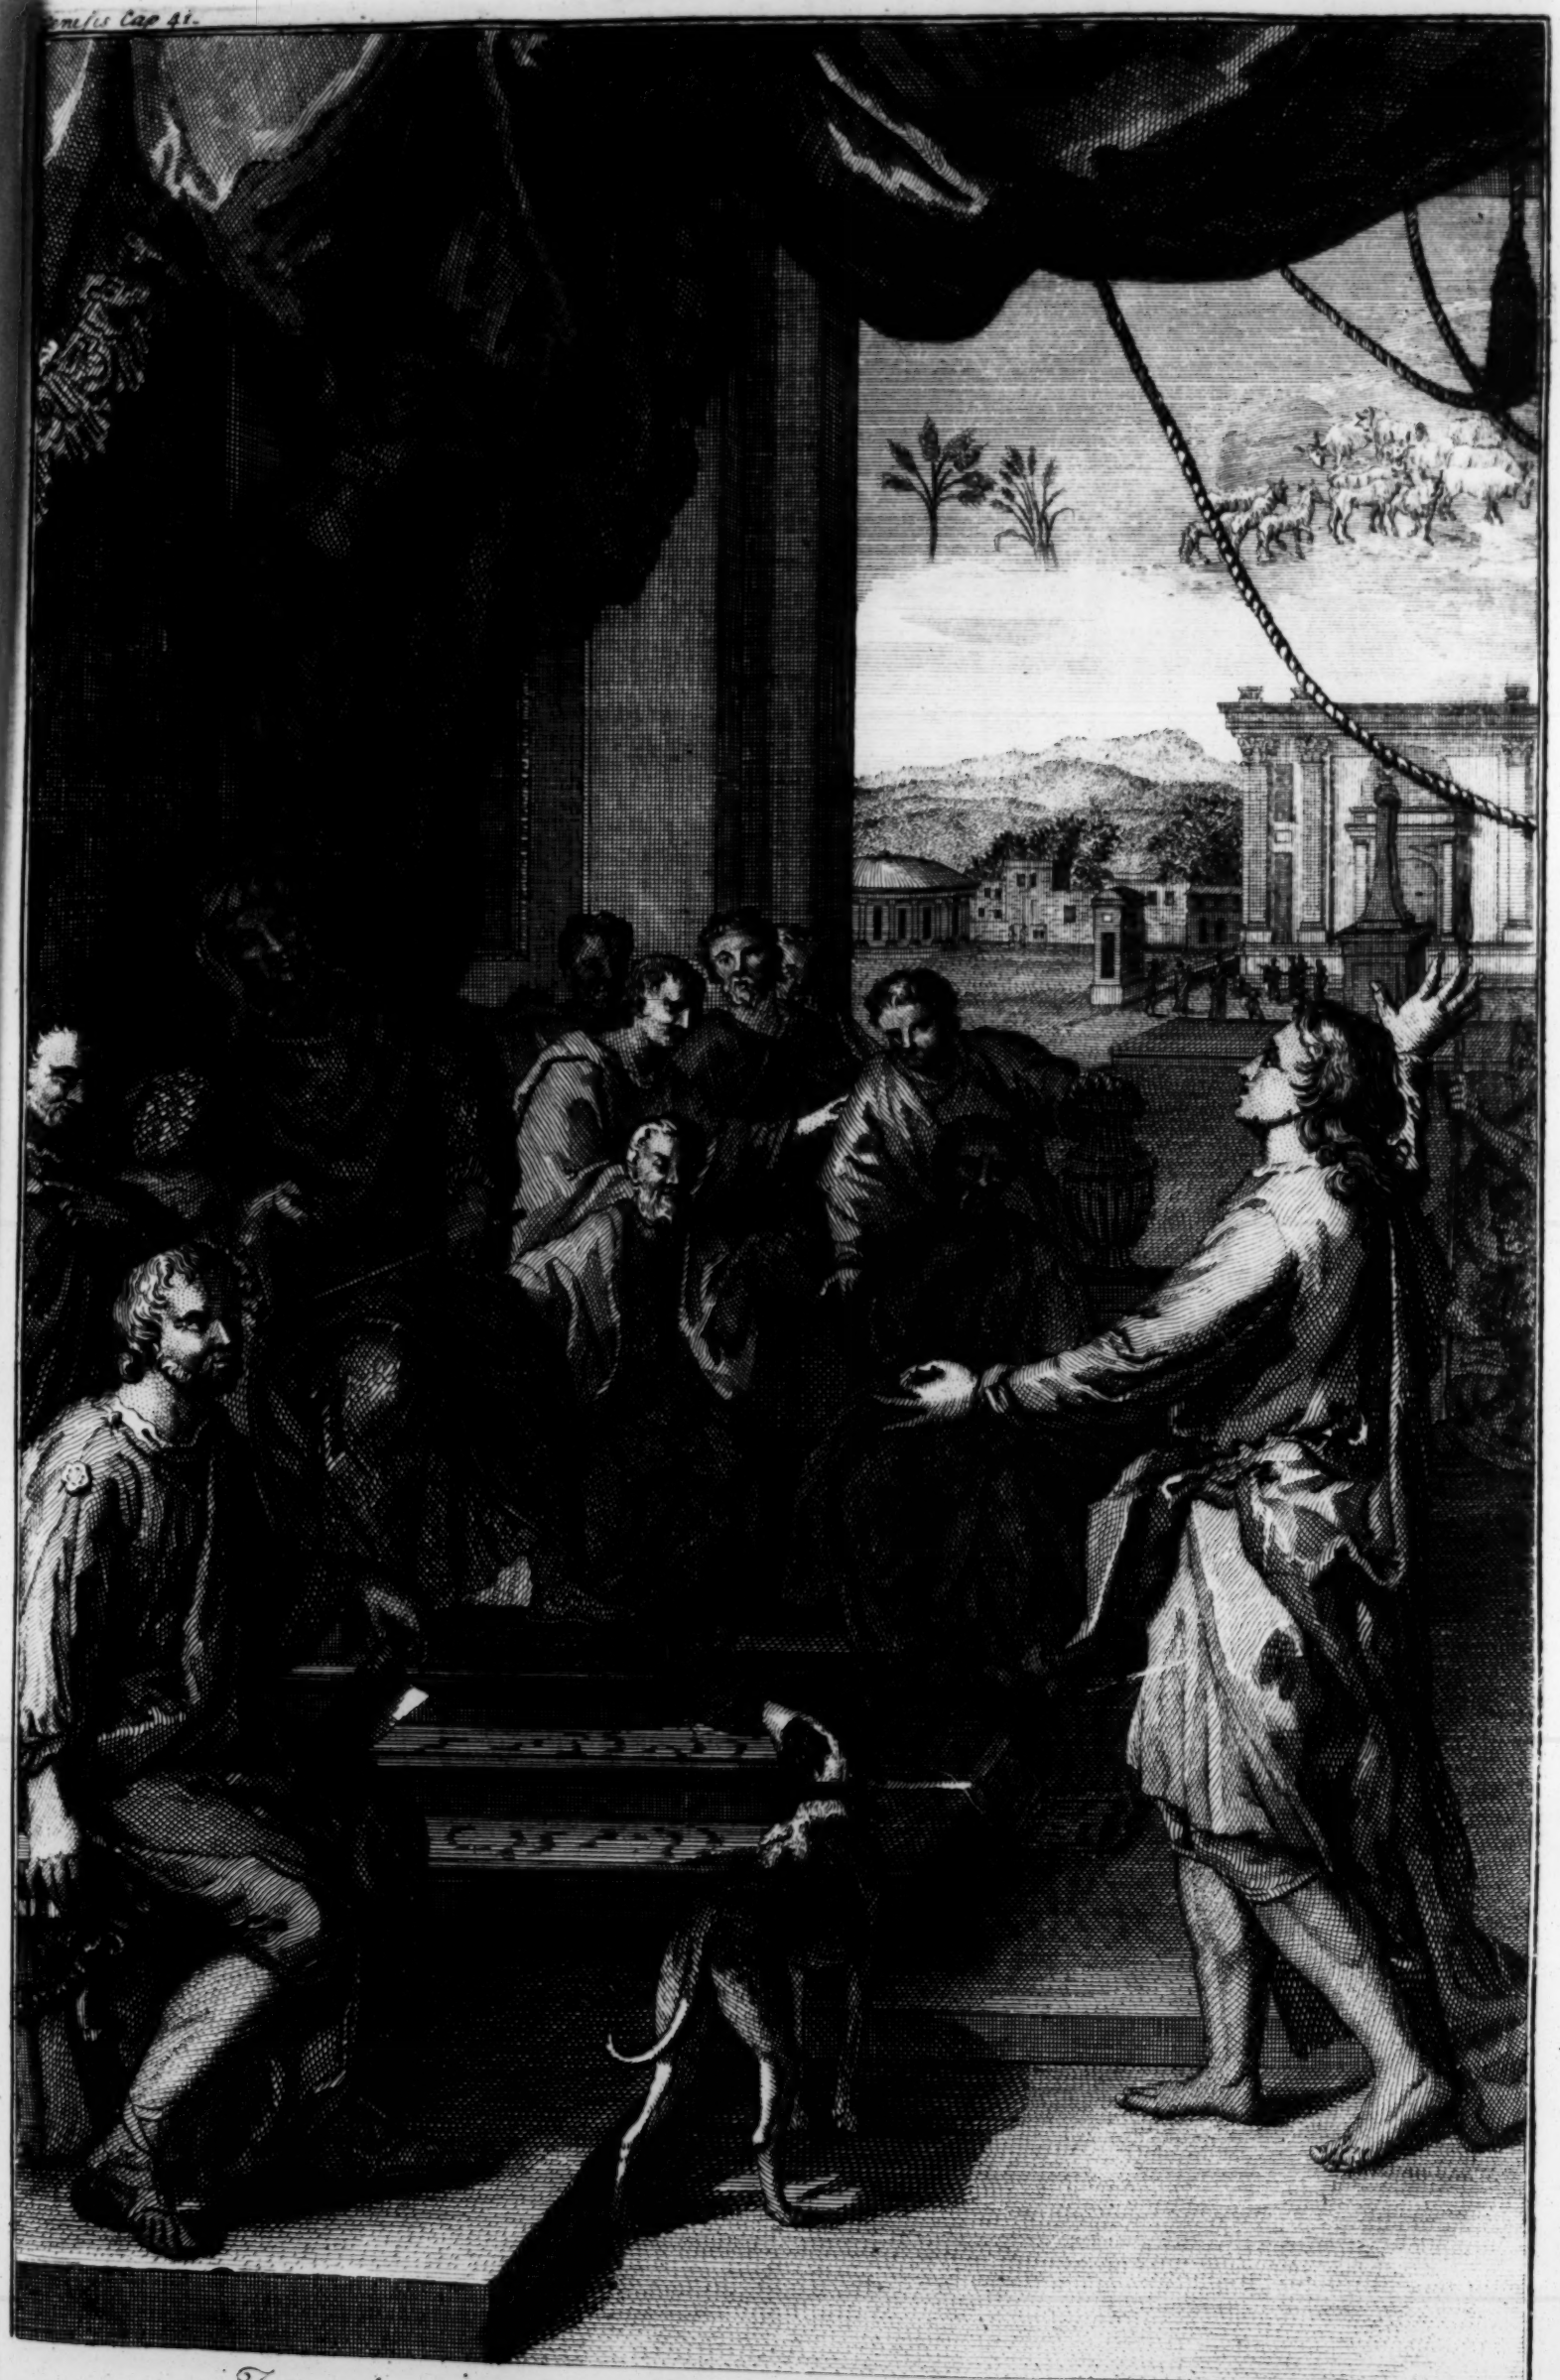
27 And the ſeven thin and ill-favoured kine



Joseph explains Pharaoh's Dream to him.

kine that came up after them, are seven years: and the seven empty ears blasted with the east-wind, shall be seven years of famine.

28 This is the thing which I have spoken unto Pharaoh: What God is about to do, he sheweth unto Pharaoh.

29 Behold, there come seven years of great plenty, throughout all the land of Egypt.

30 And there shall arise after them seven years of famine, and all the plenty shall be forgotten in the land of Egypt: and the famine shall consume the land.

31 And the plenty shall not be known in the land, by reason of that famine following: for it shall be very grievous.

32 And for that the dream was doubled unto Pharaoh twice: it is because the thing is established by God, and God will shortly bring it to pass.

33 Now therefore let Pharaoh look out a man discreet and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt.

34 Let Pharaoh do this, and let him appoint officers over the land, and take up the fifth part of the land of Egypt in the seven plenteous years.

35 And let them gather all the food of those good years that come, and lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh, and let them keep food in the cities.

36 And that food shall be for store to the land, against the seven years of famine, which shall be in the land of Egypt; that the land perish not through the famine.

37 ¶ And the thing was good in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of all his servants.

38 And Pharaoh said unto his servants, Can we find such a one as this is, a man in whom the spirit of God is?

39 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Forasmuch as God hath shewed thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art.

40 Thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled, only in the throne will I be greater than thou.

41 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, See, I have set thee over all the land of Egypt.

42 And Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand, and put it upon Josephs hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck.

43 And he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, Bow the knee: and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt.

44 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I am Pharaoh, and without thee shall no man lift up his hand or foot in all the land of Egypt.

45 And Pharaoh called Josephs name Zaphnath-paaneah; and he gave him to wife Asenath the daughter of Poti-pherah priest of On: and Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt.

46 ¶ And Joseph was thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh king of Egypt: and Joseph went out from the presence of Pharaoh, and went throughout all the land of Egypt.

47 And in the seven plenteous years the earth brought forth by handfuls.

48 And he gathered up all the food of the seven years, which were in the land of Egypt, and laid up the food in the cities: the food of the field which was round about every city, laid he up in the same.

49 And Joseph gathered corn as the sand of the sea, very much, until he left numbring: for it was without number.

50 And unto Joseph were born two sons before the years of famine came: which Asenath the daughter of Poti-pherah priest of On, bare unto him.

51 And Joseph called the name of the first-born Manasseh: for God, said he, hath made me forget all my toil, and all my fathers house.

52 And the name of the second called he Ephraim: for God hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction.

53 ¶ And the seven years of plenteousness that was in the land of Egypt, were ended.

54 And the seven years of dearth began to come, according as Joseph had said: and the dearth was in all lands; but in all the land of Egypt there was bread.

55 And when all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried to Pharaoh for bread; and Pharaoh said unto all the Egyptians, Go unto Joseph; what he saith to you, do.

56 And the famine was over all the face of the earth: and Joseph opened all the store-houses, and sold unto the Egyptians; and the famine waxed sore in the land of Egypt.

57 And all countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy corn; because that the famine was so sore in all lands.

Ver. 1. And it came to paſs at the end of two full years, that Pharaoh dreamed, &c.] It is not certain whether this Epocha of two years is to be reckoned from the beginning of Joſeph's impriſonment, or from the chief butler's releaſe, but we are inclin'd to think it relates to the latter, becauſe it is immediately connected with that event.

Ver. 2. And behold there came up out of the river.] This is a moſt apt and lively figure, repreſenting things exactly conformable to the ſtate of that country; which was enriched by the over-flowing of the Nile; and without which the beaſts would have had no graſs to feed, much leſs to fatten them.

Well-favoured kine, &c.] Or oxen, by whoſe labours the fields being ploughed, and all the affairs of husbandry managed, their fatneſs was a proper indication of fertility, as their leanneſs was of famine.

Ver. 3. And behold, ſeven other kine came up after them out of the river, ill-favoured and lean-fleſhed; and ſtood by the other kine upon the brink of the river.] By the leanneſs of theſe kine, who likewiſe aſcended from the Nile, the deficiency of that river in its future inundations was finely repreſented, and conſequently the famine that uſually ſucceeded thoſe ſcanty over-flowings The immediate ſucceſſion likewiſe of a dearth to the fertility denoted by the fat kine, was ſtrongly intimated by the lean kine ſtanding near the other. The ill-favoured cattel alſo ſtood upon the brink of the river, and did not feed in a meadow like the former, which was an evident ſign that the river had not over-flowed at all, or to a very moderate degree, and that the lean oxen were therefore obliged to continue on the edge of the ſtream, ſince they could have no other food than the flags which ſprung up there.

Ver. 6. And behold ſeven thin ears, and blaſted with the eaſt wind, &c.] To this wind, which the Hebrews call Kadim, is aſcribed in Scripture, all the miſchief that was done to corn or fruit; by blaſting, mildews, locuſts, and other noxious caſualties; and this wind was more pernicious in Egypt, than in other countries, becauſe it came over the vaſt deſarts of Arabia.

Ver. 7. ——— and Pharaoh awoke, and behold it was a dream.] Or behold the dream continually preſented it ſelf to his thoughts, and render'd him incapable of employing them on any other ſubject. This evinced it to be one of thoſe dreams which the Greeks called Θεόπεμπα, ſent from God.

Ver. 8. ——— And he ſent and called for all the magicians of Egypt, and all the wiſe men thereof, &c.] Pharaoh ſummoned on this occaſion, all thoſe perſons who were likely to give him a ſatisfactory interpretation of his dreams. The Hebrew word for magicians, had a bad ſignification in after-times, but what kind of men they were in the days of Joſeph, is uncertain. The learned Fuller thinks the Hebrew word Chartummim imports, ſuch as divined by certain ſuperſtitious characters, pictures, images, and figures, which they engraved with magical rites and ceremonies.

But there was none that could interpret them.] Either they were amazed, and did not attempt an expoſition, finding the dream beyond their penetration, or what they ſaid gave no ſatisfaction to the king. The ſeven kine, and the ſeven ears, might probably be thought by them to contain ſome great myſtery; if the worſhip of the planets were then eſtabliſhed among them. Theſe were addreſſed to with ſecret or unutterable invocations, Κλήσεσι ἀφθέγκτοις, as the oracle mentioned by Porphyry, declares, and which, according to the ſame oracle, were invented by that moſt excellent of all magicians, the king of the ſeven ſounds, whom all men know, i. e. Oſtanes, or Hoſtanes.

——— Ὃς εὗρε Μάγων ὀχ' ἄριστος
Ἐπταφθόγγου βασιλεὺς ὃν πάντες ἴσασιν

By which ſeven ſounds, of which he was the inventor, and governor, Mr. Selden thinks is meant the harmony, which the ancients imagined to be made by the ſeven planets.

Ver. 9. Then ſpake the chief butler unto Pharaoh, ſaying, I do remember my faults this day.] He thought it juſt to make this acknowledgment of his ingratitude, after which he acquainted the king, with his paſt experience of the wiſdom and abilities of Joſeph, and repreſented him as the moſt proper perſon to give a ſatisfactory ſolution of Pharaoh's myſterious dream.

Ver. 14. Then Pharaoh ſent and called Joſeph, and they brought him haſtily out of the dungeon: and he ſhaved himſelf and changed his raiment, and came in unto Pharaoh.] It is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that tho' Joſeph was thrown into the dungeon when he was firſt impriſoned, he did not continue there, when he was entruſted with the care of the priſoners, and perform'd all the offices of the keeper. Moſes, therefore, may be preſum'd to mean, that they brought him out of the priſon, where he had been, for ſome time, in the dungeon.

Joſeph made the neceſſary preparations for appearing in a decent condition before the king, for the delicacy of the Egyptian monarchs was ſo great, that it would not permit them to caſt their eyes on any diſagreeable object.

Ver. 16. And Joſeph anſwered Pharaoh, ſaying, It is not in me: God ſhall give Pharaoh an anſwer of peace.] Joſeph immediately reminded that prince of a maxim not unknown to the Egyptians before, viz. that the gift of divination proceeded from God alone; and having thus made an acknowledgment to heaven for the light he had receiv'd from thence, he proceeded to an admirable explanation of the dreams, whoſe emblems, as we before obſerved, were perfectly adapted to the events prefigured by them.

Ver. 33. Now therefore let Pharaoh look out a man diſcreet and wiſe, &c.] Joſeph was not content with foretelling theſe events to Pharaoh, which were predicted by his dream, but he alſo imparted to him the proper expedients for ſoftening the diſtreſs of the ſeven years of famine, by the fertility of the firſt ſeven years.

Ver. 34. Let Pharaoh do this, and let him appoint officers over the land, and take up the fifth part of the land of Egypt, in the ſeven plenteous years.] Ten parts being the tribute due to kings, in many countries, and probably in Egypt, Pharaoh was adviſed by Joſeph, to double this charge, in the years of extraordinary plenty, when the fifth part would not be a more burthenſome taxation to the ſubject, than the tenth, in years of moderate fertility.

Ver. 37. And the thing was good in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of all his ſervants.] Perhaps ſome perſons may be ſurpriz'd, that Pharaoh and his miniſters ſhould ſo readily credit the predictions of a young man, who had been charg'd, ſome time ago, with a very criminal action; but all ſcruples of this nature may be eaſily ſatisfied, by conſidering, that Joſeph had ſufficiently vindicated his innocence, in the opinion of the keeper of the priſon, whoſe affection for him might make him deſirous of propagating the ſame conviction in the officers of Pharaoh's court. It was likewiſe known, that Joſeph had already interpreted dreams exactly conformable to the ſucceeding events, in two remarkable inſtances which the chief butler had related, and atteſted: Beſides which, his expoſition of the emblematical figures in Pharaoh's dreams, was ſo natural, that it could not but create an immediate belief, tho' he had never expounded any dream before. And, above all, it is to be conſider'd, that God, who imparted thoſe dreams to the king, and caus'd them to affect him with ſtrong impreſſions, diſpos'd his mind, alſo, to approve the interpretation with a full conviction of its truth.

Ver. 38. And Pharaoh ſaid unto his ſervants, Can we find ſuch a one as this is, a man in whom the ſpirit of God is?] Pharaoh did not only reſtore Joſeph to his liberty, but, likewiſe, advanc'd him to the higheſt offices in the kingdom, and commanded the Egyptians to conſider him as the deliverer of their country. He bore witneſs to him, that he was endued with a wiſdom that tranſcended all human attainments, and that he was a man in whom the ſpirit of the gods reſided. The king gave Joſeph the ſuperintendency, not only over the royal palace, but over all Egypt.

Ver. 42. And Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand, and put it upon Joſeph's hand, and arrayed him in veſtures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck.] Pharaoh having devolv'd on Joſeph a real and effective power, beſtow'd upon him all the ſymbols and external marks of that gift. The ring, the veſtures of fine linnen, and the golden chain, were ſo many enſigns of the great dignity to which he was promoted by that monarch.

Ver. 43. And he made him to ride in the ſecond chariot which he had, and they cried before him, Bow the knee, and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt.] The grateful king commanded Joſeph to be proclaim'd the deliverer of Egypt, and this proclamation to be attended with the moſt pompous and ſolemn ceremonies. He caus'd him to be carried in the ſecond royal chariot, and order'd the attendants to cry before him, abrech, which we tranſlate bow the knee; deriving it from the Hebrew word barach, which hath that ſignification. Others will have it to ſignify, the father of the king; for the Hebrew word ab, denotes a father; rach is a Syrian word, importing, a king, and from which ſome criticks derive the Latin Rex. This interpretation is agreeable to what Joſeph himſelf afterwards declar'd to his brethren; God has made me a father to Pharaoh.

and

Ver. 45. And Pharaoh called Joſeph's name Zaphnath-paaneah.] This is not a Hebrew name, as ſome Rabbies imagine; for tho' the firſt word may be deriv'd from zaphan, to hide; yet the original of paaneah is not to be found in the Hebrew. St. Jerome, and others, think it ſignifies the Saviour of the world, in the Egyptian tongue; but it is moſt probable, that it ſignifies a finder-out of hidden things; and is ſo reader'd by moſt Jewiſh and Chriſtian expoſitors.

——And he gave him to wife Aſenath, the daughter of Poti-pherah, prieſt of On.] As it is not probable that Joſeph ſhould have become ſo compleat a courtier in that ſhort time, as to have loſt the remembrance of his religion, eſpecially ſince he made ſo ample a profeſſion of it to his brothers, ſeven years after his marriage, chap. xlii. 18. ſo neither is it probable that he would have eſpouſed the daughter of an uncircumciſed perſon, whether prince or prieſt. Potipherah could not but be deſirous of purchaſing ſo advantageous an alliance upon any terms, and therefore might eaſily be induc'd, by Joſeph, to remove the only obſtacle, by ſubmitting to circumciſion. It muſt, at leaſt, be granted, that Joſeph had now a moſt favourable opportunity to introduce that ceremony among the Egyptian prieſts, from whom it might afterwards be tranſmitted to the laity.

The city of On, mention'd in this verſe, was Heliopolis, the chief city of the canton of that name, call'd, by Ptolemy, Onium, diſtant about twenty miles from Memphis, the metropolis of Egypt.

We are not, with St. Jerome, to confound the prieſt Potipherah, with the Potiphar to whom Joſeph was ſold; ſince they were certainly diſtinct perſons. 1. Becauſe the names are differently written. 2. The one is call'd captain of the guards, the other prieſt, or prince of On. 3. The former, therefore, muſt have his reſidence in the capital, to be always near the perſon of the king; the other was oblig'd, by his function, to live at Heliopolis.

Ver. 46. And Joſeph was thirty years old, when he ſtood before Pharaoh king of Egypt.] He had therefore been abſent from his own country thirteen years, for he was but ſeventeen, when he was ſold into Egypt. This obſervation would be of great uſe in the chronology of the patriarchs, if it could be proved, that the years of plenty did commence immediately after his exaltation to the greateſt dignities of Egypt. But tho' this ſuppoſition has been entertained almoſt unanimouſly by the commentators, as a principle not to be conteſted, it is yet attended with great difficulties; and it is much more probable, that there was ſome interval between theſe two periods, as we have formerly hinted. If the ſilence of the Scripture, with relation to the length of that interval, diſables us from ſolving ſome chronological queſtions, it ſhould alſo be allowed to ſilence ſome difficulties which can have no weight, as long as we are ignorant of the quantity of time that paſſed, between the advancement of Joſeph, and the years of plenty.

——And Joſeph went out from the preſence of Pharaoh, and went throughout all the land of Egypt.] Joſeph, in this progreſs, made an exact ſurvey of the Egyptian provinces, which enabled him to compute what number of officers was neceſſary for collecting the corn, which was to be laid up, and what magazines were requiſite, in order to contain it; and agreeably to theſe wiſe precautions, the great hiſtorian informs us, that Joſeph appointed cities in all parts of Egypt, into which the grain was to be conveyed from the circumjacent country, to be depoſited in the granaries that were built and filled by his order, during the ſeven years of exuberant plenty.

The exact accompliſhments of Joſeph's predictions, muſt certainly have raiſed his character exceedingly among the Egyptians, whom we may ſuppoſe to have been well acquainted with his interpretation of Pharaoh's dream.

During theſe tranſactions, Joſeph had two ſons born of his wife Aſenath, the firſt of whom he called Manaſſeh, intimating, that God had made him forget all his toils; and the next he called Ephraim, importing, that God had rendered him fruitful in the land of his afflictions.

Ver. 54. And the ſeven years of dearth began to come, according as Joſeph had ſaid, and the dearth was in all lands, &c.] The ſeven plentiful years were immediately ſucceeded by the ſeven of ſcarcity, which was not confined to the land of Egypt, but extended over all the country of Canaan and the regions around it. Aſſoon therefore as the Egyptians began to be diſtreſſed for want of bread, they addreſſed themſelves for relief to Pharaoh; who commanded them to make their application to Joſeph, upon which he immediately ordered his magazines to be opened, and corn to be ſold to the people, who reſorted to him in vaſt numbers, not only from all parts of Egypt, but likewiſe from all the adjacent countries.

The deſire of attaining wealth might, poſſibly, prevail on many of the Egyptian merchants, to part with this precious commodity, from the deluſive hope of the famine's being leſs ſevere, or of a ſhorter duration than Joſeph had predicted. Thoſe who are well acquainted with human nature, and know into what extreams mankind are daily precipitated by the thirſt of gain, will not think this conjecture improbable, eſpecially if they compare it with the ſacred text, and obſerve, within how ſhort a time the people of Egypt became as deſtitute and neceſſitous as their neighbours.

Tho' an hiſtorian, inſpired by God, needs not the teſtimony of authors, who are only guided by human prudence, yet it is not altogether unprofitable to read thoſe paſſages of prophane hiſtory which concur, in ſome particulars, with the ſacred records. We ſhall therefore conclude our obſervations on this chapter, with a remarkable paſſage extracted from Juſtin, a heathen author, who abridged the hiſtory of Trogus Pompeius. His words are theſe. "Joſeph, the youngeſt of his brethren, had a ſuperiority "of genius, which made them fear him, and which in- "duced them to ſell him to foreign merchants, who car- "ried him into Egypt, where he practiſed the magic art, "with a ſucceſs that rendered him very dear to the king. "He had a great ſagacity in the explanation of prodigies "and dreams; there was nothing ſo abſtruſe, either in di- "vine or human things, to which he did not attain, ſo "far, that he foretold a great dearth before it happened. "Egypt had periſhed by famine, if Joſeph had not adviſed "the king to publiſh a decree, whereby the people were "ordered to make proviſions for ſeveral years. His know- "ledge was ſo great, that the Egyptians hearkened to the "prophecies delivered by him, as if they did not proceed "from man, but from God himſelf. Juſtin. L. xxxvi. "cap. ii. N. 6. p. 426."

CHAP. XLII.

1 Jacob ſendeth his ten ſons to buy corn in Egypt: 6 They are impriſoned by Joſeph for ſpies: 18 They are ſet at liberty, on condition to bring Benjamin: 21 They have remorſe for Joſeph: 24 Simeon is kept for a pledge: 25 They return with corn, and their money: 29 Their relation to Jacob. 36 Jacob refuſeth to ſend Benjamin.

NOW when Jacob ſaw that there was corn in Egypt, Jacob ſaid unto his ſons, Why do ye look one upon another?

2 And he ſaid, Behold, I have heard that there is corn in Egypt: get you down thither, and buy for us from thence; that we may live, and not die.

3 ¶ And Joſephs ten brethren went down to buy corn in Egypt.

4 But Benjamin, Joſephs brother, Jacob ſent not with his brethren: for he ſaid, Leſt peradventure miſchief befal him.

5 And the ſons of Iſrael came to buy corn among thoſe that came: for the famine was in the land of Canaan.

6 And Joſeph was the governour over the land, and he it was that ſold to all the people of the land: and Joſephs brethren came, and bowed down themſelves before him, with their faces to the earth.

7 And Joſeph ſaw his brethren, and he knew them, but made himſelf ſtrange unto them, and ſpake roughly unto them; and he ſaid unto them, Whence come ye? And they ſaid, From the land of Canaan to buy food.

8 And Joſeph knew his brethren, but they knew not him.

9 And Joſeph remembred the dreams which he dreamed of them, and ſaid unto them, Ye are ſpies; to ſee the nakedneſs of the land you are come.

10 And they ſaid unto him, Nay, my lord, but to buy food are thy ſervants come.

11 We are all one mans ſons: we are true men, thy ſervants are no ſpies.

12 And he ſaid unto them, Nay, but to ſee the nakedneſs of the land you are come.

13 And they ſaid, Thy ſervants are twelve brethren, the ſons of one man in the land of Canaan; and behold, the youngeſt is this day with our father, and one is not.

14 And Joſeph ſaid unto them, That is it that I ſpake unto you, ſaying, Ye are ſpies.

15 Hereby ye ſhall be proved: by the life of Pharaoh ye ſhall not go forth hence, except your youngeſt brother come hither.

16 Send one of you, and let him fetch your brother, and ye ſhall be kept in priſon, that your words may be proved, whether there be any truth in you: or elſe by the life of Pharaoh ſurely ye are ſpies.

17 And he put them altogether into ward, three days.

18 And Joſeph ſaid unto them the third day, This do, and live: for I fear God.

19 If ye be true men, let one of your brethren be bound in the houſe of your priſon: go ye, carry corn for the famine of your houſes.

20 But bring your youngeſt brother unto me; ſo ſhall your words be verified, and ye ſhall not die. And they did ſo.

21 ¶ And they ſaid one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we ſaw the anguiſh of his ſoul, when he beſought us; and we would not hear: therefore is this diſtreſs come upon us.

22 And Reuben anſwered them, ſaying, Spake I not unto you, ſaying, Do not ſin againſt the child; and ye would not hear? therefore behold alſo his blood is required.

23 And they knew not that Joſeph underſtood them; for he ſpake unto them by an interpreter.

24 And he turned himſelf about from them, and wept; and returned to them again, and communed with them, and took from them Simeon, and bound him before their eyes.

25 ¶ Then Joſeph commanded to fill their ſacks with corn, and to reſtore every mans money into his ſack, and to give them proviſion for the way: and thus did he unto them.

26 And they laded their aſſes with the corn, and departed thence.

27 And as one of them opened his ſack to give his aſs provender in the inn, he eſpied his money: for behold it was in his ſacks mouth.

28 And he ſaid unto his brethren, My money is reſtored; and lo, it is even in my ſack: and their heart failed them, and they were afraid, ſaying one to another, What is this that God hath done unto us?

29 ¶ And they came unto Jacob their father, unto the land of Canaan, and told him all that befel unto them, ſaying,

30 The man who is the lord of the land ſpake roughly to us, and took us for ſpies of the country.

31 And we ſaid unto him, We are true men; we are no ſpies.

32 We be twelve brethren, ſons of our father: one is not, and the youngeſt is this day with our father in the land of Canaan.

33 And the man the lord of the country ſaid unto us, Hereby ſhall I know that ye are true men; leave one of your brethren here with me, and take food for the famine of your houſholds, and be gone.

34 And bring your youngeſt brother unto me: then ſhall I know that you are no ſpies, but that you are true men; ſo will I deliver you your brother, and ye ſhall traffick in the land.

35 ¶ And it came to paſs as they emptied tied their ſacks, that behold, every mans bundle of money was in his ſack: and when both they and their father ſaw the bundles of money, they were afraid.

36 And Jacob their father ſaid unto them, Me have ye bereaved of my children: Joſeph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away: all theſe things are againſt me.

37 And Reuben ſpake unto his father, ſaying, Slay my two ſons, if I bring him not to thee: deliver him into my hand, and I will bring him to thee again.

38 And he ſaid, My ſon ſhall not go down with you: for his brother is dead, and he is left alone; if miſchief befall him by the way in the which ye go, then ſhall ye bring down my gray hairs with ſorrow to the grave.

Ver. 1. And when Jacob ſaw that there was corn in Egypt, &c.] We have already obſerved, that the famine foretold by Joſeph, did not afflict Egypt alone; it extended even to Canaan where Iſrael and his family dwelt. Moſes acquaints us, that the patriarch knew there was corn in Egypt. It has been thought ſurprizing by ſome, that he ſhould be ignorant how it happened; and that the name of a man who declared himſelf to be an Hebrew, chap. xli. 12. and who, from a priſon, was exalted to ſo much grandeur, did not excite ſome ſuſpicion in his mind concerning Joſeph; but thoſe perſons who are ſo apt to wonder at every thing they dont underſtand, would have found very little cauſe for their aſtoniſhment, if they had recollected that Iſrael was firmly perſuaded of Joſeph's death, by ſeeing the bloody coat of many colours; and that, in thoſe early times, the tranſactions in one country were not tranſmitted to another, by ſuch methods of conveying intelligence, as are now practiſed.

Jacob ſaid unto his ſons, why do ye look one upon another? Why is there nothing viſible among you but ſadneſs and conſternation? According to the gloſs of the Hebrew doctors, and which very well explains the nature of the original expreſſion. Some have been very inquiſitive, how Jacob came to know, before his ſons, that there was corn in Egypt? The text will inform them that he was told ſo, ver. 2. But from whom did he receive this information? reply theſe curious perſons. Probably from ſome Canaanite, who had already been in Egypt to purchaſe that food, or he might have heard it from ſome of the merchants who maintained a correſpondence in that country.

Ver. 3. And Joſeph's ten brethren went down to buy corn in Egypt.] All Jacob's ſons, except Benjamin, departed from Hebron to purchaſe food for the family: He remained with his father, to comfort the good old man, who had transferred an extraordinary meaſure of his affection to him, as the only ſurviving ſon of his beloved wife Rachel, and as the brother of his darling Joſeph, whom he imagined was ſlain, by a wild beaſt. Perhaps ſome perſons may be at a loſs to apprehend, how Jacob and his houſehold, and all the families of his ſons were ſubſiſted, during the abſence of thoſe who went to purchaſe corn for them; It may be neceſſary therefore to obſerve, that Memphis, the capital of Egypt, was not diſtant above eighty miles ſouth, from Iſrael's ſettlement at Hebron. The brethren of Joſeph, therefore, might eaſily have accompliſhed their affair in Egypt, and have returned to their father in a very few days.

Ver. 7. And Joſeph ſaw his brethren, and he knew them, but made himſelf ſtrange unto them, and ſpake roughly unto them, &c.] The whole conduct of Joſeph, from his firſt arrival in Egypt, to his diſcovering himſelf to his brethren, having been very much canvaſſed and diſapproved by many perſons; it will not be amiſs to enquire how far it deſerves their cenſure, and to what particular vindication it may juſtly be entitled. Firſt then, he is condemned for not acquainting his aged father with his condition, ſince the tender patriarch would have redeemed him from his firſt ſervitude at any rate: But to this it may be anſwered, that if he had returned home, his brethren, in all probability, would have taken a more effectual method to deſtroy him, than they had practiſed before; and Secondly, that Egypt being the place where he expected the preferment that had been indicated to him by his former dreams, it was by no means adviſeable for him to leave it, but to wait patiently there for the event. He is again blamed for his uncourteous behaviour to his brethren, when they were firſt introduced into his preſence, and which, it is pretended, diſcovers a ſtrong tincture of a very revengeful diſpoſition; but it is evident, that if vengeance had been the motive of his conduct to them, he might have indulged it in a more effectual manner, and without incurring any danger of being called to an account for his ſeverity: Whereas it is apparent, that he had a much nobler deſign in view: namely either to affect them with a religious compunction for their barbarity to him, as he afterwards actually did, or, 2. In order to inform himſelf of the welfare of his aged father and family, or laſtly to give them a better reliſh of his future kindneſs, by infuſing a few preparatory and innocent terrors into their minds. The laſt, and indeed the moſt conſiderable inſtance of his conduct, for which he is cenſured, is his ſending for his brother Benjamin, which he was ſenſible would afflict his father beyond expreſſion, if not ſhorten his days; and that if he ſhould refuſe to ſend him into Egypt, the whole family muſt ſtarve for want of food, and Simeon remain in bonds. As to the latter part of the charge, Joſeph had it in his power to releaſe that brother from his confinement, when ever he pleaſed, ſhould the abſence of his other brethren be longer than ordinary; and he might have ſent Simeon home, with what meſſage he ſhould think proper: And as to his cauſing his father to paſs ſo many days, if not weeks, in all the painful anxiety that the abſence and imagined danger of ſo dear a ſon would create in his ſoul, it may be juſtified by ſuppoſing, that Joſeph perfectly foreſaw the events that would happen, and was ſenſible that his father's ſorrow for being deprived of Benjamin, a ſhort time, would be fully recompenſed by his joy to ſee him again, and which would likewiſe be greatly enhanſed by his beholding the advancement and proſperity of his dearer Joſeph whom he then numbered among the dead.

Ver. 11. And they ſaid unto him, nay my lord, but to buy food are thy ſervants come.] Joſeph having charged them with coming into Egypt as ſpies, to diſcover the nakedneſs of the land, the men vindicated themſelves with an artleſs ſimplicity peculiar to innocence. They repreſented themſelves to be the ten ſons of one father who was then living, by which they would intimate, that it was not probable, that an aged parent would ſuffer ſo many of his children to undertake ſo dangerous a province, as that of ſpies.

Ver. 14. And Joſeph ſaid unto them, that is it that I ſpake unto you ſaying, &c.] Joſeph having learnt, by the anſwer of his brethren, that Jacob and Benjamin were ſtill living, accompliſhed one part of the deſign he propoſed by his conduct; but he carried on the feint, that his ſatisfaction might be as compleat as poſſible. His anſwer to them was as if he had ſaid, the weakneſs of the proofs you alledge in favour of your innocence, tend rather to increaſe than diſſipate my ſuſpicions. Let one of you therefore return to Canaan, in order to bring your younger brother to me, which is the only demonſtration you can give me of your not being guilty of the crime I lay to your charge. But if you refuſe to comply with my orders in this particular. By the life of Pharaoh, that refuſal will convince me that you are ſpies.

This affirmation, by the life of Pharaoh, has induced ſome commentators to ſuſpect, that Joſeph ſwore by that prince, in ſuch a manner as to pay that homage to him which is only due to the ſupreme God. But an oath is to be conſidered as an act of religion, only when it attributes to the perſon by whom it is made, the perfections of the deity. By this expreſſion therefore is to be underſtood, as ſure as Pharaoh lives, or ſo let Pharaoh be ſafe and in health, as I will detain you here till I ſee your younger brother. Others expound it, If Pharaoh have any authority here, it muſt be acknowledged indeed, that the generality of authors, who have attempted to explain this paſſage, repreſent repreſent it as an oath; the original of which is well explain'd by Mr. Selden, in his Titles of honour, p. 45. Where he obſerves, that the name of gods being given to kings very early, δι' ἀρετῆς ὑπερβολήν, as Ariſtotle declares, l. vi. Ethic. c. 1. from the excellence of their heroic virtue, which render'd them great benefactors to mankind: Thence aroſe the cuſtom of ſwearing by them; which Aben Ezra ſays continu'd in his time, about 1170. when Egypt was govern'd by Khalifahs. If any man ſwore by the king's head, and was detected in falſhood, he was puniſh'd capitally. And when Sophi Iſmael obtain'd the Perſian empire, no oath was deem'd ſo ſacred, according to Leunclavius, as to ſwear by his head, which, in effect, was to ſwear by his life.

St. Baſil, however, contends, that this expreſſion of Joſeph was not an oath, properly ſo called, but a ſolemn aſſeveration, to induce belief. For ſaith he, Tom. 1. Hom. in Pſal. xv. p. 155. Εἰσι τινες λόγοι σχήματα μὴ ὅρκων ἔχοντες, οὐχ ὅρκοι ὄντες. There are ſome ſpeeches which have the form, or ſimilitude of oaths, which in reality are not ſuch; but διαπαίσα πρὸς τὰς ἀκροάσεις, expreſſions that miniſter to the perſuaſion of the auditors. Such he conceives this to have been; and likewiſe that of St. Paul, Νὴ τὴν ὑμετέραν καύχησιν, By our rejoicing, 1 Cor. xv. 31 Where, ſaith he, the Apoſtle was not unmindful of the Evangelical commandment, not to ſwear; but by an expreſſion, in the form of an oath, he would have them believe, that his glorying in them, or rather in Chriſt, was dearer to him, than any other ſatisfaction. And the truth is, Judah ſeems to have taken thoſe words of Joſeph only for a ſolemn proteſtation, ch. xliii. 3. wherein he expoſed the life of Pharaoh, which was exceeding dear to him, to execration, if he did not act as he had ſaid. So G. Calixtus likewiſe underſtands it.

Ver. 21. And they ſaid one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we ſaw the anguiſh of his ſoul, when he beſought us, and we would not hear: therefore is this diſtreſs come upon us.] The ſevere expreſſions, and conduct of Joſeph, awakened in their conſcience the remembrance of their barbarity to their brother; and they ſaid one to another, in the preſence of Joſeph himſelf, by whom they did not imagine they were underſtood, becauſe he converſed with them by an interpreter, that the rigid treatment they then ſuſtained, was a juſt puniſhment for their inexorable behaviour to their brother. Theſe expoſtulations were ſo many daggers piercing the ſoul of Joſeph: His tenderneſs overcame him, and his mind was agitated by an irreſiſtable anguiſh. He retired into an apartment, to give a free vent to thoſe tears that were ready to flow; and when he returned to his brethren, he haſten'd them back to Canaan.

Ver. 24. And took from them Simeon, and bound him before their eyes.] The Hebrews ſay, that Simeon was the perſon who caſt Joſeph into the pit, and therefore met with this retaliation of his inhumanity. Perhaps Joſeph might ſelect him from the reſt of his brethren, becauſe he was a man of a ſavage and impetuous diſpoſition, as appear'd by his cruelty to the Shechemites.

Ver. 29. And they came unto Jacob their father, &c.] They acquainted their father, at their return, with all the ſurpriſing circumſtances of their journey; but that which moſt affected the good old man, was the detention of Simeon. Reuben endeavoured to moderate his affliction on that account. Truſt, ſaid he, young Benjamin to my care, and I myſelf will preſent him to the man who governs all Egypt, and he will reſtore our brother Simeon to his liberty, when he finds we have acted ſincerely by him. But if you are ſtill apprehenſive for Benjamin, whom you love ſo tenderly, I will leave my two ſons with you, as pledges for his ſecurity, and you yourſelf may take away their lives, if I fail to bring Benjamin back.

Reuben's propoſal made no impreſſion on Jacob, who could not prevail upon himſelf to loſe the ſight of his dear Benjamin for a moment. The anſwer of this good patriarch cannot be repreſented in a more pathetic manner, than it is already related by Moſes, that great maſter of the paſſions. My ſon, ſays the afflicted old man, ſhall not go down with you: for his brother is dead, and he is left alone: if miſchief befall him by the way in which ye go, then ſhall ye bring down my grey hairs with ſorrow to the grave.

CHAP. XLIII.

1 Jacob is hardly perſuaded to ſend Benjamin, 15 Joſeph entertaineth his brethren: 31 He maketh them a feaſt.

AND the famine was ſore in the land.
2 And it came to paſs when they had eaten up the corn which they had brought out of Egypt, their father ſaid unto them, Go again, buy us a little food.

3 And Judah ſpake unto him, ſaying, The man did ſolemnly proteſt unto us, ſaying, Ye ſhall not ſee my face, except your brother be with you.

4 If thou wilt ſend our brother with us, we will go down, and buy thee food.

5 But if thou wilt not ſend him, we will not go down: for the man ſaid unto us, Ye ſhall not ſee my face, except your brother be with you.

6 And Iſrael ſaid, Wherefore deal't ye ſo ill with me, as to tell the man whether ye had yet a brother?

7 And they ſaid, The man aſked us ſtraitly of our ſtate, and of our kindred, ſaying, Is your father yet alive? Have ye another brother? And we told him according to the tenor of theſe words: Could we certainly know that he would ſay, Bring your brother down?

8 And Judah ſaid unto Iſrael his father, Send the lad with me, and we will ariſe and go; that we may live, and not die, both we and thou, and alſo our little ones.

9 I will be ſurety for him; of my hand ſhalt thou require him: if I bring him not unto thee, and ſet him before thee, then let me bear the blame for ever.

10 For except we had lingred, ſurely now we had returned this ſecond time.

11 And their father Iſrael ſaid unto them, If it muſt be ſo now, do this; take of the beſt fruits in the land in your veſſels, and carry down the man a preſent, a little balm, and a little honey, ſpices, and myrrh, nuts, and almonds.

12 And take double money in your hand; and the money that was brought again in the mouth of your ſacks, carry it again in your hand; peradventure it was an overſight.

13 Take alſo your brother, and ariſe, go again unto the man.

14 And God Almighty give you mercy before the man, that he may ſend away your other brother, and Benjamin: if I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved.

15 ¶ And

15 ¶ And the men took that preſent, and they took double money in their hand, and Benjamin; and roſe up, and went down to Egypt, and ſtood before Joſeph.

16 And when Joſeph ſaw Benjamin with them, he ſaid to the ruler of his houſe, Bring theſe men home, and ſlay, and make ready: for theſe men ſhall dine with me at noon.

17 And the man did as Joſeph bade: and the man brought the men into Joſephs houſe.

18 And the men were afraid, becauſe they were brought into Joſephs houſe, and they ſaid, Becauſe of the money that was returned in our ſacks at the firſt time, are we brought in; that he may ſeek occaſion againſt us, and fall upon us, and take us for bondmen, and our aſſes.

19 And they came near to the ſteward of Joſephs houſe, and they communed with him at the door of the houſe, 20 And ſaid, O ſir, we came indeed down at the firſt time to buy food.

21 And it came to paſs when we came to the inn, that we opened our ſacks, and behold, every mans money was in the mouth of his ſack, our money in full weight: and we have brought it again in our hand.

22 And other money have we brought down in our hands to buy food: we cannot tell who put our money in our ſacks.

23 And he ſaid, Peace be to you, fear not: your God, and the God of your father hath given you treaſure in your ſacks: I had your money. And he brought Simeon out unto them.

24 And the man brought the men into Joſephs houſe, and gave them water, and they waſhed their feet, and he gave their aſſes provender.

25 And they made ready the preſent againſt Joſeph came at noon: for they heard that they ſhould eat bread there.

26 ¶ And when Joſeph came home, they brought him the preſent which was in their hand into the houſe, and bowed themſelves to him to the earth.

27 And he asked them of their welfare, and ſaid, Is your father well, the old man of whom ye ſpake? is he yet alive?

28 And they anſwered, Thy ſervant our father is in good health, he is yet alive: and they bowed down their heads, and made obeiſance.

29 And he lift up his eyes, and ſaw his brother Benjamin, his mothers ſon, and ſaid, is this your younger brother, of whom ye ſpake unto me? And he ſaid, God be gracious unto thee, my ſon.

30 And Joſeph made haſte; for his bowels did yern upon his brother: and he ſought where to weep, and he entred into his chamber, and wept there.

31 And he waſhed his face, and went out, and refrained himſelf, and ſaid, Set on bread.

32 And they ſet on for him by himſelf, and for them by themſelves, and for the Egyptians, which did eat with him, by themſelves: becauſe the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews; for that is an abomination unto the Egyptians.

33 And they ſat before him, the firſt-born according to his birth-right, and the youngeſt according to his youth: and the men marvelled one at another.

34 And he took and ſent meſſes unto them from before him: but Benjamins meſs was five times ſo much as any of theirs. And they drank, and were merry with him.

Ver. 2. And it came to paſs, when they had eaten up the corn which they had brought up out of Egypt, their father ſaid unto them, Go again, by us a little food.] The increaſe of the famine, and the conſumption of the proviſion brought from Egypt, produced that effect, which paternal tenderneſs would not permit Jacob to think of at firſt, and he, at laſt, conſented that Benjamin ſhould accompany the reſt of his brethren into Egypt. He was ſenſible that the dearth which had ſpread ſo much deſolation through all the country around him, would infallibly be fatal to this dear ſon, as well as to himſelf and the reſt of the family, without a ſeaſonable prevention of that calamity, and was therefore induced to think, that if Benjamin muſt periſh, it ought not to be till his father had employed all poſſible means for his preſervation.

Ver. 3. And Judah ſpake unto him, ſaying, &c.] Reuben had already ſpoken to him in vain, chap. xlii. 37, 38. And Levi, perhaps had not yet recovered his intereſt in him, ſince the barbarous action at Shechem; Judah therefore, took upon him to perſuade his father, as being next in birth, and of no ſmall authority among his brethren.

Ver. 11. And their father Iſrael ſaid unto them, If it muſt be ſo now, do this, &c.] There are three remarkable points, in this ſpeech of Iſrael. Firſt, his prudence is obſervable, in conquering his tenderneſs for Benjamin; when he grew ſenſible how prejudicial it would otherwiſe prove to the reſt of his ſons, and their families; and in thinking of a preſent, for the ruler of Egypt, of the choiceſt productions the land of Canaan then afforded; which would be an evidence that the bearers of that preſent came from this country, ſince ſome of the materials, at leaſt, which compoſed it would bear that teſtimonial. Secondly, Iſrael's juſtice is manifeſted, by his commanding his ſons to carry back the money found in their ſacks, as well as another ſum for the quantity of corn they went to purchaſe. Thirdly, His moſt pathetic prayer for their ſafety, and his pious reſignation of his own will, to that Almighty God, fully demonſtrate the ſincere faith of the aged Iſrael, and his ſettled confidence, in the rock of his ſalvation.

As to the particular ingredients of the preſent, which Iſrael ordered to be prepared for the governour of Egypt, the Hebrew word mizzimrath, ſignifies, of the moſt praiſed; or, as Bochart more literally interprets it, quæ in hac terra ſunt maxima decantata, theſe fruits which are moſt celebrated in the land of Canaan; which was as famous for moſt of the productions comprehended in this preſent, as Egypt was for corn; and they might be now more acceptable in Egypt where they never grew. For Canaan being a hilly, and Egypt a low and level country, occaſion'd the produce of thoſe ſoils to be very different.

Take of the beſt fruits in the land in your veſſels, and carry down the man a preſent, a little balm, and a little honey, ſpices and myrrh, nuts and almonds.] It is to be ſuſpected, that the generality of our expoſitors, have not been very happy in their tranſlation of the Hebrew words that ſignify the ingredients of Iſrael's preſent. The honey, nuts, and almonds, could be no great curioſities in Egypt, nor indeed any other parts of the preſent, except the balm, which was that of Gilead, and in great eſtimation in all countries. A ſmall quantity therefore of this was a preſent worth acceptance; but as for roſin, or wax, as the original word is rendered by many interpreters; it is certain, that ſuch common productions could not be worth ſending to a governor of Egypt.

Bochart, indeed, thinks, that it was either roſin or turpentine, rather than balm of Gilead; becauſe Gilead was on one ſide Jordan, and Iſrael was then at ſome ſmall diſtance from it, on the other; but he has not attempted to prove, that there was none to be bought there, or to be ſent for on ſuch an occaſion. He adds, indeed, that Joſephus declares balm to have been unknown in Judea, till the queen of Sheba, brought ſome of it to Solomon, from Arabia Felix, but Joſephus may be miſtaken in this particular, as he is in a variety of others. Beſides, how came Gilead to be ſo famous for it afterwards? The queen hardly brought the trees there, and if Solomon had ſent for them afterwards, he, in all probability, would have planted them nearer to the place where he reſided.

The next article is honey, which was certainly much eſteemed by the ancients, as well Jews, as Gentiles; but unleſs that of Canaan was better than ordinary, it could hardly be worth ſending to a prime miniſter of Egypt, ſince 'tis morally impoſſible that this country could be without it. It is therefore moſt likely, that this part of the preſent conſiſted of dates, which are called by the ſame Hebrew name Debeſh, as the Jewiſh doctors obſerve, and which, when they have attained their due maturity, produce a ſort of honey not much inferior to the other. The Arabians call dates Duboos, and the honey of them Dibo, or Dibis, to this day, and it is evident, that Judea abounded in palm-trees of all ſorts, more eſpecially about Jerecho, if we may believe Pliny.

The next article is render'd Spices, by our tranſlators, but the Hebrew word Nekoth, rather ſignifies Storax, which is a precious aromatic gum, uſed as an ingredient in all ſpicy ointments.

The laſt particular, which is tranſlated myrrh, is called Lot, in the original, and is rather the ſtacte, or ladanum of the Chaldee, and Septuagint. It is thought to be the gum of the cypreſs tree, and was one of the aromatics in the perfume preſcribed by God, Exod. xxx. 34.

Ver. 15. And the men took that preſent, and they took double money in their hand, and Benjamin, and roſe up and went down to Egypt, &c.] The ſons of Iſrael arrived in Egypt, and were preſented to Joſeph, who order'd them to be brought into his houſe, and directed his ſteward to ſlay ſome beaſts, and prepare a feaſt. The Hebrew expreſſion may be tranſlated to offer ſacrifices. Some commentators have concluded, from this phraſe, that Joſeph affected, either out of policy or ſuperſtition, to ſerve up to his table the fleſh of thoſe creatures, which had been ſacrificed to the falſe Gods: But nothing obliges us to admit either this conſequence or verſion. The ſame expreſſion is uſed in the 9th chapter of the Proverbs, and the 2d verſe, to denote the preparation for a feaſt.

Ver. 21. And it came to paſs when we came to the inn, that we opened our ſacks, and behold every man's money was in the mouth of his ſack, &c.] The invitation which Joſeph made to his brethren alarmed them; they imagined they were going to be called to an account for the money found in their ſacks, and they proteſted their innocence to Joſeph's ſteward, with relation to this circumſtance. There is a kind of contradiction between what Moſes ſays in the 42d chapter of this book, ver. 35. that it was when Joſeph's brethren emptied their ſacks in the preſence of Jacob, that each one found his money in the mouth of his ſack; and what they themſelves ſay in the 21ſt verſe of this chapter, that they diſcovered their money in the inn; but this contradiction is not between the two relations made by Moſes; it is between the account given by that ſacred hiſtorian, and what is ſaid by the patriarchs themſelves, who were in ſo much fear and confuſion, upon this occaſion, as to be incapable of being very accurate in the account they gave of the affair.

The Steward was comforting them, when Joſeph himſelf arrived: he enquired of their health, and of their father's, ſaying, Is your father well, the old man of whom you ſpake; is he yet alive? Then caſting his eyes upon Benjamin, who was the ſon of Rachel as well as himſelf, he ſaid, Is this your younger brother, of whom you ſpake unto me? and being informed that it was he, the dear object did ſo affect him, that all that the emotions of his heart would ſuffer him to ſpeak was, God be gracious to thee my ſon; and even his ſoul was ſo affected in pronouncing theſe words, that he was hardly able to bring them forth; after which he retired, and ſought for a place to weep alone, and with greater freedom.

Ver. 32. And they ſet on for him by himſelf, and for them by themſelves, and for the Egyptians, which did eat with him, by themſelves: becauſe the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews, for that is an abomination unto the Egyptians.] This extreme averſion of the Egyptians to eat with the Hebrews, has been variouſly accounted for. Some attribute it to the exceſſive pride of that nation, which deſpiſed all but themſelves. Others to the Hebrews being ſhepherds, and eating of the ſheep and other cattle which the Egyptians worſhipped. Accordingly, we read, in the 46th chapter, and 34th verſe, that ſhepherds were alſo an abomination to the Egyptians, whether Hebrews or otherwiſe; and Moſes tells Pharaoh, that they could not ſacrifice in Egypt what was an abomination to them; that is, to kill and eat part of thoſe beaſts which they worſhipped; others think, the moſt probable reaſon of this averſion to ſhepherds, and to the Hebrews, as ſuch, was the great oppreſſion and tyranny under which the Egyptians had groaned, when the Hykſos, or king ſhepherds, as the word ſignifies, poured upon them, enſlaved, and held them in ſubjection above 500 years. We ſhall preſent our readers with ſome further remarks on this fact, at the cloſe of the 46th chapter of this book.

Ver. 34. And he took and ſent meſſes unto them, from before him, but Benjamin's meſs was five times ſo much as any of theirs.] Benjamin was diſtinguiſhed from the reſt of his brethren, while they ſat at table; Joſeph order'd him five ſhares for the others one. So they anciently treated thoſe perſons whom they had a mind to diſtinguiſh. This, doubtleſs, is the whole myſtery of that circumſtance, and never could the allegory be worſe timed than in this place. One of the ancients pretends, that Joſeph gave theſe five ſhares to his brother, to make up the number of the children of Rachel, that all the ſons of Leah together might not have a greater portion than Benjamin alone. St. Ambroſe finds other myſteries therein, and fancies to have diſcovered, in this difference of ſhares, the preſage of that ſuperiority, which St. Paul, a deſcendant from the tribe of Benjamin, ſhould have one day over the whole Apoſtolical College.

It was the ancient cuſtom for great men to honour ſuch as were in their favour, by ſending diſhes to them, which were firſt ſerved up to themſelves; from whence they were called miſſa, meſſes, or things ſent.

CHAP. XLIV.

1 Joſephs policy to ſtay his brethren. 14 Judahs humble ſupplication to Joſeph.

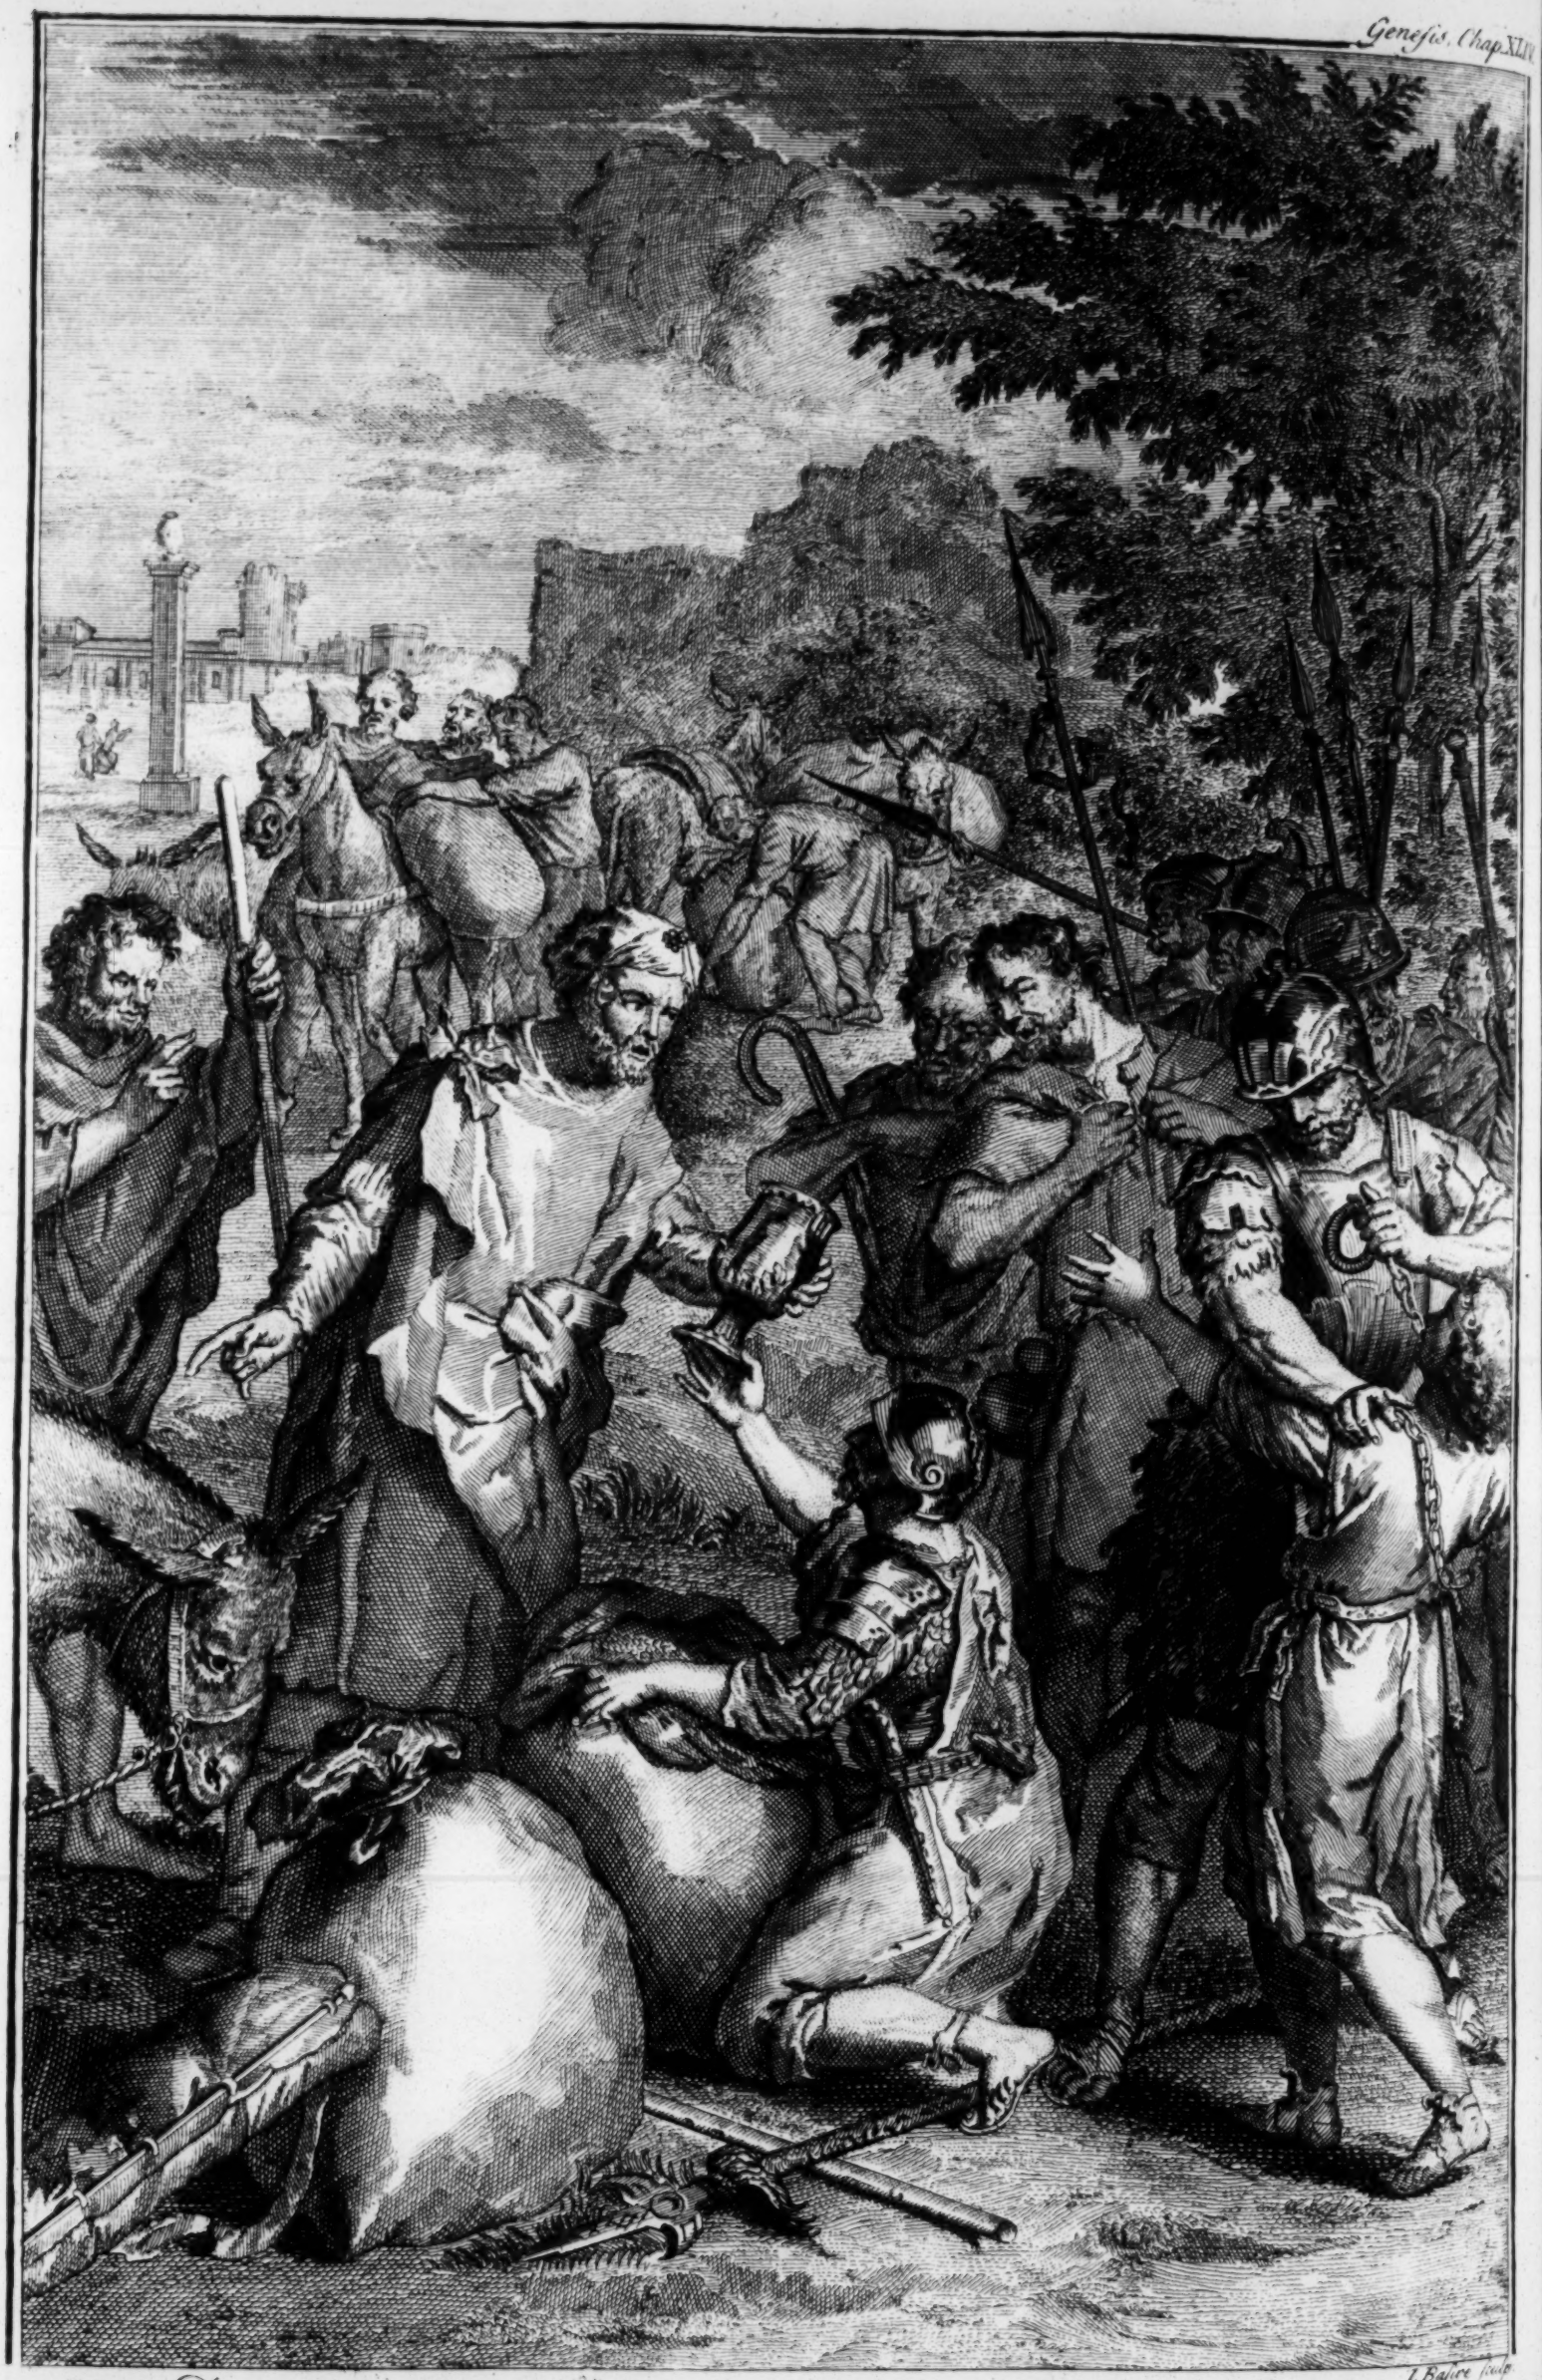
AND he commanded the ſteward of his houſe, ſaying, Fill the mens ſacks with food, as much as they can carry, and put every mans money in his ſacks mouth.

2 And put my cup, the ſilver cup, in the ſacks mouth of the youngeſt, and his corn-money;



I. Bajeve ſculp.

money: and he did according to the word that Joſeph had ſpoken.

3 Aſſoon as the morning was light, the men were ſent away, they and their aſſes.

4 And when they were gone out of the city, and not yet far off, Joſeph ſaid unto his ſteward, Up, follow after the men; and when thou doſt overtake them, ſay unto them, Wherefore have ye rewarded evil for good?

5 Is not this it in which my lord drinketh? And whereby indeed he divineth? Ye have done evil in ſo doing.

6 ¶ And he overtook them, and he ſpake unto them theſe ſame words.

7 And they ſaid unto him, Wherefore ſaith my lord theſe words? God forbid that thy ſervants ſhould do according to this thing.

8 Behold, the money which we found in our ſacks mouths, we brought again unto thee out of the land of Canaan: how then ſhould we ſteal out of thy lords houſe ſilver or gold?

9 With whom ſoever of thy ſervants it be found, both let him die, and we alſo will be my lords bond-men.

10 And he ſaid, Now alſo let it be according unto your words: he with whom it is found ſhall be my ſervant; and ye ſhall be blameleſs.

11 Then they ſpeedily took down every man his ſack to the ground, and opened every man his ſack.

12 And he ſearched, and began at the eldeſt, and left at the youngeſt: and the cup was found in Benjamins ſack.

13 Then they rent their clothes, and laded every man his aſs, and returned to the city.

14 ¶ And Judah and his brethren came to Joſephs houſe (for he was yet there) and they fell before him on the ground.

15 And Joſeph ſaid unto them, What deed is this that ye have done? Wot ye not, that ſuch a man as I can certainly divine?

16 And Judah ſaid, What ſhall we ſay unto my lord? What ſhall we ſpeak? Or how ſhall we clear ourſelves? God hath found out the iniquity of thy ſervants: behold, we are my lords ſervants, both we, and he alſo with whom the cup is found.

17 And he ſaid, God forbid that I ſhould do ſo: but the man in whoſe hand the cup is found, he ſhall be my ſervant; and as for you, get you up in peace unto your father.

18 ¶ Then Judah came near unto him, and ſaid, O my lord, let thy ſervant, I pray thee, ſpeak a word in my lords ears, and let not thine anger burn againſt thy ſervant: for thou art even as Pharaoh.

19 My lord asked his ſervants, ſaying, Have ye a father, or a brother?

20 And we ſaid unto my lord, We have a father, an old man, and a child of his old age, a little one: and his brother is dead, and he alone is left of his mother, and his father loveth him.

21 And thou ſaidſt unto thy ſervants, Bring him down unto me, that I may ſet mine eyes upon him.

22 And we ſaid unto my lord, The lad cannot leave his father: for if he ſhould leave his father, his father would die.

23 And thou ſaidſt unto thy ſervants, Except your youngeſt brother come down with you, you ſhall ſee my face no more.

24 And it came to paſs, when we came up unto thy ſervant my father, we told him the words of my lord.

25 And our father ſaid, Go again, and buy us a little food.

26 And we ſaid, We cannot go down: if our youngeſt brother be with us, then will we go down; for we may not ſee the mans face, except our youngeſt brother be with us.

27 And thy ſervant my father ſaid unto us, Ye know that my wife bare me two ſons:

28 And the one went out from me, and I ſaid, ſurely he is torn in pieces; and I ſaw him not ſince.

29 And if ye take this alſo from me, and miſchief befall him, ye ſhall bring down my gray hairs with ſorrow to the grave.

30 Now therefore when I come to thy ſervant my father, and the lad be not with us; (ſeeing that his life is bound up in the lads life)

31 It ſhall come to paſs, when he ſeeth that the lad is not with us, that he will die: and thy ſervants ſhall bring down the gray hairs of thy ſervant our father with ſorrow to the grave.

32 For thy ſervant became ſurety for the lad unto my father, ſaying, If I bring him not unto thee, then I ſhall bear the blame to my father for ever.

33 Now therefore, I pray thee, let thy ſervant abide inſtead of the lad, a bondman to my lord; and let the lad go up with his brethren.

34 For how ſhall I go up to my father, and and the lad be not with me? Leſt peradventure I ſee the evil that ſhall come on my father.

Ver. 1. And he commanded the ſteward of his houſe, ſaying, fill the mens ſacks with corn, &c.] Joſeph having given this favourable reception to his brethren, order'd the neceſſary preparations to be made for their return. He commanded his ſteward to fill the ſacks of thoſe ſtrangers with proviſion, to put their money likewiſe in, as at firſt, and his ſilver cup into Benjamin's ſack. They then departed, wholly taken up with the wonders they had ſeen in Egypt, and the pleaſure they propoſed by relating them at their return to Canaan. But their joy was ſoon interrupted by the arrival of the ſteward, who had been order'd by Joſeph to purſue, and ſeverely reproach them, for ſtealing his lord's cup.

Ver. 5. Is not this it, in which my lord drinketh; and whereby indeed he divineth, &c.] This paſſage is capable both of a good and bad conſtruction; the Targum of Onkelos, and the Arabick verſion, prefer the former. The firſt tranſlate it, is not this the cup out of which my lord drinketh, and which he ſeeketh with great care: The other offers to the mind a meaning yet more natural; is it not the cup out of which my lord drinketh, and by which he hath tried you? This laſt explanation has been followed by a number of ancient and modern doctors; who are of opinion, that Joſeph ſaid to his brethren, that this cup would diſcover their ingratitude towards him; and to ſupport this opinion, they quote ſome paſſages of ſcripture, in which the term here in the original, denotes a knowledge of futurity, to which a man may attain by his own ſagacity.

But this expreſſion is likewiſe capable, and indeed uſually, of an odious ſignification, and is affix'd to divination, ſtrictly ſo called. Among the Heathens, there were ſeveral methods of divining by the cup. Jamblicus makes mention of them in his book of the myſteries of the Egyptians: He ſays, that ſeveral perſons, received Irradiations by means of the water, which is tranſparent and proper, on that very account, to tranſmit the light; and St. Auſtin had the ſame notion of Numa, founding himſelf upon the authority of Varro, who ſays, that the Perſians were the authors of that method of knowing future things, and who thought that he himſelf ſaw, in the water, the image of Mercury, which had pronounced, in 150 verſes, all that was to happen in the war with Mithridates.

This is the manner of divining by the cup: They threw into it little thin plates of gold, and ſilver; they mixt them with ſome precious ſtones, upon which certain characters were engraven, and after having obſerved divers ſuperſtitious ceremonies, they conſulted the oracle: The anſwer was returned ſeveral ways; ſometimes by articulate ſounds, ſometimes the characters that were in the cup appear'd upon the ſuperficies of the water, and the anſwer was formed by their arrangement. Sometimes the images or pictures of the perſons, about whom the oracle was conſulted, were repreſented to the ſight.

Thoſe who have written upon the ſubject of magic, mention likewiſe another way of divining by the cup: They faſtened a ring to a thread, by which they held it ſuſpended upon the water in the veſſel; the ring, by its different percuſſions, deſcribed the things that were to be known: Some of theſe divinations may be ſeen in the Demonomania of Bodinus, in Cornelius Agrippa, and ſome other authors.

Several Jewiſh doctors have thought, that Joſeph was a magician, and have given to the words in this verſe, the ſenſe of which we are enquiring after, the moſt odious ſignification they ſeem capable of: They have carried their boldneſs ſo far, as to pretend to deſcribe the cup of this Patriarch; they ſay it was by virtue of that myſterous veſſel, and by beholding it attentively, that Joſeph diſcovered the age of his brethren: 'Tis ſo they explain the words of Moſes; They ſat before him the firſt-born according to his birth-right, and the youngeſt according to his youth, and the men marvelled one at another. The doctors, of whom we ſpeak, will have it, that the ſurprize of Joſeph's brethren, proceeded from his having diſcovered, in the cup, the rank, or place, that belonged to each of them.

Some Rabbins have taught, that Joſeph was not himſelf learned in the magic art, but that he had a mind to frighten his brethren, by threatening them to conſult the wiſe men about the cup that had been ſtolen from him.

There are ſome commentators who have fancied, that by a divine providence, the glory and happineſs of Joſeph were annexed to his cup, inſomuch that when-ever he loſt it, he would fall into the greateſt misfortunes; accordingly, they paraphraſe theſe words, wot ye not that ſuch a man as I can certainly divine; in the following manner; can ye be ignorant, that a man like me can make nothing but unhappy preſages againſt himſelf, when ſuch a precious thing is taken from him?

Urſinus has, upon this occaſion, a thought worthy of ſome notice: He is of opinion, that there was a kind of divination allowed to the ancient believers; and quotes the examples of Jonathan, 1 Sam. of Jonas, chap. 7. and ſome others, that ſeem to favour his ſuppoſition.

Grotius has advanced, that Joſeph made uſe of his cup to pour out drink offerings to the deity, when he had a mind to propheſy.

Finally, ſeveral commentators have thought, not that Joſeph was a magician, but that he made a ſhew of being ſo, to render himſelf more formidable to his family, and more venerable to the Egyptians. It is eaſier to refute ſeveral of theſe comments, than to decide which is the moſt proper to explain the paſſage before us. 'Tis demonſtrable, that Egypt abounded with people profeſſing the magic art. Kircher has even maintained, that it was brought thither by Ham, and that it ſpread itſelf from thence among the other nations: The ſame author ſpeaks of the ſtatue of braſs, upon which theſe words were engraven I Mezram a ſtrong and mighty giant; revealer of hidden things, have made ſeveral Taliſmans, and ſeveral images that ſpeak, &c. But it is impoſſible to prove, that the ways of divining by the cup, now known to us, were practiſed in the time of Joſeph. The character of magician, or ſorcerer, is ſo odious, that we ought not to apply it to that great patriarch, unleſs we ſhould be obliged by any formal text of Scripture; but there can be none brought to ſupport ſuch an opinion, and the ſentiments of thoſe who ſay, that Joſeph made profeſſion of diſcovering the greateſt myſteries, either by the natural talents he had received from heaven, or by extraordinary revelations from thence, are more charitable and more probable alſo.

The charge brought againſt the ſons of Jacob, occaſion'd the utmoſt conſternation among them, they all proteſted their innocence, and offer'd to remain ſlaves in Egypt, if any one among them were guilty of the crime of which they ſtood accuſed. Search was made; their ſacks were opened; the cup was found in that of Benjamin. Joſeph moderated the ſentence which they had paſſed upon themſelves; telling them, it ſhould be only executed upon him who had committed the crime, and that he alone ſhould remain a ſlave in Egypt.

Ver. 18. Then Judah came near him and ſaid, &c.] He ſtanding bound for Benjamin, to his father, took upon him to plead his cauſe, and indeed he ſeems to have been a man of the beſt ſenſe, courage and eloquence, among them. We think biſhop Patrick's remarks, on this admirable ſpeech of Judah, well worth tranſcribing.

There is nothing could be ſaid more moving, than what is delivered in this ſpeech of Judah; which flowed, as one may ſee, from ſuch natural paſſions, as no art can imitate. Which makes me wiſh, continues that prelate, that they who think theſe hiſtorical books of Scripture were written with no ſpirit, but that with which honeſt men now write the hiſtory of their country, or the lives of any famous perſon; would ſeriouſly read and conſider this ſpeech of Judah to Joſeph; together with the foregoing dialogue between Jacob and his ſons, from the 19th verſe of the 42d chapter, to the 15th of the 43d, and I hope it may make them change their opinion, and be of the mind of Dr. Jackſon, book I. on the creed, chap. 4. " That ſeeing " ſuch paſſages are related by men who affect no art, and " who lived long after the parties that firſt uttered them; " we cannot conceive how all particulars could be ſo natu- " rally and fully recorded, unleſs they had been ſuggeſted " by his ſpirit, who gives mouth and ſpeech to men. Who " being alike preſent to all ſucceſſions, is able to com- " municate the ſecret thoughts of fore-fathers to their " children, and put the very words of the deceaſed, never " regiſtred before, into the mouths or pens of their ſucceſ-

Joseph makes himself known to his brethren

" fors, for many generations after: And that as expreſly,
" and diſtinctly, as if they had been impreſſed in characters
" of ſteel or braſs, as they iſſued out of their mouth. For " it is plain, every circumſtance is here related with ſuch
" natural ſpecifications, as if Moſes had heard them talk;
" and therefore could not have been repreſented to us,
" unleſs they had been written by his direction, who knows
" all things, as well fore-paſt, as preſent, or to come.

Philo juſtly admired this ſpeech, and has expreſſed it in an eloquent paraphraſe; Joſephus has endeavoured to excel Philo, but Moſes is infinitely ſuperior to both.

CHAP. XLV.

1 Joſeph maketh himſelf known to his brethren: 5 He comforteth them in God's providence: 9 He ſendeth for his father: 16 Pharaoh confirmeth it: 21 Joſeph furniſheth them for their journey, and exhorteth them to concord. 25 Jacob is revived with the news.

THEN Joſeph could not refrain himſelf before all them that ſtood by him; and he cried, Cauſe every man to go out from me: and there ſtood no man with him, while Joſeph made himſelf known unto his brethren.

2 And he wept aloud: and the Egyptians and the houſe of Pharaoh heard.

3 And Joſeph ſaid unto his brethren, I am Joſeph; Doth my father yet live? And his brethren could not anſwer him: for they were troubled at his preſence.

4 And Joſeph ſaid unto his brethren, Come near to me, I pray you; and they came near: and he ſaid, I am Joſeph your brother, whom ye ſold into Egypt.

5 Now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with your ſelves, that ye ſold me hither: for God did ſend me before you, to preſerve life.

6 For theſe two years hath the famine been in the land: and yet there are five years, in the which there ſhall neither be earing nor harveſt.

7 And God ſent me before you, to preſerve you a poſterity in the earth, and to ſave your lives by a great deliverance.

8 So now it was not you that ſent me hither, but God: and he hath made me a father to Pharaoh, and lord of all his houſe, and a ruler throughout all the land of Egypt.

9 Haſte you, and go up to my father, and ſay unto him, Thus ſaith thy ſon Joſeph, God hath made me lord of all Egypt; come down unto me, tarry not.

10 And thou ſhalt dwell in the land of Goſhen, and thou ſhalt be near unto me, thou, and thy children, and thy childrens children, and thy flocks, and thy herds, and all that thou haſt.

11 And there will I nouriſh thee (for yet there are five years of famine;) leſt thou, and thy houſhold, and all that thou haſt, come to poverty.

12 And behold, your eyes ſee, and the eyes of my brother Benjamin, that it is my mouth that ſpeaketh unto you.

13 And you ſhall tell my father of all my glory in Egypt, and of all that you have ſeen; and ye ſhall haſte, and bring down my father hither.

14 And he fell upon his brother Benjamins neck, and wept, and Benjamin wept upon his neck.

15 Moreover he kiſſed all his brethren, and wept upon them: and after that his brethren talked with him.

16 ¶ And the fame thereof was heard in Pharaohs houſe, ſaying, Joſephs brethren are come: and it pleaſed Pharaoh well, and his ſervants.

17 And Pharaoh ſaid unto Joſeph, Say unto thy brethren, This do ye; lade your beaſts, and go, get you unto the land of Canaan,

18 And take your father, and your houſholds, and come unto me: and I will give you the good of the land of Egypt, and ye ſhall eat the fat of the land.

19 Now thou art commanded, this do ye; take you waggons out of the land of Egypt for your little ones, and for your wives, and bring your father, and come.

20 Alſo regard not your ſtuff: for the good of all the land of Egypt is yours.

21 And the children of Iſrael did ſo: and Joſeph gave them waggons, according to the commandment of Pharaoh, and gave them proviſion for the way.

22 To all of them he gave each man changes of raiment: but to Benjamin he gave three hundred pieces of ſilver, and five changes of raiment.

23 And to his father he ſent after this manner; ten aſſes laden with the good things of Egypt, and ten ſhe-aſſes laden with corn and bread and meat for his father by the way.

24 So he ſent his brethren away, and they departed: and he ſaid unto them, See that ye fall not out by the way.

25 ¶ And they went up out of Egypt, and came into the land of Canaan unto Jacob their father, 26 And told him, ſaying, Joſeph is yet alive, and he is governour over all the land of Egypt. And Jacobs heart fainted, for he believed them not.

27 And they told him all the words of Joſeph, which he had ſaid unto them: and when he ſaw the waggons which Joſeph had ſent to carry him, the ſpirit of Jacob their father revived.

28 And Iſrael ſaid, It is enough; Joſeph my ſon is yet alive: I will go and ſee him before I die.

Ver. 1. Then Joſeph could not refrain himſelf before all that ſtood by him, &c.] The moving ſpeech of Judah, pierced the heart of Joſeph; The concern in which he beheld his brethren; the conſideration of the anguiſh his aged father would ſuſtain, when he ſhould ſee them return without his beloved Benjamin, and when he ſhould hear that he was detained in Egyptian ſlavery; the ardent deſire he had of embracing his tender parent; all theſe powerful motives made it impoſſible for him to conceal himſelf any longer from his family. Firſt then, he cauſed all the Egyptians to withdraw; being deſirous of a private conference with his brethren, when he ſhould diſcover himſelf to them. When nature determines to indulge her pathetic impreſſions, ſhe removes every object capable of diſtracting her; any interruption, in the movements of love and tenderneſs, is inſupportable; and we are unwilling to lay open our hearts, but in the preſence of thoſe who can enter into our ſentiments, and ſhare them, in ſome meaſure, with us.

When Joſeph was alone with his brethren, he began to unfold himſelf in a flow of tears, and accompanied them with theſe melting expreſſions, I am Joſeph, doth my father yet live? His brethren were ſo affected with this language, that they were incapable of making him any reply; and he endeavoured to comfort them, by continuing, I am Joſeph your brother whom ye ſold into Egypt, now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with yourſelves, that ye ſold me hither, for God did ſend me before you to preſerve life, &c.

This diſcourſe, repreſents to us, in the moſt emphatical manner, the ſweet and engaging temper of this great patriarch. He himſelf excuſes thoſe who had injured him with the greateſt barbarity, and gives us, at the ſame time, an admirable leſſon of humanity and moderation to thoſe who have treated us in any injurious manner. He was ſo far from uttering the leaſt reproaches againſt his brethren, that he ſeem'd ſollicitous to diſpel the dark clouds of fear, which the conſciouſneſs of their crime had drawn over their ſouls. He had a full power to puniſh them with the utmoſt ſeverity, but he only employs it in gratifications, and endearing behaviour; and inſtead of anger and revenge, melts them with the tenderneſs of his affection to them.

The charity of this excellent perſon, is an admirable figure of the amazing goodneſs and mercy of the divine redeemer of mankind, who was likewiſe ſold by his brethren, and not only forgave their putting him to ſo painful and ignominious a death, but likewiſe made the blood which they ſo cruelly ſhed, to become the price of their redemption, and the ſalutary balſom to the wounds their guilt had inflicted on them.

Ver. 9. Haſte you, and go up to my father, &c.] Joſeph, having diſpelled the grief and apprehenſions of his brethren, by his engaging diſcourſe, directed them to return immediately to Canaan, and acquaint his father that he was yet living; that he governed all Egypt, and that he conjured him to come without delay, into that kingdom. But leſt the great age and infirmities of the good patriarch, ſhould, together with the length of that journey, render him incapable of performing it, he propoſed his taking up his reſidence in the land of Goſhen.

It is ſurpriſing, how the Septuagint came to place Goſhen, in Arabia, at leaſt, ſome copies have it ſo; ſince that was farther off from Egypt, than the land of Canaan. St. Jerom thinks, that it was the ſame as Thebais in Æthiopia, or adjacent to it: But that was too long a journey for Jacob to undertake, neither would Joſeph have been near enough to have paid him frequent viſits, or to have ſupplied his wants: Whereas he gives it as a reaſon to his brethren, for his chooſing this land, that they might be near him: Goſhen, therefore, was ſituate between the Red Sea and the Nile, upon the borders of Canaan, not far from the city On, or Hieropolis, where Joſeph chiefly reſided. It was a fruitful tract of land, and fit for cattle; and Joſephus tells us, that Pharaoh kept his own there. It was ſeparate from Egypt, and conſequently fitteſt for Jacob and his family, who would be out of all danger of interfering with the Egyptians; and at the ſame time, their proximity to Joſeph, would facilitate a correſpondence between them.

Ver. 16. And the fame thereof was heard in Pharaoh's houſe, ſaying, Joſeph's brethren are come, and it pleaſed Pharaoh well, and his ſervants.] The Egyptians of Joſeph's houſhold, who had retired into the adjoining apartments, while he diſcovered himſelf to his brethren, heard, from thence, the ſound of his weeping, and without diſpute were exceedingly ſurprized at ſo unexpected a circumſtance: But their lord ſoon revealed as much of that affair to them as he thought proper, and the report was ſoon ſpread thro' the palace of Pharaoh, that the brethren of their benefactor were come down into Egypt: and as the wiſdom and gentleneſs of Joſeph's adminiſtration had procured him the love and reſpect of the inhabitants, it was natural for the whole court to be pleaſed with theſe tidings, which gave them a new opportunity of teſtifying their eſteem for Joſeph, by their civilities to his aged father and family.

Ver. 22. To all of them he gave each man changes of raiment, &c.] Joſeph executed the orders of Pharaoh, and was the miniſter of the liberality, and magnificence of that prince; he loaded his brethren with rich preſents for Jacob; furniſhed them with waggons, and proviſions, and gave each of them changes of garments, in which, one part of the riches of the ancients conſiſted. Sampſon declares, in the Book of Judges, chap. xiv. verſe, 13. that thirty changes of garments ſhould be the reward of the perſon who could explain his riddle, or what he himſelf ſhould expect from them in caſe of their inability. In the time of the firſt Roman Emperors, this kind of vanity was increaſed to ſo immoderate a degree, that the Prætor Lucullus had two hundred changes of garments, as Plutarch declares in the life of that perſon; and if we may believe Horace, they carried the number as far as to five thouſand. Lib. 1. Epiſt. 6. v. 44. 'Tis without doubt to this cuſtom, that St. James alludes ch. 5. ver. 1, 2. of his Epiſtle, Go to now, ye rich, weep and howl for your miſeries ——— your riches are corrupted and your garments are moth-eaten.

Benjamin was diſtinguiſhed by the number and value of the preſents he received; and the Jewiſh commentators have diſcovered many myſteries in the 300 pieces of ſilver beſtowed on him by Joſeph. Their conjectures are not worth repeating, ſince the plain matter of fact is no more than this; Joſeph, as a token of his particular affection for Benjamin, preſented him with 300 pieces of ſilver, which, if they were ſhekels, amounted to thirty four pounds, four ſhillings, and four pence half-penny of our money.

Ver. 24. —— See that ye fall not out by the way.] Joſeph was well acquainted with the impetuous diſpoſition of ſome of his brethren, and as he was ſenſible, that what had now paſſed between him and them, would create them much converſation on their journey, he, therefore, prudently cautions them againſt all diſputes, which, growing warm by degrees, might be attended with ill conſequences, and defeat all the good offices he intended them.

Verſes 25, 26. And they went up out of Egypt, and came into the land of Canaan, to Jacob their father. And told him, ſaying, Joſeph is yet alive, and he is governor over all the land of Egypt. And Jacob's heart fainted, for he believed them not.] The exceſs of the old Patriarch's joy, overwhelmed his faculties, and he fainted away, in hearing his ſons report of the life and greatneſs of Joſeph, whoſe death he had long lamented with all the anguiſh of a tender father.

The good old man, recovered at laſt from his ſwoon: The paraphraſe of Onkelos ſays, that the Spirit of the Lord returned unto Jacob: And the Targum of Jonathan declares, that the Spirit of the Lord, which departed from Jacob, ever ſince his loſs of Joſeph, returned unto him again. The import of which gloſſes is explained by this maxim of the Rabbins, That the Spirit of God reſi- deth not in men of melancholy and dejected diſpoſitions. But the natural meaning of the ſacred hiſtorian ſeems to be no more than, that Jacob revived from the fainting fit, which this ſurprizing news had brought upon him, and when he caſt his eyes on the preſents which his ſons had brought him out of Egypt, and the waggons ſent by his ſon Joſeph, to convey him and his family into that country, he no longer doubted of his life, and amidſt the paternal tranſports which the hope of ſeeing him once more, had kindled in his ſoul, It is enough, ſaid he, Joſeph my ſon is yet alive, I will go and ſee him before I die.

CHAP. XLVI.

1 Jacob is comforted by God at Beer-ſheba: 5 Thence he with his company goeth into Egypt: 8 The number of his family that went into Egypt. 28 Joſeph meeteth Jacob: 31 He inſtructeth his brethren how to anſwer to Pharaoh.

AND Iſrael took his journey with all that he had, and came to Beer-ſheba, and offered ſacrifices unto the God of his father Iſaac.

2 And God ſpake unto Iſrael in the viſions of the night, and ſaid, Jacob, Jacob: And he ſaid, Here am I.

3 And he ſaid, I am God, the God of thy father: fear not to go down into Egypt; for I will there make of thee a great nation.

4 I will go down with thee into Egypt; and I will alſo ſurely bring thee up again: and Joſeph ſhall put his hand upon thine eyes.

5 And Jacob roſe up from Beer-ſheba: and the ſons of Iſrael carried Jacob their father, and their little ones, and their wives, in the waggons which Pharaoh had ſent to carry him.

6 And they took their cattel, and their goods which they had gotten in the land of Canaan, and came into Egypt, Jacob, and all his ſeed with him:

7 His ſons and his ſons ſons with him, his daughters, and his ſons daughters, and all his ſeed brought he with him into Egypt.

8 ¶ And theſe are the names of the children of Iſrael, which came into Egypt, Jacob and his ſons: Reuben Jacobs firſt-born.

9 And the ſons of Reuben; Hanoch, and Phallu, and Hezron, and Carmi.

10 ¶ And the ſons of Simeon; Jemuel, and Jamin, and Ohad, and Jachin, and Zohar, and Shaul the ſon of a Canaanitiſh woman.

11 ¶ And the ſons of Levi; Gerſhon, Kohath, and Merari.

12 ¶ And the ſons of Judah; Er, and Onan, and Shelah, and Pharez, and Zerah: But Er and Onan died in the land of Canaan. And the ſons of Pharez were Hezron and Hamul.

13 ¶ And the ſons of Iſſachar; Tola, and Phuva, and Job, and Shimron.

14 ¶ And the ſons of Zebulun; Sered, and Elon, and Jahleel.

15 Theſe be the ſons of Leah, which ſhe bare unto Jacob in Padan-aram, with his daughter Dinah: all the ſouls of his ſons and his daughters were thirty and three.

16 ¶ And the ſons of Gad; Zipion, and Haggai, Shuni, and Ezbon, Eri, and Arodi, and Areli.

17 ¶ And the ſons of Aſher; Jimnah, and Iſhuah, and Iſui, and Beriah, and Serah their ſiſter: And the ſons of Beriah; Heber, and Malchiel.

18 Theſe are the ſons of Zilpah, whom Laban gave to Leah his daughter: and theſe ſhe bare unto Jacob, even ſixteen ſouls.

19 The ſons of Rachel Jacobs wife; Joſeph, and Benjamin.

20 And unto Joſeph in the land of Egypt were born Manaſſeh and Ephraim, which Aſenath the daughter of Poti-pherah prieſt of On bare unto him.

21 ¶ And the ſons of Benjamin were Belah, and Becher, and Aſhbel, Gera, and Naaman, Ehi, and Roſh, Muppim, and Huppim, and Ard.

22 Theſe are the ſons of Rachel, which were born to Jacob: all the ſouls were fourteen.

23 ¶ And the ſons of Dan; Huſhim.

24 And the ſons of Napthali; Jahzeel, and Guni, and Jezer, and Shillem.

25 Theſe are the ſons of Bilhah, which Laban gave unto Rachel his daughter, and ſhe bare theſe unto Jacob: all the ſouls were ſeven.

26 All the ſouls that came with Jacob into Egypt, which came out of his loins, beſides Jacobs ſons wives, all the ſouls were threeſcore and ſix;

27 And the ſons of Joſeph which were born him in Egypt, were two ſouls: all the ſouls of the houſe of Jacob, which came into Egypt, were threeſcore and ten.

28 ¶ And he ſent Judah before him unto Joſeph, to direct his face unto Goſhen; and they came into the land of Goſhen.

29 And Joſeph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Iſrael his father, to Goſhen; and preſented himſelf unto him: and he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while.

30 And

30 And Iſrael ſaid unto Joſeph, Now let me die, ſince I have ſeen thy face, becauſe thou art yet alive.

31 ¶ And Joſeph ſaid unto his brethren, and unto his fathers houſe, I will go up, and ſhew Pharaoh, and ſay unto him, My brethren, and my fathers houſe, which were in the land of Canaan, are come unto me:

32 And the men are ſhepherds, for their trade hath been to feed cattel, and they have brought their flocks and their herds, and all that they have.

33 And it ſhall come to paſs when Pharaoh ſhall call you, and ſhall ſay, What is your occupation?

34 That ye ſhall ſay, Thy ſervants trade hath been about cattel, from our youth, even until now, both we and alſo our fathers: that ye may dwell in the land of Goſhen; for every ſhepherd is an abomination unto the Egyptians.

Ver. 2. And God ſpake unto Iſrael in the viſions of the night, &c.] Scarce did Jacob ſet out for Egypt, when God appeared to him in the ſame place which the piety of Abraham had render'd famous. He there promiſed to preſerve him in ſafety through his journey to his ſon Joſeph, who, he aſſured him, ſhould put his hands upon his eyes. This was one of thoſe teſtimonies of affection and duty that were render'd to dying perſons by the ancients.

Ver. 8. And theſe are the names of the children of Iſrael which came into Egypt, &c.] Moſes mentions two numbers of ſouls in Jacob's family, excluſive of his daughters in law, viz. ſixty ſix, verſe 26. and ſeventy, verſe 27. He likewiſe reckons thirty three ſouls to Leah, including Dinah, verſe 15. and to Zilpah her hand-maid ſixteen, including Serah, Aſher's daughter, and the two ſons of Beriah, verſe 18. To make which reckonings agree with the fourteen of Rachel, verſe 22. and the two firſt ſums of ſixty ſix, and ſeventy; It is to be obſerved, firſt, that in the number ſixty ſix, Jacob is not reckoned, but only the ſouls that came out of his loins; but in the number of thirty three he ſeems included, elſe we ſhall find but thirty two. Viz. Leah's twenty nine ſons; two grandſons by Phares, and Dinah, in all thirty two: But that Jacob is included in this number, ſeems intimated by the eighth verſe of this chapter, in the words Jacob and his ſons, viz. his ſons by Leah. Accordingly Joſephus gives us a liſt of them, to the number of thirty two, including Dinah, yet ſums up thirty three, without acquainting us that he comprehends Jacob, tho' 'tis evident, by the account, that he does. This being premiſed, the whole account will ſtand thus.

Leah	33	including Jacob.
Zilpah	16
Rachel	11	excluſive of Joſeph and his two ſons.
Bilhah	7
	67.

Out of which deduct Jacob, becauſe Moſes here only reckons thoſe who came out of his loins, and there will remain ſixty ſix.

To whom add, Jacob, Joſeph, Ephraim, and Manaſſeh; becauſe this ſecond reckoning comprehends all the ſouls of Jacob's family, in which caſe, he may be included, and the whole will amount to ſeventy ſouls. But if we reckon Serah, Aſher's daughter, as Joſephus has done, and, in all probability, Moſes too, ſince he mentions her in his liſt, we need not include Jacob in the number, for it will be ſeventy compleat without him.

St. Stephen, indeed, reckons the whole number of them ſeventy five, Acts vii. 14. which diſagrees with the Moſaic account, but it muſt be remembred, that the Apoſtles and firſt preachers of the Goſpel, made uſe of the ſeptuagint verſion, as being the only one then univerſally underſtood by the Jews; which verſion adds five more to Manaſſeh and Ephraim; namely, Machir, and Gilead, ſons of Manaſſeh; Sutalan, and Tuhan, ſons of Ephraim; and Eden, Sutalan's ſon. But beſides that, they differ from the Hebrew, by aſcribing eighteen, inſtead of fourteen deſcendants to Rachel: They likewiſe differ from themſelves; for fourteen, and the five whom they add, will make nineteen, and not eighteen. Some ancient fathers, thinking this knot inſoluble, have endeavour'd to form ſome myſteries out of it, but we need not be at any trouble to free the ſeptuagint verſion from error, ſince it differs, in ſo many inſtances, from the original. However, there is ſtill another rational method to account for this difference between St. Stephen's reckoning and that of Moſes, which is this. That of St. Stephen follows the firſt number of Moſes, viz. ſixty ſix; (out of which he excludes Jacob and Joſeph, and the two ſons of the latter) to whom he adds nine of their wives; for Judah's wife was already dead, and Benjamin is ſuppoſed to be ſtill unmarried, and Joſeph's wife out of the caſe. So that if we add theſe nine wives, who, tho' not of Jacob's blood, yet belonged to his family, and to Joſeph's kindred (which is the expreſſion uſed by St. Stephen) to the number of ſixty ſix, it will amount to ſeventy five.

Some ancient and modern writers have ſuppoſed, that all theſe grandſons were not born when Jacob went down into Egypt; but either ſoon after, or at leaſt during his life; for which reaſon they think, Moſes made no ſcruple to ſet them down with the reſt. So far are they from being of opinion, that Benjamin, for inſtance, had ten ſons, by that time, being but a little turned of thirty, that they think he was hardly married. The ſame thing they ſuppoſe of the two ſons of Phares, alledging, tho' falſly, that Phares was but one year old, at the departure of Jacob for Egypt. But all theſe ſuppoſitions are diametrically oppoſite to the ſacred text; and if Moſes muſt have reckoned all thoſe who were born in Egypt before Jacob's death, we ſee no reaſon, why he might not almoſt have enumerated ſome hundreds, as well as ſeventy; ſince they muſt have increaſed very faſt there, and married very young, elſe they could hardly have multiplied, from ſeventy, to upwards of ſix hundred thouſand, in the ſpace of two hundred and fifteen years, which was all the time of their continuance in Egypt. It will, therefore, be much more reaſonable to grant, according to the Moſaic account, that the two ſons of Phares were then born, tho' they were very young; for Phares, being begotten by Judah, in the 30th year of his age, might take a wife at 14 or 15, and ſo have two ſons before Jacob left Canaan. The ſame may be likewiſe ſaid of Benjamin, who might have ſeveral children, and two grand-children, at the age of thirty-one. There is, therefore, no reaſon to depart from the plain text of Moſes, to fall into more difficult ſuppoſitions, than any that are in his narrative.

Another difficulty, which is raiſed againſt this genealogical liſt, is the difference of the names here mentioned, and in other places of Scripture, where the ſame genealogy is rehearſed, as in 1 Chron. iv. 24. and likewiſe in the xxivth chapter of Numbers, but we have already obſerved, that it was very common for perſons to have two names in the ſcriptures, and to be called ſometimes by the one, and ſometimes by the other.

There are three particulars to be obſerved in the liſt which Moſes has given us in this chapter, namely, 1. That the wives are not ſet down in it, becauſe they were not deſcended from him, any more than his ſervants and ſlaves. 2. That he doth not ſet them down according to the order of their birth, as in other places, but mentions thoſe who were born of Leah, and her maid, and thoſe of Rachel and her maid. And, 3. That the number ſixty-ſix, in one part of the liſt, is only of the deſcendants who came out of Jacob's loins; and the number of ſeventy, is that of all the ſouls, which belonged to the houſe of Jacob; to which therefore Joſeph and his two ſons, and a granddaughter, named Serah, Aſher's daughter, muſt be added, in order to compleat the number of ſeventy.

Perhaps

Perhaps it will not be diſagreeable to our readers, to ſee the family of Jacob ranged into the following order.

A Liſt of Jacob's ſons and grandſons.

The ſons of Jacob, by LEAH, with their ſons.
Reuben; Hanoch, Phalluć, Hezron, Carmi.
Simeon; Jemuel, Jamin, Ohad, Jachin, Zohar, Shaul.
Levi; Gerſhon, Koath, Merari.
Judah; *Er, *Onan, Shelah, Pharez, Zerah.
Iſſachar; Tola, Phuvah, Job, Shimron.
Zebulun; Sered, Elon, Jahleel.

* Theſe two died in Canaar.

The ſons of Jacob, by ZILPAH, with their ſons.
Gad; Ziphion, Haggai, Shuni, Esbon, Eri, Arodi, Areli.
Aſher; Jimnah, Iſhuah, Iſui, Beriah, Serah, a daughter.

The ſons of Jacob, by BILHAH, with their ſons.
Dan; Huſhim.
Naphtali; Jahzeel, Guni, Jezer, Shillem.

The ſons of Pharez, Judah's ſon.
Hezron, Hamul.

The ſons of Beriah, Aſher's daughter.
Heber, Malchiel.

The ſon of Jacob, by RACHEL, with his ſons.
Benjamin; Belah, Becher, Aſhbol, Gera, Naaman, Ehi, Roſh, Muppim, Huppim, Ard.

In all, threeſcore and ſix, excluſive of Dinah, Jacob's daughter by Leah, and of Joſeph, and his two ſons Manaſſeh, and Ephraim, who being added to the number will increaſe it to ſeventy ſouls.

Ver. 29. And Joſeph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Iſrael his father, to Goſhen; and preſented himſelf unto him, and he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while.] The interview between the father and ſon was accompanied with a tenderneſs not to be expreſſed. Joſeph preſented himſelf to the venerable patriarch with all the humility that could be expected from a dutiful child; and as if he was more affected with his being the ſon of Jacob, than with the lofty titles of Father of Pharaoh, and Ruler of Egypt.

The Jews pretend, that Joſeph, aſſoon as he came in ſight of his father, took off the ornament of ſtate that he wore on his head, and threw aſide his robe of dignity, that Jacob might the better know him to be his ſon; but this, like many other of their conjectures, is without any foundation. Some difficulties, indeed, have ariſen, with reſpect to the proper conſtruction of the words, and he fell on his neck, &c. whether the pronoun he is to be referred to Jacob, or to Joſeph. Many of the Hebrew doctors think, that Joſeph fell on the neck of his father; and it muſt be confeſſed, that this conſtruction ſeems to correſpond beſt with the diſpoſition of the words in this period. But Junius, and ſome others, maintain, that it is more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that Joſeph, making his obeyſance unto Jacob, aſſoon as he came near him, the old man, in a tranſport of joy, threw himſelf on his ſon's neck, and was ſo exceedingly affected by the agitations of his tender paſſions, that being unable to ſpeak, or recover himſelf, he continued weeping, for a long time, over his beloved ſon. This interpretation preſents us with a moſt moving image, and, as it is not inconſiſtent with the Moſaic text, we chuſe to adhere to it.

Ver. 31. And Joſeph ſaid unto his brethren, and unto his father's houſe, I will go up, &c.] We may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that ſome days were dedicated by Joſeph, to welcome, in the moſt agreeable manner, his father and family, and in appointing the order of their incampment; aſſigning paſtures for their cattle, and in other neceſſary proviſions, to render their preſent habitation commodious.

When all things requiſite were adjuſted, Joſeph inform'd his father, that it was time for him to go to Pharaoh, and acquaint him with their arrival, that as his majeſty had ſo kindly invited them into his dominions, and had ſo amply impowered him to do whatſoever he ſhould think proper for their welfare, ſo he might now give ſuch directions, as ſhould, to him, ſeem beſt, with reſpect to their being thoroughly ſettled in the land. He alſo inſtructed his brethren, as to the manner in which they ought to behave, when they ſhould be introduced into the preſence of Pharaoh, and obſerved to them, that it was requiſite for them to live in Egypt as they had done in Canaan, without interfering with the concerns of the people of the country. He then pointed out an expedient for their accompliſhment of this intention, without offending either the king or his ſubjects: And directed them to acquaint Pharaoh, that they were ſhepherds by profeſſion, and only verſed in paſtoral affairs, which would naturally diſpoſe the king to ſend them into the land of Goſhen. Shepherds and feeders of cattel being exceedingly deteſted by the Egyptians.

We have already, in our obſervations on the 32d verſe of the 43d chapter, repreſented the opinions of ſome commentators with reference to the deteſtation with which the Egyptians conſidered ſhepherds.

The irruption of the paſtors into Egypt, which, according to ſome expoſitors, was the ſource of the Egyptian abhorrence of all perſons of that profeſſion, is placed, by St. John Marſham, 157 years before the Exodus of the children of Iſrael. Perizonius, drawing a very circumſtantial parallel between what is recorded of the ſhepherds by Manetho, and what is ſaid of the obſcurity of the Iſraelites, the power and dignity of Joſeph, and the miraculous works of Moſes, which almoſt utterly deſtroy'd the country; upon the cloſe, pronounces the ſhepherds, ſo heinouſly ſpoken of, to have been the Iſraelites themſelves. The incomparable Sir Iſaac Newton makes the paſtors to have been the Canaanites who fled from Joſhua, and went into Afric, but in their flight ſeized on the kingdom of the lower Egypt, in the reign of Timaus, whom the ſame author calls Thamus, or Thammuz. Greaves, after a parallel drawn by him between the hiſtory of the ſhepherds and of the Iſraelites, which ſeems as natural and as plauſible as that of Perizonius, will by no means allow them to have been the ſame. The variety of theſe opinions concerning the time when the Hycſos, or king ſhepherds made their irruption, makes it very doubtful, whether the averſion conceived by the Egyptians againſt thoſe who exerciſed a paſtoral life in the time of Joſeph, ſprung from the depredations and conqueſts of thoſe Hycſos.

Gaulmin, in his notes upon the book called the life of Moſes, has more probably conjectured, that this hatred to ſhepherds, aroſe from their being generally addicted, in thoſe parts, to robbery, which render'd their courſe of life abominable to all civilized people. Bochart himſelf inclined to this opinion ſometime before his death, and confirms it in his Hierozoic, L. II. c. 44. p. i. where he alledges many proofs, that ſhepherds were anciently furax hominum genus, a thieviſh race of people, againſt which opinion there is but one exception of any weight; and this is taken from Aulus Gellius, who declares, Lib. XI. cap. 18. out of an ancient lawyer, That the old Egyptians held all manner of theſts to be lawful, and did not puniſh them. Diodorus Siculus likewiſe mentions this law, and adds, That they who intended to live by robbery, were to enter their names, and bring what they ſtole, immediately to the prieſt, with whom it was uſual to mulct the perſon robbed, a fourth part, which was given, by the prieſt, to the thief. All theſts were, by theſe means, diſcovered, and men were render'd more vigilant in the care of their effects. But this law cannot well be thought ſo ancient as the times of Joſeph. Or if it was, thoſe outlaws who robbed on the frontiers, were not included in it, any more than their neighbours, who were no leſs addicted to theft and rapine. Thoſe of Paleſtine, in particular, from whence Jacob came, appear, by what we read, 1 Chron. vii. 21, 22. to have been much addicted to robbery; for before this generation ended, the men of Gath ſlew ſeveral of the ſons of Ephraim, who himſelf was then living, for they came down to take their cattle, ſaith that ſacred hiſtorian, in the laſt cited place, that is, to get what plunder they could in Goſhen, where ſome of the Ephramites defending their cattle, were killed by the Philiſtines, to the great grief of their father. The Egyptians alſo are noted by Strabo, Lib. xvii. p. 787. to have lived, for the moſt part Νομαδικῶς καὶ ἀπέρως, after a ſharking and roving manner, by feeding cattle where they could find food for them. And that great geographer immediately adds Τοῖς Αἰγυπ-

Ἅπαντα τἀναντία συμβέβηκε, all things were quite contrary with the Egyptians, who were a more civilized people, inhabiting certain and known places; which ſhews that their manners were very different, and this circumſtance naturally created averſion in them to the people, who differ'd ſo extremely from them.

It looks like a very generous proceeding in Joſeph, not to conceal from Pharaoh, the quality of his family, tho' men of their profeſſion were in ſo much diſ-repute among the Egyptians. He, however, hoped they would diſtinguiſh themſelves from ſuch lawleſs ſhepherds, who had brought infamy upon the name; and that if they did not gain the love of the Egyptians, they would, at leaſt, be more ſecured in the favour of God, by not learning the evil manners, and ſuperſtitions of that people, which they would be guarded from, by having no converſation with them.

CHAP. XLVII.

1 Joſeph preſenteth five of his brethren, 7 and his father before Pharaoh: 11 He giveth them habitation and maintenance: 13 He getteth all the Egyptians money, 16 their cattel, 18 their lands to Pharaoh: 22 The prieſts land was not bought: 23 He letteth the land to them for a fifth part. 28 Jacobs age: 29 He ſweareth Joſeph to bury him with his fathers.

THEN Joſeph came and told Pharaoh, and ſaid, My father and my brethren, and their flocks, and their herds, and all that they have, are come out of the land of Canaan; and behold they are in the land of Goſhen.

2 And he took ſome of his brethren, even five men, and preſented them unto Pharaoh.

3 And Pharaoh ſaid unto his brethren, What is your occupation? And they ſaid unto Pharaoh, Thy ſervants are ſhepherds, both we and alſo our fathers.

4 They ſaid moreover unto Pharaoh, For to ſojourn in the land are we come: for thy ſervants have no paſture for their flocks, for the famine is ſore in the land of Canaan: now therefore, we pray thee, let thy ſervants dwell in the land of Goſhen.

5 And Pharaoh ſpake unto Joſeph, ſaying, Thy father and thy brethren are come unto thee:

6 The land of Egypt is before thee; in the beſt of the land make thy father and brethren to dwell, in the land of Goſhen let them dwell: and if thou knoweſt any man of activity amongſt them, then make them rulers over my cattel.

7 And Joſeph brought in Jacob his father, and ſet him before Pharaoh: and Jacob bleſſed Pharaoh.

8 And Pharaoh ſaid unto Jacob, how old art thou?

9 And Jacob ſaid unto Pharaoh, The days of the years of my pilgrimage are an hundred and thirty years: few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, and have not attained unto the days of the years of the life of my fathers in the days of their pilgrimage.

10 And Jacob bleſſed Pharaoh, and went out from before Pharaoh.

11 ¶ And Joſeph placed his father and his brethren, and gave them a poſſeſſion in the land of Egypt, in the beſt of the land, in the land of Rameſes, as Pharaoh had commanded.

12 And Joſeph nouriſhed his father, and his brethren, and all his fathers houſhold with bread, according to their families.

13 ¶ And there was no bread in all the land: for the famine was very ſore, ſo that the land of Egypt, and all the land of Canaan fainted by reaſon of the famine.

14 And Joſeph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, for the corn which they bought: and Joſeph brought the money into Pharaohs houſe.

15 And when money failed in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, all the Egyptians came unto Joſeph, and ſaid, Give us bread: for why ſhould we die in thy preſence? For the money faileth.

16 And Joſeph ſaid, Give your cattel; and I will give you for your cattel, if money fail.

17 And they brought their cattel unto Joſeph: and Joſeph gave them bread in exchange for horſes, and for the flocks, and for the cattel of the herds, and for the aſſes: and he fed them with bread, for all their cattel, for that year.

18 When that year was ended, they came unto him the ſecond year, and ſaid unto him, We will not hide it from my lord, how that our money is ſpent, my lord alſo hath our herds of cattel; there is not ought left in the ſight of my lord, but our bodies and our lands.

19 Wherefore ſhall we die before thine eyes, both we and our land? Buy us and our land for bread, and we and our land will be ſervants unto Pharaoh: and give us ſeed, that we may live, and not die, that the land be not deſolate.

20 And Joſeph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh; for the Egyptians ſold every man his field, becauſe the famine prevailed over them: ſo the land became Pharaohs.

21 And as for the people, he removed them to cities, from one end of the borders of Egypt, even to the other end thereof.

22 Only

22 Only the land of the prieſts bought he not: for the prieſts had a portion aſſigned them of Pharaoh, and did eat their portion which Pharaoh gave them; wherefore they ſold not their lands.

23 Then Joſeph ſaid unto the people, Behold, I have bought you this day, and your land for Pharaoh: lo here is ſeed for you, and ye ſhall ſow the land.

24 And it ſhall come to paſs in the increaſe, that you ſhall give the fifth part unto Pharaoh, and four parts ſhall be your own, for ſeed of the field, and for your food, and for them of your houſh-holds, and for food for your little ones.

25 And they ſaid, Thou haſt ſaved our lives: let us find grace in the ſight of my lord, and we will be Pharaohs ſervants.

26 And Joſeph made it a law over the land of Egypt unto this day, that Pharaoh ſhould have the fifth part; except the land of the prieſts only, which became not Pharaohs.

27 ¶ And Iſrael dwelt in the land of Egypt in the country of Goſhen; and they had poſſeſſions therein, and grew, and multiplied exceedingly.

28 And Jacob lived in the land of Egypt ſeventeen years: ſo the whole age of Jacob was an hundred forty and ſeven years.

29 And the time drew nigh that Iſrael muſt die: and he called his ſon Joſeph, and ſaid unto him, If now I have found grace in thy ſight, put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and deal kindly and truly with me; bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt.

30 But I will lie with my fathers, and thou ſhalt carry me out of Egypt, and bury me in their burying place. And he ſaid I will do as thou haſt ſaid.

31 And he ſaid, Swear unto me: and he ſware unto him. And Iſrael bowed himſelf upon the beds head.

Ver. 2. And he took ſome of his brethren, even five men, and preſented them to Pharaoh.] The duty of Joſeph's high ſtation requiring his attendance at court, he returned thither, after he had ſettled the affairs of his father and brethren into ſome order; and he then preſented five of the latter to the king, who received them in a very gracious manner, and permitted them to reſide in the land of Goſhen, according to their requeſt, and at the ſame time directed Joſeph to prefer thoſe of them to be keepers of the royal cattle, as he ſhould find qualified for that ſtation. By which proceeding, the Egyptian monarch diſcovered a generous and grateful inclination to oblige his benefactor Joſeph, in every inſtance wherein either he or his relations could reaſonably deſire his favour.

Ver. 7. And Joſeph brought in Jacob his father and ſet him before Pharaoh; and Jacob bleſſed Pharaoh.] What noble and affecting images does this paſſage preſent to the imagination! Joſeph, the darling of the court of Egypt, introduces his venerable father to a great and generous monarch, who receives him with a majeſtic affability, and ſurveys with pleaſure the aged parent of Egypt's deliverer. The reverend old man, with a mixture of tranſport and reſpect, beholds the prince who had advanced his beloved ſon to the firſt dignities of the kingdom; his ſoul melts with the exſtacy of a father's joy and he bleſſes Pharaoh for the favours he had conferred upon his ſon.

Ver. 8, and 9. And Pharaoh ſaid unto Jacob, how old art thou? And Jacob ſaid unto Pharaoh, the days of my pilgrimage are an hundred and thirty years: Few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, and have not attained unto the days of the years of the life of my fathers, in the days of their pilgrimage] Pharaoh's queſtion was the natural effect of thoſe impreſſions that were created in him, by the venerable figure of Jacob; and it is impoſſible to be unaffected with the eaſtern ſolemnity of the patriarch's anſwer. When he declares, that his days have been few and evil, he ſeems to have ſpoken, partly with reference to the age of his father and grandfather, of whoſe years he then fell ſhort, as he likewiſe did, at the time of his death; and partly with reference to the ſeries of thoſe afflictions he had ſuſtain'd. Thoſe who have read his hiſtory with any attention cannot but be ſenſible, that he was continually exerciſed with calamities and croſſes. The diſagreement in his father's family, with Eſau, who was beloved by Iſaac; his own flight into Meſopotamia; the ſeverity of his ſervice there, under Laban, from whom he might juſtly have expected better treatment; The impoſition of Leah upon him, inſtead of Rachel; his flight from that country; the terrors that racked him before his interview with Eſau; the rape of Dinah; the inhuman ſlaughter of the Shechemites; the untimely death of his beloved Rachel, amidſt the pangs of labour; and finally the loſs of Joſeph, in whom he had placed moſt of his remaining happineſs; are certain teſtimonies, not only to the truth of his ſpeech to Pharaoh, but likewiſe to the general obſervation, that God, by beſtowing the bleſſing of his peculiar choice on the patriarchs, did not exempt them from the misfortunes incident to human life, but furniſhed them only with his grace to enable them to ſuffer their afflictions with patience, and to maintain a conſtant faith in the divine promiſes, with a ſteady reliance on the covenant made with their fathers.

Ver. 14. And Joſeph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, for the corn which they bought: And Joſeph brought the money into Pharaoh's houſe.] Joſeph, in the years of plenty, had collected a ſufficient ſtock of corn, not only for Egypt, but to ſupply the neighbouring countries around: And in the years of famine, when he opened his ſtores, and ſold out his proviſion, he acquired immenſe riches for the king. The Egyptians purchaſed his corn for money, until all the money in the land of Egypt, and all that could be drawn out of Canaan, was depoſited in Pharaoh's treaſury; and they then exchanged their cattle for corn, until the king had purchaſed all thoſe. In the laſt place, they ſold their lands and poſſeſſions, ſo that, by Joſeph's conduct, Pharaoh became the ſole proprietor of the lands, cattle, and money of Egypt. There are two or three particulars very remarkable in Joſeph's management of this affair. 1. When the Egyptians had parted with all their money, cattle, and lands, ver. 15, 17, 18. and ſtill wanted ſuſtenance, they offered to become Pharaoh's ſervants, ver. 19. but Joſeph refuſed to accept of this propoſal. He ſeems to have a great and true inſight into things, and could not think, that he ſhould really advance his maſter's intereſt, by keeping his ſubjects in poverty and ſlavery. He was deſirous to eſtabliſh a ſufficient revenue for the occaſions of the crown, and, at the ſame time, to give the ſubjects a property of their own, as well to excite their induſtry to improve it, as to raiſe in them a ſenſe of duty and affection to the government that protected them in the ſecure enjoyment of it. For this reaſon, Joſeph returned back poſſeſſions to all the people, upon condition of their paying yearly the fifth part of the product of their lands, to their king for ever, ver. 24. 2. When he returned the lands back again to the people, he did not reinſtate each perſon in the poſſeſſion of his former property, but removed them them from one end of Egypt to the other; ver. 21. wiſely foreſeeing, that few men would have ſo eaſy a ſenſe of their condition in the enjoyment of what had formerly been their own, without much taxation or burthen, but now received upon terms of diſadvantage, as they would have in poſſeſſion of what was never their own, tho' they held it upon the ſame conditions. 3. When Joſeph bought in the lands of Egypt for Pharaoh, he bought not the prieſt's lands, ver. 22. for they did eat their portion which Pharaoh gave them, and therefore ſold not their lands, and ſo, when afterwards the kingdom came to be taxed the fifth part, the prieſt's lands were exempted, becauſe they became not Pharaoh's, ver. 26.

Lord Shaftsbury makes the following remark upon this favourable treatment of the prieſts. "To what a height "of power the eſtabliſhed prieſthood was arrived even at "that time, may be conjectured hence; That the crown "(to ſpeak in a modern ſtyle) offered not to intermeddle "with the Church-lands; and that in this great revoluti- "on, nothing was attempted ſo much as by way of pur- "chaſe or exchange, in prejudice of this landed clergy; "the prime miniſter himſelf having joined his intereſt with "theirs, and entered by marriage into this alliance." Characteriſt. Vol 3. Miſcel. 1.

In anſwer to which it may be obſerved, 1. That the prieſts of Egypt were the heads of all the families in the land, not raiſed to be ſo by their prieſthood, but they became prieſts, becauſe they were originally perſons of the higheſt rank. They were reputed almoſt equal to the kings; conſulted upon all affairs of conſequence, and ſome of them, generally upon a vacancy, ſucceeded to the crown; and therefore it does not ſeem likely, that they ſhould want Joſeph's aſſiſtance to ſtrengthen their intereſt, or to obtain them any favour. 2. Whatever favour was ſhewn them, Moſes repreſents it as proceeding from the king, and not from Joſeph: The land of the prieſts bought he not [ki chock le cohanim meeth Pharaoh] becauſe there was a decree for (in favour of) the prieſts from even Pharaoh, as the paſſage in the 22d verſe might have been render'd, or we may tranſlate the words agreeably to our Engliſh verſion, becauſe there was an appointment for the prieſts, from even Pharaoh, and they did eat their appointed or aſſigned portion, which Pharaoh gave them, wherefore they ſold not their lands: Take the words either way, the favour to the prieſts proceeded from Pharaoh. It may perhaps be here asked, why Pharaoh, when he thought fit to leſſen the property of his common ſubjects, did not alſo attempt to reduce, in ſome meaſure, the exorbitant wealth of the prieſts, who, according to Diodorus Siculus, Lib. I. p. 96. were poſſeſſed of a third part of the whole land? To this we may anſwer, the Egyptian prieſts were obliged to provide all ſacrifices, and to bear all the charges of the national religion; and religion was, in thoſe days, a very great expence to them, who were to ſupply what was requiſite for the performance of its reſpective offices. The numerous ſacrifices that were appointed to be offered in thoſe times, could not be provided, nor the preparations and ceremonies in offering them, performed, without an extraordinary charge; and indeed at one ſo very great, that we find in countries, where the ſoil was not fruitful, and conſequently the people poor, they did not well know how to bear the burthen of Religion; and therefore Lycurgus, when he reformed the Lacedemonian ſtate, inſtituted the meaneſt and cheapeſt ſacrifices he could invent, that he might not render religion too expenſive for his people [Plut. in vita Lycurg.] Egypt, on the contrary, was a rich and fertile country, and, moſt probably, both king and people were deſirous of having the public religion appear with a ſuitable ſplendour: And we do not find, that even Ariſtotle could compute, that leſs than a fourth part of the lands of his republick, could ſuffice for theſe uſes; [Ariſt. de Repub. l. 7.] and ſuppoſe we ſhould allow them no more in Egypt, yet there would ſtill remain a difficulty; for the prieſts of Egypt, were the whole body of the nobility: They were the king's counſellors and aſſiſtants in all affairs that concerned the republick; they were joint agents with him, (ωσπερει in ſome things (Diodor. Sic. ubi ſupra) In ſome others, the king himſelf was to be directed and inſtructed by them; in theſe they are ſaid to be his εισηγηται και διδασκαλοι (Diodor. Sic. ubi ſupra) They were the profeſſors and cultivators of aſtronomy, an uſeful ſcience in that country, and without which agriculture itſelf could not have been properly conducted. They were the keepers of the public regiſters, memoirs, and chronicles of the kingdom; in a word, under the king, they were the magiſtrates, and filled all prime offices. And if we conſider them in ſome or other of theſe views, we may poſſibly find reaſon to allow, that Pharaoh might think they had not too much to ſupport the ſtations they were to act in, and for that reaſon, he ordered that they ſhould not be ſubject to any taxation.

Ver. 29. And the time drew nigh, that Iſrael muſt die: And he called his ſon Joſeph, and ſaid unto him, if now I have found grace in thy ſight, put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and deal kindly and truly with me; bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt.] Tho' there be ſomething of a natural deſire in moſt men, to be buried in the place where their anceſtors lie, yet Jacob's averſion to have his remains depoſited in Egypt, ſeems to be more earneſt than ordinary, otherwiſe he would never have impoſed an oath upon his ſon Joſeph, nor charged all his ſons with his dying breath, nor to ſuffer that to be done. For he very well knew, that had his body been buried in Egypt, his poſterity, upon that very account, would have been too much wedded to the country, ever to attempt the acquiſition of the promiſed land; and therefore, to wean them from the thoughts of continuing in Egypt, and to fix their minds and affections in Canaan, he ordered his body to be conveyed thither, in teſtimony that he died in full perſuaſion of the truth of the promiſes, which were given to him, and his anceſtors: Nor was it inconvenient, that future generations, after their return into Canaan, ſhould have before their eyes the ſepulchre of their fore-fathers, for a record of their virtues, and an incitement to their imitation of them: But the ſtrongeſt motive of all, for Jacob's deſiring to be interred in Canaan (ſuppoſing that he foreknew, that the great Meſſiah was to live, and die, and riſe again with ſome others in that country) was, that he might be one of that bleſſed number: As it was indeed, an ancient tradition in the church, that, among thoſe who came out of their graves after our Lord's reſurrection, the patriarch Jacob was one.

Ver. 31. And he ſaid ſwear unto me: And he ſware unto him. And Iſrael bowed himſelf on the beds head.] Some expoſitors, preſuming, that this bowing was a religious action, will by no means have it directed to Joſeph, but to God only, for the aſſurance which Joſeph had given him, that he ſhould be buried according to his deſire. But if the original word muſt be tranſlated bowed, there is no need to make it an act of adoration, but only a common form of civility, with which a father might comply, without any diminution to his ſuperiority over his ſon. What led theſe expoſitors into this conception, was the verſion of the Septuagint, and the words of the Apoſtle to the Hebrews, where Jacob is ſaid (in alluſion as they ſuppoſe to this paſſage) to have worſhipped on the top of his ſtaff, Heb. xi. But the plain truth is, that the Apoſtle there ſpeaks of a different tranſaction, not of what Jacob did now, when Joſeph ſwore unto him, but of what he ſaid, when he bleſſed his other children: In the former caſe, he ſeems to have kept his bed: But, in the latter, to have a freſh ſupply of Spirits, and he then ſat upon his bed, tho' leaning perhaps upon his ſtaff. So that the Apoſtle's words are not taken from thoſe of Moſes, but are a reflection of his own, whereby he intimates the ſtrength of Jacob's faith, even when he was ſo weak, as not to be able to bow himſelf, and worſhip, without the help of his ſtaff. This clearly removes the difficulty, and reconciles Moſes and the Apoſtle very perfectly; but ſtill there ſeems to be a more compendious way of doing this; for ſince the word Schacah, which ſignifies, to bow the body, may, likewiſe be render'd to lie, or fall down, the moſt natural tranſlation ſeems to be, he laid himſelf down on his pillow, as is uſual for weak perſons, after they have ſat up a-while, to diſpatch ſome buſineſs.

CHAP.

CHAP. XLVIII.

1 Joſeph with his ſons viſiteth his ſick father: 2 Jacob ſtrengtheneth himſelf to bleſs them: 3 He repeateth the promiſe: 5 He taketh Ephraim and Manaſſeh as his own: 7 He telleth Joſeph of his mothers grave: 9 He bleſſeth Ephraim and Manaſſeh: 17 He preferreth the younger before the elder: 21 He propheſieth their return to Canaan.

AND it came to paſs after theſe things, that one told Joſeph, Behold, thy father is ſick: and he took with him his two ſons, Manaſſeh and Ephraim.

2 And one told Jacob, and ſaid, Behold, thy ſon Joſeph cometh unto thee: and Iſrael ſtrengthened himſelf, and ſat upon the bed.

3 And Jacob ſaid unto Joſeph, God almighty appeared unto me at Luz in the land of Canaan, and bleſſed me.

4 And ſaid unto me, Behold, I will make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, and I will make of thee a multitude of people, and will give this land to thy ſeed after thee, for an everlaſting poſſeſſion.

5 ¶ And now thy two ſons, Ephraim and Manaſſeh, which were born unto thee in the land of Egypt, before I came unto thee into Egypt, are mine: as Reuben and Simeon, they ſhall be mine.

6 And thy iſſue which thou begetteſt after them, ſhall be thine, and ſhall be called after the name of their brethren in their inheritance.

7 And as for me, when I came from Padan, Rachel died by me in the land of Canaan, in the way, when yet there was but a little way to come unto Ephrath: and I buried her there in the way of Ephrath, the ſame is Beth-lehem.

8 And Iſrael beheld Joſephs ſons, and ſaid, Who are theſe?

9 And Joſeph ſaid unto his father, They are my ſons, whom God hath given me in this place: And he ſaid, Bring them, I pray thee, unto me, and I will bleſs them.

10 (Now the eyes of Iſrael were dim for age, ſo that he could not ſee) And he brought them near unto him; and he kiſſed them, and embraced them.

11 And Iſrael ſaid unto Joſeph, I had not thought to ſee thy face: and lo, God hath ſhewed me alſo thy ſeed.

12 And Joſeph brought them out from between his knees, and he bowed himſelf with his face to the earth.

13 And Joſeph took them both, Ephraim in his right hand towards Iſraels left hand, and Manaſſeh in his left hand towards Iſraels right hand, and brought them near unto him.

14 And Iſrael ſtretched out his right hand, and laid it upon Ephraims head, who was the younger, and his left hand upon Manaſſehs head: guiding his hands wittingly; for Manaſſeh was the firſt-born.

15 ¶ And he bleſſed Joſeph, and ſaid, God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Iſaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day.

16 The angel which redeemed me from all evil, bleſs the lads; and let my name be named on them, and the name of my fathers Abraham and Iſaac: and let them grow into a multitude in the midſt of the earth.

17 And when Joſeph ſaw that his father laid his right hand upon the head of Ephraim, it diſpleaſed him: and he held up his fathers hand, to remove it from Ephraims head unto Manaſſehs head.

18 And Joſeph ſaid unto his father, Not ſo, my father: for this is the firſt-born; put thy right hand upon his head.

19 And his father refuſed, and ſaid, I know it, my ſon, I know it; he alſo ſhall become a people, and he alſo ſhall be great: but truly his younger brother ſhall be greater than he, and his ſeed ſhall become a multitude of nations.

20 And he bleſſed them that day, ſaying, In thee ſhall Iſrael bleſs, ſaying, God make thee as Ephraim, and as Manaſſeh: and he ſet Ephraim before Manaſſeh.

21 And Iſrael ſaid unto Joſeph, Behold, I die; but God ſhall be with you, and bring you again unto the land of your fathers.

22 Moreover, I have given to thee one portion above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorite with my ſword and with my bow.

Ver. 1. And it came to paſs, after theſe things, that one told Joſeph, Behold thy father is ſick: and he took with him his two ſons, Manaſſeh and Ephraim.] The important affairs of ſtate, which were under the direction of Joſeph, obliged him to ſhorten his viſit to his father, wherefore having quieted the mind of Iſrael, by the faithful promiſe he made of burying him, in the manner he himſelf directed, he took his leave, and returned to the duties of his high ſtation. But the ſtrength of the old patriarch declining now apace, his eye-ſight failing him, and every day adding to the number of his infirmities, it was not long before Joſeph was again called to attend him, becauſe he appeared to be in evident danger of a ſpeedy departure out of the world. Joſeph, therefore, taking with him his two ſons, went down a ſecond time into the land of Goſhen, being deſirous that his children might receive the bleſſing of their grand-father before his deceaſe, for he undoubtedly was acquainted with the nature and efficacy of paternal benediction, and muſt have heard, in particular, of the extraordinary bleſſing pronounced by Iſaac on Iſrael his father, tho' to the prejudice of Eſau, his elder brother, and in the hopes of ſharing which, we may naturally ſuppoſe Joſeph himſelf to have been educated.

Ver. 3. And Jacob ſaid unto Joſeph, God Almighty appeared unto me at Luz, &c.] The aged patriarch, hearing that his favourite ſon was come, ſummoned all his ſpirits together, and was ſo far revived, as to be able to ſit up in his bed; and addreſſing himſelf to him, ſpoke with ſuch chearfulneſs, and in ſuch ſtrong and lively terms, as were far from having any ſimilitude to the dotage or weakneſs of a ſuperannuated and dying old man. He began with recapitulating all the glorious promiſes which God had formerly made to him, with relation to the numerous poſterity that was to ſpring from his loins, and by whom the land of Canaan was to be poſſeſſed and inhabited; and concluded with the death of his dear Rachel. As if he had ſaid, How tenderly I loved her, all my family can teſtify, but I intend to give this additional proof of my affection for her. You have two ſons born in a foreign country, and who, according to the uſual circumſtances of inheritance, ſhould have only the portion of grand-children, in the diviſion of the promiſed land; but I will do more for them, and they ſhall, from this day, be called by my name, be eſteemed my ſons, and receive a double lot, as heads of two diſtinct tribes, for they ſhall not be called the tribe of Joſeph, but the tribe of Ephraim and Manaſſeh.

Ver. 6. And thy iſſue which thou begetteſt after them ſhall be thine, and ſhall be called after the name of their brethren in their inheritance.] The ſons that may happen to be born to thee, after theſe thy two children, ſhall be entitled only to the portion of grand-children. There cannot well be any thing plainer, than the import of this paſſage, as related by Moſes Iſrael certainly intended to diſtinguiſh, more fully, his deſign in the diſpoſitions he had made, with regard to the ſons of Joſeph; and he declared that, tho' by adoption, he aſſumed them into the number of his own children; yet the ſons which Joſeph might afterwards beget, were not to expect any ſuch privilege or favour; but on the contrary, were to be eſteemed as the children of their brethren Ephraim and Manaſſeh, ſo that thoſe two tribes were to comprehend the whole poſterity of Joſeph. The Hebrews have fallen into many miſtakes on this head; ſome fancying, that the children, born afterwards to Joſeph, were excluded from any ſhare in the land of Canaan, whilſt others think, that thoſe mentioned in ſcripture, as the ſons of Ephraim and Manaſſeh, were really the ſons of Joſeph, and only comprehended under the tribes of Ephraim and Manaſſeh; neither of which notions have any foundation; the true meaning of the text being conditional, only if Joſeph ſhould afterwards have other children; but it does not follow from thence, that he really had any other than thoſe whom his father adopted. Whether Joſeph had any iſſue born after Iſrael's death, is not to be aſcertained from the ſacred ſcriptures; ſince, if he had, no mention is made of them, becauſe they were included in the houſholds of their brethren, according to Iſrael's deſire. So that it evidently appears, a double portion was intended for Joſeph's deſcendants, and no more.

Ver. 7. And as for me, when I came from Padan, Rachel died by me, in the land of Canaan, &c.] What Iſrael ſpake concerning the death and interment of Rachel, is ſo little connected with what the patriarch was before declaring to Joſeph, that commentators have been not a little embarraſſed, in their attempts to account for the mention of it here. Aben Ezra tells us, that Iſrael intended hereby to excuſe himſelf to his ſon, for not burying his mother in the cave Machpelah, becauſe ſhe died ſuddenly on the road; as fearing, on that reflection, that Joſeph might think it hard to attend his body from Egypt into Canaan, when he had neglected to carry that of Rachel from Ephrath to Mamre. Many Hebrew authors have followed this opinion, at leaſt with little alteration; and ſome other ſolutions have been offered, which, on examination, ſeem to have no probability in them. It is therefore more likely, that Iſrael intended to inſinuate the reaſon of transferring the double portion to Joſeph, from Rachel's ſudden death in child-bed; whereby being deprived of iſſue by his beloved wife; Iſrael, by adopting Ephraim and Manaſſeh, in ſome meaſure, increaſed her children, and repaired that loſs. He, at the ſame time, beſtowing the right of primogeniture, on the eldeſt ſon of her, who, if he had not been deceived by Laban, would have been his only wife. Taken in this ſenſe, it ſerves to explain and illuſtrate what went before, which is the reaſon why we prefer this interpretation to the reſt; ſince none of thoſe aſſign any means for reconciling the import of this paſſage with the current of the hiſtory, and with the ſpeech Iſrael is then ſuppoſed to be making to Joſeph his ſon.

Ver. 8. And Iſrael beheld Joſeph's ſons, and ſaid, who are theſe?] All this while Iſrael, whoſe ſight was much impaired, talked to Joſeph concerning his children, as if they had been abſent, but when he was made ſenſible that they ſtood before him, he rejoiced, and then ordered them to be brought near him, in order to his pronouncing his benediction upon them. Joſeph, in obedience to his father's command, placed his ſons between Iſrael's knees, and the affectionate old man then embraced them with the utmoſt tenderneſs, ſaying, at the ſame time to Joſeph, I deſpaired of ſeeing thy face any more, and lo! God, in his mercy hath ſhewed me thy ſeed alſo.

Ver. 14. And Iſrael ſtretched out his right hand, and laid it upon Ephraim's head, who was the younger, and his left hand upon Manaſſeh's head: Guiding his hands wittingly; for Manaſſeh was the firſt born.] Joſeph had placed his children in a poſition that correſponded with the order of their birth; that they might receive his father's bleſſing, but Iſrael croſſing his hands, laid his right, which carried with it an intimation of the preference, upon the younger, and his left upon the elder. In the hiſtory of the patriarchs Abraham, and Iſaac, we have ſeveral inſtances of the great efficacy of their prayers; their power in uttering God's purpoſes, and in manifeſting the future ſtate and condition of a people, even unto lateſt times. Joſeph therefore, whoſe genius was adapted to ſuch inquiries, might well be ſuppoſed to have had a clear idea of the paternal benediction, and conſequently he muſt have been very attentive to his father's expreſſions, and, indeed, every circumſtance of this tranſaction, proves he was ſo, and that all his thoughts were taken up in conſidering the prayer pronounced by his father. Previous to this, he had placed his ſons in that order, in which he deſired they might receive the bleſſing; for, knowing the dimneſs of Iſrael's ſight, he, by this proceeding, endeavoured to avoid any poſſibility of a miſtake, by leaving nothing for the old man to do, but to ſtretch his hands out directly forward. It may, perhaps, be inquired, how Joſeph came, after this precaution, to withdraw his eyes from Iſrael's poſture, before he ſaw his right hand laid, as he deſigned it, on Manaſſeh's head? But if we conſider how uſual it is for men to act with peculiar caution in the preliminaries to great affairs, and yet be guilty of overſight in the laſt, and moſt material paſſages, we need not be much ſurpriſed, eſpecially, if we obſerve alſo, how far an extraordinary providence interpoſed in this tranſaction; from whence a new inſtance was to ariſe of the freedom of God's gifts, which are not regulated by any laws that human wiſdom is privileged to adjuſt. The inſpired hiſtorian was careful to acquaint us, that the poſition of Iſrael's hands did not proceed from any deficiency of ſight, but from the internal diſpoſition of his mind, which, in concurrence with the impreſſions of the holy ſpirit, inclined him, notwithſtanding his infirmity, to find out Ephraim, and lay his right hand upon him, as he had predetermined; for in mentioning the two brothers, he had named Ephraim before Manaſſeh, ver. 5. And as this prophetic Teſtament of Iſrael, was a tranſaction of extraordinary importance, not only in regulating the right of the perſons concerned, and their poſterity, but alſo the recital of it by Moſes was intended by the Almighty, to be a ſtrong proof of the divine authority, of the facts related by the great hiſtorian. It appears therefore, by the context, that the conduct of Iſrael, on this occaſion, was the reſult of mature deliberation, and not a ſudden effect of the contingent circumſtances, then preſented to him.

Ver. 16. The Angel which redeemed me from all evil, bleſs the lads,] Many of the beſt commentators are of opinion, that this redeeming angel, was the bleſſed Saviour of the world, and the ſecond perſon in the moſt Holy Trinity. Others again, underſtand no more from this expreſſion, than that Iſrael meant an angel, by whoſe miniſtration he had been preſerved from imminent danger; this explication is indeed more accommodated to modern ſentiments, but we cannot think that circumſtance any proof of its being preferable to the other.

Ver. 18, 19. And Joſeph ſaid unto his father, not ſo, my father: for this is the firſt-born; put thy right hand upon his head. And his father refuſed, and ſaid, I know it my ſon, I know it; he alſo ſhall become a people, and he alſo ſhall be great: but truly his younger brother ſhall be greater than he, and his ſeed ſhall become a multitude of nations.]

Iſrael

Iſrael is here prophecying in direct terms, and refuſes to comply with his ſon Joſeph's deſire of bleſſing the firſt-born with his right hand: Informing him, at the ſame time, that it was not any miſtake in him, but that the will of God, which he was now declaring, had ſo directed him, and that he had not any power to alter or vary from it. We may properly obſerve on this occaſion, that as Moſes was an author very ſuccinct in his narrations, it may juſtly be ſuppoſed, that there is ſomething of weight and importance in every point on which he dwells, or is careful to repeat. An attentive and intelligent reader, therefore, cannot omit remarking, how diſtinctly he explains God's-rejecting the elder, in a multitude of inſtances; as in chooſing Abel rather than Cain; Abraham in preference to his brethren; Iſaac to Iſhmael; and Jacob to Eſau; Joſeph likewiſe is rendered ſuperior to many of his brethren, who were older than himſelf, and Ephraim is declared to be greater than Manaſſeh, who was born before him; doubtleſs to intimate, as we have already obſerved, the freedom and illimitation of God's gifts, and their being unattainable by the meer deſires of parents, in favour of particular children, how juſt and holy ſoever thoſe parents may have been. This Prophecy of Iſrael was exactly fulfilled, as we read in the firſt chapter of the book of Numbers, where it is related, that Moſes found of the Ephramites, fit for war, forty thouſand and five hundred, and of the Manaſſites only thirty-two thouſand, and two hundred. How they differed in other reſpects, in the particulars wherein Ephraim's poſterity had the ſuperiority, will be render'd evident in the courſe of this work.

Ver. 20. And he bleſſed them that day, ſaying, In thee ſhall Iſrael bleſs, ſaying, God make thee as Ephraim, and as Manaſſeh, and he ſet Ephraim before Manaſſeh.] Iſrael proceeded yet farther in his bleſſing, and turning to Joſeph, ſaid, in theſe ſhall Iſrael bleſs; as if he had ſaid, Thy felicity ſhall be a proverb among my poſterity, and they ſhall ſay, God make thee as Ephraim, and as Manaſſeh, when they would bleſs one another. The Targum of Jonathan informs us, that it was uſual for the Jews to pray for children, at their circumciſion, in this form, God make thee happy as Ephraim, and as Manaſſeh.

Ver. 22. Moreover I have given to thee one portion above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorite, with my ſword, and with my bow.] Three queſtions naturally ariſe from this paſſage. Firſt, What this portion was, which Iſrael gave to Joſeph above his brethren? Secondly, How he could be ſaid to have acquired it by his ſword and bow? And thirdly, Who the people, ſtyled Amorites, were, from whom he took it. As to the firſt, we are of opinion, with the learned biſhop Patrick, that Iſrael doth not mean the city of Shechem, which his ſons took unjuſtly and cruelly, (and not from the Amorites, but the Hivites) without his knowledge, and contrary to his will: But that piece of land, which he bought of Hamor, father of Shechem; and this donation to Joſeph, ſeems to be the reaſon why that patriarch was himſelf buried there, as in his own ground given him by his father, and not in the cave of Macphelah. With reſpect to the ſecond queſtion, how he could be ſaid to have acquired it by his ſword and his bow, (which comprehended all inſtruments of war) ſince he purchaſed it for an hundred pieces of ſilver of Hamor the Hivite? It may be ſuppoſed, that he recovered it from the Amorites, who had ſeized on it, after his removal to another part of Canaan; and would not reſtore it, without military compulſion. We read nothing, indeed, in the Moſaic hiſtory, either of their invading his poſſeſſions, or their expulſion from thence. But the Scripture relates many things to have been done, without mentioning the circumſtances of time and place: And when Iſrael ſays he took this portion out of the hand of the Amorite, it ſeems natural to think it was his own property, before that action; for it cannot be ſuppoſed, that he himſelf would diveſt other perſons of their rights, when he was ſo offended with his own ſons, for their violent proceedings and depredations in Shechem. Nor could an acquiſition unjuſtly wreſted from another, be a proper preſent for Iſrael to offer Joſeph, when he was bleſſing him and his children with ſo much ſolemnity. The third queſtion, is already explained in our ſolution of the ſecond.

CHAP. XLIX.

1 Jacob calleth his ſons to bleſs them: 3 Their bleſſing in particular: 29 He chargeth them about his burial: 33 He dieth.

AND Jacob called unto his ſons, and ſaid, Gather yourſelves together, that I may tell you that which ſhall befall you in the laſt days.

2 Gather yourſelves together, and hear, ye ſons of Jacob; and hearken unto Iſrael your father.

3 ¶ Reuben, thou art my firſt-born, my might, and the beginning of my ſtrength, the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power.

4 Unſtable as water, thou ſhalt not excel, becauſe thou wenteſt up to thy fathers bed: then defiledſt thou it; he went up to my couch.

5 ¶ Simeon and Levi are brethren: inſtruments of cruelty are in their habitations.

6 O my ſoul, come not thou into their ſecret; unto their aſſembly, mine honour, be not thou united: for in their anger they ſlew a man, and in their ſelf-will they digged down a wall.

7 Curſed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel: I will divide them in Jacob, and ſcatter them in Iſrael.

8 ¶ Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren ſhall praiſe; thy hand ſhall be in the neck of thine enemies: thy fathers children ſhall bow down before thee.

9 Judah is a lions whelp; from the prey, my ſon, thou art gone up: he ſtooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion; who ſhall rouſe him up?

10 The ſceptre ſhall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him ſhall the gathering of the people be.

11 Binding his fole unto the vine, and his aſs's colt unto the choice vine; he waſhed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes.

12 His eyes ſhall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk.

13 ¶ Zebulun ſhall dwell at the haven of the ſea: and he ſhall be for an haven of ſhips; and his border ſhall be unto Zidon.

14 ¶ Iſſachar is a ſtrong aſs, couching down between two burdens.

15 And he ſaw that reſt was good, and the land that it was pleaſant; and bowed his his ſhoulder to bear, and became a ſervant unto tribute.

16 ¶ Dan ſhall judge his people, as one of the tribes of Iſrael.

17 Dan ſhall be a ſerpent by the way, an adder in the path; that biteth the horſe-heels, ſo that his rider ſhall fall backward.

18 I have waited for thy ſalvation, O LORD.

19 ¶ Gad, a troop ſhall overcome him: but he ſhall overcome at the laſt.

20 ¶ Out of Aſher his bread ſhall be fat, and he ſhall yield royal dainties.

21 ¶ Naphtali is a hind let looſe: he giveth goodly words.

22 ¶ Joſeph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well; whoſe branches run over the wall.

23 The archers have ſorely grieved him, and ſhot at him, and hated him.

24 But his bow abode in ſtrength, and the arms of his hands were made ſtong, by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob: from thence is the ſhepherd, the ſtone of Iſrael.

25 Even by the God of thy father who ſhall help thee, and by the Almighty, who ſhall bleſs thee with bleſſings of heaven above, bleſſings of the deep that lieth under, bleſſings of the breaſts, and of the womb.

26 The bleſſings of thy father have prevailed above the bleſſings of my progenitors, unto the utmoſt bound of the everlaſting hills; they ſhall be on the head of Joſeph, and on the crown of the head of him that was ſeparate from his brethren.

27 ¶ Benjamin ſhall ravin as a wolf: in the morning he ſhall devour the prey, and at night he ſhall divide the ſpoil.

28 ¶ All theſe are the twelve tribes of Iſrael: and this is it that their father ſpake unto them, and bleſſed them; every one according to his bleſſing he bleſſed them.

29 And he charged them, and ſaid unto them, I am to be gathered unto my people: bury me with my fathers, in the cave that is in the field of Ephron the Hittite,

30 In the cave that is in the field of Machpelah, which is before Mamre, in the land of Canaan, which Abraham bought with the field of Ephon the Hittite, for a poſſeſſion of a burying-place.

31 (There they buried Abraham and Sarah his wife, there they buried Iſaac and Rebekah his wife, and there I buried Leah)

32 The purchaſe of the field and of the cave that is therein, was from the children of Heth.

33 And when Jacob had made an end of commanding his ſons, he gathered up his feet into the bed, and yielded up the ghoſt, and was gathered unto his people.

Ver. 1. And Jacob called unto his ſons, and ſaid, gather yourſelves together, that I may tell you that which ſhall befall you, in the laſt days.] Jacob, having now exhauſted his ſpirits, and finding his death approaching, reſolved to conſecrate his few remaining hours in foretelling to his ſons, whom he had gathered about him, what ſhould happen to them in the latter days; and as no prophecy was ever more punctually fulfilled than this, we ſhall endeavour to repreſent it to our readers, in a more familiar and intelligible ſtile, than we have it in our verſion, and without departing from the ſenſe of the original; and where any difficulty ariſes in our way, we ſhall offer thoſe explanations as ſeem moſt ſatisfactory. It will not be improper to premiſe, that what Jacob pronounced, or rather propheſied, concerning his ſons, is not ſo much to be underſtood as foretold of them, as of their tribes; nor what ſhould immediately happen to them, but what was not to have its completion till ſome time, at leaſt, after their entrance to the promiſed land. When he ſays, for inſtance, that Zebulun ſhall dwell along the ſea coaſts; or that Naphtali is a well ſpread tree, yielding graſts and fair branches; it is plain that he means by the firſt, that the lot of the tribe of Zebulun, ſhould be by the ſea-ſide, and by the laſt, that the Naphtalites ſhould prove, in time, very powerful and numerous. This is what the event has fully verified, and what will be further proved, in the ſequel of theſe annotations. The good old Patriarch, after a moſt pathetick preface to engage the deepeſt attention of his ſons, began with the firſt born in the following manner, which entirely correſponds with the Hebrew, tho' it differs in ſome reſpects, from our Engliſh tranſlation.

Ver. 3, 4. "Reuben thou art my firſt born, and wert once "the firſt-fruits of my might and my ſtrength, and, as ſuch, "thou wert intitled to the right of primogeniture, the "beſt portion in thy inheritance; to the dignity of the "prieſthood, and the ſupreme authority over thy brethren: But all theſe prerogatives, like the unſtable "waters, that paſs by, and return no more, are gone "from thee; becauſe thou, little regarding the ſacredneſs of thy father's bed, didſt defile it, and alienate it "from me, for which crime, tho' thou doſt continue ſtill "to be a tribe in Iſrael, yet thou ſhall be far inferior to "the reſt of thy brethren, either in number, wealth, or "ſtrength.

It is evident by the ſequel of the Jewiſh hiſtory, that, the tribe of Reuben continued in obſcurity, and without any of the marks of diſtinction, which uſed to be annexed to the right of primogeniture; ſuch as a double portion, ſupreme authority, and the prieſthood. Accordingly, the Jewiſh expoſitors, eſpecially the Bereſhith Rabbah, or large comment on Geneſis, tell us, that he fell from a three-fold dignity, viz. primogeniture, prieſthood, and Royalty. But becauſe thou art fallen, continues the commentator, thy primogeniture is given to Joſeph (who accordingly had two portions alloted to him) the prieſthood to Levi, and the ſcepter to Judah. And where it is ſaid of this laſt, thy brethren ſhall praiſe thee, he paraphraſes it thus: Thy brethren ſhall be called by thy name, that is, they will not ſay I am a Reubenite, or a Simeonite, but a Jew.

Ver. 5, 6, 7. "Simeon or Levi, might have ſucceeded "to the right of primogeniture, of which their brother's "inceſt has juſtly depriv'd him, had they not proved "ſuch inſtruments of treacherous cruelty. May my "ſoul be for ever preſerved from ſuch bloody councils, "and mine honour unſtained with their horrid guilt: "For the fierceneſs of their anger hurried them to commit murder, and the impetuoſity of their fury made "them break through all obſtacles that oppoſed them.

"Curſed

" Curſed be their fury, for it was violent, and their " malice, for it was inhuman. This cruel diſpoſition of " their's obliges me to divide their tribes, that they may " never be rejoin'd in Iſrael."

Theſe words of Iſrael imply a double diſperſion, viz. of the two tribes from each other, and of their interſperſion among the reſt. Levi, accordingly, had no inheritance among his brethren, in the land of Canaan, but had a certain number of cities aſſigned to him in every tribe. As for that of Simeon, it had properly but a portion of Judah's inheritance, if we except ſome few places, which they acquired upon mount Seir, and in the wilds of the valley of Gedor. 1 Chron. iv. 39, 40.

Thus far the good old Patriarch had performed a ſevere and ungrateful task, and his prophecy againſt thoſe two tribes was exactly verified in due time, as we have already made it evident. Then caſting his eyes on Judah, with a joy equal to the indignation he had expreſſed againſt his other brethren, he addreſſed himſelf to him thus.

Ver. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12. " Judah, thy name ſignifies " praiſe, and accordingly thou ſhalt have the praiſe of all " thy brethren: They ſhall fall proſtrate before thee, as " before their king and ſovereign, and thine enemies ſhall " be compelled to ſubmit their necks to thy yoke. " Like a young lion ſhall my ſon fall upon his prey, " and like an old lion, ready to ruſh upon it; who " ſhall dare to rouſe him up? The ſcepter ſhall not " depart from Judah, nor the lawgiver from between " his feet, until Shiloh come, and the people be ga- " thered unto him. His portion ſhall abound with ſuch " fertile vineyards, fruitful trees, and paſture grounds, " that he ſhall tie his aſs to the vine and palm tree, " and waſh his garments in the juice of the grape, and " his teeth with the milk of his kine."

The ſenſe as well as completion of this noble prophecy, being very much diſputed between the Jews and us, we have endeavoured to render the latter part of the tenth verſe more agreeably to the original, which, in its plain and obvious ſenſe, affirms, that the ſcepter ſhall not depart from Judah till Shiloh was come, and till the nations were gathered unto, or brought to his obedience. This verſion is more effectually proved by the event, for the Jews did not loſe their ſcepter, or Sanhedrim, which was their Bethdin, or higheſt court of judicature and ſupreme legiſlative power, till the Heathens became converts to Chriſtianity, of whom Cornelius was the firſt, Acts x. And the Jews themſelves own, that this ſupreme court did ſtill ſubſiſt from the time of Moſes the founder of it, to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem by the Romans. They likewiſe own, that the word Sheveth, which we tranſlate ſcepter, doth not always ſignify the royal power, but ſometimes only the legiſlative. The latter Jews, therefore, finding themſelves embarraſſed by this prophecy, rather than allow the received interpretation of the ancients, which is agreeable to ours, have fallen into a variety of abſurd notions, which they are not aſhamed to defend with a zeal peculiar to them. Thus ſome will have the meaning of this paſſage to be, that the Meſſiah ſhall not come, till Shiloh, the place ſo called, be deſtroyed, or the Jewiſh monarchy be at an end. Others by Sheveth, underſtand a tribe, which that word alſo ſignifies, and think the meaning to be, that Judah ſhould not ceaſe to be a tribe, till the coming of the Meſſiah, in which they have been alſo followed by ſome Chriſtians; becauſe that tribe did viſibly ſubſiſt, as ſuch, till the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; but ſo did that of Levi. However, many of our modern Jews obſtinately adhere to this ſenſe, and ſcruple not to affirm, that it has ſubſiſted, not only to that time, but even to this very day, pure and unmixed. Others add, that it retains ſtill a kind of ſcepter, or royal power, beyond the river Euphrates; and that the Naſſi, or head of it, is a prince lineally deſcended from Judah, whoſe ſplendor, dignity, and power over his own tribe, is little inferior to that of a king: But credat Judæus. 'Tis certain, we have only their bare word for this imaginary kingdom.

As to the word Shiloh, tho' it be almoſt univerſally own'd to mean the Meſſiah, yet, as to its original ſignification, there is no ſmall diſagreement. St. Jerome reads it Shaloach, from Shalach, to ſend; others from Shalah, to be peaceable; and underſtand by Shiloh, a peace-maker. Le Clerc takes the word Shiloh to ſignify the end, and the ſenſe of the words to be, that from the time the ſcepter comes into the tribe of Judah, it will continue in it till that tribe be at an end; but his opinion has been lately confuted, by Monſ. Saurin, in an elaborate diſcourſe on that ſubject. Another modern author tells us, that it ought to be derived from Shulah, to fatigue, be tired, or ſuffer; and to be applied to the ſufferings of the Meſſiah: But, the moſt probable ſenſe of the word, if the change of a letter be allow'd, will be that of the Septuagint, Onkelos, and ſome others, who read it Shelo, that is, he to whom it belongs, the Hebrew letters vau and he being often interchanged in the ſacred books. The ſenſe therefore will be plainly this, that the ſcepter, or legiſlative power, ſhall not depart from, but be depoſited in the tribe of Judah, until the right owner, or he, Shelo, to whom it of right belongs, has made his appearance in the world. This ſenſe ſeems the moſt eaſy, natural, and agreeable to the original, as well as the moſt applicable to Chriſt, the king of kings.

Judah's lot did exactly anſwer the prediction of fruitfulneſs and plenty, intimated in the 11th and 12th verſes. It was a fertile land, full of vineyards, fruit-trees, and noble paſture-ground for cattle. It was in this tribe, that the valley of Eſhcol, or the brook of the grape, was; a bunch of which was brought by two of the ſpies, whom Moſes ſent to ſearch the land, as a ſpecimen of the richneſs of that ſoil: Here was likewiſe the brook, or torrent of that name, along whoſe banks were the moſt delicious paſture-grounds; and ſome travellers aſſure us, that there are ſtill very large grapes to be met with in the valley of Hebron, which probably may be that, along which the torrent runs.

Ver. 13. " Zebulun's dwellings ſhall ſpread themſelves " along the borders of the ſea, and he ſhall ſtretch the " number of his commodious havens as far as the city of " Zidon."

Zebulun is mentioned next, tho' Iſſachar was elder than him, for which no certain reaſon can be aſſigned, unleſs we ſuppoſe, that the patriarch had a prophetic eye to the lot that was to fall to Zebulun, which was, in time, to become famous for being the chief dwelling of the Meſſiah; for Nazareth and Capernaum were in that tribe, and himſelf was denominated a Nazarene, from the firſt of theſe cities; but this is only a conjecture. Certain it is, however, that if Jacob had been preſent at the diviſion of the promiſed land, he could hardly have given a more exact deſcription of Zebulun's lot than he did then, above two hundred and fifty years before it was aſſigned to his tribe, for it extended from the Mediterranean, on the weſt, to the lake of Genezareth, on the eaſt.

Ver. 14, 15. " Iſſachar; like a ſtrong, but indolent aſs, " will chuſe to carry burdens, in the midſt of his brethren, " rather than be deprived of his beloved eaſe, in the plea- " ſant land of his inheritance, and will prefer ſervitude " and tribute, before the fatigues of war and con- " queſt."

No leſs wonderful and exact was Iſrael, in the deſcription of Iſſachar's tribe, and the lot that fell to it. The Chaldee paraphraſt, who is alſo followed by the generality of Jewiſh Rabbies, gives a quite different turn to this prophecy: They read it thus; Iſſachar, finding that his lot is fallen in a fertile land, ſhall ſubdue the inhabitants of it, and bring them under tribute; but the firſt ſenſe is more agreeable to the original, and verified by the event; for that tribe had the richeſt and moſt fertile ſpot in all the land of Canaan, but was often infeſted and ſubjected by ſtrangers, eſpecially in the time of the judges.

From the ſix ſons of Leah, Iſrael paſſes to thoſe of Bilhah, Rachel's maid, and begins with intimating, that the ſons of the handmaids ſhould have the ſame privilege with thoſe of their miſtreſſes, and be heads and judges of their own tribes. Then alluding to the name of Dan, a judge, he declares, ver. 16. that " Dan ſhould judge his people," that is, his own tribe, like the reſt of the twelve, and then adds, " like a ſerpent hid in the highway, or a viper in " the ſand, which doth not openly aſſault its enemy, but " bites him by the heel, ſo Dan ſhould overcome more by " policy and ſtratagem, than by valour and open force."

The word nachaſh, in the original, ſignifies a ſerpent in general, which having no ſuch qualities as are here deſcribed, the Septuagint have tranſlated it by the word ce- raſtes, which is a kind of ſerpent, ſo called, from his having two fleſhy horns; its inſtinct is to hide itſelf in the ſand, and, by faſtening on the horſe's heel, to make him overthrow his rider. The Jews think, that this prophecy was more particularly fulfilled, when Sampſon, who was of that tribe, pulled down the large building, which cruſhed him and the Philiſtines to death. Others, both Jews and Chriſtians, ſuppoſe, that Iſrael deſigned to intimate by it, that, tho' Dan's tribe was but ſmall, he having had but one ſon, yet it ſhould produce one of the moſt famous judges of all Iſrael: As for thoſe who apply this prophecy to Antichriſt, as if he was to come out of that tribe, becauſe it is omitted, in the Apocalypſe, in the liſt of the tribes that were ſealed, they are ſcarce worth confuting, ſince they may as well fetch him out of that of Simeon, which Moſes omits when he bleſſes the reſt. Beſide, Iſrael pronounces theſe words as a bleſſing, not as a curſe, to Dan, whoſe tribe, moreover, was diſperſed, if not extinguiſhed, a thouſand years before Antichriſt appeared in the world, if he has yet at all.

Here the prophetic Patriarch breaks out into an ejaculation, I wait for thy ſalvation, O Lord. The meaning of which ſeems to be this, that whether his poſterity were preſerved by their valour or policy; whether they owed their ſucceſs to the drawn ſword of Judah, or the hidden ſnares of Dan; yet their ſafety and happineſs did chiefly depend on the gracious promiſes of God, on whom alone he did rely. Others think, however, that Iſrael foreſeeing, either the grievous oppreſſions which that tribe was to labour under, as it actually did from the Amorites, from which nothing but a miracle could ſave them, or elſe foreſeeing their defection from the true worſhip of God, that tribe being the firſt that eſtabliſhed the public worſhip of idols, did breathe out this ſhort prayer for their deliverance. However, it is not improbable, that Iſrael might have a much higher view than any of theſe, and that his comparing Dan to a viper, might bring into his mind that univerſal ſalvation which was to be wrought by the ſeed of the woman, which was to bruiſe the ſerpent's head, and to have his heel bruiſed by it.

Gad, continued he, ver. 19. "ſhall be often infeſted by "bands of robbers and plunderers, but he ſhall conquer "them at laſt."

What was propheſied of Gad, was likewiſe exactly accompliſhed. His lot was laid out on the other ſide of Jordan, where he was continually expoſed to the incurſions of the plundering Arabs, but, by the conſtant watchfulneſs and bravery of that tribe, they were not only prevented, but ſometimes alſo caught and plundered in their turn by the Gadites. Others, indeed, underſtand it quite otherwiſe; and it muſt be owned, that the original is ſomewhat obſcure in this place: They read it thus; Gad, being girded for the battle, ſhall lead an army, and bring it back victorious; which they apply to Jephtha, who is thought to have been of that tribe; but as this ſenſe is rather too forced, others read it, Gad armed ſhall fight at the head of all Iſrael; which they think was, in ſome meaſure, verified, when, having received their portion on one ſide Jordan, they offered likewiſe to go and help their brethren on the other ſide, to conquer theirs. But as this ſeems to be a ſtrain'd interpretation, we therefore preſer the firſt reading, and think that the prophecy refers chiefly to the continual conflicts the Gadites had with the Hagarenes, that is, with Nephiſh, Jetur, and Nodab, whom they at length overcame, and took from them, in one battle, fifty thouſand camels, two hundred and fifty thouſand ſheep, and an hundred thouſand men priſoners, 1 Chron. v. 20, 21. This ſenſe is likewiſe more agreeable to the character which Moſes gives of that tribe, for he compares it to a lion that leapeth upon his prey.

Ver. 20. "Aſher's portion ſhall make him happy; it "ſhall abound with excellent corn and oil; the bread and "dainty meats that ſhall be made of them, ſhall be fit for "a king's table."

The bleſſing predicted to Aſher, is capable of a double conſtruction, both of which were verified by the event. Namely, either that his country ſhould be the moſt fertile, and produce the nobleſt corn in the whole land of Paleſtine, which it actually did; or elſe, that it ſhould abound with the fineſt, and moſt delicious oil, which his allotment was alſo remarkable for, inſomuch that its oil was the moſt celebrated of all Canaan, as ſhall be ſhewn in the ſequel: For which reaſon we have choſen to expreſs the prophecy, relating to this tribe, in ſuch terms as intimate the two excellencies of that noble ſoil, rather than to confine the ſenſe to either particular.

Ver. 21. "Naphtali is like a large tree well ſpread, or "having grafts, which ſhoot out pleaſant branches." Or, according to our Engliſh verſion, Naphtali, like a hind newly eſcaped, or let looſe, ſhall excel his brethren in ſwiftneſs, and be remarkable for the ſweetneſs of his eloquence.

We have alſo exhibited this prophecy, in both the ſenſes of which the original is capable; but as that of our tranſlators tends a little to the unintelligible, we have endeavoured to render the meaning of it more evident: tho' the reading in our Engliſh Bible be moſt generally received, both ancient and modern expoſitors, and the firſt part applied to Barak's overthrowing Siſera, and the latter to the admirable ſtrains which Deborah and he ſang in the noble hymn of triumph which was compoſed on that occaſion, [Judg. iv. and v. throughout] yet as we have obſerved, that Jacob's bleſſings have a more general ſcope, we preſer the firſt reading, which compares him to a luxuriant oak, and is agreeable to the original, and is more exactly verified by the event; for no tribe multiplied ſo wonderfully as this of Naphtali, who had but four ſons when he came into Egypt; yet could muſter upwards of fifty-three thouſand men fit to bear arms, Numb. i. 43. when they came out of it, that is, in leſs than two hundred and twenty years. Thoſe who object againſt tranſlating the Hebrew Ailah, a great tree, becauſe it is contrary to the Mazorah's punctuation, may find that verſion juſtified by the learned Bochart, and le Scene, as well as that of the whole verſe, which is agreeable to the Septuagint, Chaldee, and Arabic verſions.

Verſes 22, 23, 24, 25, 26. "Joſeph, ſays the good "old patriarch, ſhall increaſe more and more. His beauty "attracted the eyes of Damſels; the daughters ran upon "the walls to ſee him. Or, agreeably to our verſion, he "ſhall multiply like a fruitful bough, planted by a well "ſide, whoſe branches run up and ſpread againſt the wall."

The original has Ben porath; which, if derived from the root Para, he has fructified, the ſenſe will be, Joſeph is a fruitful ſon; and then the word Banoth, daughters, muſt be underſtood figuratively of the branches that ſhoot along the wall; but we rather chooſe to derive the word from Paar, to make, or be beautiful, the Aleph being quieſcent in Holem, as the Hebrew grammarians ſpeak; and then the literal ſenſe will be, Joſeph is a ſon of beauty, in conſequence of which, the daughters ran upon the walls to ſee him, and this reading has, by far, the moſt advocates.

"Men, armed with the poiſoned darts of rancour and "envy (meaning his brethren) have been exceeding injurious to him; his deſtruction would have been inevitable, "had not the Almighty, in whom he truſted, proved his "ſtrong ſhield and defence, broken his bonds from off his "arms, and brought him out of priſon, to be a father and "protector to the houſe of Iſrael."

Our Engliſh verſion and ſome others render the latter part of the above paſſage thus; But his bow abode in ſtrength, and the arms of his hands were made ſtrong. But this interpretation is ſomething forced, and the literal ſenſe is this; but he continued in the ſtrength of his bow; and the hands of his arms (not weapons, but the arms of his body) were (not ſtrengthened, as it is there rendered, but) ſcattered, or expanded, which, therefore, may be more applicable to his ſetters, in which ſenſe the Septuagint, Vulgate, Chaldee, &c. have taken it. The ſame word ſho, occurs in the firſt verſe of the 68th Pſalm; let God ariſe and let his enemies be ſcattered; it is therefore rightly rendered there, and it would have been very incongruous to have ſaid, Let his enemies be ſtrengthened; that verſe contains the very words which Moſes and the Iſraelites uttered, whenever the ark was taken up, before they removed from one place to another: To which may be added, that the verb Phos, has ſeldom any other ſignification than that we have given it, which however we ſubmit to the learned reader.

"For this, the Lord, even the God of thy father, ſhall "bleſs thee with the dew of heaven, and with the fatneſs "of the earth; with the fruit of the womb, a numerous "poſterity; the fruit of the breaſt, and plenty of all ſorts "of cattle. May all the bleſſings promiſed to me, and to "my fore-fathers, be doubled upon Joſeph's head, even "upon his crowned head; may they out-top and out-

"ſtretch

" ſtretch the everlaſting mountains, and prove him more " fruitful and durable than thoſe."

With reſpect to the expreſſion, even upon his crowned head, we have ventured again to depart from the Engliſh verſion, which renders the Hebrew words Nazir Achauf, him that was ſeparate from his brethren: For tho' the verb Nazar, ſometimes ſignifies to ſeparate, whence the word Nazarite is derived; and Joſeph was really ſeparated from his brethren, when he was ſold into Egypt, yet it is not probable, that Iſrael would have couched ſo barbarous and unnatural an action in ſuch ſoft terms, ſince he delivers himſelf with a very expreſſive ſeverity in ſome other paſſages of his prophecy, where he repreſents actions that were not more heinous than this. Beſide, Nazar rather ſignifies a ſeparation on a religious account; it is therefore moſt probable, that the patriarch uſed this word, which alſo ſignifies crowned, in alluſion to the ſuperintendants of the houſholds of the eaſtern kings, which ſuperintendants were called Nazars, and, perhaps, wore ſome kind of diadem on their heads, as an ornament of diſtinction, and grandeur. This ſenſe will be likewiſe more agreeable to the ſolemn and pompous ſtyle uſed by Iſrael through his whole benediction on Joſeph.

Benjamin, the laſt of all Iſrael's ſons, and who had been ſo great a favourite of his father, might naturally expect a bleſſing from him, that would correſpond with the tender treatment he had always experienced from that patriarch; but whether it were, that Iſrael did not foreſee any extraordinary merit or happineſs attending his tribe, or that, its being afterwards blended with that of Judah, would afford it a participation of all its bleſſings, he contented himſelf with deſcribing him by his fierce and warlike diſpoſition, who, wolf-like, would ſhed the blood of his enemies in the morning, and divide their ſpoil in the evening.

The warlike and unconquerable diſpoſition of this tribe, was ſufficiently manifeſted in future times. Firſt, By the fierce battles they fought againſt the united forces of all the other tribes, tho' in a very bad cauſe, [Judg. xix, throughout] and wherein they were twice victorious, tho' greatly inferior in numbers. And Secondly, By the war which the houſe of Saul, who was of that tribe, maintained againſt David and the houſe of Judah for the kingdom. However, 'tis certain that they are repreſented, in Scripture, as the fierceſt warriors and moſt expert archers in all Iſrael.

Ver. 28. All theſe are the twelve tribes of Iſrael: and this is it that their father ſpake unto them, and bleſſed them; every one according to his bleſſing he bleſſed them.] Some critics have cavilled at theſe words of Moſes, every one according to his bleſſing he bleſſed them, or he bleſſed every one of them with a ſeparate bleſſing. Whereas they think, the three firſt might have been more properly called curſes than bleſſings. Some authors have been too fond of having recourſe to the ſubtilties of the ſchools for the ſolution of this difficulty, or rather to elude it. Thus, St. Ambroſe gravely acquaints us, that they being rather prophecies than bleſſings, muſt likewiſe be bleſſings, becauſe they are prophecies [Ambroſ. de benedict. Patriarch. Jacob. cap. ii.] Perrer aſſures us as judiciouſly, that they (i. e. all of them) were called bleſſings, becauſe the greateſt part of them (i. e. not all of them) were ſuch. Others have, as they imagine, happily bethought themſelves of that thread-bare ſolution, that the ſame word, in the original, ſignifies to bleſs and to curſe; and this critical diſcovery has been applied to other caſes as well as this, and altogether to as little purpoſe. Thus, when Job's wife bids him bleſs God and die, they have thought ſhe meant, curſe God and die, whereas a very moderate penetration would have diſcovered, that ſhe only ſpoke ironically to her husband, and meant no more than, your bleſſing of God has really been very beneficial to you, I would therefore adviſe you to bleſs him once more, that you may breathe your laſt. But Rabbi Solomon ſeem'd reſolved to carry the prize of abſurdity from all the preceding commentators; for he declares, that Jacob, indeed, had a good intention to bleſs all his children, who were gathered around him for that purpoſe, but that he was unfortunately ſeized with ſuch a malignant fit of phrenſy at the beginning, that he curs'd the three firſt who came in his way. But not to ſwell this annotation with any more quotations of this nature, tho' each of them has had its admirers, it will be ſufficient to ſay, That Iſrael bleſſed all his children, tho' not in an equal degree; and if his ſevere reprehenſion of the three eldeſt, did bring them to a due ſenſe of the crimes they had committed, it was a real bleſſing to them, tho' not of a temporal nature: But the good patriarch may properly have been ſaid to have beſtowed his benedictions upon them, even in this laſt ſenſe, ſince he aſſigned to each of them, a lot in the inheritance of the promiſed land; and as Moſes thought fit to bleſs them afterwards, in their poſterity, 'tis certain he could not think they had been curſed by their dying father.

The good old patriarch having thus diſpenſed his prophetical bleſſing to every tribe, reminded all his ſons of his earneſt deſire to be buried with his anceſtors in the cave of Machpelah; and his laſt words, with which he uttered his dying charge to his children, are ſo exceedingly pathetical, ſo infinitely ſuperior to any paraphraſe we can poſſibly offer to our readers upon them, that we ſhall tranſcribe them exactly as they are recorded by the incomparable hiſtorian. I am to be gathered unto my people: bury me with my fathers, in the cave that is in the field of Ephron the Hittite. In the cave that is in the field of Machpelah, which is in Mamre in the land of Canaan, which Abraham bought with the field of Ephron the Hittite, for a poſſeſſion of a burying-place. There they buried Abraham and Sarah his wife: there they buried Iſaac and Rebekah his wife: and there I buried Leah.

Ver. 33. And when Jacob had made an end of commanding his ſons, he gathered up his feet into the bed, and yielded up the ghoſt, and was gathered unto his people.] The venerable old man, after this charge, had no ſollicitude remaining in his mind; he had now arrived at the laſt period of a good old-age, he gathered up his feet into the bed, and reſigned, without a pang, his pious ſoul into the hands of the Almighty Being who gave it.

In this manner did the great patriarch cloſe his laſt ſcene of life, and as this excellent man makes ſo conſpicuous a figure in the Moſaic hiſtory, we hope that the following imperfect ſketch of his character will not be diſagreeable to our readers.

As Iſaac had paſſed the greateſt part of his life in a ſtate of retirement and tranquility, which God permitted him to enjoy, as the greateſt bleſſing to a man of a contemplative diſpoſition, ſo Jacob, on the other hand, being of a more active and lively genius, led a very different kind of life, whereby his faith was render'd more conſpicuous, as it was rewarded more amply than that of his anceſtors; ſince God rejected ſome of their iſſue, whereas the twelve ſons of Jacob were all made heirs of Canaan. The prophecy, which Rebekah his mother received concerning him while he was yet in her womb, inſpired her with a peculiar affection towards him, and naturally inclined her to be particularly careful to enrich his youthful mind with a knowledge of the divine promiſes, and the neceſſity of affording them a firm belief. The purchaſe of Eſau's birth-right, however obſcure and obnoxious to cenſure, (if it really be ſo) in other particulars, is yet a ſufficient proof, that Jacob delighted early in what had any relation to religion, and ſet a high eſtimate on that bleſſing which Eſau profanely diſregarded, according to the Apoſtle. He was a perſon very conſiderable in every reſpect. His natural abilities of mind were very great, and he was maſter of an uncommon prudence and ſagacity, in every turn and conjuncture of his life; particularly in his conduct to Laban, his addreſs to his elder brother, and his ſenſe of his ſons barbarity to the Shechemites: He diſcovered himſelf to be a man of a ſtrong and ready apprehenſion to foreſee the calamities he was likely to incur, and his courage and prudence, to ſhape himſelf the beſt way through them, were equally conſpicuous. The life of Iſaac ſeems to have been the life of a virtuous honeſt man, without any remarkable variety, or extraordinary turns in it. He had a vaſt ſubſtance left him by Abraham his father, and he lived upon it all his life-time, and generally in the ſame place. But Jacob was born to greater things, and was deſign'd to be more known to the world. He receiv'd no great patrimony from his father, but was to riſe by his own induſtry and the bleſſing of God. He was ſent into Padan Aram to obtain himſelf a wife, and, by his diligence, to make a decent proviſion for his family; and he ſucceeded ſo effectually in the ſpace of twenty years, as to be able to live afterwards, in credit and reputation, with the princes of his age, and to have thoſe of his own rank fearful of offering him the leaſt injury. His virtues were likewiſe exerciſed by a life that was oftentimes ſtrongly marked with affliction. We ſee him compelled to forſake his father's houſe, and, like a fugitive, to croſs great plains and deſarts in his travels to Meſopotamia. Scarce was he arrived at the houſe of his uncle Laban, in whom he expected to find a ſecond father, but he was treated rather like a ſlave than a near relation; and after he had ſuſtained unſpeakable fatigues, for the ſpace of ſeven years, and which were only alleviated by the pleaſing hope of enjoying a perſon exceedingly dear to him, he found himſelf cruelly deceiv'd in his expectations, and was fraudulently married to Leah, inſtead of Rachel. And when he left a houſe, which the troubles and vexations of 20 years render'd inſupportable to him, he is fiercely purſued by Laban, and threaten'd by the rage of that barbarous and mercenary man. No ſooner was he delivered from the apprehenſions he entertained of this uncle, than he dreads the reſentment of his brother Eſau, and expects every moment to feel the effects of what he conceived to be a diſſembled and ill-extinguiſhed hatred. After all this, his virgin daughter Dinah is defiled, and the crime avenged in ſuch a manner, as ſeemed to preſage a thouſand inevitable misfortunes; and ſcarce is he, at laſt, in the peaceable poſſeſſion of his deareſt Rachel, but ſhe is ſnatched for ever from his embraces; and he ſees her die in the pangs of labour.

And as if theſe afflictions were not ſufficient to fill the meaſure of his anguiſh, his ſon Reuben defiles his bed, by an action that tended to alienate from him the affection of Bilhah. In a word, we may juſtly affirm, that towards the cloſe of his life, God was pleaſed to diveſt him, in a great meaſure, of what may be termed his adventitious happineſs: Joſeph, the ſole fruit of his marriage with Rachel; is taken from him; his numerous family is diſperſed by the preſſures of a famine, and his comforts did not revive till the laſt period of his days was approaching. The ſcenes of his various afflictions were but too natural a picture of human life. Our days are few and evil; but the one is a compenſation for the other. Our days, indeed, are evil; but then they are but few.

But if the life of Jacob was thus blended with calamities and ſorrow, he had likewiſe very frequent and remarkable revelations from heaven, to ſupport and conduct him in his paſſage through them. We don't find, that any favours of this nature were imparted to Iſaac, above twice or thrice in his whole life, and indeed, the circumſtances of it did not require more. But God was pleaſed to converſe more frequently with Jacob, and to give him a fuller knowledge of the manner in which he deſigned to deal with his poſterity. When Iſaac purpoſed to diſpoſe of the bleſſing promiſed to Abraham, it is evident, that he was not ſenſible of the manner in which God intended it ſhould be given, for his determination was to beſtow it on the perſon who was never deſigned to inherit it. He, indeed, by the contrivance of Rebekah, happened to diſpoſe of it aright, and God was afterwards pleaſed to enlighten his underſtanding, and inform him, in ſome meaſure, what would be the circumſtances of his ſons and their poſterity: But Jacob, when he drew towards his end, had a much greater ſhare of this prophetical knowledge imparted to him. He was enabled, with great exactneſs and perſpicuity, to enter into the circumſtances of the lives of Joſeph's ſons, and when he came to tell his own children, what ſhould befall them in the latter days, he was qualified to intimate many particulars, that were appropriated to the families of each of his children, as will be evident hereafter, when we ſhall remark, in the proper places, how the events foretold by him were fulfilled to their poſterity.

As the life of Jacob was more remarkable and various than the life of Iſaac, ſo we find larger accounts of it among the heathen writers. We diſcover but little notice of his father, any where but in the ſacred writings; ſo that ſome of the Heathen hiſtorians, who enquired after the accounts of Abraham's family, did not know there was ſuch a perſon, but took Jacob or Iſrael to be the immediate ſon of Abraham. [See Juſtin, from Trogus Pompeius, lib. 36. c. 2.] But Jacob's wife was celebrated by many of their ancient writers. Euſebius [Præp. Evang. lib. 9. c. 21.] gives a large account of the life of Jacob, which he tranſcribed from Demetrius, and Demetrius had it from the Annals of Alexander Polyhiſtor. The account agrees, in the main, with that of Moſes; but differs, remarkably, from it, in little immaterial particulars. Demetrius fixes the dates and times of many tranſactions in Jacob's life, which Moſes has not determined, and fixes ſome in a manner which will not exactly coincide with ſome other of the Moſaical computations; which, in our opinion, ſeems to evince, that he did not copy from the great Legiſlator of the Jews, and indeed, there was no neceſſity that he ſhould; for the ancient hiſtory, even of thoſe early times, was compiled by various writers, who differed in circumſtances from one another, and therefore took their hints from different originals, and amongſt the reſt, a large account of Jacob is given by Theodorus, a very ancient hiſtorian, who wrote the Phœnician Antiquities; and whoſe works, Chætus tranſlated into Greek, a part of which tranſlation, relating to Jacob, is preſerved in Euſebius. Jacob was a hundred and forty years old when he died.

Beſides, the prophecies of Jacob, which have been tranſmitted to us by Moſes, and which have likewiſe been ſufficiently verified by their events, the Jews aſcribe ſome other works to him, ſuch as the treatiſe entitled, The ladder to heaven, which contains an explanation of his viſion at Bethel; and which the Ebeonites adopted as canonical; and a Teſtament called by his name, The Teſtament of Jacob, and ranked by Pope Gelaſius among the Apochryphas. The Jews likewiſe uſe ſome prayers every night, which they pretend were compoſed by him; they alſo affirm, that he wrote the fourteen Pſalms of degrees, or gradual Pſalms, and ſome others, while he lived with Laban; all which fables are only fit for a rabbinical Creed. However, the Jews are not to be condemned for the extraordinary praiſes they afford him. Some divines, eſpecially thoſe of the Romiſh Church, look upon him not only to have expreſly foretold the coming of the Meſſiah, but to have been likewiſe a type of him, in his laborious and troubleſome life, in his flights and travels; in his marriage with Leah, the figure of the Jewiſh ſynagogue, and afterwards with his beloved Rachel, the figure of the Chriſtian church.

The Mohammedans allow him to have been, not only a prophet, but alſo the father of all the prophets, who, according to them, were all deſcended from him, except Job, Jethro, and Mohammed. They likewiſe believe, that the royal dignity did not depart from his poſterity, till the times of John the Baptiſt, and Jeſus Chriſt, and that the twelve tribes of the Jews deſcended from him, as their own twelve tribes ſprung from Iſhmael.

Jacob gave names to two places; the Well, and the Ford of Jacob: The former of which was ſtill known by that name, in the time of our bleſſed Saviour, and we read of a famous Church built there, in the form of a croſs, and dedicated to St. John the Baptiſt, and that juſt before the communion table, was the well to which ſick perſons reſorted, in great numbers, to drink the water for the recovery of their health. With reſpect to the ford of Jacob, it is not eaſy to gueſs at its true ſituation, but as for thoſe who think, that he forded Jordan near the place where it flows into the ſea of Tiberias, they ſeem to have been greatly miſtaken in their geography; and it is much more probable, that he paſt that river ſome where near Bethſan, ſince he came back that way, when he returned from Meſopotamia, and that he croſſed the Jabbok at Mahanaim, and went from thence to Peniel and Succoth, which are near Bethſan, and his declaration, that he had paſſed over that river, only with his ſtaff, and now with two bands, makes it probable, that he returned the ſame way he went.

CHAP. L.

1 The mourning for Jacob: 4 Joseph getteth leave of Pharaoh to go to bury him. 7 The funeral. 15 Joseph comforteth his brethren who craved his pardon: 22 His age: 23 He seeth the third generation of his sons: 24 He prophesieth unto his brethren of their return: 25 He taketh an oath of them for his bones: 26 He dieth, and is chested.

AND Joseph fell upon his fathers face, and wept upon him, and kissed him.

2 And Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father: and the physicians embalmed Israel.

3 And forty days were fulfilled for him (for so are fulfilled the days of those which are embalmed) and the Egyptians mourned for him threescore and ten days.

4 And when the days of his mourning were past, Joseph spake unto the house of Pharaoh, saying, If now I have found grace in your eyes, speak, I pray you, in the ears of Pharaoh, saying,

5 My father made me swear, saying, Lo, I die: in my grave which I have digged for me, in the land of Canaan, there shalt thou bury me. Now therefore let me go up, I pray thee, and bury my father, and I will come again.

6 And Pharaoh said, Go up, and bury thy father, according as he made thee swear.

7 ¶ And Joseph went up to bury his father: and with him went up all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt.

8 And all the house of Joseph, and his brethren, and his fathers house: only their little ones, and their flocks, and their herds, they left in the land of Goshen.

9 And there went up with him both chariots and horsemen: and it was a very great company.

10 And they came to the threshing-floor of Atad, which is beyond Jordan, and there they mourned with a great and very sore lamentation: and he made a mourning for his father seven days.

11 And when the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites, saw the mourning in the floor of Atad, they said, This is a grievous mourning to the Egyptians: wherefore the name of it was called Abel-mizraim, which is beyond Jordan.

12 And his sons did unto him according as he commanded them.

13 For his sons carried him into the land of Canaan, and buried him in the cave of the field of Machpelah; which Abraham bought with the field for a possession of a burying-place, of Ephron the Hittite, before Mamre.

14 ¶ And Joseph returned into Egypt, he and his brethren, and all that went up with him to bury his father, after he had buried his father.

15 ¶ And when Josephs brethren saw that their father was dead, they said, Joseph will peradventure hate us, and will certainly requite us all the evil which we did unto him.

16 And they sent messengers unto Joseph, saying, Thy father did command before he died, saying,

17 So shall ye say unto Joseph, Forgive, I pray thee now, the trespass of thy brethren, and their sin; for they did unto thee evil: And now, we pray thee, forgive the trespass of the servants of the God of thy father. And Joseph wept when they spake unto him.

18 And his brethren also went and fell down before his face: and they said, Behold, we be thy servants.

19 And Joseph said unto them, Fear not: for am I in the place of God?

20 But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive.

21 Now therefore fear ye not: I will nourish you, and your little ones. And he comforted them, and spake kindly unto them.

22 ¶ And Joseph dwelt in Egypt, he, and his fathers house: and Joseph lived an hundred and ten years.

23 And Joseph saw Ephraims children, of the third generation: the children also of Machir, the son of Manasseh, were brought up upon Josephs knees.

24 And Joseph said unto his brethren, I die: and God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land, unto the land which he sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob.

25 And Joseph took an oath of the children of Israel, saying, God will surely visit you, and ye shall carry up my bones from hence.

26 So Joseph died, being an hundred and ten years old: and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt.

Ver. 1. And Joseph fell upon his father's face, and wept upon him, and kissed him.] The loss of so excellent a father as Jacob, was undoubtedly lamented by all his family, with an unaffected sorrow; but by none so much as Joseph. He was unable to suppress the anguish he sustained at that melancholy diſpenſation, he threw himſelf upon the body of his dead father, bathed his reverend face with tears, and diſcovered, by every part of his conduct, that his ſoul was affected with the deepeſt impreſſions of filial ſorrow.

Ver. 2. And Joſeph commanded his ſervants the phyſicians to embalm his father: and the phyſicians embalmed Iſrael.] The Egyptians are ſaid to have been the firſt who aſſerted the immortality of the ſoul, which, according to their doctrine, when the body was corrupted, enter'd into ſome other animal, and paſſing, by a continual metempſychoſis, through the different kinds of animals, belonging to the air, earth, and water, returned again into a human body, after the revolution of 3000 years. For this reaſon they endeavoured by art to preſerve the body as long as poſſible, that the ſoul might be obliged to continue with it, and not ſoon paſs to another: As the dead bodies, by the means they uſed, were of long duration, they ſpared no labour nor coſt in building their ſepulchres, which they termed their eternal manſions; at the ſame time being little curious in the ſtructure of their houſes, calling them inns, where they ſtay'd but for a ſhort time, whereas they remained in the other for a long courſe of years.

The mourning for the dead, and funeral rites, in Egypt, were anciently theſe: When a man of any conſiderable figure died, all the women of that family beſmear'd their heads and faces with dirt, then making bare their breaſts, and girding their waiſts, they left the body at home, and marched through the ſtreets of the city, lamenting and beating themſelves as they went, attended by all their relations of the ſame ſex; the men at the ſame time forming another company, mourned in the ſame manner. This they continued till the corpſe was interr'd, abſtaining in the mean time from bathing, wine, and the more delicate meats, and laying aſide their beſt attire. The firſt lamentation being over, the body was carried to thoſe who profeſſed the art of embalming, which, like other trades, they learned from their anceſtors. Theſe perſons ſhewed the kindred of the deceaſed ſeveral models, or patterns in wood, and painted, together with a bill of the charges of each manner of preparation, and asked them which they would chuſe; for there were three different ways of preparing dead bodies for burial; one was very exquiſite and expenſive, and came to a talent of ſilver, or about 258*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* the ſecond was inferior, and of a moderate price, the charge being no more than 20 minæ, or a fourth part of the former ſum; and the third way was very mean, and coſt but a triſle. This preliminary being ſettled, the embalmers took the body, and firſt drew out the brains through the noſtrils with a crooked inſtrument of iron, and filled the vacancy with certain medicaments. Then one, whom they called the ſcribe, marked out, on the left ſide of the belly, how far the inciſion was to be made; and the Paraſchiſtes, whoſe office it was to make the inciſion, taking a ſharp Ethiopic ſtone, cut open the body, as far as the law ordained, and immediately ran away as faſt as he could, all that were preſent purſuing him, throwing ſtones at him, and curſing him, to turn the execration upon him; for they thought it a very heinous crime to wound, or offer violence to a dead body; but the Taricheutæ, or embalmers, were highly eſteemed and reſpected, converſing with the prieſts, and being with them admitted, as perſons of ſanctity, into the more ſacred parts of their temples. When theſe perſons came to dreſs the diſſected body, one of them thruſt his hand into it by the wound, and drew out all the inteſtines, except the heart and kidneys; another cleanſed all the entrails, waſhing them with wine of palms, and aromatic odours. Plutarch writes, that when the belly was opened, they firſt expoſed it to the ſun, and then caſt the bowels into the Nile, as what defiled the body. Then the belly was filled with pounded myrrh, caſſia, and other odoriferous drugs (frankincenſe only excepted) and the inciſion being ſewed up, the body was carefully anointed with oil of cedar, and other things, for above thirty days, or elſe laid in nitre for ſeventy days, which was the longeſt time allowed. At the expiration of which term, they waſhed the whole body; and bound fillets of fine linnen round every part, covering it with gum, which the Egyptians uſed inſtead of glue. And all this was done without diſfiguring the body; ſo that the very hairs remained on the brows and eye-lids, and the reſemblance of the countenance was preſerved, and eaſy to be known. This, indeed, ſeems a little extraordinary, conſidering how the fleſh of the face muſt have been dried by the ſalt; but an eye-witneſs aſſures us, that he ſaw ſome embalmed bodies, in Egypt, with the hair, beard, and nails; the fillet which covered the head and feet being rotted off. Several of the Egyptians kept their dead at home with them above-ground, in magnificent apartments, having, by this means, the pleaſure of ſeeing the lineaments of their anceſtors who died many ages before they were born; and they often brought the dried corpſe of a friend, as a gueſt, at their feaſts; the way of embalming which we have deſcribed, was the moſt coſtly manner of preſerving the dead. Thoſe who were unable, or unwilling, to be at ſo great an expence, were contented with a more ordinary preparation; which was perform'd in this manner: They injected a proper quantity of oil of cedar in the body, without opening the belly, or taking out the bowels, and laid the corpſe in nitre, the number of days above-mentioned; at the end of which, they diſcharged the oil of cedar, which, by a peculiar efficacy, brought away the whole entrails ſhrunk and putrified; the nitre having conſumed the fleſh, and left nothing but the skin and bones: And when this was done, they delivered the body to the relations, without any further operation. The third and laſt manner of preſerving the dead, uſed only for the poorer ſort, was performed by injecting cleanſing lotions into the belly, and ſalting the body for ſeventy days; after which, it was taken away. The wives of conſiderable perſons, and all women who had been beautiful, and dear to their relations, were not delivered to the embalmers preſently after death, but were kept at home three or four days, before they were carried out.

If any Egyptian, or even a ſtranger, was found killed by a crocodile, or drowned in the river; wherever the body came a-ſhore, the inhabitants were by law obliged, at their own charge, to embalm and place it among the conſecrated monuments, in the moſt coſtly manner; for none of his friends, or relations, or any other, might touch his body, except the prieſt of the Nile, who buried him with his own hands, as ſomething more than human.

To this deſcription of embalming, which is chiefly extracted from Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, we believe it will not be unentertaining to the reader, if we ſubjoin a few obſervations on thoſe embalmed bodies, or mummies, as they are now called, which are frequently taken up and brought from Egypt.

The coffins in which they lie, are very thick, and generally of ſycamore, which, in Egypt, they call Pharaoh's fig-tree, and does not rot ſo ſoon as other wood; ſome are of ſtone, and others of cloths paſted together, and very ſtrong. The top of the coffin is uſually cut into the ſhape of a head, with a face painted on it reſembling a woman; the reſt is one continued trunk, at the end of which is a broad pedeſtal, to ſet in upright upon, in the reconditory. Some of theſe coffins are handſomely painted with ſeveral hieroglyphicks.

The bodies appear in this manner: They are wrapp'd up in a ſhroud of linnen, upon which are faſten'd divers ſcrolls of linnen alſo, painted with ſacred characters: Theſe ſcrolls generally run down the belly and ſides, or elſe are plac'd on the knees and legs. The face is covered with a kind of head-piece of linnen cloth, fitted with plaiſter, on which the countenance of the perſon is repreſented in gold; and the feet have alſo a cover of the ſame, painted with hieroglyphicks, and faſhioned like a high ſlipper. The whole body is ſwathed with fillets, or narrow bands of linnen, beginning with the head, and ending with the feet, ſo artificially, and in ſo inimitable a manner, wound round with ſo many caſts, and turnings, and ſo often one upon another, that there cannot be leſs than a thouſand ells of filleting upon one body; thoſe which cover the head and face being ſo neatly done, that one may even ſee the ſhape of the eyes, noſe, and mouth. On the boſom is a ſort of breaſt-plate, made with folds of linnen cut ſcollop-wiſe, richly painted, and gilt; on which is uſually repreſented the face of a woman with her arms expanded.

The inſide of the body is filled with medicaments, of the conſiſtence, colour, and ſcent of pitch, or bitumen, and which are ſoftened by the heat of the ſun. In a ſkull of one of theſe bodies, was found the quantity of two pounds of this preparation, which could not be infuſed any other way than by the noſtrils, as Herodotus intimates.

mates. And the tongue of one being weighed, was leſs than ſeven grains Engliſh. Some curious perſons, in vain, ſearched one of theſe mummies for the piece of money which the ancient Grecians are ſaid to put into the mouths of the dead, to pay Charon his fare. We are told, however, that the greater part of theſe embalmed bodies have, under the tongue, a ſmall plate of gold, worth about two piſtoles.

We have no hiſtorical monuments to prove that the Jews embalmed dead bodies: On the contrary, we find, that the moſt uſual cuſtom was, in proceſs of time, to burn them in the fire. It may be, it was to conform to that of Egypt, that Joſeph cauſed the body of his father to be embalmed: Perhaps, too, of neceſſity, to the end that he might more conveniently diſcharge the promiſe made to the dying patriarch, to tranſport his body to Canaan, and to preſerve it from corruption during the journey.

Ver. 3. And forty days were fulfilled for him (for ſo are fulfilled the days of thoſe which are embalmed.)] His embalming could not be compleated in a leſs time: For Diodorus tells us of ſeveral officers who were employed about it, one after another; and ſays, expreſly, that they ſpent more than thirty days in it. Which differs ſomething from what is here related by Moſes. But it is probable, that, in future times, (when Diodorus lived) they might have attained to a greater perfection in this art, and made their ſpices penetrate the whole body in leſs than forty days. And Herodotus doth not really differ from this, when he ſaith, that when they had filled the body with myrrh, caſſia, and other ſpices, except frankincenſe, they immerſed it in nitre, for the ſpace of ſeventy days; that is, thirty days more, till the forty were made up ſeventy.

There have been ſome ſo moroſe, as to cenſure Joſeph for following the perverſe cuſtoms, as they call them, of the Egyptians; who employed too much expence upon dead bodies: But they ſhould have conſidered, how much more perverſe it is, not to comply with the decent cuſtoms of the country where we live: And that dead bodies, eſpecially thoſe of the faithful, are not to be neglected, but ſhould be treated (as St. Auſtin ſpeaks, De Civ. Dei, cap. 13.) as the organs of the Holy Ghoſt, which the ancients, he thinks, did well to carry to their funerals, officioſa pietate.

——And the Egyptians mourned for him ſeventy days.] Some perſons, perhaps, may think this ſpace of ſeventy days much too long; but Capellus propoſes this to their conſideration, (Hiſt. Exot. & Sacra, ad A. M. 2310.) that Joſeph being next to their king, the Egyptians honoured his father with a royal funeral, and a mourning of ſeventy days, which, he thinks, is a round number for ſeventy-two. For Diodorus ſays, ſo many were the days of mourning for their king; it ſeeming reaſonable to them, that as they gave the fifth part of the increaſe of their land to their ſovereign when he was alive; ſo they ſhould beſtow the fifth part of the year upon him, in mourning for his death, which was juſt ſeventy-two days, not reckoning the five odd days, which were not comprehended in their account. As to thoſe who object that this was an immoderate mourning, having more of ambition than piety in it; the anſwer is, That (granting it to be true) Joſeph did not introduce this cuſtom, and had peculiar reaſon to follow what he found in uſe there, that the Egyptians might be the more inexcuſeable in their future perſecutions of the innocent poſterity, on whoſe parent they had beſtowed royal honours. Beſides, there is ſomething due to kings, and great men, to diſtinguiſh them from the dregs of the people.

Ver. 4. And when the days of mourning were paſt, Joſeph ſpake unto the houſe of Pharaoh ſaying, &c.] It was an unpardonable crime, for any perſon whatever, to appear before the Egyptian monarchs in a mourning habit. Every thing that contributes to remind great men of death, is too frequently odious to them; and the princes of the eaſt carried this nicety to the utmoſt exceſs. Wherefore Joſeph himſelf durſt not appear before Pharaoh, to ask leave to fulfil the promiſe he had made his father, of tranſporting his dead body to Canaan. He therefore cauſed that monarch to be addreſs'd by an interceſſor, and his requeſt was granted, Jacob's body was carried away, with a pomp worthy the father of Egypt's deliverer. The convoy attending it was ſo numerous, and the equipages ſo rich, that they reſembled an army. To ſee the account, which a certain Rabbi has given of it, one would ſay, that tho' he himſelf did not aſſiſt at the funeral, yet he had procured very particular memoirs of it. But ſuch is the humour of the Jewiſh hiſtorians, that they commonly ſupply the ſilence of hiſtory, with the productions of their own fancy. Among their fabulous relations may be juſtly placed, what ſome of them ſay, that Joſeph fought with the Idumeans upon this occaſion, and did not loſe one man in the battle.

Such a numerous company might have given umbrage to the inhabitants of Canaan. St. Auſtin thinks, it was the cauſe why Joſeph halted ſome time at the threſhing-floor of Atad, (whether that be the name of the place or of the owner) and to chooſe that place to give a new vent to his grief, rather than to expreſs it in the heart of Paleſtine. St. Jerome pretends, that the threſhing floor of Atad, was beyond Jordan, with reſpect to thoſe who came from Egypt, and three leagues diſtant from Jericho; and that it is the ſame place which was called in his time Bethagla, which ſignifies the houſe of the circle. If one could depend upon this father's teſtimony, one might the better judge of St. Auſtin's obſervation, and of the conjecture of ſome interpreters, who ſuppoſe, that this threſhing-floor was called the houſe of the circle, for no other reaſon, but becauſe the antient cuſtom was to ſurround the dead body, and ſo to take the laſt leave of it. Joſeph was ſeven whole days in mourning for his father at the threſhing-floor of Atad. This is the moſt antient monument extant, concerning the exact time of ſeven days ſpent in bewailing the dead; but we find many inſtances of this conduct in the following ages. The author of the book of Eccleſiaſticus, chap. 22. verſe 12. gives us to underſtand, that this was the ordinary term of the tokens of ſorrow, cauſed by the loſs of perſons beloved. Amianus Marcellinus gives the ſame account of ſome of the Heathen nations.

Jacob's funeral proceſſion was ſo great, and the ſolemn ſtop and lamentations at this floor of Atad, were ſo exceedingly remarkable, that the Canaanites, who perceived the company came from Egypt, called the place, Abel-mizraim, which ſignifies the mourning of the Egyptians, and this was its conſtant denomination in future times.

Ver. 13. For his ſons carried him into the land of Canaan, and buried him in the cave of the field of Machpelah, &c.] From the threſhing floor of Atad, Joſeph and his company proceeded to carry Jacob's body to the cave of Machpelah, where they interred the precious remains of the old patriarch with his great anceſtors. It was neceſſary that this funeral ſhould be publick, and that a monument ſhould be raiſed to the memory of this excellent man, which might be tranſmitted to poſterity. If Jacob had been buried after a common manner, his name would, in ſome meaſure, have died with him: But this cave of Machpelah, which contained the venerable relicks of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, was a noble monument, and an earneſt alſo, to their deſcendants, of the conqueſt and poſſeſſion of the land of Canaan, of which God had already given them hopes by his promiſes.

The Jewiſh doctors have a tradition of a bloody encounter in which Joſeph was engaged at his father's funeral, with one Tzepho, the ſon of Eliphaz, who would have oppoſed his burying him in the cave of Machpelah, as diſputing his title to the ground; but that Joſeph and his men, having entirely defeated him and his party, carried him away with them into Egypt, and kept him a priſoner there, as long as Joſeph lived; but that as ſoon as this great miniſter was dead, Tzepho found means to eſcape into Italy.

Ver. 15. And when Joſeph's brethren ſaw that their father was dead, they ſaid, Joſeph will peradventure hate us, and will certainly requite us all the evil which we did unto him.] Joſeph's brethren began now to be apprehenſive of his reſentment for the former wrongs they had offered him; and therefore ſent an humble meſſage to acquaint him, that their late father had earneſtly requeſted, that he would pardon them all paſt injuries, and continue to protect them. Such an injurious and unmerited ſuſpicion was ſufficient to have produced a contrary effect to what they deſired, had Joſeph been a perſon of leſs generoſity: But he was ſo far from reſenting this conduct, or enquiring into the reality of this pretended laſt requeſt of their father, which he had never heard of before, tho' he was the proper perſon to whom whom it ſhould have been made, that he could not refrain his tears, whilſt the meſſenger was acquainting him with the concern and dread his brethren were in: To remove which, he ſent immediately for them, and received them with the ſame affection as when Jacob was alive; he excuſed and comforted them, and gave them ſuch freſh aſſurances of his future love and protection, that they went joyfully home to their families, though probably, very much amazed at the greatneſs of his ſoul, a virtue to which moſt of them ſeem to have been utter ſtrangers.

Ver. 24. And Joſeph ſaid unto his brethren, I die: and God will ſurely viſit you, and bring you out of this land, unto the land which he ſware to Abraham, to Iſaac, and to Jacob.] Joſeph ſurvived his father about ſixty years, and, when he found his death approaching, he ſent for his brethren and told them, with the ſame prophetic ſpirit which had inſpired Jacob before, that God would, according to his promiſe, bring their poſterity out of that country into the land of Canaan: He charged them, therefore, not to bury him in Egypt, but to lay his body in a coffin, and depoſit it in ſome place where they might find it, and carry it away with them, in order to bury it in the ſame ſpot of ground which Jacob had bequeathed to him by his dying will. And his brethren took a ſolemn oath for the due performance of his laſt requeſt.

There are ſeveral reaſons which might induce Joſeph not to have his dead body immediately conveyed to Canaan, and buried as his father was, 1. Becauſe his brethren, after his deceaſe, might not have intereſt enough at court to provide themſelves with ſuch things, as were neceſſary to ſet off the pomp and ſolemnity of a funeral, befitting ſo great a perſonage. 2. Becauſe he might foreſee, that the Egyptians, in all probability, as long as their veneration for his memory was warm, would hardly have ſuffered his remains to have been carried into another country. 3. Becauſe the continuance of his dead body among them, might be inſtrumental to preſerve the remembrance of the ſervices, he had rendered them, and conſequently be an inducement to them to treat his relations with the greater kindneſs and humanity. 4. And chiefly, becauſe, the preſence of his body among the Iſraelites, would be a pledge to aſſure them, and a means to ſtrengthen and confirm their faith and hope in God's promiſes to their progenitors, that he would infallibly conſign to their poſterity the poſſeſſion of the land of Canaan: And accordingly, when Moſes conducted them out of Egypt, he carried Joſeph's body along with him, and committed it to the care of the tribe of Ephraim who buried it near Shechem, in the field which Jacob, a little before his death, gave to Joſeph as his peculiar property.

Ver. 26. So Joſeph died, being an hundred and ten years old: and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt.] Thus died this great and excellent man, after he had happily conducted the adminiſtration of the Egyptian affairs near fourſcore years. The learned and accurate Mr. Shuckford, is of opinion, that the king who advanced Joſeph was Thuſimares, who was the twentieth king of Tanis, or lower Egypt, according to Sir John Marſham, and Joſeph was promoted to his high dignities in the thirteenth year of the reign of this Thuſimares. Sir John Marſham places the advancement of Joſeph, in the time of Rameſſe-Tubaete, the twenty-third king of Tanis; but this poſition of him will appear to be too late: Joſeph was ſold into Egypt in the year of the world 2279. according to the Hebrew chronology; and if we compute the reigns of Sir John Marſham's kings of Egypt, ſuppoſing Mizraim firſt to have reigned there Anno Mundi 1772 and to die in the year 1943. we muſt place Joſeph about the time of the twelfth king of Tanis, in the reign of Achoreus: But this will be much too high; and there are, certainly, miſtakes in this part of Sir John Marſham's tables. Moſes intimates to us, that Joſeph ſettled his brethren in the land of Rameſes, chap. xlvii. 11. but that land could not have this denomination, until there had been ſuch a perſon as Rameſes: For the ancient practice was, after kings, or men of eminence, were dead, to call the lands after their names, Pſal. xlix. 11. Thus the land of Haran was not ſo nam'd, until after Haran was dead. Rameſes, therefore, who, according to Sir John Marſham, was the eighteenth king of Tanis, and began his reign a hundred and forty-five years after Achoreus was dead, gave his name to part of the land of Goſhen, before Joſeph brought his brethren into Egypt. And this will agree with Mr. Shuckford's placing Joſeph in the reign of Thuſimares, who was the ſecond king after Rameſes. Thuſimares reigned thirty-one years; and if Joſeph was advanced in the thirteenth year of his reign, that monarch died ſixty-two years before this great patriarch; for Joſeph was thirty years old when Pharaoh promoted him, and he lived to the age of an hundred and ten years. Conſequently he lived eighty years after his exaltation. And, according to Sir John Marſham's account of the lengths of the reigns of thoſe kings who ſucceeded Thuſimares, Joſeph lived to ſerve three of them, and died in the twentieth year of the reign of Rameſſe-Tubaete. So that he ſupported his extraordinary credit with four kings; a remarkable inſtance of the ſtability of courts in thoſe early days, and of their generous regard to merit, which, at preſent, is ſeldom ſo proſperous in the palaces of princes, whoſe paſſions and intereſts are too often gratified and promoted, by proſtitution inſtead of virtue, and by low enſnaring artifice, rather than real abilities.

Joſeph had advanced the crown of Egypt to a ſtate of wealth and grandeur which it never acquired till his time, and he ſecured the king a property, greater, perhaps, than any monarch in the world enjoyed in thoſe days, and eſtabliſhed upon a better foundation; for he had obliged the ſubjects, in the manner by which he acquired it, as much as he had enriched Pharaoh by the acquiſition it ſelf; and he was really what he ſtiled himſelf, a father not only to Pharaoh, Gen. xlv. 8. but, likewiſe, to every one of his ſubjects. For the whole land was ſaved from deſolation, by his ſeaſonable and prudent care, and every individual of the inhabitants was preſerved from periſhing by famine.

The Jewiſh Rabbies have been very fertile in their inventions, and have added many particulars to the life and death of this great man, of which there is not the leaſt trace in the ſacred records. They tell us, for inſtance, that, after his death, the magicians of Egypt told Pharaoh, that if he had any deſire to detain the Hebrews in his dominions, it would be neceſſary for him to conceal the body of Joſeph, in ſome place where they never could find it, becauſe it would be impoſſible for them to depart from Egypt without it: Upon which, his body was depoſited in a cheſt that weighed five hundred talents, which, even according to the Syrian talent, which is but twelve pounds, amounted to the weight of ſix thouſand pounds; and that they carefully laid it in the bottom of one of the branches of the Nile, after they had turned the courſe of it another way, whilſt they ſunk it in the oozy ſoil, and that Moſes was obliged to work a miracle to recover and carry it away. Some tell us, that this coffin was placed in the king's treaſury, becauſe his magicians had predicted that if ever it ſhould be carried out of Egypt, the land would be covered with a dreadful darkneſs, and be plagu'd with an infinite number of other evils. Joſeph has likewiſe been thought to have inſtructed the Egyptians in all thoſe ſciences for which they became ſo famous, by applying to him that verſe in the Pſalms, that he might inſtruct his (Pharaoh's) princes, and teach his ſenators wiſdom. In a word, he has been taken for Serapis, Oſiris, Adonis, for Mercury, or Hermes; for the famous Hermes Triſmegiſt, the reputed inventor of arts and ſciences. On the other hand, ſome Heathen authors tell us, that he himſelf learn'd ſeveral magic arts in Egypt; and, in particular, that of interpreting ſigns and dreams: And there is a book of magic ſtill extant, which has been falſly aſcribed to him, intitled, Joſeph's Looking-glaſs. It is mentioned by Trithemius, Naude, and others. He is alſo thought to have been the inventor of the art of menſuration, and land-marks are ſaid to have been firſt contriv'd by him. This latter tradition is, indeed, more than probable, becauſe he was obliged to make a new diſtribution of the land to the Egyptians, after the famine; and this circumſtance might induce him to project ſome kind of boundaries to facilitate his deſign. Artaphanes, quoted by Euſebius, tells us, that the Egyptians had their fields all in common, till Joſeph taught them to divide and aſſign them their due limits; that every one might cultivate his own patrimony. Adding, that he likewiſe invented the art of meaſuring, which procured him the reſpect and admiration of that people. They ſhew, to this day, in Egypt, ſome wells, baths, and other works of that patriarch; but thoſe eaſtern nations have added ſo many ridiculous fancies of their own to his zeal in hiſtory, that they do not deſerve to be credited.

Mo-

Mohammed, in his Koran, Sarat xii. gives us a long history of Joſeph, which he has crowded with many fabulous circumſtances, and which the eaſtern people have ſtill more enlarged upon. The Mohammedans pretend to have ſeveral books of his amours with Zeleikhah, Pharaoh's daughter, and who, according to them, was Potiphar's wife. And they read the hiſtory of his paſſion for that lady, with no other intention, as they declare, than to kindle the love of God in their hearts; this book being in as much reputation among them, as the Canticles of Solomon are with the Jews and Chriſtians.

As for Mohammed's hiſtory, tho' it differs much from that of Moſes, yet the reader may not poſſibly be diſpleaſed if we preſent them with the following sketch of it. It is to this purpoſe: ——— Joſeph having acquainted his father with his dream, of the Sun, Moon, and 12 Stars, falling down before him, Jacob ordered him to conceal it from his brethren, leſt the devil ſhould tempt them to conſpire againſt him; adding, that Joſeph would be the choſen one of God, &c. but his brethren ſeeing that he poſſeſſed a greater ſhare of their father's affection than themſelves, formed a reſolution to murder him; and, with this view, perſwaded their father to ſend him into the fields with them; alledging, that it would prove an agreeable recreation to him, and promiſing, at the ſame time, that they would be very careful of his welfare. Jacob anſwered, that he was afraid leſt they ſhould neglect him; to which they replied, Are you afraid the wolves ſhould come and eat him in our preſence, or that we ſhall not have ſtrength enough to defend him? The father being thus prevailed upon, they took him next morning along with them, and threw him into a well; and told their father, when they came home, that night, that whilſt they were diverting themſelves with running a race, and Joſeph was watching their garments, a wolf had devoured him. And when they found Jacob not inclineable to credit their relation, they ſhewed him Joſeph's bloody ſhirt. Upon which, Jacob told them, that they themſelves had perpetrated the murder, and would certainly anſwer for it before God. After which, he endeavoured to ſupport his loſs with patience.

A caravan, which chanced to paſs by that very day, and wanted a ſupply of water, let down their bucket into the well, and Joſeph laying hold on it, was drawn out. They cloathed him forthwith, and carried him into Egypt, where they ſold him for a little ready money. The perſon who bought him, gave him in charge to his wife, telling her, that he would one day prove uſeful, and be inſtead of a ſon to them. When he had attained the 20th year of his age, his miſtreſs, Zeleikah, became ſo exceſſively enamour'd of him, that ſhe ſhut him up one day in her chamber, and diſcloſed her paſſion to him. Joſeph reproved her for it, and then haſtened towards the door, but before he could open it, ſhe caught hold of his linnen habit, and tore it off his back. Her husband happened to be behind the door, and ſhe no ſooner ſaw him, but ſhe began to make a loud complaint of an attempt offered by Joſeph againſt her chaſtity: And ſhe therefore deſired he might be ſeverely puniſhed; appealing to a child, who lay in its cradle, for the truth of what ſhe ſaid. The child readily anſwered, that if the habit was torn before, he was guilty, and ſhe innocent; but if it was torn behind, he was innocent, and ſhe accuſed him falſely. The garment, upon examination, proving to be rent behind, acquitted Joſeph, and diſcovered the ill intention of his miſtreſs.

The whole city was ſoon filled with the noiſe of this adventure; and Zeleikah being informed that the ladies repreſented it much to her diſadvantage, reſolved to invite them to a feaſt, and whilſt they were eating, to introduce Joſeph to them. She did ſo; and he no ſooner appeared, but his beauty aſtoniſh'd them beyond expreſſion; inſomuch that they whiſpered to one another, that he undoubtedly was ſome angel, and no man. By this expedient, ſhe put a ſtop to their reflections; but it was not long before ſhe made another attempt on the virtue of her ſervant, tho' with as little ſucceſs: Which ſo enrag'd her, that ſhe cauſed him to be ſent to priſon; where he expounded dreams of the butler and the baker. His confinement laſted nine years, after which, he was ſent for to interpret Pharaoh's dream; which he did, ſo much to his ſatisfaction, that he was made ſuperintendent of all his finances.

Mohammed then proceeds to the account of his brethren coming to buy corn; of his detaining his brother Benjamin, and of his diſcovering himſelf to them; and adds, that Joſeph hearing that his father had wept ſo much for him, that he had loſt his ſight, he gave them one of his ſhirts, and directed them to return, and lay it over his face, and he would recover his ſight: After which, he charged them to come back to him with their whole family.

By that time the caravan was advanced half their journey, Jacob told thoſe who were with him, that he ſmelt the odour of his ſon Joſeph; deſiring them not to deride him for that perſuation, becauſe he was ſure of the reality of what he had ſaid. Accordingly, a few days after, one of his ſons brought him Joſeph's ſhirt; and, as ſoon as he had drawn it over his face, his ſight was reſtored to him. He then made all poſſible expedition to go down into Egypt, with his family, and all he had. Joſeph met him on the way, and, taking him by the hand, deſired him not to be apprehenſive of coming into Egypt. He then made him ſit down, while his brethren fell proſtrate before him; which made him take notice to his father that now his dream was fulfilled. Thus far Mohammed; whoſe followers further add, that Joſeph was ſeventeen years old when he was ſold; that the king who then reigned, was Rian, the ſon of Valid; that he was likewiſe called Pharaoh, which ſignifies a depotick monarch; that Joſeph did afterwards inſtruct him in the knowledge of the true God, but that his ſucceſſor, named Rabous, the ſon of Maſſaab, proved a wicked prince: That the Iſraelites continued four hundred and thirty years in Egypt, from the time of Jacob's firſt coming down, to their being delivered out of it by Moſes, who took care to carry away the bones and coffin of Joſeph, which had lain buried in the bottom of the Nile.

Ebn Batrick, otherwiſe called Eutychius, patriarch of Alexandria, tells us, that Joſeph married Azimak, the daughter of the Kahen of Aen Shem; that is, the prieſt, or diviner of the fountain of the ſun; which was the name of the city of On, called, by the Greeks, Heliopolis. He aſſures us, likewiſe, that the Nilometer, which is in the city of Memphis, and the canal of the city of Al Kahira, corruptly called Cairo, for the diſcharge of the waters of that river, were Joſeph's own works. In a word, they attribute to him all the curious wells, ciſterns, aqueducts, publick granaries, as well as ſome obelisks, pyramids, and other ancient monuments; all which are ſtill called by his name: And pretend, that he had ſomething ſhining like a ſtar, upon one of his ſhoulders; which was an indelible character of the gift of prophecy, and a ſure token of his future grandeur.

St. Jerome aſſures us, that the Iſraelites raiſed a moſt noble monument to the memory of Joſeph, which was to be ſeen even in the days of that father: And he adds, that it was erected in the field of Shechem, which Jacob purchaſed of Hemor.

There are no events in all the ſacred records wherein the agency and interpoſition of the divine providence is diſplayed, in a more amiable and lively manner, than it is in the inimitable hiſtory of Joſeph: And one would imagine it impoſſible for mankind to degenerate into ſo much inſolence and ſtupidity, as to deny the ſuperintendency of a wiſe and propitious God over the courſe of human affairs. But as it is now very uſual to meet with perſons, who have the vanity to believe themſelves the ornaments of the preſent age, tho' in reality they are but miſerable ſmatterers in true knowledge and learning, and are become ſuch polite Infidels, as to be deſirous of excluding the belief of all providential diſpenſations, out of the claſs of rational ideas; we ſhall cloſe our annotations on this ſacred book of Geneſis, with a collection of ſuch proofs as we doubt not will appear to all candid and truly-judicious readers, a demonſtration of this important doctrine; namely, that God who gives exiſtence to the world, does alſo govern it by his providence. And this will be evident to thoſe who have accuſtomed themſelves to think in the following manner:

Firſt, The world may be ſaid to be governed, (at leaſt can not be ſaid to be ἀκυβέρνητον, or left to fluctuate fortuitouſly) if there are laws, by which natural cauſes act, if the ſeveral Phænomena in it ſucceed regularly, and, in general, if the conſtitution of things is preſerved: If there are rules obſerved in the production of herbs, trees, and the like: If the ſeveral kind of animals are, in proportion to their ſeveral degrees and ſtations in the animal kingdom, furniſh'd with faculties proper to direct and determine their actions; and when they act according to them, they may be ſaid to follow the law of their nature: If they are placed and provided for ſuitably to their reſpective natures and wants, or (which amounts to the ſame thing) if their natures are adapted to their circumſtances: If, laſtly, particular caſes relating to rational beings are taken care of in ſuch a manner, as will at laſt agree beſt with reaſon.

Secondly, if there are ſuch laws and proviſions, they can come originally from no other being, but from him who is the author of nature. For thoſe laws, which reſult from the natures of things, their properties, and the uſe of their faculties, and may be ſaid to be written upon the things themſelves, can be the laws of no other: Nor can thoſe things, whoſe very being depends upon God, exiſt under any condition repugnant to his will; and therefore can be ſubject to no laws or diſpoſitions, which he would not have them be ſubject to; that is, which are not his. Beſide, there is no other being capable of impoſing laws, or any ſcheme of government, upon the world, and whoſe own exiſtence doth not depend upon Him.

Thirdly, by the providence of God, we mean his governing the world by ſuch laws, and making ſuch proviſions, as are mention'd above. So that if there are ſuch, there is a divine providence.

Laſtly, It is not impoſſible, that there ſhould be ſuch: On the contrary, we have juſt reaſons to believe there are. It would be an abſurd aſſertion to ſay, that any thing is impoſſible to a being whoſe nature is infinitely above our comprehenſion, if the terms do not imply a contradiction: But we may with confidence aſſert, that it is impoſſible for any thing, whoſe exiſtence flows from ſuch a being, ever to grow ſo far out of his reach, or be ſo emancipated from under him, that the manner of its exiſtence ſhould not be regulated and determined by him.

As to inanimate ſubſtances, we ſee the caſe to be really juſt as it was ſuppoſed before to be. The heavenly and greater bodies keep their ſtations, or perſevere to go the ſame circuits over and over by a certain law. Little bodies, or particles, of the ſame kind, obſerve continually the ſame rules of attracting, repelling, &c. When there are any ſeeming variations in nature, they proceed only from the different circumſtances and combinations of things, acting all the while under their ancient laws. We are ſo far acquainted with the laws of gravitation and motion, that we are able to calculate their effects, and ſerve our ſelves of them, ſupplying, upon many occaſions, the defect of power in our ſelves, by mechanical powers, which never fail to anſwer according to the eſtabliſhment. Briefly, we ſee it ſo far from being impoſſible, that the inanimate world ſhould be govern'd by laws, that all the parts of it are obnoxious to laws by them inviolable.

As to the vegetables, we ſee alſo how they are determin'd by certain methods preſcribed them. Each ſort is produced from its proper ſeeds; hath the ſame texture of fibres; is nouriſh'd by the ſame kind of juices out of the earth, digeſted and prepared by the ſame kind of veſſels, &c. Trees receive annually their peculiar liveries, and bear their proper fruits: Flowers are dreſt, each family, in the ſame colours, or diverſify their faſhions after a certain manner proper to the kind, and breathe the ſame eſſences: And both theſe and all other kinds obſerve their ſeaſons; and ſeem to have their ſeveral profeſſions and trades appointed them, by which they produce ſuch food and manufactures (pardon the Catachreſis,) as may ſatisfy the wants of animals. Being ſo very neceſſary, they, or at leaſt the moſt uſeful, grow eaſily: Being fixt in the earth, inſenſible, and not made for ſociety, they are generally ἀφροδίσια: being liable to a great conſumption both of them and their ſeeds, they yield great quantities of theſe, in order to repair and multiply their race, &c. So that here is evidently a regulation, by which the ſeveral orders are preſerved, and the ends of them anſwer'd according to their firſt eſtabliſhment too.

Then as to animals, there are laws, which, mutatis mutandis, are common to them, with inanimate beings and vegitables, or at leaſt ſuch as reſemble their laws. The individuals of the ſeveral kinds of thoſe, as of theſe, have the ſame (general) ſhape and members, to be managed after the ſame manner; have the ſame veſſels, repleniſhed with the ſame kinds of fluids, and furniſhed with the ſame glands, for the ſeparation and diſtribution of ſuch parts of them, as anſwer the ſame intentions in them all: Are ſtimulated by the ſame appetites and uneaſineſſes to take in their food, and continue their breed, &c. Add, whatever it is, that proceeds thus in a manner ſo like to that of vegitables, according to fixt methods, and keeps in the ſame general track as they do, may be ſaid to obſerve and be under ſome like rule, or law, which either operates upon, and limits it ab extra, or was given it with its nature. But there are, moreover, certain obligations reſulting from the ſeveral degrees of reaſon and ſenſe, or ſenſe only, of which we cannot but be conſcious in ourſelves, and obſerve ſome faint indications in the kinds below us, and which can be looked upon as nothing leſs than laws, by which animals are to move and manage themſelves; that is, by which the author of their natures governs them. 'Tis true, theſe laws may not impoſe an abſolute neceſſity, nor be of the ſame rigour with thoſe of inanimate, and meerly paſſive beings, becauſe the beings which are ſubject to theſe (men at leaſt) may be ſuppoſed, in ſome meaſure, free, and to act upon ſome kind of principles or motives: Yet ſtill they have the nature of laws, tho' they may be broken; and may make a part of that providence by which God adminiſters the affairs of the world. Whatever advantages we obtain by our own free endeavours, and the right uſe of thoſe faculties and powers we have, may be eſteem'd as much the effects of God's providence and government, as if they were given us immediately by him, without our acting, ſince all our faculties and abilities (whatever they are) depend upon him, and are as it were inſtruments of his providence to us, in reſpect of ſuch things as may be procured by them.

The world then not being left in a ſtate of confuſion, or as a chaos, but reduced into order, and methodized for ages to come; the ſeveral ſpecies of beings having their offices and provinces aſſigned them, the ſubſiſtence of Plants and animals ſet out for them; and as they go off, ſucceſſors appointed to relieve them, and carry on the ſcheme; that the poſſibility only of a general providence ſhould be allowed, is certainly too modeſt a demand. We ſee, or may ſee, that, in fact, there is ſuch a providence.

The great difficulty is, to account for that providence which is called particular; or that, which reſpects (principally) particular men. For rational beings and free agents are capable of doing and deſerving well, or ill. Some will make a right uſe of their faculties and opportunities, ſome will not. The vicious may, or may not, repent; or repent and relapſe: Some fall into evil habits thro' inadvertence, bad examples, and the like, rather than any deſign; and theſe want to be reclaimed: Some may be ſuppoſed to worſhip God, and to crave his protection and bleſſing, &c. and then a proper anſwer to their prayers may be humbly expected. Hence many and great differences will ariſe, which will require, from a governor, ſuitable encouragements, rewards, correptions, puniſhments; and that ſome ſhould be protected and fortunate, others not, or leſs. Now the good or ill ſtate of a man here, his ſafety or danger, happineſs or unhappineſs, depend upon many things, which ſeem to be ſcarce all capable of being determined by providence. They depend upon what he does himſelf, and what naturally follows from his own behaviour: Upon what is done by others, and may either touch him at the ſame time, or reach him afterward; upon the courſe of nature, which muſt affect him; and, in fine, upon many incidents, of which no account is to be given. As to what he does himſelf, it is impoſſible for him, as things are in this maze of life, to know always what tends to happineſs, and what not: Or if he could know, that, which ought to be done, may not be within the compaſs of his power. Then, if the actions of other men are free, how can they be determined to be only ſuch, as may be either good or bad (as the caſe requires) for ſome particular man; ſince ſuch a determination ſeems inconſiſtent with liberty? Beſide, numbers of men acting every one upon the foot of their own private freedom, and the ſeveral degrees of ſenſe and ability which they reſpectively have, their acts, as they either conſpire, or croſs and obliquely impede, impede, or perhaps directly meet and oppoſe each other, and have different effects upon men of different makes, or in different circumſtances, muſt cauſe a ſtrange embarras, and intangle the plot. And as to the courſe of nature, if a good man be paſſing by an infirm building, juſt in the article of falling, can it be expected, that God ſhould ſuſpend the force of gravitation till he is gone by, in order to his deliverance; or can we think it would be increaſed, and the fall haſtened, if a bad man was there, only that he might be caught, cruſhed, and made an example? If a man's ſafety or proſperity ſhould depend upon winds or rains, muſt new motions be impreſt upon the atmoſphere, and new directions given to the floating parts of it, by ſome extraordinary and new influences from God? Muſt clouds be ſo precipitated, or kept in ſuſpence, as the caſe of a particular man or two requires? To which add, that the differing and many times contrary intereſts of men are ſcarce to be reconciled. The wind, which carries one into the port, drives another back to ſea, and the rains, that are but juſt ſufficient upon the hills, may drown the inhabitants of the vallies. In ſhort, may we expect miracles? Or can there be a particular providence, a providence that ſuits the ſeveral caſes and prayers of individuals, without a continual repetition of them, and force frequently committed upon the laws of nature, and the freedom of intelligent agents? For our part, we verily believe there may. For,

It ſeems not impoſſible, that God ſhould know what is to come: On the contrary, it is highly reaſonable to think that he does and muſt know things future. Whatever happens in the world, which does not come immediately from him, muſt either be the effect of mechanical cauſes, or of the motions of living beings, and free agents: For chance is no cauſe. Now as to the former, it cannot be impoſſible for him, upon whom the being and nature of every thing depends, and who therefore muſt intimately know all their powers, and what effects they will have, to ſee through the whole train of cauſes and effects, and whatever will come to paſs in that way; nay, it is impoſſible, that he ſhould not do it. We ourſelves, if we are ſatisfied of the goodneſs of the materials of which a machine is made, and underſtand the force and determination of thoſe powers by which it is moved, can tell what it will do, or what will be the effect of it; and as to thoſe things which depend upon the voluntary motions of free agents, it is well known, that men (by whom learn how to judge of the reſt) can only be free with reſpect to ſuch things as are within their ſphere, not great, God knows: and their freedom with reſpect to theſe can only conſiſt in a liberty either to act, without any incumbent neceſſity, as their own reaſon and judgment ſhall determine them, or to neglect their rational faculties, and not uſe them at all, but ſuffer themſelves to be carried away by the tendencies and inclinations of the body, which, left thus to itſelf, acts in a manner mechanically. Now he, who knows what is in men's power, what not; knows the make of their bodies, and all the mechaniſm and propenſions of them; knows the nature and extent of their underſtandings, and what will determine them this or that way; knows all the proceſs of natural (or ſecond) cauſes, and conſequently how theſe may work upon them: He, who knows all this, may know what men will do, if he can but know this one thing more, viz. whether they will uſe their rational faculties or not; and ſince even we ourſelves, mean and defective as we are, can in ſome meaſure conceive, how ſo much as this may be done, and ſeem to want but one ſtep to finiſh the account, can we, with any ſhew of reaſon, deny to a perfect Being this one article more, or think that he cannot do that too, eſpecially if we call to mind, that this very power of uſing our own faculties, is held of him?

Obſerve what a ſagacity there is in ſome men, not only in reſpect of phyſical cauſes and effects, but alſo of the future actings of mankind; and how very eaſy it is many times, if the perſons concerned, their characters, and circumſtances, are given, to foreſee what they will do; as alſo to foretell many general events, tho' the intermediate tranſactions upon which they depend are not known. Conſider how much more remarkable this penetration is in ſome men, than in others; conſider further, that if there be any minds more perfect than the human, (and who can be ſo conceited of himſelf as to queſtion this?) they muſt have it in a ſtill more eminent degree, proportionable to the excellence of their natures: In the laſt place, do but allow (as you muſt) this power of diſcerning to be in God proportionable to his nature, as in lower beings it is proportionable to theirs, and then it becomes infinite; and then again, the future actions of free agents are at once all unlocked, and expoſed to his view. For that knowledge is not infinite, which is limited to things paſt or preſent, or which come to paſs neceſſarily.

We can never conclude, that it is impoſſible for an infinitely perfect being to know what a free agent will chuſe to do, till we can comprehend all the powers of ſuch a being, and that is, till we ourſelves are infinite and perfect: So far are we from being able to pronounce with any ſhew of reaſon, that it is impoſſible there ſhould be ſuch knowledge in God.

In the laſt place, this knowledge is ſo far from being impoſſible, that, on the contrary, it is demonſtrable, from the nature of the Deity and his perfections, that nothing can be hid from him. For if ignorance be an imperfection, the ignorance of future acts and events muſt be ſo; and then if all imperfections are to be denied of him, this muſt.

There is indeed a common prejudice againſt the preſcience (as it is uſually called) of God; which ſuggeſts, that if God foreknows things, he foreknows them infallibly or certainly; and if ſo, then they are certain; and if certain, then they are no longer matter of freedom. And thus preſcience and freedom are inconſiſtent. But ſurely, the nature of a thing is not changed, by being known, or known before-hand; for if it is known truly, it is known to be what it is; and therefore is not alter'd by this.

The truth is, God foreſees, or rather ſees the actions of free agents, becauſe they will be; not that they will be, becauſe he foreſees them. If we ſee an object in a certain place, the veracity of our faculties ſuppoſed, it is certain, that object is there; but yet it cannot be ſaid, it is there becauſe we ſee it there, or that our ſeeing it there is the cauſe of its being there; but becauſe it is there, therefore we ſee it there. It is the object that determines our ſenſation. And ſo in the other caſe, it is a future choice of the free agent, that determines the preſcience, which yet may be infallibly true.

Let us put theſe two contradictory propoſitions; B (ſome particular man) will go to church next Sunday, and B will not go to church next Sunday; and let us ſuppoſe withal, that B is free, and that his going or not going depends merely upon his own will. In this caſe he may indeed do either, but yet he can do but one of theſe two things, either go, or not go; and one he muſt do. One of theſe propoſitions therefore is true; but yet it is not the truth of that propoſition, which forces him to do what is contained in it; on the contrary, the truth of the propoſition ariſes from what he ſhall chuſe to do, and if that truth doth not force him, the foreknowledge of that truth will not. Surely we may ſuppoſe B himſelf to know certainly before-hand, which of the two he will chuſe to do, whether to go to church or not (we mean, ſo far as it depends upon his choice only): and if ſo, then there is B's own foreknowledge conſiſtent with his freedom; and if we can but, further, ſuppoſe God to know as much in this reſpect as B does, there will be God's foreknowledge conſiſtent with B's freedom.

In a word, it involves no contradiction to aſſert, that God certainly knows what any man will chuſe; and therefore that he ſhould do this cannot be ſaid to be impoſſible.

It is not impoſſible that ſuch laws of nature, and ſuch a ſeries of cauſes and effects, may be originally deſigned, that not only general proviſions may be made for the ſeveral ſpecies of beings, but even particular caſes may alſo be provided for, without innovations or alterations in the courſe of nature. It is true, this amounts to a prodigious ſcheme, in which all things to come are comprehended under one view, eſtimated, and laid together: but when I conſider, what a maſs of wonders the univerſe is, in other regards; what a being God is, incomprehenſibly great and perfect; that he cannot be ignorant of any thing, no not of the future wants and deportments of particular men; and that all things, which derive from him as the firſt cauſe, muſt do this ſo as to be conſiſtent one with another, and in ſuch a manner, as to make one compact ſyſtem, be-fitting ſo great an author; I ſay, when I conſider this, I cannot deny ſuch an adjuſtment of things to be within his power. The order of events, proceeding from the ſettlement of nature, may be as compatible with the due and reaſonable ſucceſs of my endeavours and prayers (as inconſiderable a part of the world as I am) as with any other thing or phænomenon how great ſoever.

Perhaps what we have advanced may be made more intelligible thus. Suppoſe M (ſome man) certainly to foreknow ſome way or other that, when he ſhould come to lie upon his death-bed, L would petition for ſome particular legacy; in a manner ſo earneſt and humble, and with ſuch a good diſpoſition, as would render it proper to grant his requeſt: and upon this M makes his laſt will, by which he deviſes to L that which was to be asked, and locks up the will; and all this many years before the death of M, and whilſt L had yet no expectation or thought of any ſuch thing. When the time comes, the petition is made, and granted, not by making any new will, but by the old one already made, and without alteration; which legacy had, notwithſtanding that, never been left, had the petition never been prefer'd. The grant may be called an effect of a future act, and depends as much upon it, as if it had been made after the act. So if it had been foreſeen, that L would not ſo much as ask, and had therefore been left out of the will, this preterition would have been cauſed by his carriage, tho' much later than the date of the will. In all this is nothing hard to be admitted, if M be allow'd to foreknow the caſe. And thus the prayers, which good men offer to the All-knowing God, and the neglects of others, may find fitting effects already forecaſted in the courſe of nature; which poſſibility may be extended to the labours of men, and their behaviour in general.

It is obvious to every one's obſervation, that, in fact, particular men are very commonly (at leaſt in ſome meaſure) rewarded or puniſh'd by the general laws and methods of nature. The natural (tho' not conſtant) attendants and conſequences of virtue, are peace, health, and felicity; of vice, loſs of philoſophical pleaſures, a diſeaſed body, debts, and difficulties. Now, then, if B be virtuous and happy, C vicious, and at laſt miſerable, labouring under a late and fruitleſs remorſe: tho' this comes to paſs through the natural tendency of things, yet theſe two caſes, being ſuppoſed ſuch as require, the one that B ſhould be favour'd, the other that C ſhould ſuffer for his wickedneſs, as are effectually provided for, as if God exerted his power in ſome peculiar way on this occaſion.

It is not impoſſible, that men, whoſe natures and actions are foreknown, may be introduced into the world in ſuch times, places, and other circumſtances, as that their acts and behaviour may not only coincide with the general plan of things, but alſo anſwer many private caſes too. The planets, and bigger parts of the world, we cannot but ſee, are diſpoſed into ſuch places and order, that they together make a noble ſyſtem, without having their natural powers of attraction (or the force of that which is equivalent to attraction) or any of the laws of motion reſtrain'd or alter'd. On the contrary, being rightly plac'd, they, by the obſervation of theſe, become ſubſervient to the main deſign. Now why may there not be in the Divine mind ſomething like a projection of the future hiſtory of mankind, as well as of the order, and motions, and various aſpects, of the greater bodies of the world? And then, why ſhould it not be thought poſſible for men, as well as for them, by ſome ſecret law, tho' of another kind, or rather by the preſidence and guidance of an unſeen governing power, to be brought into their places in ſuch a manner, as that by the free uſe of their faculties, the conjunctions and oppoſitions of their intereſts and inclinations, the natural influence and weight of their ſeveral magnitudes, and degrees of parts, power, wealth, &c. they may conſpire to make out the ſcheme? And then, again, ſince generals conſiſt of particulars, and in this ſcheme are comprehended the actions and caſes of particular men; they cannot be ſo ſituated reſpectively among the reſt of their ſpecies, as to be ſerviceable to the principal intention, and fall properly into the general diagram of affairs, unleſs they and their ſeveral actings and caſes do, in the main, correſpond one to another, and ſit among themſelves, or, at leaſt, are not inconſiſtent.

Here is no implication of any contradiction or abſurdity in all this, and therefore it may, at leaſt, be fairly ſuppoſed; and if ſo, it will follow, that a particular providence may be compatible with the natural freedom of men's actions. Such a ſuppoſition is certainly not beyond the power of an Almighty perfect being: It is, moreover, worthy of him, and what they, who can dwell a while upon theſe words, and take their import, muſt believe.

It is not impoſſible (for this is all that we contend for here), that many things, ſuitable to ſeveral caſes, may be brought to paſs by means of ſecret, and, ſometimes, ſudden influences, on our minds, or the minds of other men, whoſe acts may affect us. For inſtance, if the caſe ſhould require that N ſhould be delivered from ſome threatening ruin, or from ſome misfortune, which would certainly befal him, if he ſhould go ſuch a way, at ſuch a time, as he intended: Upon this occaſion ſome new reaſons may be preſented to his mind, why he ſhould not go at all, or not then, or not by that road; or he may forget to go. Or, if he is to be delivered from ſome dangerous enemy, either ſome new turn given to his thoughts may divert him from going where the enemy will be, or the enemy may be, after the ſame manner, diverted from coming where he ſhall be, or his (the enemy's) reſentment may be qualified, or ſome proper method of defence may be ſuggeſted, or degree of reſolution and vigour excited. After the ſame manner, not only deliverances from dangers and troubles, but advantages and ſucceſſes, may be conferred: Or, on the other ſide, men may, by way of puniſhment for crimes committed, incur miſchiefs and calamities. We ſay, theſe things, and ſuch like, may be; for ſince the motions and actions of men, which depend upon their wills, do alſo depend upon their judgments, as theſe again do upon the preſent appearances or non-appearances of things in their minds; if a new proſpect of things can be any way produced, the lights by which they are ſeen alter'd, new forces and directions impreſt upon the ſpirits, paſſions exalted or abated, the power of judging enlivened or debilitated, or the attention taken off, without any ſuſpenſion or alteration of the ſtanding laws of nature, then, without that, volitions, deſigns, meaſures, or a ceſſation of thinking, may alſo be produc'd, and thus many things prevented, that otherwiſe would be; and many brought about that would not. But that this is far from being impoſſible, ſeems clear to us; for the operations of the mind following, in great meaſure, the preſent diſpoſition of the body, ſome thoughts and deſigns, or abſences of mind, may proceed from corporeal cauſes, acting according to the common laws of matter and motion themſelves; and ſo they may be occaſioned by ſomething ſaid or done by other men; or they may be cauſed by the ſuggeſtion, and impulſe, or other ſilent communications of ſome ſpiritual being; perhaps the Deity himſelf. For that ſuch imperceptible influences, and ſtill whiſpers, may be, none of us all can poſitively deny: That is, we cannot know certainly, that there are no ſuch things. On the contrary, we believe there are but few of them who have made obſervations upon themſelves, and their affairs, but muſt, when they reflect on life paſt, and the various adventures and events in it, find many inſtances, in which their uſual judgment, and ſenſe of things, cannot but ſeem to themſelves to have been over-ruled, they knew not by what, nor how, nor why (i. e. they have done things, which afterwards they wonder how they came to do); and that theſe actions have had conſequences very remarkable in their hiſtory. We ſpeak not here of men dementated with wine, or enchanted with ſome temptation; the thing holds true of men even in their ſober and more conſidering ſeaſons.

That there may be, poſſibly, ſuch inſpirations of new thoughts and counſels, may, perhaps, further appear, from this; that we ſo frequently find thoughts ariſing in our heads, into which we are led by no diſcourſe, nothing we read, no clue of reaſoning; but they ſurprize and come upon us from we know not what quarter, If they proceeded from the mobility of ſpirits, ſtraggling out of order, and fortuitous affections of the brain, or were of the nature of dreams; why are they not as wild, incoherent, and extravagant, as they are? Not to add that the world has generally acknowledged, and therefore ſeems to have experienced, ſome aſſiſtance and directions given to good men by the Deity; that men have been many times infatuated, and loſt to themſelves, &c. if any one ſhould object, that if men are thus over-ruled in their actings, then they are deprived of their liberty, &c. the anſwer is, that tho' man is a free agent, he may not be free as to every thing. His freedom may be reſtrain'd, and he only accountable for thoſe acts, in reſpect of which he is free.

There poſſibly may be, and moſt probably are, beings inviſible and ſuperior in nature to us, who may by other means be, in many reſpects, miniſters of God's providence, and authors, under him, of many events to particular men, without altering the laws of nature. For it implies no contradiction, or abſurdity, to ſay there are ſuch beings: On the contrary, we have the greateſt reaſon to think that ſuch imperfect beings, as we are, are far below the top of the ſcale. Tho' pictures of ſpiritual beings cannot be drawn in our imagination, as of corporeal; yet to the upper and reaſoning part of the mind, the idea of ſpiritual ſubſtance may perhaps be as clear, as that of corporeity. For what penetrability is, muſt be known juſt as well as what impenetrability is: And ſo on.

Now then, as we our ſelves, by the uſe of our powers, do many times interpoſe and alter the courſe of things within our ſphere, from what it would be if they were left entirely to the laws of motion and gravitation, without being ſaid to alter thoſe laws; ſo may theſe ſuperior beings likewiſe, in reſpect of things within their ſpheres, much larger be ſure, the leaſt of them all, than ours is; only with this difference, that as their knowledge is more extenſive, their intellects purer, their reaſon better, they may be much properer inſtruments of divine providence, with reſpect to us, than we can be with reſpect one to another, or to the animals below us. We cannot think, indeed, that the power of theſe beings is ſo large, as to alter or ſuſpend the general laws of the world; or that the world is like a bungling piece of clock-work, which requires to be oft ſet backward or forward by them; or that they can, at pleaſure, change their condition, to ape us, or inferior beings; and conſequently are not apt to credit ſtories of portents, &c. ſuch as cannot be true, unleſs the nature of things, and their manner, or being, be quite inverted: Yet (we will repeat it again) as men may be ſo placed, as to become, even by the free exerciſe of their own powers, inſtruments of God's particular providence to other men (or animals); ſo may we well ſuppoſe, that theſe higher beings may be diſtributed through the univerſe, and ſubject to ſuch an œconomy (tho' we pretend not to tell what that is), as may render them, alſo, inſtruments of the ſame providence; and that they may, in proportion to their greater abilities, be capable, conſiſtently with the laws of nature, ſome way or other, tho' not in our way, of influencing human affairs in proper places.

We conclude, then, that it is as certain, that there is a particular providence, as that God is a being of perfect reaſon. For if men are treated according to reaſon, they muſt be treated according to what they are: The virtuous, the juſt, the compaſſionate, &c. as ſuch; and the vicious, unjuſt, cruel, &c. according to what they are: And their ſeveral caſes muſt be taken and conſidered as they are; which cannot be done without ſuch a providence.

Againſt all this it has been, as one might well expect, objected of old, that things do not ſeem to be dealt according to reaſon; virtuous and good men very often labouring under adverſity, pains, and perſecutions; whilſt vicious, wicked, cruel men, prevail and flouriſh. But to this an anſwer (in which we ſhall a little further explain our ſelves) is ready. 1. We are not always certain, who are good, who wicked. If we truſt to fame and reports, theſe may proceed, on the one hand, from partial friendſhip, or flattery; on the other, from ill-natur'd ſurmiſes, and conſtructions of things, envy, or malice: And on either, from ſmall matters aggrandized, from miſtake, or from the unskilful relation even of truth it ſelf. Oppoſite parties make a merit of blackening their adverſaries, and brightening their friends, undeſervedly, and unmeaſurably: And to idle companions, and goſſips, it is diverſion, and what makes the principal part of their converſation, to rehearſe the characters of men, dreſs'd up out of their own dreams and inventions. And, beſide all this, the good or bad repute of men depends, in great meaſure, upon mean people, who carry their ſtories from family to family, and propagate them very faſt; like little inſects, which lay apace, and the leſs the faſter. There are few who have the opportunity, and the will or ability, to repreſent things truly. Beſide the matters of fact themſelves, there are many circumſtances, which, before ſentence is paſs'd, ought to be known and weighed, and yet ſcarce ever can be known, but to the perſon himſelf who is concern'd.

He may have other views, and another ſenſe of things, than his judges have: And what he underſtands, what he feels, what he intends, may be a ſecret confined to his own breaſt. A man may thro' bodily indiſpoſitions and faults in his conſtitution, which it is not in his power to correct, be ſubject to ſtarts and inadvertencies, or obnoxious to ſnares, which he cannot be aware of; or thro' want of information, or proper helps, he may labour under invincible errors and act as in the dark: In which caſes he may do things, which are in themſelves wrong, and yet be innocent, or at leaſt rather to be pitied, than cenſured with ſeverity. Or perhaps the cenſurer, notwithſtanding this kind of men talk as if they were infallible, may be miſtaken himſelf in his opinion, and judge that to be wrong, which in truth is right. Nothing more common than this: Ignorant and ſuperſtitious wretches meaſure the actions of letter'd and philoſophical men by the tattle of their nurſes, or illiterate parents and companions, or by the faſhion of the country: And people of different religions judge and condemn each other by their own tenets, when both of them cannot be in the right, and it is well if either of them are. To which may be added, that the true characters of men muſt chiefly depend upon the unſeen part of their lives; ſince the trueſt and beſt religion is moſt private, and the greateſt wickedneſs endeavours to be ſo. Some are modeſt, and hide their virtues: Others hypocritical, and conceal their vices under ſhews of ſanctity, good nature, or ſomething that is ſpecious. So that it is many times hard to diſcern, to which of the two ſorts, the good or the bad, a man ought to be aggregated. 2. It rarely happens, that we are competent judges of the good or bad fortune of other people. That which is diſagreeable to one, is many times agreeable to another, or diſagreeable in a leſs degree. The miſery accruing from any infliction or bad circumſtance of life, is to be counted according to the reſiſtance and capacity of bearing it, which it meets with. If one man can carry a weight of four or five hundred pounds, as well as another can the weight of one hundred, by theſe different weights they will be equally loaded. And ſo the ſame poverty or diſgrace, the ſame wounds, &c. do not give the ſame pain to all men. The apprehenſion of but a vein to be open'd is worſe to ſome, than the apparatus to an execution is to others: And a word may be more terrible and ſenſible to tender natures, than a ſword is to the ſenſeleſs, or intrepid breed. The ſame may be ſaid with reſpect to injoyments: Men have different taſtes; and the uſe of the ſame things does not beget equal pleaſure in all. Beſide, we ſcarce ever know the whole caſe. We do not ſee the inward ſtings and ſecret pains, which many of thoſe men carry about them, whoſe external ſplendor and flouriſhing ſtate is ſo much admired by the beholders: Nor perhaps ſufficiently conſider the ſilent pleaſures of a lower fortune, ariſing from temperance, moderate deſires, eaſy reflections, a conſciouſneſs of knowledge and truth; with other pleaſures of the mind, much greater, many times, than thoſe of the body. Before one can pronounce another happy or otherwiſe, he ſhould know all the other's injoyments and all his ſufferings. Many misfortunes are compenſated by ſome larger endowments, or extraordinary felicity in other reſpects. But ſuppoſe the pleaſures of ſome, and the ſufferings of ſome others, to be juſt as they appear; ſtill we know not the conſequences of them: The pleaſures of thoſe men may lead to miſeries greater than thoſe of the latter, and be, in reality, the greater misfortune: And, again, the ſufferings of theſe may be preludes to ſucceeding advantages. So that indeed we know not how to name theſe outward appearances of particular men, nor which to call happineſs, which the contrary; unleſs we knew the inward ſenſe of the perſons themſelves, all their true circumſtances, and what will be hereafter conſequent upon their preſent ſucceſs or adverſity. 3. Men are to be conſider'd as members of families, nations, mankind, the univerſe, from which they cannot be ſeparated: And then, from the very condition of their being it will appear, that there muſt be great inequalities; that the innocent cannot but be ſometimes involved in general calamities or puniſhments, nor the guilty but ſhare in publick proſperities; and that the good of the whole ſociety or kind, is to be regarded preferably to the preſent pleaſure of any individual, if they happen to claſh. Laſtly, if the virtuous man has undergone more in this life, than it would be reaſonable he ſhould ſuffer, if there was no other; yet thoſe ſufferings may not be unreaſonable, if there is another; for they may be made up to him by ſuch enjoyments, as it would be reaſonable for him to prefer, even with thoſe previous mortifications, before the pleaſures of this life with the loſs of them. And moreover, ſometimes the only way to the felicities of a better ſtate may lie thro' dark and difficult paſſes: Diſcipline to ſome men being neceſſary, to bring them to reflect, and to force them into ſuch methods as may produce in them proper improvements; ſuch, as otherwiſe and of themſelves they would never have fallen into. On the other ſide, vicious and wicked men do proſper and make a figure; yet it is poſſible their ſufferings hereafter may be ſuch, as that the exceſs of them above their paſt enjoyments, may be equal to the juſt mulct of their villanies and wickedneſs. And further, their worldly pleaſures (which muſt be ſuppoſed to be ſuch as are not philoſophical, or moderated and governed by reaſon and habits of virtue) being apt to fill the mind, and ingroſs the whole man, and by that means to exclude almoſt all right reflections, with the proper applications of them, may be the very cauſes of their ruin; whilſt they leave them under ſuch defects at the end of their days, as will afterwards tend to the greateſt unhappineſs.

If what is objected be in many inſtances true, this only infers the neceſſity of a future ſtate; that is, if good and bad men are not reſpectively treated according to reaſon in this life; they may yet be ſo treated, if this and another to follow be taken together into the account. And perhaps it is (as we have been always apt to think) in order to convince us of the certainty of a future ſtate, that inſtances of that kind have been ſo numerous. For he muſt not only be guilty of blaſphemy, but reduced to the greater abſurdity, who, rather than he will own there is ſuch a ſtate, is forced to make God an unreaſonable Being, which we think amounts to a ſtrong demonſtration, that there is one. But of that more in the courſe of this work.

The End of the firſt Book of MOSES, called GENESIS.

Critical and Explanatory ANNOTATIONS ON THE SECOND BOOK of MOSES, CALLED EXODUS.

The ARGUMENT.

The word Exodus, which is at the head of the ſecond book of Moſes, is derived from the Greek, and ſignifies, the going out. This book was diſtinguiſhed by that appellation, becauſe it relates the departure of the Iſraelites out of Egypt, where they had long been detained in a ſlaviſh ſubjection, the particulars of which are faithfully recorded by the ſacred hiſtorian, together with their miraculous deliverance from it; their wonderful paſſage through the Red-ſea, and the deſtruction of their purſuers; their wanderings in the wilderneſs; the awful promulgation of their law; the hiſtory of its eſtabliſhment; the building of the tabernacle; the miracles that were wrought in it after its erection; its immerſion in a cloud, to manifeſt the preſence of God in it. Theſe, with a variety of other great and memorable events, are comprehended in this ancient and genuine Book of Moſes, which contains the hiſtory of one hundred and forty five years, from the death of the great patriarch Joſeph, to the building of the tabernacle. The Jews call it Veelle Schemot, which ſignify, Theſe are the names, and they are the firſt words, in the Hebrew original, of this Book.

CHAP. I.

1 The children of Iſrael after Joſephs death do multiply: 12 The more they are oppreſſed by a new king, the more they multiply. 15 The godlineſs of the midwives in ſaving the men-children alive. 22 Pharaoh commandeth the male-children to be caſt into the river.

NOW theſe are the names of the children of Iſrael, which came into Egypt, every man and his houſhold came with Jacob.

2 Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah,

3 Iſſachar, Zebulun, and Benjamin,

4 Dan, and Naphtali, Gad, and Aſher.

5 And all the ſouls that came out of the loyns of Jacob, were ſeventy ſouls: for Joſeph was in Egypt already.

6 And Joſeph died, and all his brethren, and all that generation.

7 ¶ And the children of Iſrael were fruitful, and increaſed abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty; and the land was filled with them.

8 Now there aroſe up a new king over Egypt, which knew not Joſeph.

9 And he ſaid unto his people, Behold, the people of the children of Iſrael are more and mightier than we.

10 Come on, let us deal wiſely with them: leſt they multiply, and it come to paſs, that when there falleth out any war, they joyn alſo unto our enemies, and fight againſt us, and ſo get them up out of the land.

11 Therefore they did ſet over them taskmaſters, to afflict them with their burdens. And they built for Pharaoh treaſure-cities, Pithom and Raamſes.

12 But the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew. And they were grieved becauſe of the children of Iſrael.

13 And

13 And the Egyptians made the children of Iſrael to ſerve with rigour.

14 And they made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in morter, and in brick, and in all manner of ſervice in the field: all their ſervice wherein they made them ſerve, was with rigour.

15 And the king of Egypt ſpake to the Hebrew midwives (of which the name of one was Shiphrah, and the name of the other Puah)

16 And he ſaid, When ye do the office of a midwife to the Hebrew women, and ſee them upon the ſtools; if it be a ſon, then ye ſhall kill him, but if it be a daughter, then ſhe ſhall live.

17 But the midwives feared God, and did not as the king of Egypt commanded them, but ſaved the men-children alive.

18 And the king of Egypt called for the midwives, and ſaid unto them, Why have ye done this thing, and have ſaved the men-children alive?

19 And the midwives ſaid unto Pharaoh, Becauſe the Hebrew women are not as the Egyptian women: for they are lively, and are delivered ere the midwives come in unto them.

20 Therefore God dealt well with the midwives: and the people multiplied, and waxed very mighty.

21 And it came to paſs, becauſe the midwives feared God, that he made them houſes.

22 And Pharaoh charged all his people, ſaying, Every ſon that is born ye ſhall caſt into the river, and every daughter ye ſhall ſave alive.

Ver. 1. Now theſe are the names of the children of Iſrael which came into Egypt, &c.] As Moſes was now preparing to relate the departure of the children of Iſrael out of Egypt, it was very proper for him to begin this part of his hiſtory with the enumeration of thoſe progenitors of theirs who came into that country, whereby he might the better illuſtrate the accompliſhment of God's promiſe to Abraham, of multiplying his ſeed; and which Moſes had recorded in his firſt book of Geneſis, where he ſhews this promiſe was made at that very time, when God declared, that he would re-conduct the poſterity of that patriarch into Canaan, who had ſuſtained a long ſervitude in Egypt, Gen. xv. 5, 13, 18.

Ver. 7. And the children of Iſrael were fruitful, and increaſed abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty; and the land was filled with them.] Moſes himſelf was ſo ſurpriſed at the wonderful increaſe of this people, when he came to take an account of them, that he makes uſe of four of the moſt expreſſive verbs in the whole Hebrew tongue, to intimate their prolificneſs, viz. pharu, they fructified, or increaſed like the fruit of trees; jiſrezzu, they multiplied like fiſhes; rabbu, they daily increaſed in number; jahatzmu, they grew ſtronger and ſtronger. Had the rigour of their bondage permitted them to have increaſed as much in wiſdom, and true greatneſs of mind, they would not have created Moſes ſo much trouble, as we find they did both in Egypt, and afterwards in the deſart.

Ver. 8. Now there aroſe up a new king over Egypt, which knew not Joſeph.] Thoſe who have been converſant in the hiſtory of Egypt, muſt be fully ſenſible of the difficulties of adjuſting the chronology of that nation, and of determining who thoſe kings were, under whom the Iſraelites were ſo long enſlaved: Amidſt the various ſyſtems and conjectures, that have been offered by learned men, on an article of ſo much perplexity, we ſhall have recourſe to that which ſeems moſt likely to lead us out of this labyrinth of antiquity.

In the fifth year of Concharis, whom Joſephus, from Manetho, calls Timæus, and who, according to Syncellus, was the 25th king of Tanis, or Lower Egypt, a numerous army of unknown people made a ſudden irruption into Egypt, and ſpread themſelves through the upper and lower provinces of that country, where they fired the houſes and cities, ſlaughter'd the inhabitants, and made dreadful devaſtations wherever they came; and having in a ſhort time ſubdued all before them, they made one of their leaders their king, whoſe name was Salatis. This prince made the ancient inhabitants his ſlaves, laid the land under tribute, garriſon'd ſuch towns as he thought proper all over the country, and ſettled his people in the land. Whence Salatis and his followers came, is only to be conjectured: They called themſelves Paſtors or Shepherds; took particular care to fortify the eaſtern parts of Egypt, and ſeemed moſt apprehenſive of commotions from that quarter. The government of Egypt being thus ſubverted, the happineſs and protection, which the Iſraelites enjoyed, were extinguiſhed with it. Salatis knew nothing of Joſeph, nor did he regard any eſtabliſhment that patriarch had ſettled. He had made his way into Egypt with the ſword, and brought his people into the land by conqueſt, in ſuch a manner, and upon ſuch terms, as he thought fit; the Iſraelites were a rich and increaſing people, inhabiting the very parts, where he thought the greateſt precautions were neceſſary to be obſerved; and he ſuſpected, that if any invaſion ſhould happen from the eaſt, they would join againſt him. He therefore took particular care to keep them low.

That this king, who oppreſſed the Iſraelites, was not an Egyptian, but ſome foreigner, who had over-run the country with his forces, ſeems evident from the appellations given him by Moſes. He was a new king, and knew not Joſeph; both which expreſſions ſtrongly intimate him to have been a foreigner: The word new is frequently uſed in this ſenſe; new gods, Deut. xxxii. 16, 17. are ſtrange or foreign gods; and had he been an Egyptian, he muſt have known Joſeph; for he obtained the kingdom not long after the death of that great Iſraelite, and of that generation; and it is impoſſible that the kings of Egypt could, in ſo ſhort a time, have forgotten Joſeph. Some authors have endeavoured to determine whence this new king and people came. Cardinal Cajetan affirms them to have been Aſſyrians, which he collects from Iſa. lii. 4. where the words of the prophet are, Thus ſaith the Lord, my people went down afore time into Egypt, to ſojourn there, and the Aſſyrian oppreſſed them without cauſe. If the Hebrew of this verſe had been ſo ranged, as that the word and might be read before there, viz and there the Aſſyrian oppreſſed them without cauſe, the cardinal's opinion, founded upon this paſſage, would be unqueſtionable; but as the verſe is worded, the two parts of it ſeem to be two diſtinct ſentences, and the deſign of it was to comfort the Jews againſt the proſpect of the Babylonian captivity, by intimating to them their former deliverance out of the Egyptian bondage, from whence they might juſtly conclude, that God would likewiſe free them from the Aſſyrian ſlavery. Africanus ſays, that theſe paſtors were Phœnicians, but hints, that ſome other writers thought them to have been Arabians. Theſe two opinions are not ſo widely different, as they perhaps may ſeem, for Africanus obſerves, that theſe Phenicians came out of the eaſtern parts (ἐκ τῶν πρὸς ἀνατολὴν μερῶν) and the ancients did not accurately diſtinguiſh, but often call'd the whole land of Canaan, with the adjacent countries, by the name of Phœnicia. It is true indeed, that the Arabians are rather ſituated ſouthward, than to the eaſt, and we cannot think theſe paſtors came out of that country. The moſt probable conjecture therefore, that we can form about them is, that they were the Horites, whom the poſterity of Eſau drove out of their own land, Deut. ii, 12, 22. Theſe Horites were a people who who lived by paſturage, and were expelled their country much about this time. Their paſſage into Egypt was almoſt directly from the eaſt, and they had ſufficient reaſon to fortify the eaſtern parts of Egypt, ſince they might very probably be apprehenſive, that the ſame enemy who had already diſpoſeſſed them of their own country, might take occaſion to follow them thither. It may ſeem unaccountable, that a number of unſettled people ſhould be able to ſeize upon, and over-turn the government of a large, a wiſe, and well-eſtabliſh'd kingdom: But this will not appear ſo ſurprizing, if we conſider the ſtate of kingdoms in thoſe ages. Thucydides's obſervation of the ancient ſtates of Greece, might be applied to all the kingdoms of the world in the early ages. Kings had not ſo firm and ſecure a poſſeſſion of their thrones, as we are apt to think from a judgment form'd from the preſent ſtate of the world: As there was but little traffick in thoſe times, ſo diſtant kingdoms had little or no acquaintance with one another; nor did they know of deſigns form'd againſt themſelves, until they came to feel them. When the Iſraelites went out of Egypt, and were advanced into the wilderneſs, they exerciſed and formed their diſcipline and government for forty years together: And tho' they were exceedingly numerous, yet no great notice was taken of them, by other nations, until they were ready to be attack'd by them. Where could ſuch a body of people aſſemble together, now, in the world, without cauſing all the neighbouring kingdoms to form an alliance with each other in order to oppoſe their deſigns?

But in thoſe early days kings apprehended no foreign attacks, until the armies, that came to conquer them, were at their doors, and ſo their kingdoms were more eaſily over-ran by them. Egypt was a very flouriſhing kingdom, but not famous for war; we do not read of any exerciſe this way, or any trial of their arms, from the days of their firſt king, to this time: So that theſe Horites (if they were indeed the Horites) might eaſily conquer them, and gain themſelves a ſettlement in their kingdom, as the Arcadians did in Thrace, the Pelaſgi, and, afterwards, the Trojans, did in Italy; nay, and in much later days, the Franconians iſſued out of their country, in this manner, in armed multitudes, and conquered France, and ſet up there that government which that kingdom is now ſubject to. The time when theſe paſtors thus over-ran Egypt, may be determined in the following manner: 1. It was before Moſes was born; for the new king of Egypt had taken ſeveral meaſures to oppreſs the Iſraelites, before the time of Moſes's birth, and Moſes was born, A. M. 2433. according to the Hebrew computation. 2. It was after Levi's death, for Joſeph died, and all his brethren, before this new king aroſe, who knew not Joſeph; and Levi liv'd to be 127 years old; and ſo being born about A. M. 2253, he died A. M. 2390. 3. It was ſome years after Levi's death; for not only Joſeph and his brethren were dead, but all that generation. Benjamin was born twenty years after Levi, and therefore we may ſuppoſe that he, or at leaſt ſome of that generation, lived ſo long after Levi's death, i. e. to A. M. 2410. ſo that it was that year, and before the year of Moſes's birth, perhaps about the year 2420. And this account will place it much about the ſame time that the Horites were expell'd Seir by the poſterity of Eſau; for they were expell'd by Eſau's grand-children of the families of his younger ſons Reuel and Aliphas, and theſe paſtors came to Egypt in the time of Jacob's grand-children, by his younger ſons, their fathers being all dead. If we determine the paſtor's coming into Egypt about the year 2420, above-mention'd, according to the Hebrew chronology, and in the fifth year of the reign of Concharis, we may count backwards 133 years, in Sir John Marſham's liſt of the kings of Tanis, for ſo many years paſs'd between Joſeph's advancement, and A. M. 2420. and ſo determine who the king was, and in what year of his reign he advanced Joſeph. And, according to this account, Joſeph was advanced by Thuſimares, the twentieth king of Tanis, and in the thirteenth year of his reign, as we have before ſuppoſed.

Ver. 11. Therefore did they ſet over them task-maſters, to afflict them with their burdens. And they built for Pharaoh, treaſure-cities, Pithom and Raamſes.] The Hebrew words, ſare maſſim, which are render'd task-maſters, by our tranſlators, properly ſignify tax-gatherers; and the burdens are afterwards mention'd as diſtinct ſeverities. So that the reſolution taken by the Egyptian court, ſeems to have conſiſted in the appointment of ſuch extorting officers as oppreſſed and impoveriſhed the Iſraelites with exorbitant taxations, and compelled to ſubmit to laborious and ſervile employments. Philo tells us, in his life of Moſes, that they were obliged to carry burdens above their ſtrength, and were alſo employed in brick-making, digging, and building. He adds, too, that if any of them happened to drop down dead, amidſt their oppreſſive fatigues, they were not ſuffer'd to be buried. Joſephus, likewiſe, declares, that they were compelled to learn ſeveral laborious trades; to build walls around cities; to dig trenches, in order to drain rivers into channels, and to caſt up dikes, for the prevention of inundations. And as if theſe fatigues were not ſufficient to impair them, the Jewiſh hiſtorian adds, that they were compelled to erect fantaſtical pyramids, which were vaſt ſtructures, deſigned by the kings of Egypt, as ſo many teſtimonials of their grandeur and magnificence, and to be the repoſitories of their bodies, when dead. Thus did the Egyptians endeavour to ſubject the Iſraelites by different expedients: Firſt, by exacting oppreſſive tributes from them, in order to exhauſt the wealth they had acquired. And, Secondly, by impoſing heavy burdens, and laborious employments, upon them, to weaken their bodies, and prevent their growing more numerous by a future offspring.

As to the two cities ſaid by Moſes to be built by the Iſraelites for Pharaoh; Pithom, the firſt of them, was ſituated not far from the Arabian gulph; and it is taken notice of by Herodotus, who calls it Πάτυμον τῆς Ἀραβίας πόλιν, i. e. Patumus, a city of Arabia. Manetho ſeems to mean this city, when he writes, that Salatis, τὰ πρὸς ἀνατολὴν ἠσφαλίσθη μέρη, was particularly careful to fortify the eaſtern parts of the country. Sir John Marſham is of opinion, that Pithom was the city which was afterwards called Peluſium, by the Greeks; but it is more ſurprizing that this great man ſhould give into this miſtake, than that ſo many of the commentators ſhould tranſcribe it into their annotations, ſince many of theſe gentlemen are very apt to be too implicit in their belief of the opinions they copy from others. The Egyptian name of Peluſium, was not Pithom, but Sin, which ſignifies a ſoil of clay, in that language; as Peluſium does in the Greek. And, accordingly, this city is called by its Egyptian name, Sin, Ezek. xxx. 15. where the prophet terms it the ſtrength of Egypt, with reference to its being one of the fortified towns built by the children of Iſrael.

With reſpect to Raamſes, the other city, mention'd by Moſes, we have formerly obſerved, that part of the land of Goſhen was called Rameſes, from a king of Egypt of that name, who reigned before the time of Joſeph. We think it, therefore, not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that the ſame king might have founded a city in the eaſtern tract of Egypt, which he likewiſe dignified by his name, Rameſes, or Raamſes; and that this city, in proceſs of time, being reduced to a ruinous condition, the children of Iſrael might be employed in rebuilding it; and no one will think it ſurprizing that we ſhould repreſent the Hebrew word banah, as ſignifying rebuilding, as well as building, if it be only conſidered that the Hebrew language is deſtitute of compound verbs.

Ver. 15. And the king of Egypt ſpake to the Hebrew midwives (of which the name of one was Shiprah, and the name of the other Puah.] Tho' Moſes mentions but two midwives, we are not to ſuppoſe, that their ſervice could be ſufficient for ſuch a vaſt number of Iſraelite women. Some therefore think, that theſe two only attended on perſons of the greateſt rank among them, whoſe children Pharaoh intended to deſtroy; whereas his charge was to kill all the males. Others think the Hebrew women being ſtrong and eaſily delivered, ver. 9. might ſhift with two midwives. But it is more probable, that thoſe two were the chief of their profeſſion, and had the charge and direction of all the reſt: And that there was ſuch a precedency or ſuperiority among perſons of this claſs, appears very probable, at leaſt, from what Plutarch relates; ſince he declares, that among the Grecians, there were ſome to whom the care of that buſineſs was conſigned, and that publick ſchools were kept for that purpoſe. Several learned expoſitors, eſpecially the Romiſh, following the Septuagint and vulgate Verſions, which read, Hamieledoth Haghibrioth, the midwives of the Hebrew Women, inſtead of the Hebrew midwives, as the gramatical conſtruction rather requires, have fancied after Joſephus, that they were Egyptian midwives, ſuch being moſt likely to obey the kings cruel commands; but this ſuppoſition is altogether improbable, as well as directly contrary to the ſacred text. Laſtly, their names, which are entirely of Hebrew extraction, proves them to have been Iſraelites, for Shiprah, the name of the firſt, is derived from Shaphar, which ſignifies to be, or to make beautiful; and a Jewiſh etymologiſt, aſſigns this reaſon for her receiving that appellation; namely, becauſe ſhe ſhaped the babe into form. Puah, the name of the other ſignifies, to cry out, either from the painful effects of their office to the women they tended, or becauſe they were moſt accuſtomed to the cries of the mothers and their children. And whereas Joſephus ſays, that Hebrew women of this poſſeſſion would have been too partial to their own ſex of that nation; the ſame objection might have been made againſt Pharaoh's appointing Hebrew task-maſters over them, which we find he did, and the fear of death might as eaſily influence the one as the other nation to obey the king. As for thoſe who think, with ſome Rabbies, that theſe two midwives were Jochebed, the mother of Moſes, and Miriam, her daughter, and that they are here only ſurnamed; in alluſion to their office; they are not worth confuting, ſince Miriam could not be above ſix or ſeven years old when this order was given by Pharaoh.

Ver. 16. And he ſaid, when ye do the office of a midwife to the Hebrew women ——— if it be a ſon, then ye ſhall kill him, but if it be a daughter, then ſhe ſhall live.] This diſtinction in the intended barbarity might reſult from ſeveral motives. As 1. To have deſtroyed the females with the males, had been a needleſs piece of inhumanity, becauſe it could not be ſuppoſed, that the women would ever join with the kings enemies, in any war or inſurrection againſt him. 2. The daughters of Iſrael were much more amiable than the Egyptian women, and this alone was ſufficient to effect their preſervation, among a people who were ſo devoted to beauty. Philo, indeed, tells us, they were preſerved, to be married to the ſlaves of the Egyptian lords and gentry, that the children deſcended from them might be ſlaves even by birth. But, 3. Admitting they married not at all, yet as the Hebrew women made a very conſiderable figure in Egypt, for their qualifications of mind, the care of their families, their induſtrious application to thoſe employments that were ſuitable to their ſex, and for their dexterity in many uſeful and ornamental accompliſhments, ſuch as the diſtaff, and the loom; dying, painting, embroidery, &c. Such perſons as theſe would prove excellent domeſtics for the Egyptian ladies, who would be fond of having their pleaſures miniſtred unto them by ſuch skilful hands.

Ver. 17. But the midwives feared God, &c.] Thoſe who imagine they were Egyptian women, are likewiſe of opinion, that they were proſelites to the Jewiſh religion: But ſuch faith in God as made them not fear a great king is hardly to be expected from any but thoſe who have always been trained up in a deep veneration for his divine majeſty.

Ver. 19. And the midwives ſaid unto Pharaoh, becauſe the Hebrew women are not as the Egyptian women, &c.] It doth not appear, that theſe perſons related a falſhood to Pharaoh, but only concealed ſome part of the truth; which is not unlawful, but rather commendable, when it is intended for the preſervation of the innocent. Many of the Hebrew women might have been ſuch as they are deſcribed in this verſe, tho' not every one of them. The Hebrew word chajoth has three ſignifications; 1. It may be render'd vivaces, i. e. lively; 2. Obſtetrices, midwives; 3. Animalia, animals. The Septuagint and our tranſlators adhere to the firſt interpretation, which is very proper. Aquila follows the ſecond, and tranſlates the paſſage thus, Μαῖαι γάρ εἰσιν, οἱς πρὶν ἐλθεῖν τὰς Μαίας τίκτουσιν, They can perform the office of midwives themſelves, and are delivered before we come to them. Thus the Vulgate alſo take it. But the author of the life of Moſes gives it the third explication, and renders the paſſage thus, They are like other living creatures, who do not need any midwives to facilitate the birth of their young. And ſo Raſi, and likewiſe Theodotion, who thus tranſlates it, ζωογονοῦσιν αὐταὶ, which doth not ſignify (as Gualmyn obſerves) they bring forth living children, but ad inſtar animalium pariunt, they bring forth like other creatures.

Ver. 21. And it came to paſs, becauſe the midwives feared God, that he made them houſes,] Of all the opinions that have been offered on this difficult paſſage, we think that of the accurate Mr. Shuckford moſt agreeable to reaſon, and ſhall therefore preſent to our readers the ſubſtance of what is offered by that learned man, on this article of the Moſaic hiſtory.

There is a difficulty in the account, which Moſes gives, in this place, of the midwives, It came to paſs, becauſe the midwives feared God, he made them houſes. But can we ſuppoſe, that God raiſed houſes for them in a miraculous manner? or could the Iſraelites, oppreſſed in ſlavery, ſhew ſo great a gratitude as to build them any? or if they could, dared they venture to requite them ſo publicly, for refuſing to act as the king ordered them? If I may take a liberty of gueſſing, I ſhould think that Moſes did not mean in this place, that houſes were built for the midwives, but for the Iſraelites. It will be query'd who was the builder? Why ſhould God, upon the caſe here before us, build the Iſraelites houſes? I anſwer: It was not God who built the houſes here ſpoken of, but Pharaoh: The caſe was this: Pharaoh had charged the midwives to kill the male children that were born of the Hebrew women; the midwives fear'd God, and omitted to do as the king had commanded them, pretending in excuſe for their omiſſion, that the Hebrew women were generally deliver'd before they could attend them: Pharaoh hereupon reſolving to prevent their increaſe, gave a charge to his people, to have all the male children of the Hebrews thrown into the river; but this command could not be ſtrictly executed, whilſt the Iſraelites lived up and down in the fields in tents, which was their ancient and cuſtomary way of living, for they would ſhift here and there, and lodge the women in child-bed out of the way, to ſave their children: Pharaoh therefore built them houſes, and obliged them to a more ſettled habitation, that the people he had ſet over them, might know where to find every family, and take account of all the children that ſhould be born: So that this proceeding was a very politic contrivance of Pharaoh, in order to have his charge more ſtrictly and effectually executed, than it could otherwiſe have been; and was a remarkable particular, not to be omitted in Moſes's account of this affair. But as to houſes built for the midwives, it ſeems impoſſible to give any account how they ſhould be built, or by whom. It will here be asked, But how can the words of Moſes be reconciled to what I have offered? I anſwer: If they be faithfully tranſlated, they can bear no other meaning whatſoever; which will be very evident from the following tranſlation of the Place, which is word for word agreeable to the Hebrew, and which I have diſtinguiſhed into verſes, as I think the paſſage ought really to be diſtinguiſhed.

Ver. 18. And the king of Egypt called for the midwives, and ſaid unto them, Why have ye done this thing, and ſaved alive the children?

Ver. 19. And the midwives ſaid unto Pharaoh, Becauſe the Hebrew women are not as the Egyptian women; for they are lively, and are delivered before the midwife comes to them.

Ver. 20. And God dealt well with the midwives: And the people multiplied, and waxed very mighty. [vejehi, i. e.] And this happened, [or was ſo, or came to paſs] becauſe the midwives feared God.

Ver. 21, And Pharaoh built them [i. e. the Iſraelites] houſes, and charged all his people, ſaying, Every ſon that is born ye ſhall caſt into the river, and every daughter ye ſhall ſave alive.

Our Engliſh tranſlators ſhould have conſidered, that the nominative caſe to two verbs is commonly placed after the ſecond verb, in other languages, tho' ours will not admit of ſuch a poſition. The paſſage, render'd verbatim into Latin, from the Hebrew, will run thus. Et fecit illis domos, & præcepit Pharaoh omni populo ſuo.

And thus if I may take the liberty to ſuppoſe the paſſage not rightly pointed as to the ſtops, which were the ancient marks at the end of verſes, the words may well be rendered as I would take them. The diviſion of the Hebrew bible into verſes is certainly very ancient; but not earlier than the captivity, and I do not find that the beſt writers imagine the ſections made by an unerring hand, hand. I ſhould think the verſes which I am treating of to have been divided, as they now are injudiciouſly, by ſome careleſs tranſcriber; but it is evident, that they were thus parted before the LXX tranſlation was made, for the LXX render the 21ſt. verſe thus Ἐπεὶ δὲ ἐφοβήθησαν αἱ μαῖαι τὸν Θεὸν, ἐποίησαν ἑαυταῖς οἰκίας; And becauſe the midwives feared God, they made themſelves houſes. And hence it is evident, that the LXX found a difficulty in the verſe, and thought it abſurd to ſay, that God built the midwives houſes, and ſo turn'd the expreſſion another way; but their verſion cannot be right, for the Hebrew words are not they, but he built, and in the original, la hem, ſignifies for them, and not for themſelves: And I do not at preſent ſee any way to give a clear account of the place ſo eaſy, as to ſuppoſe the punctuation wrong as I have imagined. Some of the commentators have indeed offered a conjecture, at the firſt ſight very promiſing, to explain the expreſſion as it now ſtands: They would take the words, made them houſes, metaphorically, and ſay, that they mean either that God gave the midwives many children, or that he made them proſperous in their affairs: The former of theſe interpretations is St. Ambroſe's, and it is ſaid, that the expreſſion is thus us'd Gen. xvi. 2. xxx. 3. Deut. xxv. 9. Ruth iv. 11. but in this point theſe interpreters commit a great miſtake. The expreſſion before us is naſhah beith; but the expreſſion in the paſſages cited, is a very different one: It is banah beith, and not naſhah. Had the expreſſion here before us been banah beithim lahem, it might have ſignified, God built up their houſes, or families, by making them numerous; but naſhah beithim lahem are words of a very different meaning. But, in the ſecond place, it is ſaid, that naſhah beithim ſignifies, that God proſpered them, or provided for them. And Gen. xxx. 30. is cited, to juſtify this interpretation. The words in that paſſage are, And now, when ſhall I make or provide for my own houſe alſo? But here, again, the inſtance fails: The expreſſion cited is not naſhah beith, but it is naſhah le beith; not, when ſhall I make my houſe? but, when ſhall I make for my houſe? or, when ſhall I do for my houſe? Between which two expreſſions there is evidently a difference.

CHAP. II.

1 Moſes is born, 3 and in an ark caſt into the flags: 5 He is found, and brought up by Pharaohs daughter: 11 He ſlayeth an Egyptian: 13 He reproveth an Hebrew: 15 He fleeth into Midian: 21 He marrieth Zipporah. 22 Gerſhom is born. 23 God reſpecteth the Iſraelites cry.

AND there went a man of the houſe of Levi, and took to wife a daughter of Levi.

2 And the woman conceived, and bare a ſon: and when ſhe ſaw him that he was a goodly child, ſhe hid him three months.

3 And when ſhe could not longer hide him, ſhe took for him an ark of bulruſhes, and daubed it with ſlime and with pitch, and put the child therein; and ſhe laid it in the flags by the rivers brink.

4 And his ſiſter ſtood afar off, to wit what would be done to him.

5 ¶ And the daughter of Pharaoh came down to waſh her ſelf at the river, and her maidens walked along by the rivers ſide: and when ſhe ſaw the ark among the flags, ſhe ſent her maid to fetch it.

6 And when ſhe had opened it, ſhe ſaw the child: and behold, the babe wept. And ſhe had compaſſion on him, and ſaid, This is one of the Hebrews children.

7 Then ſaid his ſiſter to Pharaohs daughter, Shall I go, and call to thee a nurſe of the Hebrew women, that ſhe may nurſe the child for thee?

8 And Pharaohs daughter ſaid unto her, Go. And the maid went and called the childs mother.

9 And Pharaohs daughter ſaid unto her, Take this child away and nurſe it for me, and I will give thee thy wages. And the woman took the child, and nurſed it.

10 And the child grew, and ſhe brought him unto Pharaohs daughter, and he became her ſon. And ſhe called his name Moſes: and ſhe ſaid, Becauſe I drew him out of the water.

11 ¶ And it came to paſs in thoſe days, when Moſes was grown, that he went out unto his brethren, and looked on their burdens: and he ſpied an Egyptian ſmiting an Hebrew, one of his brethren.

12 And he looked this way and that way, and when he ſaw that there was no man, he ſlew the Egyptian, and hid him in the ſand.

13 And when he went out the ſecond day, behold, two men of the Hebrews ſtrove together: and he ſaid to him that did the wrong, Wherefore ſmiteſt thou thy fellow?

14 And he ſaid, Who made thee a prince and a judge over us? Intendeſt thou to kill me, as thou killedſt the Egyptian? And Moſes feared, and ſaid, Surely this thing is known.

15 Now when Pharaoh heard this thing, he ſought to ſlay Moſes. But Moſes fled from the face of Pharaoh, and dwelt in the land of Midian: and he ſat down by a well.

16 Now the prieſt of Midian had ſeven daughters: and they came and drew water, and filled the troughs to water their fathers flock.

17 And the ſhepherds came and drove them away: but Moſes ſtood up and helped them, and watered their flock.

18 And when they came to Reuel their father, he ſaid, How is it that you are come ſo ſoon to day?

19 And they ſaid, An Egyptian delivered us out of the hand of the ſhepherds, and alſo drew water enough for us, and watered the flock.

20 And he ſaid unto his daughters, And where is he? Why is it that ye have left the man? Call him, that he may eat bread.

21 And Moſes was content to dwell with the man: and he gave Moſes Zipporah his daughter.

22 And

22 And ſhe bare him a ſon, and he called his name Gerſhom: for he ſaid, I have been a ſtranger in a ſtrange land.

23 ¶ And it came to paſs in proceſs of time, that the king of Egypt died, and the children of Iſrael ſighed by reaſon of the bondage, and they cried; and their cry came up unto God, by reaſon of the bondage.

24 And God heard their groaning, and God remembred his covenant with Abraham, with Iſaac, and with Jacob.

25 And God looked upon the children of Iſrael, and God had reſpect unto them.

Ver. 1. And there went a man of the houſe of Levi, and took to wife a daughter of Levi.] Pharaoh finding his firſt injunctions to the midwives ineffectual, reſolved to proceed more openly againſt the Iſraelites, and compel the parents themſelves to be the executioners of their own children. To this end, he iſſues out an edict, commanding, under the ſevereſt penalties, that every Hebrew male child, who ſhould be born from that time, ſhould be caſt into the Nile, and that none but the females ſhould be ſuffered to live. Such a barbarous command muſt certainly have diffuſed the greateſt conſternation among the afflicted Iſraelites, who were naturally inclineable to diſtruſt the promiſes of God. They thought themſelves on the verge of their emancipation from captivity: A glorious deliverer had been promiſed to them, but the inhuman edict had now condemned him to die, the moment he ſhould be born. But God, whoſe deſigns could not be fruſtrated, either by the private ſtratagems, or open violence of the king of Egypt, made him the inſtrument of bringing up that very child whom he was ſo ſollicitous to deſtroy.

Amram, the ſon of Kohath, and grandſon of Levi, had eſpouſed Jochebed, the daughter of Levi, his own aunt. We venture to call her ſo; for tho' the Septuagint, Vulgate, and many learned expoſitors, have thought ſhe was only his uncle Kohath's daughter, and, conſequently, his couſin-germain, becauſe the marriage with an aunt was forbidden by the Levitical law; yet the plain matter of fact is repugnant to that ſuppoſition. In the ſixth chapter of this book, verſe 18. it is expreſly ſaid, that Kohath, the father of Amram, was the ſon of Levi. In Numb. xxvi. 59. it is declared, that Jochebed was Levi's daughter, and born in Egypt. And it is likewiſe ſaid, Exod. vi. 20. that Amram took his father's ſiſter to wife: And therefore, without ſubverting the natural ſenſe of theſe texts, we cannot but conclude, that the nephew married his aunt. For the prohibitions, made upon the degrees of conſanguinity, did not flow from the law of nature, but derived their obligatory power from the particular command of God; and therefore relations of a nearer affinity were allowed to intermarry, before the promulgation of this command.

Some Hebrew writers pretend, that Jochebed was born about the time when Jacob came into Egypt; but, if that be true, ſhe muſt have been 135 years old, at the birth of Moſes, and, conſequently, forty years older than Sarah was when Iſaac was born. But if the nativity of Moſes had been ſo miraculous, he certainly would have recorded it as ſuch, as well as he did that of Iſaac. It is, therefore, much more probable, that Jochebed was born in Egypt, in the hundredth year of Levi's age, which was no extraordinary circumſtance, ſeeing Abraham had ſeveral children by Keturah after the 137th year of his age. Jacob, likewiſe, begat Benjamin when he was 107. and as for Jochebed, ſhe may reaſonably be ſuppoſed to have given birth to Moſes, when ſhe was ſixty-eight years old; nothing being more common than for the Hebrew women, in thoſe days, to bear children at, and even after, that age: And then we have no occaſion to ſeek for another Jochebed, to make her age coincide with the time when Moſes was born, as ſome have done.

Amram had two children by Jochebed, before the publication of the king's inhuman edict, viz. Miriam and Aaron; and tho' Moſes has not intimated the age of his ſiſter, yet it is evident that ſhe was the eldeſt of the three, becauſe ſhe was old enough to watch Moſes when he was expoſed on the Nile; whereas Aaron was but three years older than him. But that ſhe ſhould be old enough to have been one of the two midwives above-mention'd, as ſome Jews have imagined, is altogether improbable, and contrary to the opinion of our beſt chronologers and expoſitors, who repreſent her to have been but ten years old, at moſt, when Moſes was born.

Ver. 2, 3. And the woman conceived, and bare a ſon: And when ſhe ſaw that he was a goodly child, ſhe hid him three months. And when ſhe could not longer hide him, ſhe took for him an ark of bulruſhes, and daubed it with ſlime, and with pitch, and put the child therein; and ſhe laid it in the flags by the river's brink.] From the marriage between Amram and Jochebed, proceeded Moſes, who ſeem'd born at that diſmal period, only to periſh by a barbarous and immature death. The tenderneſs of affectionate parents ſuggeſted to Amram, and his wife, all imaginable expedients to preſerve the innocent victim from the rage of thoſe who ſo cruelly perſecuted the poor Iſraelites. The beauty of the child, which appeared to be almoſt ſupernatural, redoubled their concern and vigilance. St. Stephen ſays, he was exceeding (or, as ſome verſions have it, divinely) fair; Acts vii. 20. And the Jews add, that he had the form of an angel. The anxious parents ſucceeded ſo well in their firſt precautions, as even to conceal their darling babe, for the ſpace of three months. But how difficult was it to elude, for a length of time, the unrelenting enquiries of Pharaoh and his emiſſaries! His parents, therefore, finding too much reaſon to doubt the ſucceſs of their cares, determined to conſign him entirely to the divine providence. The banks of the Nile were lin'd with ruſhes, and they wove ſome of theſe into a cradle, whoſe form, perhaps, reſembled one of thoſe boats with which that famous river was always covered; and after they had well ſecured it with pitch, they laid the child in it, and lodged this precious treaſure among the green reeds, that grew along the edge of the river. Miriam, the ſiſter of this innocent creature, watched him by day, and Jochebed, perhaps, ſuckled him by night.

Ver. 5. And the daughter of Pharaoh came down to waſh her ſelf at the river, and her maidens walked along by the river ſide: And when ſhe ſaw the ark among the flags, ſhe ſent her maid to fetch it.] Miriam was performing her ſorrowful office to this unhappy brother, when ſhe now expected to ſee him become the prey of his mercileſs executioners. The daughter of Pharaoh came to bathe herſelf in the ſtream, and ſhe was certainly directed by the impulſe of a divine providence. Joſephus calls this princeſs Thermutis; but Artapanes, a Greek writer, names her Meris, in a fragment which Euſebius of Ceſarea has preſerved. He adds too, that ſhe was married to one of the inferior kings of Egypt, and that as ſhe had no children by him, ſhe ſubſtituted the ſon of a Hebrew woman, in order to conceal her own barrenneſs. The ſame writer likewiſe declares, that ſhe called him at firſt Moſes, but that he was afterwards ſtiled Muſeus by the Greeks, and was the maſter of Orpheus. This Artapanes had compoſed a compleat hiſtory of the Jews. St. Clement quotes it, Strom. p. 344. but this fragment may ſuffice to compenſate poſterity for the loſs of the remaining part of that work.

Ver. 6. And when ſhe had opened it, ſhe ſaw the child: And behold the babe wept, and ſhe had compaſſion on him, and ſaid, this is one of the Hebrews children.] The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, ſays the wiſeſt of all meer men. Prov. xxi. 1. Accordingly, God was pleaſed to inſpire the daughter of Pharaoh, with ſentiments of compaſſion for the young child. Scarce had ſhe caſt her eyes on the cradle of ruſhes, but ſhe commanded it to be brought to her, and ſcarce had ſhe opened it, but ſhe was dazzled with the beauty of the little babe, and melted into tenderneſs at its infant cries. She eaſily diſcovered him to be a Hebrew, for the ſtrange condition in which ſhe found him, was ſufficient to create that ſuſpicion in her mind, and the ſacrament with which he was marked, was a full conviction to her. Some Jewiſh doctors have thought, that ſhe beheld the Schekinah (by which they mean the divine majeſty) diffuſing its glory in the ark.

The

The daughter of Pharaoh immediately accepted the tender of Miriam's ſervice, and the joyful ſiſter haſtened to acquaint Jockebed, with the happy event. The tender mother was as expeditious, in her turn, to receive her child, with thoſe tranſports of nature which no words can deſcribe, and which none but an affectionate parent can experience. The Jews are always fond of intermixing the wonderful, with the reality; and affirm, that Pharaoh's daughter did not conſign the child to its mother, till it had refuſed ſeveral other nurſes who were appointed to tend him. But this hiſtory furniſhes us with ſo many real prodigies, that we have no occaſion to ſeek for thoſe which are imaginary.

Ver. 10.——And ſhe called his name Moſes; and ſhe ſaid, becauſe I drew him out of the water.] The Jews, who aſſert the antiquity of their tongue with the greateſt warmth, pretend, that it was immediately framed by God; that he ſpake it himſelf, for which reaſon it is called the holy tongue, and that it is the only language underſtood by the angels, and wherein we can pray and be heard with effect. And ſeveral Chriſtian writers, abating theſe ſuperſtitious fancies of the Jews, have acknowledged and maintain'd, that the Hebrew tongue is the moſt ancient in the world; the very ſame which was ſpoken by Adam and Noah, and preſerved in the family of Eber, who, according to them, were not concerned in the building of Babel, nor conſequently ſhared in the puniſhment inflicted on thoſe who were; but as we ſhall demonſtrate this, with ſeveral other particulars relating to the Hebrew tongue, to be groundleſs ſuppoſitions, in the preliminary diſſertation which we ſhall prefix to this work, when compleated, we ſhall therefore only take this opportunity offer'd us by the name of Moſes, to touch very briefly upon their principal argument, and indeed the only one which deſerves any conſideration. This argument is drawn from the etymologies of the names in the Moſaic hiſtory, ſome of which that inſpired writer himſelf derives from the Hebrew, and the reſt are generally ſuppoſed to have been deduced from that original.

And here it cannot be denied, that ſeveral names of perſons and places, before the confuſion of tongues, may be regularly derived from the Hebrew; and that there are ſome very pertinent reaſons given, and alluſions made, by the Sacred Hiſtorian, to evince their propriety, and the relation they have to the perſon or place deſigned by them: And this is the moſt that can be allowed; for tho' all the names in general, mentioned by Moſes before the diviſion of mankind at Babel, may poſſibly be forced from ſome Hebrew root or other, yet the greater part of them ſeem to be inſignificant, at leaſt to have no congruity with the ſubject; nor can it be expected they ſhould, unleſs we either imagine all ſuch names, as ſeem to relate to a future part of a perſon's life, were given by the ſpirit of prophecy; or elſe allow them to be impoſed after the events which occaſioned them happened, and ſo to be rather ſurnames than proper names; a conceſſion which manifeſtly weakens the argument drawn from them.

Thus much being premiſed, it will be eaſy to ſhew, that this demonſtrative argument, as it is called, will not bear examination. For it is not certain, that the names uſed by Moſes were the very original names themſelves, and not tranſlated by him from the primitive tongue into Hebrew, or at leaſt ſomewhat alter'd, to accommodate what he wrote to the underſtanding of the Jews. And how inconſiſtent ſoever ſome may think this method with hiſtorical veracity, it has been frequently practiſed by ſacred as well as prophane hiſtorians, as ſhall be ſufficiently proved in our intended Diſſertation, already mentioned; and Moſes himſelf has, in this 10th verſe now under conſideration, given a plain inſtance of his approbation of ſuch changes, in altering his own name, which was of Egyptian original, in order to adapt it to a Hebrew etymology. For the original name is Moüſe, or (as it is in the Coptic verſion) Moüſes, with the Greek termination, and it is compoſed of two Coptic, or old Egyptian words, mou, water, and ſe, to preſerve. But Moſes, finding that the Hebrew verb maſha, to draw out, bore ſome reſemblance, in ſound, to his name, and, in ſignification, to the occaſion of its impoſition, writes it Moſheh; and introduces Pharaoh's daughter aſſigning this reaſon for her conferring it upon him, becauſe, maſhitihu, I drew him out of the water.

The Egyptian princeſs had no children of her own, as we intimated before, nor the king her father any male heir; and it is thought that ſhe adopted Moſes for her ſon, and that her father deſigned him for his ſucceſſor to the crown of Egypt; but Moſes declined this advancement, as a ſcheme that would deprive him, and his poſterity, of the bleſſings which God had promiſed to the Hebrew nation, who were to be but ſtrangers in Egypt for a time, Gen. xv. 13. xlvi. 4. and l. 24. He had a full belief, that God would verify his promiſes to them, and by faith he refuſed to be called the ſon of Pharaoh's daughter, Heb. xi. 24. Under an entire perſuaſion of the certainty of theſe events which God himſelf had foretold, he turned his eyes and heart from the ſplendours of the Egyptian diadem, to the calamities and affliction of his brethren, and rather wiſhed that God would authoriſe him to lead them out of their captivity to the promiſed land, than to ſway the ſceptre of Egypt, and be number'd among its greateſt monarchs.

Clemens Alexandrinus informs us, that Moſes was taught arithmetic, geometry, phyſic, muſic, and hieroglyphics, otherwiſe called enigmatical philoſophy; to which Philo adds, aſtronomy, which he learned of the Chaldeans, and the Aſſyrian characters, from the Aſſyrians; and that they ſent for the beſt maſters from Greece, to inſtruct him in all liberal arts and ſciences: But that was not a time for the Egyptians, who excelled the reſt of the world in all branches of learning, to ſend for maſters from Greece, which rather ſtood in need of Egyptian teachers. So that when Moſes is ſaid to have been inſtructed in all the learning of Egypt, it plainly implies, that he had the beſt and moſt learned education that the whole world could then afford him. An ancient author, quoted by Clement biſhop of Alexandria, and by Euſebius, calls Moſes the firſt of all the ſages, or wiſe men, and ſays that he was the firſt inventer of the art of grammar, which he taught the Iſraelites, from whom the Phœnicians receiv'd it, and the Greeks from them.

Much pains have been taken to find Moſes ſuitable employment for the 40 years of his abode in Egypt. Joſephus has given us ſeveral remarkable particulars of his life, during that period, ſome of which not being contradictory to the ſacred account, but ſeeming rather to have been univerſally known and believed by the Jews of his time, the reader may perhaps be pleaſed with an abſtract of them. He informs us, that the princeſs Thermutis, having no children of her own, and having adopted Moſes, on the account of the ſingular beauties and accompliſhments of his body and mind, brought him to her father, who claſped him in his arms with great tenderneſs, and taking his crown from his head, placed it on that of the infant, who, inſtead of being pleaſed with it, caſt it on the ground, and ſtamp'd his foot upon it: Whereupon a certain prieſt, who had foretold his birth, cried out, that he ought to be put to death immediately, and that Egypt could not be ſafe, without having recourſe to that expedient for its preſervation. But Thermutis ſoon ſnatched him away, without any oppoſition from the king, and left the old prophet to exclaim at his leiſure; and he was continually contriving means to deſtroy a perſon ſo dangerous to the kingdom, but had the mortification to find them all ineffectual.

After this, Moſes being grown to man's eſtate, had an opportunity offer'd him of ſignalizing his courage and conduct. The Ethiopians who inhabited the upper lands, on the ſouth ſide of Egypt, had made many dreadful incurſions, plunder'd and ravag'd all the neighbouring parts of the country, and beat the Egyptian army which had been ſent to oppoſe them in a ſet battle, and became ſo elated with their ſucceſs, that they began to march towards the capital of Egypt. In this diſtreſs the Egyptians had recourſe to the oracle; which anſwer'd, that they muſt place an Hebrew general at their head. As none was more promiſing than Moſes, the king deſired his daughters to conſent, that he ſhould command his army: But ſhe, after having firſt expoſtulated with her father, how unreaſonable it was for the Egyptians, to implore the aſſiſtance of a man whom they had been ſo long plotting againſt, did not give her conſent, till ſhe had his oath, that no attempt ſhould be formed againſt her ſon. Moſes's firſt care, as ſoon as he was at the head of the Egyptian army, was to confront the enemy as ſoon as poſſible, and inſtead of marching up the Nile, as was uſual before, he choſe to croſs the country, and thereby ſhorten the way, and ſurprife the Ethiopians, who could not expect him to advance that way, becauſe the whole country was infeſted by flying and other poiſonous ſerpents, which did even infect the very air. But Moſes found out a method to preſerve his army from that danger, by carrying with him a vaſt number of birds, called Ibis, in iron cages, whoſe nature is to devour all ſorts of ſerpents, and to be friendly to all other creatures. His project ſucceeded to admiration, and the birds being once let looſe, made a ſpeedy end of all thoſe venomous creatures, and opened to him a quick and ſafe paſſage to the enemy's forces, upon whom he made a ſudden attack, and entirely defeated them. He afterwards enter'd their country, took ſeveral of their cities, and obliged them to retire into the city of Saba, where he cloſely beſieged them. The place being ſtrongly fortified, and ſituated in the middle of an iſland, kept him employ'd ſome conſiderable time; and the ſiege would, in all probability, have laſted much longer, had not Tharbis, the king of Ethiopia's daughter, entertain'd a ſudden paſſion for him, as ſhe ſaw him fighting with the utmoſt gallantry and valour, from the city wall. She therefore ſent privately to him, to let him know, that the city ſhould be ſurrender'd to him, upon condition that he ſhould marry her immediately after. Moſes conſented to the propoſal, and having taken poſſeſſion both of the place and the princeſs, returned with his victorious army to Egypt, where, inſtead of reaping the harveſt of his laurels, the ungrateful Egyptians accuſed him of murder to the king, who having already taken ſome umbrage at his valour and reputation, was reſolved to rid himſelf of him. Moſes having ſome ſuſpicion of his deſign, made his eſcape, and not daring to go by the common roads, for fear of being ſtop'd by the king's guards, was forced to paſs through a great deſart, to arrive at the land of Midian. Thus far Joſephus; from whoſe account we may gather, that there were three motives why Pharaoh and his people ſought Moſes's death, namely, 1. Their envy at his great ſucceſs, and conſummate wiſdom, in this warlike expedition. 2. Their jealouſy leſt he ſhould attempt to make ſome dangerous inſurrection in Egypt. And laſtly, the prophecies which that country was threatned with from an Hebrew. To which Philo adds a fourth, namely, his being too great a friend and favourer of the Hebrews, whom Pharaoh did already look upon as his moſt dangerous enemies.

Ver. 11, 12. And it came to paſs in thoſe days, when Moſes was grown, that he went out unto his brethren, and looked on their burdens: And he ſpied an Egyptian ſmiting an Hebrew, one of his brethren. And he looked this way and that way, and when he ſaw that there was no man, he ſlew the Egyptian, and buried him in the ſand.] The generous affection of this great man for his afflicted countrymen, made him venture to viſit and commiſerate them amidſt their oppreſſions, tho' at the hazard of his own life; and when he beheld an inſolent Egyptian treating a poor Hebrew with the uſual brutality of thoſe task-maſters, one of whom this Egyptian might probably then be, Moſes was ſo exaſperated at that odious ſpectacle, that he immediately killed the cruel officer, and buried him in the ſand. If what we have already cited from Joſephus be true, that Moſes had before this time commanded the troops of Pharaoh in ſeveral ſucceſsful expeditions againſt the Ethiopians, we need not be ſurpriſed at his martial diſpoſition on ſuch a conjuncture as this; but as Philo, who wrote the life of Moſes, and had as many opportunities of knowing all the particulars which compoſed it, as Joſephus himſelf, is altogether ſilent about his military expeditions againſt the Ethiopians, and as Moſes himſelf is ſo far from mentioning any particulars of that nature, that he rather deſcribes himſelf as a man of the utmoſt meekneſs and patience; we think it better to ſuppoſe, that he was ſtimulated by ſome divine impulſe, in the inſtance before us, as being the perſon choſen by heaven to be the deliverer of Iſrael.

The next day he ſaw two Hebrews in conteſt with each other, and intreated them to conſider, that they were brethren, and would have decided the difference between them; perhaps in expectation that they would conſider him, as a perſon likely to deliver them out of their bondage: They, however, entertained no ſuch idea of him, at that time; his proffer'd arbitration was rejected with contempt, and one of them upbraided him with killing the Egyptian. Moſes perceiving that his people had no favourable opinion of his conduct, and underſtanding that Pharaoh, who had been informed of his treatment of the Egyptian, had an intention to deſtroy him, thought it moſt adviſeable to withdraw from the danger that threaten'd him; and he accordingly provided for his ſecurity by retiring into the country of Midian in Arabia Petrea, whoſe metropolis was called Petra, not far from mount Horeb, which was either near that of Sinai, or more probably Sinai and Horeb were two tops of the ſame mountain; the former of which St. Paul places in Arabia, Galat. iv. 5. tho' Horeb may likewiſe have been the common name of the whole range of mountains on which Sinai was ſituated, and that it was called Horeb; or, according to the Hebrew, Choreb, from the exceſſive dryneſs of it.

Ver. 16, 17. Now the prieſt of Midian had ſeven daughters: and they came and drew water, and filled the troughs to water their father's flock. And the ſhepherds came and drove them away: But Moſes ſtood up, and helped them, and watered their flock.] The Hebrew word cohen ſignifies indifferently either a prieſt, or prince, and accordingly, in thoſe early ages, both theſe offices were frequently united in one and the ſame perſon. It ſeems however, that the perſon ſpoken of in this verſe, was ſcarce a prince in that country; for if he were, their ſhepherds would not have preſumed to treat his daughters with that inſolence, and if he exercis'd the ſacerdotal office, according to our tranſlation, it is made a matter of conteſt between two rabbies, whether he was an idolater, or a worſhipper of the true God. Aben Ezra is of opinion, that, as he deſcended from Midian the ſon of Abraham by Keturah, he, in all probability, profeſſed the true religion: Nor can he ſuppoſe, that Moſes would have married his daughter, had ſhe been bred up in a falſe religion. Whereas it is evident, that Moſes not only acknowledges his alliance with that family, but invites his father-in-law, upon his arrival in the camp of Iſrael, to offer ſacrifices to the Lord, Exod. xviii. 11, 12. as one who adored the ſame God with the Iſraelites. Kimchi, however, affirms, on the other hand, that, at firſt, he was an idolatrous prieſt, but afterwards, when he came to Moſes in the wilderneſs, and received a particular information of the wonders which God had wrought in Egypt, for the deliverance of the Hebrews, he became a convert to the worſhip of the true Deity, and for this opinion, he produces a paſſage in the ſame chapter, ver. 11. Now I know that the Lord is greater than all gods; for, in the thing wherein they dealt proudly, he was above them. But there is likewiſe another difficulty with relation to this perſon. He is expreſly called Jethro, the father-in-law of Moſes, in the third chapter of this book, ver. 1. and yet the father of the young women, whom Moſes defended at the well, and one of whom he certainly married, is ſaid to be Reuel, in the 18th verſe of this chapter; but without ſuppoſing this Reuel to be their grandfather, who being head of the family, might in a larger ſenſe be called their father, we think it more natural to ſuppoſe that he had two names, inſtances of which have already been given.

Ver. 21. And Moſes was content to dwell with the man: And he gave Moſes Zipporah his daughter.] It may not be unneceſſary to obſerve, that the ſacred writers ſeldom relate all the paſſages of an hiſtorical tranſaction in the manner other authors obſerve, but only ſuch as are moſt material. We may therefore ſuppoſe, that many circumſtances intervened between the admiſſion of Moſes into Jethro's family, and his marriage with his daughter. The obſervation of Philo, however, is not to be diſregarded, viz. That men of great genius quickly ſhew themſelves, and are not made known only by length of time. And therefore he thinks, that Jethro being ſtruck with admiration of his moſt promiſing aſpect, and then of his wiſe diſcourſe, immediately gave him the moſt beautiful of his daughters in marriage, not ſtaying to enquire who he was, becauſe his own excellent qualities ſufficiently recommended him to his affection and eſteem.

Whilſt Moſes lived in Midian, he is ſuppoſed to have employed his leiſure-time in writing his book of Geneſis; and, according to ſome authors, the book of Job, alſo: And, indeed, the ſubjects of both theſe books were exceedingly proper to be laid before the Iſraelites; for the firſt of them would preſent that people with a clear view of

of the hiſtory of the world; the creation of mankind; their own origin, and the promiſes of God to their anceſtors; ſo that it would furniſh them with the beſt account they could poſſibly deſire, of their condition and expectations. In the other work they might ſee a very noble and inſtructive model of patience, and reſignation to the will of God, in the life of a virtuous perſon, who, from a ſtate of the greateſt affluence, and domeſtick felicity, was reduced to the moſt afflictive calamities; and, after a due period of probation, re-inſtated in the poſſeſſion of greater proſperity than he had ever experienced before. This was certainly a ſubject very fit to be repreſented to the Iſraelites, who ſighed, in the anguiſh of their ſouls, under the preſſure of the Egyptian ſervitude; and they might want ſuch an excellent example, as that of Job, to enable them to poſſeſs their ſouls in patience, till the appearance of that happy ſeaſon, when God ſhould be graciouſly diſpoſed to cloſe their ſcene of ſorrow.

Ver. 22. And ſhe bare him a ſon, and he called his name Gerſhom: For he ſaid I have been a ſtranger in a ſtrange land.] The name Gerſhom ſignifies a deſolate ſtranger; and it was a very proper alluſion to the condition of Moſes, who lived remote from his own people in a foreign country. Either this ſon was born long after Moſes had eſpouſed Zipporah; or he did not marry her till he had been a conſiderable time in that country: For when he left it after forty years continuance in it, his children were but young, as appears from chap. iv. 20.

Ver. 23. And it came to paſs in proceſs of time, that the king of Egypt died, and the children of Iſrael ſighed, by reaſon of their bondage, &c.] Upon the death of this Egyptian king, the unfortunate Iſraelites expected a relaxation from the miſeries they ſuſtain'd; and flatter'd themſelves that his ſucceſſor would order them to be treated with more humanity: But when they found that their calamities had no intermiſſion, they ſighed in the agony of their ſouls. We may charitably ſuppoſe, that they pour'd out their fervent ſupplications to the Deity, to relieve them from the miſeries in which they were involv'd, by the cruelty of man. That ever-gracious being was attentive to the voice of their complaints; and as he had been the conſtant ſpectator of the injuſtice they ſuffer'd, he now determined to interpoſe, with his miraculous and Almighty power, for their deliverance.

There are four different words, in the two laſt verſes of this chapter, each of which is moſt beautifully expreſſive of God's benevolent intentions in favour of his choſen people. He heard; he remembred; he looked upon them, and had reſpect unto them. Inhuman men may triumph a while in their barbarity to the ſervants of God, but they fatally deceive themſelves, when they imagine that their conduct will be attended with impunity. The God of juſtice, and tender mercies, will manifeſt his compaſſionate regard to thoſe who are perſecuted for the ſake of righteouſneſs, and, in his own due time, will lay the proud oppreſſor low.

CHAP. III.

1 Moſes keepeth Jethro's flock: 2 God appeareth to him in a burning buſh: 9 He ſendeth him to deliver Iſrael. 14 The name of God: 15 His meſſage to Iſrael.

NOW Moſes kept the flock of Jethro his father in law, the prieſt of Midian: and he led the flock to the back-ſide of the deſart, and came to the mountain of God, even to Horeb.

2 And the angel of the LORD appeared unto him in a flame of fire out of the midſt of a buſh: and he looked, and behold, the buſh burned with fire, and the buſh was not conſumed.

3 And Moſes ſaid, I will now turn aſide, and ſee this great ſight, why the buſh is not burnt.

4 And when the LORD ſaw that he turned aſide to ſee, God called unto him out of the midſt of the buſh, and ſaid, Moſes, Moſes. And he ſaid, Here am I.

5 And he ſaid, Draw not nigh hither: put off thy ſhoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou ſtandeſt is holy ground.

6 Moreover he ſaid, I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob. And Moſes hid his face: for he was afraid to look upon God.

7 ¶ And the LORD ſaid, I have ſurely ſeen the affliction of my people which are in Egypt, and have heard their cry, by reaſon of their task-maſters: for I know their ſorrows.

8 And I am come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them up out of that land, unto a good land and a large, unto a land flowing with milk and honey; unto the place of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebuſites.

9 Now therefore behold, the cry of the children of Iſrael is come unto me: and I have alſo ſeen the oppreſſion wherewith the Egyptians oppreſs them.

10 Come now therefore, and I will ſend thee unto Pharaoh, that thou mayeſt bring forth my people the children of Iſrael out of Egypt.

11 ¶ And Moſes ſaid unto God, Who am I, that I ſhould go unto Pharaoh, and that I ſhould bring forth the children of Iſrael out of Egypt?

12 And he ſaid, Certainly I will be with thee; and this ſhall be a token unto thee, that I have ſent thee: when thou haſt brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye ſhall ſerve God upon this mountain.

13 And Moſes ſaid unto God, Behold, when I come unto the children of Iſrael, and ſhall ſay unto them, The God of your fathers hath ſent me unto you; and they ſhall ſay to me, What is his name? What ſhall I ſay unto them?

14 And God ſaid unto Moſes, I AM THAT I AM: and he ſaid, Thus ſhalt thou ſay unto the children of Iſrael, I AM hath ſent me unto you.

15 And God ſaid moreover unto Moſes, Thus ſhalt thou ſay unto the children of Iſrael, The LORD God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob, hath ſent me unto you: this is my name for ever, and this is my memorial unto all generations.

16 Go and gather the elders of Iſrael together, and ſay unto them, The LORD God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, of Iſaac, and of Jacob, appeared unto me, ſaying, I have ſurely viſited you, and ſeen that which is done to you in Egypt.

17 And I have ſaid, I will bring you up out of the affliction of Egypt, unto the land of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebuſites, unto a land flowing with milk and honey.

18 And they ſhall hearken to thy voice: and thou ſhalt come, thou and the elders of Iſrael, unto the king of Egypt, and you ſhall ſay unto him, The LORD God of the Hebrews hath met with us; and now let us go (we beſeech thee) three days journey into the wilderneſs, that we may ſacrifice to the LORD our God.

19 ¶ And I am ſure that the king of Egypt will not let you go, no, not by a mighty hand.

20 And I will ſtretch out my hand, and ſmite Egypt with all my wonders which I will do in the midſt thereof: and after that he will let you go.

21 And I will give this people favour in the ſight of the Egyptians: and it ſhall come to paſs, that when ye go, ye ſhall not go empty:

22 But every woman ſhall borrow of her neighbour, and of her that ſojourneth in her houſe, jewels of ſilver, and jewels of gold, and raiment: and ye ſhall put them upon your ſons, and upon your daughters; and ye ſhall ſpoil the Egyptians.

Ver. 1, 2. Now Moſes kept the flock of Jethro his father-in-law, the prieſt of Midian: And he led the flock to the back-ſide of the deſart, and came to the mountain of God, even to Horeb. And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a flame of fire out of the midſt of a buſh: And he looked, and behold, the buſh burned with fire, and the buſh was not conſumed.] While Moſes enjoyed the tranquility of a paſtoral life, the afflictions of the Iſraelites redoubled, and their cries aſcended up to heaven without intermiſſion. The deity was moved at the miſery of his people, and choſe Moſes for their deliverer. This great man then tended the flocks of his father, and had led them to the mount of Horeb, which is probably called, by anticipation, the mountain of God becauſe the law was one day to be publiſhed on its ſummit. He there ſaw a burning buſh, which flamed ſo as not to be conſumed. It was natural for him to be aſtoniſhed at ſo extraordinary a ſight, and when he made a nearer approach, in order to contemplate this miraculous Phænomenon, he heard an awful voice utter theſe accents, Moſes, Moſes, put off thy ſhoes from thy feet, for the place whereon thou ſtandeſt is holy Ground.

We are informed, by the ſacred account of this tranſaction, that the language, which Moſes heard, was pronounced by the angel of the Lord; but the expreſſions cannot poſſibly correſpond with any being but the uncreated angel, or the great Meſſiah. And he is, accordingly, repreſented in Deuteronomy, chap. xxxiii. ver. 13, 16. as the fountain of thoſe bleſſings, which Moſes utters to one of the moſt favoured tribes. Of Joſeph he ſaid, Bleſſed of the Lord be his land——— The good-will of him that dwelt in the buſh———come upon the head of Joſeph. The Jews affirm, that this angel was the ſame redeemer who ſaid to Jacob, I am the God of Bethel; and St. Stephen aſſures us, that the angel, who appeared to Moſes in the buſh, was the ſame being who gave the law in mount Sinai.

All that Moſes had ſeen and heard, may be conſidered as a ſymbolical ſcene. The flaming buſh repreſented the Iſraelites, in the ſtate of their afflictions which conſumed them. The miracle of the fire, that burnt without deſtroying the buſh, was an intimation that they ſhould not ſink under the rigour of their oppreſſions. The audible voice, amidſt the flame, denoted the preſence of that God who was afflicted in all their afflictions, Iſa. lxiii 9. A fine paſſage of the Rabbins deſerves a place here; God walked in the buſh, which repreſented the trouble and ſorrow wherewith we are encompaſſed. But when God ſaw his people walk in the midſt of them, he reſolved to walk, likewiſe, with his people; confirming thus what he ſaid by his prophet; In all their afflictions he was afflicted. Pirke Eliez. c. xl. p. 105.

The command which Moſes received to put off his ſhoes from his feet, denoted the reverence with which a creature ought to be impreſſed, and the purity it ought to be adorned with, when it approaches its great creator. Perhaps the cuſtom which prevailed, in ſucceeding ages, of entering bare-foot into the temple of the gods, might be derived from this command. We do not, however, think it can be proved, that the Jews anciently put off their ſhoes when they enter'd the temple of Jeruſalem, tho' ſome of their doctors pretend they did: And Maimonides declares poſitively, That people were never admitted into the houſe of God, upon the holy mountain, with ſhoes, or a ſtaff, or with the clothes in which they performed their reſpective labours, or occupations, or with ſoiled feet. But this learned Jew has not informed us from whence he derived that tradition.

Ver. 6. Moreover he ſaid, I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob. And Moſes hid his face: for he was afraid to look upon God.] Moſes was terrified at this ſacred viſion, and hid his face with an humble confuſion, when he conſidered himſelf in the preſence of the Almighty, in whoſe ſight even the heavens are impure, and who charges his angels with folly. But as his mercy is as amiable as his majeſty is awful, he condeſcended to encourage his trembling ſervant, by declaring that he was the God of his anceſtors; and adds, in the verſes that follow, that he had ſurely ſeen the affliction of his people, and had heard their cry: And that he was come down himſelf to deliver them from their barbarous oppreſſors, and to conduct them into the happy land, which he had pre-ordained them to poſſeſs. The Deity then acquaints Moſes, in the 10th verſe, with his intention of ſending him to Pharaoh, as his inſtrument for accompliſhing the intended freedom of the Iſraelites. Moſes was aſtoniſhed at this unexpected commiſſion, and cried out, Who am I that I ſhould go unto Pharaoh, and that I ſhould bring forth the children of Iſrael out of Egypt? The lowly ſenſe of his own imperfections made him think it almoſt impoſſible, that he ſhould execute this commiſſion in ſuch an effectual manner, as was neceſſary on that great occaſion; and even the divine command did not immediately convince him of his ability for that important province.

Ver. 12. And he ſaid, certainly I will be with thee; and this ſhall be a token unto thee, that I have ſent thee: When thou haſt brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye ſhall ſerve God upon this mountain.] The Deity inſtead of being offended with the firſt heſitation of Moſes, was pleaſed to ratify his promiſe by a ſign, the nature of which is attended with no ſmall difficulty. When God works an immediate miracle for the confirmation of a promiſe, there is nothing in it but what may be eaſily comprehended, and the conviction of thoſe who behold it, is in a manner, inevitable. Thus Gideon fainting under the weight of that task which God had enjoin'd him, ſollicits for a miracle to warrant the aid he ſhould want in the diſcharge of of his duty, and his requeſt was granted, Judg. vi. 17. But the propoſing a future token to evince the accompliſhment of a preſent promiſe, ſeems inconſiſtent with the intention of ſuch a token; and yet God makes an act of futurity to be the evidence of the verification of his preſent promiſe.

The ſolution of this difficulty, which uſually occurs in the commentaries of ſome expoſitors, who have taken notice of it, is, in our opinion, far from being ſatisfactory. They alledge, that this token was intended by God to root out of the heart of Moſes, the remains of his unbelief, which, perhaps, would ſtill be harboured there, even after he had delivered the Iſraelites: And, in conformity to that ſentiment, they paraphraſe theſe words thus; "Leſt "thou ſhouldeſt ſtill ſuſpect, that the perfect harmony "which thou wilt one day diſcover between the promiſe "and its accompliſhment, was the effect of ſecond cauſes, "and not a miracle immediately proceeding from my "power, and directed by my wiſdom, I tell thee before-"hand, that this mountain ſhall be the place where ye "ſhall worſhip me, when ye come out of Egypt." But was it poſſible that there ſhould remain the leaſt incredulity in the mind of Moſes, at the period which God denoted to him? After having delivered the people, by rendering himſelf terrible to Pharaoh and all his court, by turning rivers of water into blood, changing the day into night, deſtroying all the firſt-born of Egypt, and cauſing the king himſelf, and his whole army, to be ſwallowed up by the ſame waves of the ſea, which were a wall on the right hand, and on the left, to the Iſraelites; we ſay, could he ſtill have the leaſt doubt, whether this great deliverance were to be aſcribed to Divine providence, or meer fortune? And if there were ſtill occaſion for tokens, how could that propoſed by God, and which was infinitely leſs important than all the preceding, produce an effect for which the others were inſufficient?

The ſolution of this difficulty, will, in our opinion, be found in the difference of the particular promiſes made by God. There are ſome whoſe events depend upon certain conditions; but there are others, to which no condition is annexed. To be the meſſenger of the former, is exerciſing a glorious miniſtry; but this is likewiſe attended with danger and humiliation. The perſon to whom God confides it, may live in a perpetual fear of promiſing ſomething, without effect, becauſe they to whom the promiſe was made, may be wanting in the condition required of them. But nothing can intimidate a man, to whom God has given a commiſſion of the ſecond kind, becauſe the infallibility of the event ſupports him againſt all obſtacles that are preſented in his way. Moſes might be apprehenſive, that the incredulity of the Iſraelites would prove an obſtruction to their deliverance; but God fortifies him againſt that fear, and, in order to extinguiſh it entirely, he makes him ſenſible, that the promiſe he gave him was not conditional, but that it was attended with circumſtances, like theſe whoſe accompliſhment had been decreed in his eternal councils, independently of any event or limitation. He is not contented with ſimply promiſing, but foretels and particularizes the niceſt and moſt minute circumſtances: He not only acquaints him, that the people ſhall be delivered, but deſcribes to him the exact place, where they ſhould pay their homage to their deliverer, after they had ſeen their deliverance. And this detail is the token God gave him of the certainty of that event.

The ſame ſolution is applicable to the token given to Hezekiah, 2 Kings xviii. 29. and the application that may be made to the promiſe given to that king, may ſerve for a proof of the juſtneſs of that which we make of it here. What is that token which God gave to Hezekiah? 'Tis exactly the ſame as we have obſerved; a punctual detail which never accompanies thoſe promiſes, the event whereof depends on ſome doubtful and fleeting condition. The armies of Sennacherib beſiege Jeruſalem; Hezekiah fears they will take it, Iſaiah ſecures him againſt that fear, and promiſes him an approaching deliverance. Hezekiah dreads leſt the ſins of his people ſhould ſtand between him and the Divine goodneſs. God fortifies him againſt the ſecond apprehenſion, which, in appearance, was more juſt than the former; and, to convince him that the reſolution he had taken to deliver his people, was irreſpective and infallible, he ſays to him, This ſhall be a ſign unto thee, Ye ſhall eat this year ſuch things as grow of themſelves, and in the ſecond year that which ſpringeth of the ſame, and in the third year ſow ye and reap, and plant vineyards, and eat the fruit thereof.

The averſion of Moſes to the commiſſion given him by God, was not yet overcome. The people to whom he was to be ſent, knew, by the tradition of their anceſtors, that when God honoured them with any new revelation, he aſſumed ſome name, to give it the greater weight, and made mention of ſome attribute that ſeemed to ſerve as a ſecurity for its accompliſhment. Moſes, therefore, formed a new objection, and ſaid to God, Behold, when I come unto the children of Iſrael, and ſhall ſay unto them, the God of your fathers hath ſent me unto you, and they ſhall ſay unto me, What is his name? What ſhall I ſay unto them?

Ver. 14. And God ſaid unto Moſes, I AM THAT I AM: And he ſaid, Thus ſhalt thou ſay unto the children of Iſrael, I AM hath ſent me unto you.] The cabaliſtical Jews, and after them Joſephus, and ſome Romaniſts, are of opinion, that Moſes did not ask for the name of God, but for the true pronunciation of it, which they think had been loſt through the wickedneſs of mankind: For which reaſon, the former affirm, that the word holam, us'd by God preſently after, being written without a vau, ſhould not be render'd, for ever, but hid; from the root halam, to hide; not conſidering, that if that was the caſe, it ſhould be written halam, and not gholam. Upon this account, the name Jehovah, is by all the Jews call'd ſhem hamphoraſh, the unutterable name, which Joſephus, in the place juſt now quoted, ſays was never known, or heard of, before God told it to Moſes. And the hiſtorian adds, that he durſt not ſo much as mention it: For which reaſon, the Jews never pronounce it, but they uſe the word Adonai, or Elohim, or, plainly, the word haſhem, the name to expreſs it. Thus, in their letters, and common diſcourſe, inſtead of ſaying, the Lord bleſs or protect you; they ſay, the name bleſs you, &c. And they think that the words us'd by Daniel in his prayer Lemaghan Adonai, do not mean, as we underſtand them, for the ſake of the Lord, or the Meſſiah, or, as we expreſs it, for Chriſt's ſake; but for the ſake of the word Adonai, which they were obliged to uſe till the Meſſiah ſhould come and teach them the true pronunciation of the name Jehovah: Not but their high-prieſt did pronounce it Jehovah once a year, on the day of expiation, from the time of their return from the Babyloniſh captivity, to the laſt deſtruction of the temple; but they had but few diſciples near them that could learn its pronunciation. And during the time of the bleſſing, in which this name was repeated, the prieſts and Levites ſang louder than ordinary, that none elſe might hear it: But even then they were very far from thinking it the right pronunciation of the Tetrogrammaton. For they think, that any man who could once attain it, might ſhake heaven and earth with it, work the greateſt miracles, and dive into the deepeſt ſecrets of the Deity. They tell us, that Moſes had engrav'd it upon his rod, and, by vertue of that ineffable word, wrought all thoſe mighty wonders in favour of his people: That Noah could ſteer the ark which way he pleas'd, by it; and that Jeſus Chriſt having privately taken it out of the temple, or, as others, affirm, brought it with him from Egypt, and placed it between the skin and fleſh of his thigh, had obtain'd the power of working all his miracles, which, they ſay, any man elſe might do, that could pronounce that name aright.

They add, that Simon, ſurnamed the Juſt, one of their high-prieſts, who flouriſhed about the year of the world 3702. and died 3711. i. e. about 289 years before Chriſt, was the laſt who knew it; but that the number of prophane people increaſing, they thought it beſt to ſubſtitute another name in its room, conſiſting of twelve letters, which the high-prieſt made uſe of when he bleſſed the people. Tarpho, a noted Rabbi, ſuppoſed to be the ſame with the Trypho of Juſtin Martyr, tells us, that he being one day near the high-prieſt, with an intention to hear this bleſſing, found, that he only uttered the name of God in an articulate manner, whilſt the Levites did drown his voice with their ſinging, that it might not be learned and abuſed by the wicked. But adds, that, ſince the time of Simon Juſtus, it has been wholly loſt, not to be recovered again till the coming of the Meſſiah. In the mean time, the Talmud has thunder'd out a moſt horrid imprecation againſt thoſe who ſhall dare to pronounce it; becauſe the Jews think the very angels themſelves are not allowed to utter it.

The truth is, thoſe who think that Jehovah is the right pronunciation, are far from being ſure that their opinion is true: It is evident, that the ancients wrote it very differently from them. Sanchoniathon ſpells it, Jevo; Diodorus Siculus, Macrobius, Clemens of Alexandria, St. Jerome, and Origen, pronounced it Jao. The Samaritans, and, after them, Epiphanius and Theodoret, Jave, or Jabe. Others of the ancients write it, Jahoh, Javo, Jaon, Jaho, and Jahod. Among the moderns, Capellus is for pronouncing it Javo; Druſius, Jave; Hottinger, Jebva; Mercer, Jehovah; Caſtalio, Jovah; and Le Clerc, Jawoh, or Javoh. The Romans retain'd ſome ſimilitude to theſe ſounds in their Jovis; to which Varro ſeems to allude, when he ſays, Deum Judæorum eſſe Jovem; That Jove was god of the Jews, as St. Auſtin alledges, out of him, in his firſt book of The defence of the Goſpel, c. xxii. The Moors, likewiſe, call God, Juba, or Jubah; and the Mohammedans, Hou; which, with them, ſignifies the ſame as Jehovah, i. e. he who is: Which name they write at the beginning of all their patents, paſſes, and the like; and pronounce it frequently in their prayers. Some of their devotees will ſometimes repeat that word ſo often, and with ſuch rapidity and vehemence, that they drop down with giddineſs. However, it is plain, that the four letters which conſtitute that great and venerable name, may be pronounc'd in all the above-mention'd articulations of ſound, and in ſeveral others, according to the vowels that are join'd with them. Thus much for the pronunciation of the word Jehovah.

As to the utterance of it in common diſcourſe, Philo affirms, that after the blaſphemer had been ſtoned to death in the wilderneſs, God commanded Moſes to publiſh a new law, importing, That thoſe who curſed the LORD ſhould be guilty of ſin, but whoever ſhould pronounce the name of GOD, ſhould be put to death; which is the verſion which the Septuagint and Theodoret have given us, of the 15th and 16th verſes of the 24th chapter of Leviticus: Whereas, according to the original, it is, Whoſoever curſeth his god or gods, ſhall bear his own ſin; and whoſoever ſhall blaſpheme the name of the LORD, ſhall ſurely be put to death. This law, continues Philo, is full of the profoundeſt wiſdom, the firſt part of which forbids the curſing or blaſpheming the falſe gods of the Gentiles; and the ſecond, the pronunciation of the name of God, either in a vein of levity, or as an ornament of ſpeech; which he thinks deſerves the ſevereſt of all puniſhments. But as to the firſt part of this law, according to Philo's expoſition, that author ſeems to have forgotten, that Jeremiah enjoins the Jews, a little before they were carried into the Babyloniſh captivity, not only to ſpeak againſt the gods of Babylon, but even to denounce death and deſtruction againſt them all, as being no gods; and that not in their nativeHebrew, which was not underſtood there, but in plain Chaldee, the language of that country. And it is obſervable, that this verſe is the only one in this prophetical book, that is written in Chaldee, all the reſt being in Hebrew. It is not eaſy to determine, whether the Seventy had loſt the right pronunciation of the word Jehovah; or whether they purpoſely concealed it under the name of Κύριος, Lord, or whether they uſed that Greek word at all: For, firſt, they could not but be ſenſible, that the word Jehovah was no relative word, as Κύριος or Lord is; for tho' we can properly ſay, Κύριός μου, Κύριός ἡμῶν, &c. i. e. my Lord, our Lord, &c. yet Jehovah has never any pronoun fixed to it; whereas Elohim and Adonai have, as Eloai Elohenu, &c. for which reaſon even St. Jerom chuſes to render it by Adonai, in Exod. vi. 3. and nomen meum Adonai non indicavi eis, where it is in the Hebrew, but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them. Thoſe tranſlators therefore who have render'd that word by Dominus, as the Vulgate, or Lord, as our own, don't ſeem to have ſufficiently attended to what has been juſt now obſerved; for Jehovah not being a relative appellation, ought not to have been render'd by one which is ſo. The French Geneva tranſlation has made uſe of a much better word to expreſs it, viz. l'Eternel, the eternal Being; which name, in the firſt place, is not relative, (for we cannot properly ſay, mon Eternel, votre Eternel, my Eternal, your Eternal) and it expreſſes the etymon of Jehovah much better than Κύριος, Dominus, or Lord. But ſecondly, it is very probable, that the Septuagint left this, as well as ſome other names of God, ſuch as Jah, Sadæi, Zabaoth, &c. untranſlated, till the ſecond reviſal of that verſion; and that they concealed the true meaning of Jehovah under the Samaritan characters (as being leſs underſtood by the reſt of the world than the Hebrew or Aſſyrian letters were) or under the Greek capitals, which bore a reſemblance to the four letters of Jehovah, and yet had a ſound ſo different from it, that they would never lead the heathen reader to the true pronunciation of it. St. Jerom, Origen, and Euſebius aſſure us, that they had ſeen copies of the Septuagint, written in the two above-mentioned ways, and that even in their time, the Jews choſe to write that name as often as it occur'd, in the old Samaritan letters; leſt that awful name ſhould be abuſed by the heathens to ill purpoſes. Tho' Origen adds, that theſe precautions did not prove ſo effectual, but that they made uſe of it in their exorciſms, in their charms againſt diſeaſes, and other ſuperſtitious rites. And Clement of Alexandria informs us, that thoſe Egyptians who were allowed to enter into the temple of the Sun, did wear the name Jaon about their middle. We find likewiſe in ſome magic verſes againſt the gout, mentioned by Trallian, the names Jas or Jaath. Something like this we meet with in Pythagoras's golden verſes, where there is an oath by Τετρακτύς, i. e. by him whoſe name is ſpelt with four letters; as alſo the inſcription Tu es in that famous frontiſpiece in the temple of Delphos, mentioned by Euſebius, which alludes to the Hebrew name of God. Such was alſo that of the Egyptians, JAM, written over one of their's. Cicero gives an inſtance of ſome names of the heathen gods, which they did not dare to pronounce; to which Lucan adds, that the very naming of them would have ſhaken the earth.

It remains, that we now enquire into the ſignification of the name Jehovah, in which we ſhall not find ſuch a diſſonancy among expoſitors, as we did with reference to the pronunciation of it. For firſt, they are all agreed, that it is derived from the root hajah, he has been, and denotes God's ſelf-exiſtence and eternal nature. Accordingly, in the paſſage before us, God calls himſelf, Ehjeh, Aſher, Ehjeh, I am that I am, or rather I am becauſe I am; where the verb, tho' it be in the future, yet according to the genius of the Hebrew tongue, is applicable to the preſent or perfect tenſes, and implies his immutability, as continuing the ſame that he has been, and is, to all eternity. It is likewiſe more than probable, that God chuſes to expreſs himſelf in the future tenſe, to ſhew that he is the only Being who can truly ſay, I ſhall or will be what I am, &c. Neither was this name unknown to the wiſer heathens, as we have ſeen by ſome of their inſcriptions, to which we ſhall add one more mentioned by Egubinus, written on the doors of the Egyptian temples, and exactly agreeing with this wonderful name of God, viz. I am whatſoever was, is, and ſhall be. According to which, Thales of Mileſium, being asked what God was, replied, that which always is, and has neither beginning nor end. Thus Plato truly ſays, that nothing really exiſts but that which is immutable; for which, and ſome other of his wiſe ſayings, he is ſuppoſed to have read Moſes's books, or converſed with ſome of his diſciples when he was in Egypt; which is not improbable, ſeeing Ariſtobulus, who flouriſhed in the time of the Maccabees, writes to Ptolemy Philometor, that the books of Moſes having been tranſlated into Greek, in the reign of Alexander, Pythagoras and Plato had taken many things from them. Some divines, and in particular our learned Ainſworth, think that Jehovah is the participle of hajah in piel, and that it doth not only ſignify to be, but to cauſe to be, or give being; by which not only his omnipotence, but likewiſe his faithfulneſs and truth, are plainly intimated and implied, as being alone able and ſure to make good his promiſes. Upon all theſe accounts therefore Jehovah is look'd upon to be the incommunicable name of God, there being no created beings, unto whom it can be properly or indeed at all applied, in any of theſe ſenſes; whereas thoſe of Elohim, Adonai, Gibbor, &c. have been given to angels and men.

We ſhall not trouble our readers with all the myſtical notions which cabaliſts have raiſed from the letters which compoſe this awful name, nor with the preference they give to it, above all other names of God, as being, as it were, were, a monarch upon his throne, and the others only as guards and officers under him; but conclude this diſſertation with a ſhort enquiry, why the word Jehovah is thought ineffable, not only by the Jews, but alſo by ſome Chriſtians. Firſt, Genebrard confidently affirms, it is neither a Hebrew nor Chriſtian word or name; that it is neither received by the fathers, nor by the rabbins, nor even known or uſed by Chriſt or his apoſtles. But to this it may be anſwer'd, that they were all obliged to uſe the Septuagint verſion then in vogue, which every where tranſlates that word Κύριος, Lord, as has been already obſerved. Secondly, Bellarmin pretends, that becauſe St. Jerom and Origen in his Hexapla after him, read it Adonai, and that the vowel points are the ſame in both; therefore it ought to be read and pronounced Adonai, and not Jehovah. But had thoſe gentlemen conſidered, that theſe two words are of different originals and ſignifications, and written with different letters; that the one is relative, and the other not; that the one is communicable, and the other incommunicable; that the points and vowels, being almoſt univerſally acknowledged to be of human invention, can be of no authority here; and that their likeneſs, tho' not ſameneſs, in both theſe names, was owing to a ſuperſtitious reſpect which the Mazorites had for one of them; that St. Jerom might be too much influenced by his Jewiſh maſter, in this, as well as in many other caſes; and that both he and Origen have not ſcrupled to pronounce it Jao, as we have hinted above; that their writing it by Adonai might be more owing to a ſuperſtitious fear, than to any judgment or conviction of the unlawfulneſs of pronouncing that name; and laſtly, that they have no where ſaid, that it was ineffable; we ſay, had they conſidered theſe things, they would never have fallen into that ſuperſtition. As for the general reaſon, that the right pronunciation having been loſt, whether during the captivity, or at any other time or place, it is unlawful to ſubſtitute any other inſtead of it, it may be ſafely anſwered, that the deſign of words or names being to convey ideas into the mind, of thoſe things of which they are but types, the difference will be very ſmall, whether the pronunciation be right or wrong, provided the idea it conveys be right. And we are much miſtaken, whatever theſe gentlemen ſay, if in this caſe the pronouncing the word Jehovah, which conveys the moſt perfect idea we can have of the Godhead, let the pronunciation be ever ſo wrong, is not much ſafer than their pronouncing it Adonai, which being a word of a vaſtly inferior ſignification, and applicable to every man who has any ſuperiority over another, conveys a much more imperfect idea of the Godhead, and is therefore liable to be uttered with leſs awe and reſpect.

This is ſo true in fact, that one may obſerve thoſe ſcrupulous perſons who affect the utmoſt conſternation when they hear the word Jehovah utter'd, will yet pronounce that of Adonai, tho' it conveys the ſame idea, with leſs ſeeming reverence than they would that of a king, or a common magiſtrate. And one would hardly think, that they could be in earneſt, when we find them branding their adverſaries with the epithet of Jehovaiſts. However, it muſt be own'd, that tho' all the names of God ought to be utter'd with profound awe, yet this, if poſſible, ought to be expreſs'd with a greater veneration: And we ought to be exceeding cautious, not to uſe it without a warrantable occaſion. The text which chiefly intimidates the Jews, againſt the pronunciation of this ſacred name, is in Leviticus, chap. xxiv. ver. 16. where it is expreſly declar'd that he that blaſphemeth (which they read nameth) the name of the Lord, ſhall be ſtoned: Where the word nakab, which, in its primitive import, ſignifies to pierce, and is therefore often uſed for writing, engraving, or enrolling, more properly prohibits the writing, than the utterance of that ſacred name; for nakab never ſignifies to utter, unleſs it be in a very criminal ſenſe, ſuch as curſing, or blaſpheming.

Ver. 15. And God ſaid moreover unto Moſes, Thus ſhalt thou ſay unto the children of Iſrael, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob, hath ſent me unto you: This is my name for ever, and this is my memorial unto all generations.] Some perſons have been curious to know, why God calls himſelf ſo particularly, the God of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, ſince he was the God of all the Iſraelites, as well as of thoſe three patriarchs? And we readily acknowledge, that it could not be upon the account of their ſuperior ſanctity and virtues, ſince Abel, Enoch, and Noah, whoſe God he likewiſe was, were, at leaſt, as holy as they; nor was it to intimate to Moſes the myſterious doctrine of the trinity, as Perrerius imagines, from the triple repetition of the word God; ſince it is rather repeated four times, viz. the God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob. It is more probable, therefore, that they are particularly mention'd, becauſe it was to them, that the promiſe of a numerous poſterity, of their being ſtrangers in Egypt, and brought out of it, of their inheriting the land of Canaan, and eſpecially that of the Meſſiah, had been made.

And now we are upon this text, it will not be improper to enquire, why our bleſſed Saviour chuſes to allédge it againſt the Sadducees, rather than ſome others in the Old Teſtament; which more fully prove the reſurrection of the body? To which it may be anſwer'd, that the objection, being form'd out of the Pentateuch, was more naturally anſwered by another paſſage out of the ſame book; eſpecially to the Sadducees, who, as we are inform'd by St. Jerome (in Job xix. & alib.), admitted the authority of no other books of the Old Teſtament. The principal queſtion, therefore, will be, how theſe words, I am the God of Abraham, &c. which ſeem, at moſt, only to prove the immortality of the ſoul, can be urged as an evidence of the reſurrection of the body? To this ſome ancient fathers anſwer, that theſe names being given to thoſe patriarchs whilſt they conſiſted of ſoul and body, and the former of them being plainly affirmed by our Saviour to be living with God, it follows, that the latter cannot be irrecoverably dead, but rather conſign'd to ſleep for a certain period; at the cloſe of which, they will be reunited, and live together again, in order to enjoy the eternal reward of their paſt labours. Others maintain, that if the immortality of the ſoul be granted, the reſurrection of the body muſt be the conſequence of that poſition, by reaſon of the natural deſire which the former has to its union with the latter; eſpecially ſince this deſire cannot be ſuppoſed to have been infuſed into it, only to be defeated, and without the accompliſhment of which, it cannot be ſaid to be compleatly happy: That this conſideration induced Pythagoras, Plato, and other ancient philoſophers, who maintained the immortality of the ſoul, to provide her with a conſtant ſupply of bodies, either by remigration into its own, or tranſmigration into ſome other body. But the beſt ſolution ſeems to be that of St. Jerom, who obſerves, that as the Sadducees equally diſbelieved the immortality of the ſoul, and the reſurrection of the body, both which points were received and credited by the reſt of the Jews; the proof of either would be ſufficient to eſtabliſh the truth of the other, ſince the reſurrection of the body is obnoxious to as little difficulty, and is altogether as credible and rational a doctrine, as that of the ſoul's immortality.

Ver. 22. But every woman ſhall borrow of her neighbour, and of her that ſojourneth in her houſe, jewels of ſilver, and jewels of gold, and raiment; and ye ſhall put them upon your ſons, and upon your daughters; and ye ſhall ſpoil the Egyptians.] That ſome retaliation was due, in ſtrict juſtice, from the Egyptians to the Hebrews, for the great ſervices they had received from them; and that an ample compenſation ought to be granted to the latter, for the injurious ſeverities and oppreſſions they had ſuſtained, ſeems to be a reaſonable ſuppoſition; and we think it ſufficient to declare, that the Egyptians were ſpoiled with the ſame equity for their inhumanity, and tyrannical conduct to the Iſraelites, as the Canaanites, and other nations, were ordered to be deſtroyed for their aggravated iniquities. God alone had the prerogative to determine thoſe puniſhments, and employ what inſtruments he pleaſed in their infliction. And ſince Moſes was manifeſtly authorized by God, to cauſe the Egyptians to be treated in this manner, we cannot ſee either the injuſtice, or ill tendency of ſuch a precedent, ſince it is univerſally allowed, that it is never to be imitated in any conjunctures whatever, unleſs it be evidently commanded by the ſame divine and indiſputable authority.

CHAP.

CHAP. IV.

1 Moſes's rod is turned into a ſerpent. 6 His hand is leprous. 10 He is loth to be ſent: 14 Aaron is appointed to aſſiſt him. 18 Moſes departeth from Jethro. 21 Gods meſſage to Pharaoh. 24 Zipporah circumciſeth her ſon. 27 Aaron is ſent to meet Moſes. 31 The people believeth them.

AND Moſes anſwered, and ſaid, but behold, they will not believe me, nor hearken unto my voice: for they will ſay, The LORD hath not appeared unto thee.

2 And the LORD ſaid unto him, What is that in thine hand? And he ſaid, A rod.

3 And he ſaid, Caſt it on the ground; and he caſt it on the ground, and it became a ſerpent: and Moſes fled from before it.

4 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Put forth thine hand, and take it by the tail: and he put forth his hand and caught it, and it became a rod in his hand.

5 That they may believe that the LORD God of their fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Iſaac, and the God of Jacob, hath appeared unto thee.

6 ¶ And the LORD ſaid furthermore unto him, Put now thine hand into thy boſom; and he put his hand into his boſom: and when he took it out, behold, his hand was leprous as ſnow.

7 And he ſaid, Put thine hand into thy boſom again: and he put his hand into his boſom again, and plucked it out of his boſom, and behold, it was turned again as his other fleſh.

8 And it ſhall come to paſs, if they will not believe thee, neither hearken to the voice of the firſt ſign, that they will believe the voice of the latter ſign.

9 And it ſhall come to paſs, if they will not believe alſo theſe two ſigns, neither hearken unto thy voice, that thou ſhalt take of the water of the river, and pour it upon the dry land: and the water which thou takeſt out of the river, ſhall become blood upon the dry land.

10 ¶ And Moſes ſaid unto the LORD, O my Lord, I am not eloquent, neither heretofore, nor ſince thou haſt ſpoken unto thy ſervant: but I am ſlow of ſpeech, and of a ſlow tongue.

11 And the LORD ſaid unto him, Who hath made mans mouth? or who maketh the dumb or deaf, or the ſeeing, or the blind? have not I the LORD?

12 Now therefore go, and I will be with thy mouth, and teach thee what thou ſhalt ſay.

13 And he ſaid, O my Lord, ſend I pray thee by the hand of him whom thou wilt ſend.

14 And the anger of the LORD was kindled againſt Moſes, and he ſaid, Is not Aaron the Levite thy brother? I know that he can ſpeak well. And alſo behold, he cometh forth to meet thee: and when he ſeeth thee, he will be glad in his heart.

15 And thou ſhalt ſpeak unto him, and put words in his mouth: and I will be with thy mouth, and with his mouth, and will teach you what ye ſhall do.

16 And he ſhall be thy ſpokeſman unto the people: and he ſhall be, even he ſhall be to thee inſtead of a mouth, and thou ſhalt be to him inſtead of God.

17 And thou ſhalt take this rod in thine hand, wherewith thou ſhalt do ſigns.

18 ¶ And Moſes went and returned to Jethro his father-in-law, and ſaid unto him, Let me go, I pray thee, and return unto my brethren, which are in Egypt, and ſee whether they be yet alive. And Jethro ſaid to Moſes, Go in peace.

19 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes in Midian, Go, return into Egypt: for all the men are dead which ſought thy life.

20 And Moſes took his wife, and his ſons, and ſet them upon an aſs, and he returned to the land of Egypt. And Moſes took the rod of God in his hand.

21 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, when thou goeſt to return into Egypt, ſee that thou do all thoſe wonders before Pharaoh, which I have put in thine hand: but I will harden his heart that he ſhall not let the people go.

22 And thou ſhalt ſay unto Pharaoh, Thus ſaith the LORD, Iſrael is my ſon, even my firſt-born.

23 And I ſay unto thee, Let my ſon go, that he may ſerve me: and if thou refuſe to let him go, behold, I will ſlay thy ſon, even thy firſt-born.

24 ¶ And it came to paſs by the way in the inn, that the LORD met him, and ſought to kill him.

25 Then Zipporah took a ſharp ſtone, and cut off the fore-skin of her ſon, and caſt it at his feet, and ſaid, Surely a bloody husband art thou to me.

26 So he let him go: then ſhe ſaid, A bloody husband thou art, becauſe of the circumciſion.

27 ¶ And

27 ¶ And the LORD ſaid to Aaron, Go into the wilderneſs to meet Moſes. And he went and met him in the mount of God, and kiſſed him.

28 And Moſes told Aaron all the words of the LORD, who had ſent him, and all the ſigns which he had commanded him.

29 ¶ And Moſes and Aaron went, and gathered together all the elders of the children of Iſrael.

30 And Aaron ſpake all the words which the LORD had ſpoken unto Moſes, and did the ſigns in the ſight of the people.

31 And the people believed: and when they heard that the LORD had viſited the children of Iſrael, and that he had looked upon their affliction, then they bowed their heads and worſhipped.

Ver. 1. And Moſes anſwered and ſaid, But behold they will not believe me, nor hearken unto my voice; for they will ſay, The Lord hath not appeared unto thee.] Moſes ſtill perſiſted in his repugnance to execute the commiſſion with which he was charged; and his anſwer in this verſe ſeems, at firſt view, to be a direct contradiction to what God had declared to him in the 18th verſe of the preceding chapter: They ſhall hearken to thy voice. Maimonides endeavours to reconcile this, by obſerving, that Moſes was ſatisfied they would credit his account of the name of God, who had ſpoken to him; but that they would not believe, without farther proof, that he was ſent by God to undertake their deliverance. But the moſt natural anſwer is, that God did not mean, that they would hearken to Moſes immediately, but that he would ſo convince their incredulity, by unexceptionable ſigns and wonders, that they ſhould entirely credit him, when he declared that he came from God to them. Such ſigns he now asks, and they are accordingly granted, that the Iſraelites might believe the Lord had appeared to Moſes, and enjoined him to deliver them from the Egyptian ſervitude.

Ver. 2. And the Lord ſaid unto him, What is that in thine hand? And he ſaid, a rod.] This rod, in all probability, was his ſhepherd's ſtaff, for he was feeding the flock of his father-in-law, when God appeared unto him.

The Jewiſh doctors have many extravagant inventions with reference to this rod. They tell us, that it originally grew in paradiſe; was brought away by Adam, who tranſmitted it to Noah; from whom it paſſed through a ſucceſſion of patriarchs, till it came to be tranſplanted into Jethro's garden, where it again took root. That it was called Zaphir (whence Zipporah his daughter had her name) and the ſacred tetrogrammaton was inſcribed upon it. That, when Zipporah became enamour'd of Moſes, her father declared, that he would conſent to their eſpouſals, provided Moſes could draw the rod out of the earth, and at the ſame time, the prieſt publiſhed a proclamation, that whoever did it firſt, ſhould marry his daughter. That, hereupon, ſeveral robuſt young men came, and tried their ſtrength, in vain; but that Moſes, by being acquainted with the true pronunciation of the name of God, in vertue thereof, did it with eaſe, and ſo not only obtained the daughter, but, likewiſe, the rod, with which he afterwards wrought all his wonders in Egypt. But how fictitious ſoever all theſe circumſtances may be, this ſtaff is called the rod of God, in the twentieth verſe of this chapter; partly becauſe it was appropriated to God's ſervice, as the inſtrument of all his glorious works; and partly to evince, that whatever was accompliſhed by the miniſtration of that rod, was not done by any natural vertue inherent in it, or in conſequence of its being graſped by the hand of Moſes, but meerly by the power of God, who was pleaſed, for the greater confuſion of his enemies, to diſplay his omnipotence by ſo inconſiderable an inſtrument. Nor is it an improbable conjecture, that the wands, which great miniſters afterwards bore in their hands, as an intimation of their power and office, were originally derived from this of Moſes.

Ver. 3. And he ſaid, Caſt it on the ground, and he caſt it on the ground, and it became a ſerpent: And Moſes fled from before it,] Philo ſays, Αυτικα ψυχωθεῖσα ἅρπε, it was immediately enlivened, and crept about. The Hebrew word nachaſh comprehends all ſpecies of ſerpents; and R. Eliezer thinks it was one of the flying kind. But our great Doctor Lightfoot believes it was a crocodile; and, indeed, there is ſome reaſon for entertaining that opinion: For that which is here called nachaſh, (and which is ſuppoſed by moſt to ſignify a common ſnake, or ſerpent) is called tannin, when Moſes threw down his ſtaff in the preſence of Pharaoh, chap. vii. ver. 10. Tannin ſignifies a ſerpent of the largeſt dimenſions (ὑπερμεγέθης δράκων, as it is ſtiled by Philo). Job Ludolphus has demonſtrated, that nothing but the crocodile can be meant by this word, in Ezek. xxix. 3. and xxxii. 2. and ſome other places. [Vide l. i. Comment. in Hiſtor. Æthiop. c. xi. n. 88.] The tranſformation of the rod of Moſes into this fierce creature, ſeems to have been very proper, at leaſt in the preſence of Pharaoh, who had expoſed the Hebrew infants to its rapacious jaws, when he commanded them to be caſt into the Nile, which abounded with crocodiles.

Moſes might naturally fly from ſo formidable an animal, ſince God himſelf deſcribes the crocodile as a dreadful creature, Job xii. 14, 15. His teeth are terrible round about. When he raiſes up himſelf, the mighty are afraid.

Ver. 6. And the Lord ſaid furthermore unto him, Put now thine hand into thy boſom: and he put his hand into his boſom: and when he took it out, behold his hand was leprous as ſnow.] It is no improbable conjecture, that, as God commanded Moſes to work all his wonders before Pharaoh, this miracle of the leproſy gave occaſion to the fabulous ſtory, invented in after-ages, viz. that Moſes was a leper, and the Iſraelites a race polluted with that diſtemper, for which reaſon the Egyptians were obliged to drive them out of their country, leſt they ſhould communicate the infection to the other inhabitants. We meet with this defamation firſt in the Egyptian hiſtory of Manetho; from Manetho it deſcended to Appion, the Greek hiſtorian: and from him Juſtin and Tacitus, two celebrated Roman writers, undoubtedly derived it. But as this falſhood might not be any malicious invention, originally introduced by Manetho; ſo thoſe writers, from whom he compiled his hiſtory, might deduce it from the appearance of Moſes, with a leprous hand, before Pharaoh, which was preſently rumoured about the country, without the other circumſtance of its being immediately reſtored to its former ſanity. There needs no other proof that Moſes was not a leper, than what ariſes from his own inſtitution, namely, that no lepers ſhould be admitted into any towns, or villages, but live apart, in a diſtinct habit: That whoever touched a leper, or lodged under the roof with ſuch a perſon, ſhould be reputed unclean; and that whoever ſhould come, in order to be cured of that diſeaſe, ſhould paſs through certain purifications, waſh himſelf with ſpring water, ſhave off all his hair, and offer particular ſacrifices, before his admiſſion into the holy city. If Moſes had been infected with this diſtemper himſelf, it is incongruous to think, he would ever have been ſo extremely ſevere upon others who laboured under that misfortune. The leproſy, indeed, was a diſtemper, in a manner peculiar to the Egyptians.

LUCRET. lib. vi.

And if it was ſo in the time of Moſes, he may be preſumed to have made the ſtricter laws againſt it, with an intention to excite the precautions of the Iſraelites, to avoid a diſtemper, of whoſe loathſome effects they had ſo long been ſpectators, but had now happily eſcaped them, as well as the other calamities of their long bondage. For that they were then in a good ſtate of health, is evident, from the great journey they undertook, and accompliſhed. And that they were not expelled by the Egyptians, but departed much againſt their inclinations, their purſuit of them to the Red-ſea, and loſing all their lives with a purpoſe of re-taking them (which are facts that are atteſted by ſeveral Heathen authors), are an abundant demonſtration.

Ver. 9. And it ſhall come to paſs, if they will not alſo believe theſe two ſigns, neither hearken unto thy voice, that thou ſhalt take of the water of the river, and pour it upon the dry land: and the water which thou takeſt out of the river ſhall become blood upon the dry land.] This was a very proper ſign to be wrought before the Egyptians, if they perſiſted in their incredulity; ſince it was a plain indication, that the cry of the innocent blood of thoſe infants who had been drowned in that river, had aſcended up to The Moſt High, who now prepared to avenge it, by deſtroying the ſalutary temperament of that river which had been the ſcene of ſo much barbarity, and from whoſe inundations the land of Egypt derived its fertility.

Ver. 10. And Moſes ſaid unto the Lord, O my Lord, I am not eloquent, neither heretofore, nor ſince thou haſt ſpoken unto thy ſervant: but I am ſlow of ſpeech, and of a ſlow tongue.] The Rabbins, in their account of the life of Moſes, relate, that Pharaoh's daughter, whom they call Bathia, having brought Moſes to Pharaoh, at the age of three years, the infant took the regal diadem, and placed it on his own head; whereupon, Balaam, the famous diviner, mentioned in Scripture, being then at Pharaoh's court, adviſed him to put the child to death. But the magicians of that monarch, deſiring to try if Moſes had done this with any premeditated deſign, or by meer accident, placed diamonds, and coals of fire, before him. Moſes was ſtretching his hand out to the diamonds, but the angel Gabriel drew it back, and laid it on the burning coals, one of which the infant ſnatched up, and applied it to his tongue, by which means, he acquired the heſitation of ſpeech he complains of in this verſe. The Septuagint underſtand theſe words, ſlow of ſpeech, as if he had but a weak or ſlender voice, which made him think himſelf unqualified for diſcharging ſuch an embaſſy; and this interpretation is not repugnant with what St. Stephen declares, that he was mighty in words, as well as in deeds, Acts vii. 22. For the ſenſe of what he uttered was great and weighty, tho' his pronunciation might not correſpond with his ſubject. One would, however, be apt to conclude, that he at laſt conquered this impediment, by a habitude of ſpeaking, ſince he made ſeveral long orations to the people, and delivered a moſt incomparable diſcourſe to them a little before his death.

Clemens, in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, repreſents this excuſe of Moſes, as an inſtance of his great humility; but we think, whatever mean opinion this great man might entertain of his incompetency for that important miſſion, the condeſcenſion of God in indulging him ſo long in his reluctance, is very amiable and ſurprizing; and the goodneſs, likewiſe, of the Deity, in promiſing to relieve him from the impediment of which he complain'd, is equally engaging.

Ver. 13. And he ſaid, O my Lord, ſend, I pray thee, by the hand of him whom thou wilt ſend.] The Vulgate having tranſlated the word ſchilo, Gen. xlix. 10. qui mittendus eſt, him who is to be ſent; ſeveral great men have been induced to think, that Moſes here intreats God to ſend the Meſſiah: But there are other perſons, as conſiderable as thoſe, who think Moſes means no more than this; Send a more proper perſon, one fitter for this employment than my ſelf. And, indeed, ſuch ſpeeches as this, in Scripture, do not denote any certain perſon or thing, but have a general and indefinite ſignification. Moſes, therefore, determines his deſire to no particular perſon, but only wiſhes God would ſend any one, rather than himſelf.

Had Moſes been leſs ſincere, he would hardly have recorded this inſtance of extreme weakneſs, which tends ſo little to his reputation, and which nothing could well extenuate, but this free and generous acknowledgment of it. This impartiality to himſelf cannot but ſtrengthen the belief, and increaſe the eſteem and veneration, we ought to entertain for his hiſtory. It is natural for men to be extremely careful to conceal their own infirmities and imperfections: Moſes, on the contrary, ſeems peculiarly ſollicitous to record all thoſe circumſtances that could blemiſh the memory of his anceſtors, and derogate from his own reputation. Thus he caſts an eternal blot and reproach on the memory of Levi, the head of his own family, when he records his barbarity to the Shechemites, and the diſperſion of his poſterity, on that account, among the other tribes of Iſrael. Nay, more; he even villifies his own birth, by forbidding any marriage between an aunt, and her nephew. He afterwards deſcribes his own incredulity with all the openneſs imaginable, and when he repreſents the miracles which God wrought by him, he ſeems to ſpeak of himſelf, only to diſcloſe his own failings and ſins. Such an uncommon ſincerity greatly confirms and increaſes the authority of any author.

Ver. 14. And the anger of the Lord was kindled againſt Moſes, &c.] If we adhere to the ſentiments of St. Jerome and St. Baſil, who declare, that the reluctance of Moſes to undertake this miſſion, was owing to his humility, and a modeſt ſenſe of his own infirmities, of which the wiſeſt and beſt of men are much more ſenſible than other perſons; the anger of God will amount to no more than the diſpleaſure a father entertains againſt his child, when he is too diffident, in exerting himſelf, notwithſtanding all that has been ſaid and done by the parent to inſpire him with a proper confidence. This, however, may be ſaid in excuſe of Moſes, that the moſt excellent perſons are the leaſt forward to embrace the offers of great advancement.

Ver. 21. And God ſaid unto Moſes, When thou goeſt to return into Egypt, ſee that thou do all thoſe wonders before Pharaoh which I have put in thine hand: but I will harden his heart, that he ſhall not let the people go.] We ſhall here venture to depart from our own, and the generality of all other verſions, which repreſent God as the chief hardener of Pharaoh's heart, that he might inflict the greater puniſhments upon him. An opinion, which, however embraced by the Predeſtinarians, ſeems ſo extremely ſhocking to all right reaſon, and ſo utterly inconſiſtent with the gracious diſpoſition of the merciful creator of mankind, that we reject it with horror, as a bold imputation on the divine attributes. The Jews broached this monſtrous doctrine, and, by their verſions and paraphraſes, led the way to others to render this and many other texts of the Old Teſtament, in a ſenſe which neither the original, nor the whole tenour of Scripture, can poſſibly authorize. We think ourſelves, therefore, obliged to do juſtice to thoſe learned and candid criticks, who have been ſedulous to clear the ſacred Scriptures from charging the great judge of heaven and earth with unrelenting injuſtice. Theſe great men have demonſtrated, that the verbs here uſed, are in the conjugations piel, and hiphil, as they are called by the grammarians, and frequently ſignify no more than a bare permiſſion, of which they have given us many unqueſtionable inſtances, which the reader may conſult in Arr. Montan. de Idiom. Hæbr. n. 42. Gerhard. de provid. Calov. & Rung. in Exod. Hunnin, qu. de provid. 57, 91. Meſner Anthropol. dec. 1. Pelling and Whitby againſt predeſtination. Le Clerc in loc. Grotius; Le Scene's Eſſays. From all theſe, and many more authorities, it is evident, that the words ought to have been tranſlated, I will permit his (Pharaoh's) heart to be hardened, as all thoſe who are but moderately verſed in the Hebrew will allow. In ſhort, it is as if God had ſaid, I know that Pharaoh will not ſuffer my people to depart, till he is compelled to diſmiſs them; and as he will refuſe to acknowledge me, and will likewiſe harden his heart againſt my commands, it is but juſt that I ſhould ſo far forſake him, that tho' my wonders will be multiplied before him, in ſuch a manner as ſhall aſtoniſh the whole land, he alone ſhall be ſuffered to continue obſtinate, and inſenſible of them.

Verſes 24, 25. And it came to paſs in the way in the inn, that the Lord met him, and ſought to kill him. Then Zipporah took a ſharp ſtone, and cut off the fore-skin of her ſon, and caſt it at his feet, and ſaid, Surely a bloody husband art thou to me.] It has been generally ſuppoſed, that Zipporah, the wife of Moſes, was very impetuous in her diſpoſition, on this occaſion, and that Moſes had been compelled, for the ſake of peace, to neglect the circumciſion of his youngeſt ſon, till the danger ſhe ſaw her husband, or the child in (for the text is not plain which of the two it was), oblig'd her, not without great reluctancy, and indecent language, to perform the operation her ſelf. We ſhall, therefore, endeavour to ſet this paſſage in a clearer light, and hope to make it evident, that the ſenſe of the original has been greatly miſrepreſented, and that the ceremony was perform'd with all the decency and decorum that the ſolemnity of it, and their imminent danger, could poſſibly require.

Firſt then, as to the words, the Lord met him at the Inn and ſought to ſlay him, which the Septuagint, Vulgate and ſome other verſions render the Angel of the Lord,

Lord, &c. it is plain they relate to Moſes, and not to the child, as Tertullian thinks, becauſe if it had been the latter, Moſes, rather than his wife, would have performed the operation of his circumciſion. This ſhews likewiſe that the words import no more than that God ſmote him with ſome ſudden diſtemper, which ſo diſabled him from circumciſing his ſon, that Zipporah was obliged to perform that office herſelf.

Secondly, as to the cauſe of God's anger againſt Moſes, St. Auſtin and ſome others ſuppoſed it to have been becauſe he had taken his wife and children with him, the encumberment of whom did not ſuit with the buſineſs he was ſent about; for which reaſon, ſay they, he diſmiſs'd her as ſoon as he was delivered from his danger. But unleſs there had been ſome indication of God's forbidding it, it is plain it was his duty to take her and them with him, ſince man is to forſake all other relations to cleave to his wife. The true reaſon therefore of the divine diſpleaſure ſeems to be the neglect to circumciſe the child, ſince Moſes was delivered from the danger as ſoon as Zipporah had compleated that operation.

Thirdly, it is not eaſy to gueſs how long, or why Moſes deferred the circumciſion of his child. Thoſe who follow the Jeruſalem Targum, which ſays that Jethro and Zipporah took offence at it, ſeem to forget that Jethro was a Midianite, deſcended from Abraham by Kethurah, and conſequently that circumciſion was more probably adopted by them, as it was by the Iſhmaelites and all other deſcendants from that patriarch. Some think, that Moſes did not ſuppoſe circumciſion ſo neceſſary in a ſtrange land, eſpecially as his children were Iſraelites only by the fathers ſide. But the moſt probable opinion is, that Moſes having been ſo lately commanded by God to depart for Egypt, might be prevailed upon by his wife to defer the circumciſion of his ſon till his ſettlement among the Iſraelites. But ſuch a man as Moſes ſhould have truſted God to take care of his child, and not have been afraid of the conſequence, if he had performed his duty. And becauſe he rather complied with the tender inclination of Zipporah, than with an expreſs precept, Gen. xvii. 12, 13, &c. he became obnoxious to this great Danger.

Fourthly, the behaviour and language of Zipporah after ſhe had perform'd the ceremony of circumciſion have extremely perplexed the generality of expoſitors, who imagine that ſhe threw the foreskin of the Infant at her huſbands feet in great anger, but the original expreſſion is ſo far from ſignifying an action of this Nature, that it imports her laying it down in a decent or humble manner: for the litteral ſenſe is, ſhe made it touch his feet. This has induced Lud. Brugen and ſome others to think that ſhe humbly placed it at the feet of the angel, who is ſuppoſed by ſome commentators to have threatened the life of Moſes, and that ſhe implored him to ſpare her husband, for the ſake of the circumciſion blood ſhe had juſt drawn, and that her prayer having been heard, and ſhe ſeeing Moſes free from the danger, congratulates him and herſelf with the words in the text, which he renders thus, thou art now become, as it were, a new Husband or a bridegroom to me by this childs blood. But this opinion is without any foundation as will preſently appear Fifthly, as to the words, a bloody husband art thou to me, &c. the very learned Mr. Mede has proved them not to have been ſpoken to Moſes but to the child. That great divine very judiciouſly obſerves, firſt, that the word Chatan which is tranſlated husband, ſignifies only a bridegroom, and it is not likely that Zipporah ſhould call Moſes by that Name, after ſhe had been married to him ſo long; that appellation ceaſing immediately after the eight days of the nuptial ſolemnity were over. He likewiſe remarks, that this word Chatan properly ſignifies a ſon-in-law, and conſequently expreſſes not the relation a man has to his wife, but to her parents; for which reaſon it never has an affix'd pronoun, unleſs it be with relation to the latter. The ſame may be likewiſe ſaid of the word Calah, bride, or rather daughter-in-law; it being us'd only with relation to the husband's parents, who alone can properly call the married woman Calathi, my daughter-in-law, but the bridegroom never calls her by that name to ſignify his bride; it being certain, that the Hebrew language has no word to expreſs a bridegroom or bride, with reſpect to the relation they bear to one another. It would therefore have been abſurd in Zipporah to have called him by the name of Chatan. The queſtion then will be, how it could be applied to the child? and herein the Hebrew doctors are beſt able to aſſiſt us, and they accordingly declare, that it was the cuſtom of the women to call the circumciſed child Chatan. Kimchi ſays, that it ſignifies originally one who gives Joy, and is therefore us'd to expreſs the ſatisfactions that attend the nuptial ceremonials, or the circumciſion of a child. Accordingly we find, that the Arabians called the circumcis'd Machtun, or one that is made a Chatan, in the ſame manner as we ſay a baptized child is chriſtened. The words then us'd by Zipporah, ought to have been tranſlated, thou art (now) to me a joyfull circumciſed ſon. To which if we add the laſt obſervation of the ſame learned author; that the word Li, which we tranſlate to me, doth more properly ſignify, here, by me, as it doth in a great many other places of ſcripture, the ſenſe will ſtill be more plainly this; Thou art now by me made a circumciſed child, which was the form of words us'd in the circumciſion, and might be more properly render'd, I do pronounce thee circumciſed. Neither is it at all improbable, that this word was originally us'd in this form, not only to expreſs the uſual joy at a child's circumciſion, but likewiſe his admiſſion into the alliance made by God with Abraham and his poſterity, or his ſpouſal with the church of God; in both which ſenſes that word is very fitly applied. From hence then it is moſt probable, that ſhe laid the fore-skin at the child's feet, when ſhe uttered the words abovementioned; this is ſo far from being a new or peculiar notion of Mr. Mede, that we find ſeveral ancient verſions expounding it after the very ſame manner; from all which it plainly appears, that there neither was any diſagreement between Moſes and his wife, nor any indecent or ill-language us'd by her.

Ver. 27. And the Lord ſaid to Aaron, go into the wilderneſs to meet Moſes: and he went and met him in the mount of God and kiſſed him.

During the retreat of Moſes in Midian, Aaron his brother had married Elizabeth, the ſiſter of Naaſſon, both deſcended from Judah, by their father Aminadab, the ſon of Ezron. He had already had four ſons by her, viz. Nadab, Abihu, Eliazar, and Ithamar, the firſt of whom had likewiſe a ſon named Phineas, by a daughter of Phutiel. This was the ſtate of Aarons family, when God commanded him to ſet out in order to meet his brother.

CHAP. V.

1 Pharaoh chideth Moſes and Aaron for their meſſage. 5 He increaſeth the Iſraelites task. 15 He checketh their complaints. 20 They cry out upon Moſes and Aaron. 22 Moſes complaineth to God.

AND afterward Moſes and Aaron went in, and told Pharaoh, Thus ſaith the LORD God of Iſrael, Let my people go, that they may hold a feaſt unto me in the wilderneſs.

2 And Pharaoh ſaid, Who is the LORD, that I ſhould obey his voice to let Iſrael go? I know not the LORD, neither will I let Iſrael go.

3 And they ſaid, The God of the Hebrews hath met with us: let us go, we pray thee, three days journey into the deſert, and ſacrifice unto the LORD our God; leſt he fall upon us with peſtilence, or with the ſword.

4 And the king of Egypt ſaid unto them, wherefore do ye, Moſes and Aaron, let the people from their works? get you unto your burdens.

5 And Pharaoh ſaid, Behold, the people of of the land now are many, and you make them reſt from their burdens.

6 And Pharaoh commanded the ſame day the task-maſters of the people, and their officers, ſaying,

7 Ye ſhall no more give the people ſtraw to make brick, as heretofore: let them go and gather ſtraw for themſelves.

8 And the tale of the bricks which they did make heretofore, you ſhall lay upon them; you ſhall not diminiſh ought thereof: for they be idle; therefore they cry, ſaying, Let us go and ſacrifice to our God.

9 Let there more work be laid upon the men, that they may labour therein: and let them not regard vain words.

10 ¶ And the task-maſters of the people, went out, and their officers, and they ſpake to the people, ſaying, Thus ſaith Pharaoh, I will not give you ſtraw.

11 Go ye, get you ſtraw where you can find it: yet not ought of your work ſhall be diminiſhed.

12 So the people were ſcattered abroad throughout all the land of Egypt, to gather ſtubble inſtead of ſtraw.

13 And the task-maſters haſted them, ſaying, Fulfil your works, your daily tasks, as when there was ſtraw.

14 And the officers of the children of Iſrael, which Pharaohs task-maſters had ſet over them, were beaten, and demanded, Wherefore have ye not fulfilled your task in making brick, both yeſterday and to day, as heretofore?

15 ¶ Then the officers of the children of Iſrael came and cried unto Pharaoh, ſaying, wherefore dealeſt thou thus with thy ſervants?

16 There is no ſtraw given unto thy ſervants, and they ſay to us, Make brick: and behold, thy ſervants are beaten; but the fault is in thine own people.

17 But he ſaid, Ye are idle, ye are idle: therefore ye ſay, Let us go, and do ſacrifice to the LORD.

18 Go therefore now and work: for there ſhall no ſtraw be given you, yet ſhall ye deliver the tale of bricks.

19 And the officers of the children of Iſrael did ſee that they were in evil caſe, after it was ſaid, Ye ſhall not miniſh ought from your bricks of your daily task.

20 ¶ And they met Moſes and Aaron, who ſtood in the way, as they came forth from Pharaoh.

21 And they ſaid unto them, The LORD look upon you, and judge; becauſe you have made our ſavour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his ſervants, to put a ſword in their hand to ſlay us.

22 And Moſes returned unto the LORD, and ſaid, Lord, wherefore haſt thou ſo evil intreated this people? Why is it that thou haſt ſent me?

23 For ſince I came to Pharaoh to ſpeak in thy name, he hath done evil to this people; neither haſt thou delivered thy people at all.

Ver. 1. And afterwards Moſes and Aaron went in and told Pharaoh, Thus ſaith the Lord God of Iſrael, Let my people go, that they may hold a feaſt unto me in the wilderneſs.] Moſes now began to exerciſe the commiſſion with which he was entruſted by God. But the innumerable difficulties he encountered therein, might naturally make him regret the calm ſolitude of the deſart, and the innocent ſweets of the paſtoral life he had ſo long led. Pharaoh's unfriendly court, and, what was yet harder, the murmurings of that very people, to whoſe deliverance he ſacrificed his own eaſe and tranquility, all concurred to diſcourage him. He entered Egypt, without apprehending any trouble for the murder which had formerly cauſed him to quit that country; for God himſelf had condeſcended to encourage him, by a revelation that thoſe who had ſought his life, were dead, chap. iv. ver. 19. But his mind was perplexed with other thoughts; he knew his demand would be rejected by Pharaoh, ſince the Deity had already declared, that he would permit his heart to be hardened, amidſt all the wonders that ſhould be wrought by the hand of Moſes. How hard a task was it for a man, ſo low and inconſiderable in appearance, to contend with ſo great a potentate as the king of Egypt; but Moſes, inſpired by the majeſty of that Jehovah who ſent him, and with the aid of that rod, till then a ſimple crook, but which was now to be inſtrumental in working the greateſt wonders, at laſt entered upon the duties of his important miſſion, and addreſſed the tyrant with the ſolemn charge in the verſe before us. The fragments of Artapanes declare, that Moſes ſignalized his arrival in Egypt, by four miracles. Firſt, He made fire ſpring from the earth, to induce the children of Iſrael to credit his promiſe of delivering them from ſlavery, and conducting them into the land of their anceſtors. 2. Having been ſhut up in priſon by Pharaoh, he broke the bars, burſt open the doors, ſtruck the guards dead, and releaſed himſelf [Euſeb. præp. Evang. lib. 9. c. 27. p. 434.] 3. He pronounced in the ears of Pharaoh, the name Jehovah, at the ſound of which that prince became deaf, and could not recover his hearing, but by the favour of him who had taken it away. The Rabbins relate, That Moſes, upon his entring the tyrant's palace, received of God a dreadful ſhape, and the countenance of an angel. The ſacred hiſtory, however, mentions no ſuch particulars, and only acquaints us with Pharaoh's anſwer, which was ſuch, as might have been expected from a man given up to the corruption of a hardened heart. Who is the Lord, that I ſhould obey his voice to let Iſrael go? I know not the Lord, neither will I let Iſrael go, ver. 2. We muſt not ſuppoſe, however, that Pharaoh was an Atheiſt, for that was not the ſyſtem of Egypt: But the God of the Hebrews was not known in his dominions till then, and the abject ſtate of thoſe who adored him, was not very proper to produce any high conceptions of the power of their God.

Moſes and Aaron had recourſe to all the meaſures that prudence could ſuggeſt, to mollify this unrelenting prince. They only asked leave for the Iſraelites to go three days journey into the wilderneſs, that they might there offer ſacrifices, which would have been an abomination to the Egyptians, if they had been performed in the heart of their country.

Ver. 4. And the king of Egypt ſaid unto them, Wherefore do ye, Moſes and Aaron, let the people from their works? go get you unto your burdens.] Pharaoh was deaf to the ſollicitations ſollicitations of Moſes and Aaron, and inſtead of being compaſſionate to a people, already ſo unhappy, he order'd that the yoke, under which they were then ready to ſink, ſhould be render'd yet heavier. He told them, that it was the idleneſs of the people which made them think of celebrating feſtival ſolemnities, and that, in order to cure them of thoſe inclinations, their tasks ſhould be redoubled. He ordered the officers, who were ſet over them, not to furniſh them with any more ſtraw, which they wanted perhaps to mix with the clay of which they made bricks, to render them more conſiſtent and firm, or poſſibly to cover them from the heat of the ſun, which would be apt to make them too brittle. In vain did theſe unhappy people repreſent their inability to accompliſh their labours, after ſo ſevere a command. The tears which their afflictions drew from their eyes, only contributed to increaſe their ſlavery, and their very ſighs were criminal. Their bodies, which were worn away and emaciated in the ſervice of this barbarous king, were bruiſed with a thouſand ſtripes, inſomuch that they were forced to ſink, either under the weight of their taks, or under the blows they ſuſtained for their incapacity to compleat the ſame.

Ver. 20, 21. And they met Moſes and Aaron, who ſtood in the way, as they came forth from Pharaoh. And they ſaid unto them, The Lord look upon you, and judge; becauſe you have made our ſavour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his ſervants, to put a ſword into their hands to ſlay us.] The deſpairing Iſraelites, inſtead of imploring that help from a merciful God, which they could not obtain from the obduracy of a tyrant, rebelled againſt him, by inſulting his miniſters. The worſt remedy that can be applied to our evils, is to murmur againſt the ſupreme diſpoſer of thoſe events, by whoſe will and pleaſure they are diſtributed in the world: They miſrepreſented the good intentions of Aaron and Moſes, by aſcribing that to hard-heartedneſs, which proceeded from the moſt tender and leaſt to be ſuſpected charity.

Moſes, who could ſtand againſt the inflexibility of Pharaoh, could not ſupport the unjuſt conſtructions of the Iſraelites; and as if their murmurings had been contagious, and had even infected him with the ſame ſpirit, he himſelf preſented this very unreaſonable complaint to the Deity, at the cloſe of the chapter: Wherefore haſt thou ſo evil intreated this people? why is it that thou haſt ſent me, &c. Thus had God a double object of his forbearance, and a double occaſion to exerciſe his pity; the murmurs of his people, and the murmurs of his miniſters!

CHAP. VI.

1 God reneweth his promiſe by his name JEHOVAH. 14 The genealogy of Reuben, 15 of Simeon, 16 of Levi, of whom came Moſes and Aaron.

THEN the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Now ſhalt thou ſee what I will do to Pharaoh: for with a ſtrong hand ſhall he let them go, and with a ſtrong hand ſhall he drive them out of his land.

2 And God ſpake unto Moſes, and ſaid unto him, I am the LORD.

3 And I appeared unto Abraham, unto Iſaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, but by my name JEHOVAH was I not known to them.

4 And I have alſo eſtabliſhed my covenant with them, to give them the land of Canaan, the land of their pilgrimage, wherein they were ſtrangers.

5 And I have alſo heard the groaning of the children of Iſrael, whom the Egyptians keep in bondage: and I have remembred my covenant.

6 Wherefore ſay unto the children of Iſrael, I am the LORD, and I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage: and I will redeem you with a ſtretched-out arm, and with great judgments.

7 And I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God: and ye ſhall know that I am the LORD your God, which bringeth you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians.

8 And I will bring you in unto the land concerning the which I did ſwear to give it, to Abraham, to Iſaac, and to Jacob; and I will give it you for an heritage: I am the LORD.

9 ¶ And Moſes ſpake ſo unto the children of Iſrael: but they hearkned not unto Moſes, for anguiſh of ſpirit, and for cruel bondage.

10 And the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying,

11 Go in, ſpeak unto Pharaoh king of Egypt, that he let the children of Iſrael go out of his land.

12 And Moſes ſpake before the LORD, ſaying, Behold the children of Iſrael have not hearkned unto me; how then ſhall Pharaoh hear me, who am of uncircumciſed lips?

13 And the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, and unto Aaron, and gave them a charge unto the children of Iſrael, and unto Pharaoh king of Egypt; to bring the children of Iſrael out of the land of Egypt.

14 ¶ Theſe be the heads of their fathers houſes: the ſons of Reuben the firſt-born of Iſrael; Hanoch, and Pallu, Hezron, and Carmi: theſe be the families of Reuben.

15 And the ſons of Simeon; Jemuel, and Jamin, and Ohad, and Jachin, and Zohar, and Shaul the ſon of a Canaaniteſh woman: theſe are the families of Simeon.

16 ¶ And theſe are the names of the ſons of Levi, according to their generations; Gerſhon, and Kohath, and Merari: and the years of the life of Levi were an hundred thirty and ſeven years.

17 The ſons of Gerſhon; Libni, and Shimi, according to their families.

18 And the ſons of Kohath; Amram, and Izhar, and Hebron, and Uzziel; and the years of the life of Kohath were an hundren thirty and three years.

19 And the ſons of Merari; Mahali and Muſhi: theſe are the families of Levi, according to their generations.

20 And Amram took him Jochebed his fathers ſiſter to wife; and ſhe bare him Aaron and Moſes: and the years of the life of Amram were an hundred and thirty and ſeven years.

21 ¶ And the ſons of Izhar; Korah, and Nepheg, and Zichri.

22 And the ſons of Uzziel; Miſhael, and Elzaphan, and Zithri.

23 And Aaron took him Eliſheba daughter of Amminadab, ſiſter of Naaſhon, to wife; and ſhe bare him Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar.

24 And the ſons of Korah; Aſſir, and Elkanah, and Abiaſaph: theſe are the families of the Korhites.

25 And Eleazar Aarons ſon took him one of the daughters of Putiel to wife; and ſhe bare him Phinehas: theſe are the heads of the fathers of the Levites, according to their families.

26 Theſe are that Aaron and Moſes, to whom the LORD ſaid, Bring out the children of Iſrael from the land of Egypt, according to their armies.

27 Theſe are they which ſpake to Pharaoh king of Egypt, to bring out the children of Iſrael from Egypt: theſe are that Moſes, and Aaron.

28 ¶ And it came to paſs on the day when the LORD ſpake unto Moſes in the land of Egypt.

29 That the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying, I am the LORD: ſpeak thou unto Pharaoh king of Egypt all that I ſay unto thee.

30 And Moſes ſaid before the LORD, Behold, I am of uncircumciſed lips, and how ſhall Pharaoh hearken unto me?

Ver. 1. Then the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, Now thou ſhalt ſee what I will do to Pharaoh: for with a ſtrong hand ſhall he let them go, and with a ſtrong hand ſhall he drive them out of his land.] Moſes had no ſooner finiſhed his complaint, than God gave him freſh aſſurances of his love and compaſſion for his ſuffering people. Be patient a while, and thou ſhalt ſee this haughty tyrant compelled to diſmiſs my people from their injurious ſervitude; for I will chaſtiſe his impious inflexibility in ſo terrible a manner, that he ſhall not only conſent to their departure, but ſhall even thruſt them out of Egypt, and ſhall be glad to be rid of a nation, who have ſuch a God for the avenger of their wrongs.

Ver. 3. And I appeared unto Abraham, unto Iſaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, but by my name JEHOVAH was I not known to them.] Thoſe who conclude, from this paſſage, that either the name Jehovah, or the genuine meaning, or true pronunciation of it, had been unknown to the patriarchs Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, and that Moſes uſed it, in the hiſtory of their lives, by way of anticipation, and expreſſed himſelf agreeably to the time in which he wrote, when God had fully diſcloſed that tremendous name to his people, ſeem to forget that Abraham called the mountain, on which he intended to ſacrifice his ſon, Jehovah jired, Jehovah will ſee or provide. The moſt natural expoſition, therefore, of this paſſage, is that which renders the Hebrew word ſhem, by character, inſtead of name; and then the ſenſe will be this, In my character of El Shaddai, the omnipotent God, was I only known to them: Or, in other words, they only relied on my all-ſufficient power for the accompliſhment of my promiſes to them, but now I will be known by the character of Jehovah, or the performer of thoſe promiſes. God, indeed, had formerly given ſuch demonſtrations of his power to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, as could not but convince them of his ability to perform all his promiſes to them; but they did not live to ſee their accompliſhment, which he was now preparing to ſet before the Iſraelites. The patriarchs believed the reality of the predicted events, but they did not experimentally know them. They had dreams and viſions, indeed, but Moſes was the firſt who wrote miracles and prodigies. By theſe he made the name of the Lord known unto the world, and therefore Maimonides well concludes, from this place, that the prophetic ſpirit on Moſes was more excellent, than that which had been upon any before his time.

Ver. 6. Wherefore ſay unto the children of Iſrael, I am the Lord, and I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage: and I will redeem you with a ſtretched out arm, and with great judgments.] Such a noble and beneficent promiſe as this, was ſurely ſufficient to have extinguiſhed all remains of incredulity in any rational minds; we may, therefore, juſtly ſuppoſe, that it produced the proper impreſſions on that of Moſes, tho' he had the mortification to find it unavailing with the Iſraelites, to whom he immediately imparted it.

Ver. 12. And Moſes ſpake before the Lord, ſaying, Behold the children of Iſrael have not hearkened unto me; how then ſhall Pharaoh hear me who am of uncircumciſed lips?] Moſes was retiring from the Iſraelites in the utmoſt dejection, to behold their miſery and deſpair, when God commanded him to repair immediately to Pharaoh, and renew his demand, not to detain the people any longer in their ignominious bondage; but Moſes was ſo diſcouraged at his ill ſucceſs, that he could not forbear to expreſs ſome reluctance to undertake this new commiſſion. Alas! ſaid he, if my words obtain ſo little credit with my own people, how can I expect that they will be regarded by that ſtern and untractable king, eſpecially conſidering that impediment in my ſpeech, which renders all my expreſſions ſo ungraceful, and deprives them of the energy with which they might otherwiſe be attended! Moſes, by ſaying he was of uncircumciſed lips, alludes, in all probability, to the natural heſitation in his utterance, which he thought unqualified him for the delivery of ſo important a meſſage to ſuch a rigid monarch as Pharaoh.

Ver. 13. And the Lord ſpake unto Moſes, and unto Aaron, and gave them a charge unto the children of Iſrael, and unto Pharaoh king of Egypt, to bring the children of Iſrael out of the land of Egypt.] Here is no expreſs anſwer returned to the objection of Moſes; but it ſeems to be included in God's ſpeaking to Moſes and to Aaron; whereas before he had ſpoken only to Moſes, who, it is likely, was now admoniſhed, that as God had join'd Aaron with him to ſupply his deficiency of ſpeech, he ought to be ſatisfied with that proviſion, and renew his addreſſes both to the children of Iſrael, and alſo to Pharaoh.

Ver. 14. Theſe be the heads of their fathers houſes, &c.] It ſeems, at firſt view, as if Moſes was preparing to enumerate the heads of all Iſrael; but he only names three tribes, and that not only becauſe in the third, namely, that of Levi, the genealogy is deduced to Moſes and Aaron, who were to act ſo important a part in the deliverance of the Iſraelites; but, alſo, becauſe he would only name the moſt ſcandalous of all the twelve tribes. That of Reuben, who had ſtigmatized his deſcendants, by his inceſtuous commerce with his father's wife. And Simeon and Levi, who had ſtained their characters, by their barbarity to the Shechemites. Moſes, by theſe means, magnifies the mercy of God, who had pardoned ſuch offences, and was now preparing to include the poſterity of ſuch ſinful anceſtors, among thoſe whom he intended to emancipate from their their ſervitude, and conduct into the happy land of promiſe.

Ver. 16.——And the years of the life of Levi were an hundred thirty and ſeven years.] Levi is thought to have lived the longeſt of any of the ſons of Jacob, none of whoſe ages are recorded in Scripture, but only his and Joſeph's; whom Levi ſurvived twenty-ſeven years, tho' he was much the elder brother. Kohath, alſo, the ſecond ſon of Levi, attained near to the ſame age with himſelf, ver. 18. and his grandſon, who was the father of Moſes, lived as long as Levi, ver. 20.

Ver. 18. The ſons of Kohath, Amram, &c.] Kohath had the moſt numerous offspring of all Levi's ſons, Numb. iii. 38. from the eldeſt of whom, Moſes came.

Ver. 19. The ſons of Merari, Mehali, &c.] From this Mehali, the famous ſinger Heman, who compoſed the 88th Pſalm, 1 Chron. vi. 33. is ſuppoſed to have deſcended.

——And Muſhi.] From whom deſcended Ethan, who compoſed the 89th Pſalm, 1 Chron. vi. 44.

Ver. 20. And Amram took him Jochebed his father's ſiſter to wife; and ſhe bare him Aaron and Moſes.] From hence it is evident, that God exactly fulfilled his promiſe of delivering the Iſraelites out of ſervitude, in the fourth generation, Gen. xv. 16. (i.e. the fourth from their deſcent into Egypt) for Moſes was the fourth from Levi, being his great-grandſon.

Ver. 21. And the ſons of Izhar, Korah, &c.] Moſes enumerates his uncle's ſons, but is entirely ſilent as to his own, who were not to ſucceed him in his place and dignity, nor to be advanced to any other office. Such was his humility, and generous affection for his country, that he was only ſollicitous for the welfare of that; and was no ways ambitious of aggrandizing his own family.

Ver. 22. And the ſons of Uzziel, &c.] This was another of his uncles, whoſe poſterity he mentions, in order to diſplay the mercy of God in his bleſſing the tribe of Levi, notwithſtanding his criminal conduct at Shechem, and the puniſhment his father had denounced againſt him for it, Gen. xlix. But he takes no notice of Hebron, another of his father's brothers; poſſibly becauſe he died childleſs, or that his offspring had no iſſue.

Ver. 23. And Aaron took him Eliſheba, daughter of Aminadab, ſiſter of Naaſhon to wife.] Tho' Moſes is ſilent as to himſelf, he yet relates particularly what concerned Aaron, who married into an honourable family, with the ſiſter of a prince of the tribe of Judah, chief commander of their hoſt when they were come out of Egypt, Numb. i. 7. ii. 3. Perhaps he thought the knowledge of this might create in poſterity a greater reſpect to the prieſthood; which was ſettled in the family of Aaron.

And ſhe bore him Nadab, and Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar.] The two former of theſe four ſons of Aaron, periſhed in the very firſt ſacrifice which their father offered; becauſe they did not take fire from the altar, but offered with ſtrange fire, Lev. x. 1, 2. Eleazar ſucceeded his father Aaron in the prieſthood, Numb. xx. 25, &c. and aſſiſted Joſhua in the diviſion of the land of Canaan, Joſh. xiv. 1. xix. 51. xxi. 1. From him ſprung Zadok, and the ſucceeding high-prieſts, till the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, 1 Chron. vi. 4, &c. From Ithamar, were deſcended Eli, Abimelech, and Abiathar (in the time of David) and this family was extinct with them.

Ver. 25. And Eleazar took one of the daughters of Putiel to wife.] Who this Putiel was is not very certain. Dr. Lightfoot thinks he was an Egyptian convert, but we cannot ſee any good ground for that opinion, but rather think it more probable, that Eleazar would eſpouſe one of the race of Abraham; he was married indeed before his father was promoted to the dignity of high prieſt; but Aaron was ſo great a man in his own tribe, and married into ſo honourable a family, that it is not probable that he would ſuffer his ſon to match with an Egyptian Proſelyte.

Ver. 26. Theſe are that Aaron and Moſes, to whom the Lord ſaid, bring out the children of Iſrael from the land of Egypt, &c.] Some fanciful and affected critics have bungled this paſſage into what they intended as an argument that Moſes was not the author of this book; becauſe it is not likely, as they imagine, that he would write thus of himſelf. In anſwer to which it may be ſaid, that none but theſe men of penetration, can diſcover any abſurdity in it; and that Moſes and his brother being the inſtruments of God for accompliſhing ſuch wonderful works, poſterity ought not to have been unacquainted with that circumſtance. Nor is this more than Ezra, Nehemiah, and Daniel ſay with relation to themſelves. And St. John may as well be denied to be the author of his own Goſpel, becauſe he declares of himſelf, This is the diſciple that teſtifieth theſe things, &c. chap. xxi. 24. Beſide, the hiſtory of ſucceeding ages ſufficiently ſhews us the neceſſity there was for Moſes to inſert this account of himſelf, as likewiſe the particulars of his own genealogy; for if theſe had been omitted, we are ſenſible, by what we read in Juſtin and Tacitus, and ſuch like authors, what falſe accounts would have been impoſed upon us, with reſpect to this great Legiſlator and his family; for Juſtin repreſents him as the ſon of Joſeph. Nay the Jewiſh writers themſelves are ſo extremely fabulous, that we ſhould have learnt as little truth from them; if Moſes had not been more authentic in the account of himſelf.

Ver. 28. And it came to paſs on the day when the Lord ſpake unto Moſes, &c.] Moſes having finiſhed the account he thought fit to give of himſelf and of his brother, whom God was pleaſed to make his colleague in this great embaſſy, reſumes the relation of it, which he broke off at the end of verſe 13.

Ver. 29. That the Lord ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying, I am the Lord, &c.] This and the next verſe ſeem to be a recapitulation of what God had ſaid in his laſt appearances to Moſes, verſes 2. 10. and of his deſire to be excuſed from the employment conſigned to his miniſtration, which deſire he had urged by two arguments, ver. 12, 13. where they are related ſomething more largely than they are at the cloſe of this chapter; where he mentions them again, that there might be a clearer connection with what God further added for his encouragement in the ſucceeding chapter, where he commands him to deliver a new meſſage to Pharaoh.

CHAP. VII.

1 Moſes is encouraged to go to Pharaoh. 7 His age. 8 His rod is turned into a ſerpent. 11 The ſorcerers do the like. 13 Pharaohs heart is hardned. 14 Gods meſſage to Pharaoh. 19 The river is turned into blood.

AND the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, See, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh: and Aaron thy brother ſhall be thy prophet.

2 Thou ſhalt ſpeak all that I command thee: and Aaron thy brother ſhall ſpeak unto Pharaoh, that he ſend the children of Iſrael out of his land.

3 And I will harden Pharaohs heart, and multiply my ſigns and my wonders in the land of Egypt.

4 But Pharaoh ſhall not hearken unto you, that I may lay my hand upon Egypt, and bring forth mine armies, and my people the children of Iſrael, out of the land of Egypt, by great judgments.

5 And the Egyptians ſhall know that I am the LORD, when I ſtretch forth mine hand upon Egypt, and bring out the children of Iſrael from among them.

6 And Moſes and Aaron did as the LORD commanded them, ſo did they.

7 And Moſes was fourſcore years old, and Aaron fourſcore and three years old, when they ſpake unto Pharaoh.

8 ¶ And the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, and unto Aaron, ſaying,

9 When

9 When Pharaoh ſhall ſpeak unto you, ſaying, Shew a miracle for you: then thou ſhalt ſay unto Aaron, Take thy rod and caſt it before Pharaoh, and it ſhall become a ſerpent.

10 ¶ And Moſes and Aaron went in unto Pharaoh, and they did ſo as the LORD had commanded: and Aaron caſt down his rod before Pharaoh, and before his ſervants, and it became a ſerpent.

11 Then Pharaoh alſo called the wiſemen, and the ſorcerers: now the magicians of Egypt, they alſo did in like manner with their inchantments.

12 For they caſt down every man his rod, and they became ſerpents: but Aarons rod ſwallowed up their rods.

13 And he hardned Pharaohs heart, that he hearkned not unto them; as the LORD had ſaid.

14 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Pharaohs heart is hardned, he refuſeth to let the people go.

15 Get thee unto Pharaoh in the morning, lo, he goeth out unto the water, and thou ſhalt ſtand by the rivers brink, againſt he come: and the rod which was turned to a ſerpent ſhalt thou take in thine hand.

16 And thou ſhalt ſay unto him, The LORD God of the Hebrews hath ſent me unto thee, ſaying, Let my people go, that they may ſerve me in the wilderneſs: and behold, hitherto thou wouldeſt not hear.

17 Thus ſaith the LORD, In this thou ſhalt know that I am the LORD: behold, I will ſmite with the rod that is in mine hand, upon the waters which are in the river, and they ſhall be turned to blood.

18 And the fiſh that is in the river ſhall die, and the river ſhall ſtink; and the Egyptians ſhall loath to drink of the water of the river.

19 ¶ And the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, Say unto Aaron, Take thy rod, and ſtretch out thine hand upon the waters of Egypt, upon their ſtreams, upon their rivers, and upon their ponds, and upon all their pools of water, that they may become blood; and that there may be blood throughout all the land of Egypt, both in veſſels of wood, and in veſſels of ſtone.

20 And Moſes and Aaron did ſo, as the LORD commanded: and he lift up the rod, and ſmote the waters that were in the river, in the ſight of Pharaoh, and in the ſight of his ſervants: and all the waters that were in the river, were turned to blood.

21 And the fiſh that was in the river died: and the river ſtunk, and the Egyptians could not drink of the water of the river: and there was blood throughout all the land of Egypt.

22 And the magicians of Egypt did ſo with their inchantments: and Pharaohs heart was hardned, neither did he hearken unto them; as the LORD had ſaid.

23 And Pharaoh turned and went into his houſe, neither did he ſet his heart to this alſo.

24 And all the Egyptians digged round about the river for water to drink: for they could not drink of the water of the river.

25 And ſeven days were fulfilled, after that the LORD had ſmitten the river.

Ver. 1. And the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, See I have made thee a god to Pharaoh: and Aaron thy brother ſhall be thy prophet.] Behold I inveſt thee with a miraculous and divine power, over Pharaoh, and thy brother ſhall be as thy prophet and interpreter to him; caſt away thy apprehenſions, then, of appearing before that proud prince, ſince I have armed thee with a deligated omnipotence, and no longer object thy heſitation and inaccuracy of ſpeech, ſince thy brother ſhall be a compleat expoſitor of thy mind, and ſhall declare it to Pharaoh as effectually as an inſpired prophet utters my divine pleaſure to the children of men.

Some perſons, who read the ſacred Scriptures with no other view than to cavil at what they have neither judgment, nor learning, to underſtand, pretend to draw an argument from this verſe, that the book of Exodus was not written by Moſes, but ſome author who lived long after his time; becauſe they fancy the Hebrew word nabi was not uſed in the ſignification of a prophet, in the age of Moſes. And this, they ſay, appears evident to them, from 1 Sam. ix. 9. where it is declared, that he that is now called (nahi) a prophet, was before-time called (roeh) a ſeer, which, in their opinion, ſeems to ſignify, that the word nabi (which Moſes here uſes for a prophet) was but newly introduced in the days of Samuel. But this is very far from Samuel's meaning, whoſe plain ſenſe is this, That he who foretold things to come, or diſcovered ſecrets, was anciently called a ſeer, not a prophet; which laſt word ſignified, heretofore, only an interpreter of the divine will, without any eſſential regard to futurity: But they firſt began, in Samuel's days, to apply the word nabi, or prophet, to thoſe who could reveal any ſecret, or foreſee things future, which had not been the original import of that word, ſince it only ſignified one who maintained a familiar intercourſe with God, knew his mind, and delivered it to others; as may be obſerved from Gen. xx. 7. where God himſelf calls Abraham a prophet, as he here aſſigns that name to Aaron, and what holy writer would preſume to alter the word which God himſelf had uſed? Which is far more proper, likewiſe, to the preſent purpoſe, in the paſſage before us, than either roeh, or choſeh, which our criticks pretend were the words uſed in the time of Moſes, and not nabi; for neither of thoſe two words could correſpond with the intention of God, in this declaration concerning Aaron; who was not to ſee, and divine, but to be a mouth to Moſes, and to utter what God revealed to him, not to Aaron.

Ver. 3. And I will harden Pharaohs heart, and multiply my ſigns and wonders in the land of Egypt.] We have already vindicated the original expreſſion, from the opprobrious ideas that riſe from the manner in which it is tranſlated in this verſe, and in many other paſſages in this book. The true meaning may be expreſſed in the following ſhort paraphraſe on this and the two ſucceeding verſes: Tho' I ſuffer Pharaoh's heart to be harden'd, as a puniſhment for his wilful perſeverance in cruelty and injuſtice to my choſen people, yet be aſſured that I will deliver them from their bondage, bondage; and they ſhall march out of Egypt like a triumphant army, and the Egyptians ſhall know that I am the Lord. Go on then, and make that proud tyrant ſenſible, at leaſt, that your meſſage is from a greater and more powerful monarch than himſelf.

Ver. 6. And Moſes and Aaron did as the LORD commanded them, ſo did they.] This repetition of their obedience to God's commands is very properly inſerted, becauſe they no longer heſitated in the execution of their commiſſion, but performed it with all the intrepidity that the miniſters of God ought to manifeſt in the diſcharge of their duty.

Ver. 7. And Moſes was fourſcore years old, and Aaron fourſcore and three years old, when they ſpake unto Pharaoh.] Theſe illuſtrious ſervants of the Almighty were very venerable on account of their age, but much more ſo on account of their commiſſion, and of the tremendous power by which it was ſupported. They repeated to the tyrant the commands they had received from God. They ſummoned him to grant a deliverance to the children of Iſrael, and releaſe them from the unjuſt ſlavery they had ſo long endured. Pharaoh, in all probability, required a miracle, by which they were to prove, that the God who ſent them was worthy of his obedience, and that they were really his miniſters. The proud king was immediately obey'd; Aaron threw down his rod, and it became a ſerpent.

Moſes himſelf was ſtruck with terror at the firſt ſight of this ſpectacle, chap. iv. ver. 3. but the hiſtory does not acquaint us, that it produced any ſuch effect upon Pharaoh; probably, becauſe he had been accuſtomed to the operations of his own magicians, and had often ſeen them perform ſurpriſing actions, tho' not like this.

Ver. 11. Then Pharaoh alſo called the wiſe men, and the ſorcerers: now the magicians of Egypt, they alſo did in like manner with their inchantments.] As the ſacred hiſtory is now entring into a long detail of the miracles wrought by Moſes, ſome of which were imitated by the magicians of Egypt, it will not be improper to enquire who the latter were, and by what power they performed the wonders recorded of them, and why they came ſhort of ſome of thoſe which were accompliſhed by the great law-giver of the Jews. The Egyptian magicians were Jannes and Jambres, who are mentioned by St. Paul as having withſtood Moſes, 2 Tim. iii 8. or, as Pliny calls them, Jamnes and Jotapha, when, ſpeaking of the ſect of the magicians, he declares, that Moſes, Jamnes, and Jotapha, were the founders of it, (lib. xxx. c. 1.) They are celebrated in the Talmud under the names of Jochani and Mamri. The Targum of Jonathan affirms them to have been Balaam's ſons, and that they attended him in his journey to Balac king of Moab, (Targ. in Numb. xxii. 22) Some Jewiſh authors call them Janes and Jambres, others Jochanan and Mamre, aud others Jonah and Jombres. (Buntorf. Lexic. Talmud. Fabric. de Apocr. Vet. Teſt.) and pretend, that they were drowned in the Red-ſea, with the Egyptians; tho' others think, they were not deſtroyed till the war which Phineas waged againſt the Midianites, Numb. xxv. 17, 18. The apocryphal book, entitled Jannes and Mambres, quoted by Origen, (in Matth. Tract. xxxv.) and by Hilary the deacon, (Ambroſiat. in 2 Tim. iii. 8) affirm them to have been two brothers; and Numenius, cited by Euſebius, (in Ariſtob. ap. Euſeb. præp. Evang. lib. 9 c. 8.) preſents us with this account of them. "Jannes and Jambres, interpreters of the myſteries of "Egypt, were in great repute, at the time when the He"brews were driven out of Egypt; being, in the opinion "of all men, inferior to none in the magic art. For by "the general voice of the Egyptians, they two were "choſen to oppoſe Moſes, the leader of the Jews, and "whoſe prayers were, of all others, the moſt prevalent "with God; and they only were able to fruſtrate all "thoſe calamitous plagues which Moſes brought upon E"gypt, in the open view of all the Egyptians." This may ſuffice for the names and character of thoſe celebrated magicians.

It cannot be thought, that Pharaoh employed his magicians to vie with Moſes in working miracles, in order to determine whether the gods of Egypt were as powerful to protect him, as the God of Iſrael was to afflict him; for it was not the cuſtom of the heathens to endeavour to ſupport themſelves by the favour of one god, againſt the expreſs and known demands of another: but their belief was, that when the ſupreme deity determined to afflict them, no other god could help them againſt his determinations; and that every or any god had full power to diſtreſs them, unleſs they took care, when required, duly to make atonement for any treſpaſſes and offences againſt him. Rabſhekah believed, that when he was come up againſt Jeruſalem, not without the Lord, no god could be able to deliver the Jews out of his hand: And thus Homer repreſents Hector delivered up to the fury of Achilles. When Jupiter determined that he ſhould be kill'd, then Phœbus left him; no deity any longer interpoſed in his behalf: And Virgil gives up Turnus to Æneas in the ſame manner. And as they thought no god able to deliver any favourite from the fate appointed by the ſupreme deity, ſo we do not find inſtances, which intimate, that when any god threatned to afflict them, they thought they could ſupport themſelves againſt his vengeance, by ſeeking the more immediate favour of ſome other deity. When Calchas had informed the Greeks, that Apollo had ſent the peſtilence among them, for neglecting his prieſt and favourites, the Greeks did not endeavour to fly to Jupiter, or to any other god, to be protected againſt Apollo's anger; but they immediately took the beſt care they could to appeaſe Apollo. And thus, when the Aſſyrians thought the people, whom they had planted in Samaria, had lions ſent among them by the god of the country into which they had removed them, they did not think it ſufficient to endeavour to procure them protection againſt this god, whoſe manner they did not know, by ſetting up the worſhip of their own gods; but the king of Aſſyria thought fit to command, that they ſhould carry thither one of the prieſts, whom they had brought from thence, that he might go and dwell there, and teach the people the manner of the god of the land. When Cyrus invaded Aſſyria, he made libations, to render the ſoil propitious to him; then he ſacrificed to the gods and heroes of the Aſſyrian nation; then to Jupiter Patrius; and it is remarked, that if there appeared to him to be any other god, he took care not to neglect him. This was the Pagan practice, and it could have been to no purpoſe for Pharaoh to have employed his magicians to try to work miracles as Moſes did, if he had thought them aſſiſted by a divine power in working them; for it had been no detection of Moſes's not being ſent by God, that when he had wrought a miracle to confirm his miſſion, a perſon, who by the ſame, or a like divine power, could work the ſame miracle, had been oppos'd to him. This could not have prov'd either of the perſons not to have wrought a true miracle; for each of them muſt have known and confeſſed that they had either of them wrought a true miracle by divine aſſiſtance. It is no where ſuggeſted, that the gods of Egypt commanded Pharaoh to detain the Iſraelites; nor can it be conceived that Pharaoh could deſire his prieſts to try to work miracles, to know whether this was their will, or no; for ſuppoſing him to think that Moſes had been able, by the power of one deity, to perform a miracle to demand their diſmiſſion, it is impoſſible to think he or his people could be ſo abſurd as to imagine that the gods would work miracles in defiance of, and oppoſition to, one another. In this caſe, had he thought Moſes had wrought a true miracle, he would have believed that ſome deity had really ſent him; and tho' this deity was not an Egyptian god, yet when Pharaoh had been convinced that he really was a god; like Cyrus, when he had appeaſed the ſeveral gods he knew of, if he found that there was any other deity, which he had hitherto been a ſtranger to, he would not have neglected him: But Pharaoh doubted whether Moſes really wrought a miracle or no: The learned in Egypt imagined, that miracles, prodigies, and omens, were accompliſhed by the planetary and elementary influences, and that ſtudents, deeply vers'd in the myſteries of nature, could cauſe them by arts and incantations. Pharaoh thought his magicians to be great maſters of theſe arts, and that therefore, if they could perform what Moſes did, then Moſes was only ſuch a one as they, and endeavour'd to delude him by artificial wonders, inſtead of real miracles. And this is abundantly confirmed to be the fact, by the account which Moſes gave of the magicians uſing their inchantments, and of the confeſſion extorted from them, when they could not ſucceed in the uſe of them.

When the magicians of Egypt endeavour'd by their inchantments to produce lice, and could not ſucceed, the confeſſion which they then made was, not that they were over-power'd by the God of Iſrael, nor that he aſſiſted his ſervants beyond what their gods did them; but Atsban Elohim Houa, this is the finger of God. The Targum of Onkelos renders it, This plague comes from God. The Arabic verſion expreſſes it, A ſign of this nature is of God. So that this appears evidently to have been what Pharaoh endeavoured fully to convince himſelf of; whether the works which Moſes performed were artificial, or whether they were the finger of God; and when the magicians had anſwered this queſtion, we find that he made no further uſe of them: Whereas, had the queſtion been, whether the gods of Iſrael, or the gods of Egypt, were the moſt able to aſſiſt their ſervants, Pharaoh might have doubted, whether the want of ſucceſs in the experiment was not more owing to defect in the magicians inchantments, than the impotency of the gods: He would have thought, that the magicians had made improper applications, to obtain their favour, and that according to the notions which prevailed, when Balaam was deſired to curſe the Iſraelites, tho' ſome inchantments or religious arts of addreſs might not obtain the divine favour, yet others might; and the being diſappointed in one trial, would rather have argued a defect in the attempts of the prieſt or magicians, to render the gods propitious, than any want of power in their gods to aſſiſt them. But the enquiry was evidently not of this nature; All that Pharaoh wanted to be informed of, was, whether Moſes was a magician, or was really ſent by the God he mentioned; and he expected to be convinced of this, by examining whether his wonders were ſuch as the magicians by their arts could perform, or no. There are ſeveral queries which may be very juſtly made upon Pharaoh's employing his magicians to attempt the wonders which Moſes performed. It may be asked, was there really any knowledge of the powers of nature, or Arcana of art, by which magicians, without the miraculous aſſiſtance of the deity, could perform ſuch operations as Pharaoh here employ'd his wiſe men and ſorcerers to attempt? Did the Egyptian magicians really perform thoſe wonders, in which they are recorded to have imitated Moſes? How could Pharaoh think or imagine, that they could poſſibly perform them? Or could they themſelves be ſo weak as to attempt them? Or how came they to have ſucceſs in ſome inſtances, wherein they tried and performed wonders that correſponded with the miracles of Moſes? But to all theſe queries it is not difficult to find a juſt and ſufficient anſwer.

1. Was there really any knowledge of the powers of nature, or any ſecrets of art, by which magicians might be able to accompliſh ſuch wonders as Moſes performed before Pharaoh, without their having an extraordinary and divine aſſiſtance? The anſwer is eaſy; for the knowledge of natural cauſes, and effects, is ſo clear in this age, by the light which has been introduced by experiments and philoſophy, that we may poſitively ſay, that no effects, like what theſe men pretended to accompliſh by ſorcery and inchantment, can be artificially produced by any or all the powers of nature. No art, no ſtudy of occult ſciences, can enable a man really to change a rod, or ſtick of wood, into a living ſerpent: There are no inchantments ſufficient to enable us to make a living frog, or to ſtrike our neighbour with a diſeaſe or boil, or to inflict any vengeance of this ſort upon him. There never were the inſtances of things of this nature effected by arts of this ſort. How the magicians of Egypt performed their wonders before Pharaoh, ſhall be mention'd in the ſequel of this Annotation, and in the ſame manner in which we account for them, we may account for all other wonderful and ſupernatural works, repreſented to have been effected by any Heathen magicians in the ſacred pages. As to many accounts of ſuch facts which are mention'd in prophane hiſtorians, we may venture to aſſert, that they never were really done as they repreſent them, but that they are generally ſome of the Scripture miracles falſely reported, or attributed to perſons who were never concerned in them, or accounts of facts which were never performed at all. Julian, the ſon of Theurgus, is ſaid to have cauſed the heavens to be black with clouds, and a vaſt ſhower to fall, with terrible thunders and lightning, σοφια τινι, by ſome magic art; but others think, that Arnuphis, the Egyptian philoſopher, perform'd this miracle: Such as this are the relations of Heathen wonders: no certainty of the performance of them, and nothing but a vain and undetermined conjecture how they could be accompliſhed. This fact may as well be aſcribed to Arnuphis as to Julian, and was certainly true of neither; being probably an account of Elijah's obtaining rain in the time of Ahab, falſely aſcribed to one or other of theſe Heathens, in order to raiſe the credit of the Pagan learning. But it will be ask'd,

2. Did the Egyptian magicians actually perform thoſe wonders which are aſcribed to them? Some learned writers have imagined, that there was not any real tranſmutation, when the rods of the Egyptian ſorcerers were ſeemingly changed into ſerpents; and that they did not really convert water into blood, or produce frogs, or exhibit any real miracle in their oppoſition to Moſes; but that they either play'd their parts as juglers, pretending to do what they really did not do; or that ſome dæmons aſſiſted them, and, by their power over the air, enabled them to deceive the ſight of the beholders, and to cauſe phantoms, or deluſive appearances of what was really not done, tho' it ſeemed to be performed in the ſight of Pharaoh, and thoſe who were preſent with him. Many of the fathers of the Chriſtian church are cited as abettors of this opinion, and Joſephus is ſaid to favour it; but certainly we have little reaſon to admit it. As to the magicians impoſing upon Pharaoh, by artifice and pretence, we cannot ſee how they could poſſibly do it, without giving Moſes and Aaron an opportunity of detecting the cheat, and expoſing them to Pharaoh and his people. Elijah found it no great difficulty to diſcover the falſe pretences of the prieſts of Baal, when they pretended by prayer to bring fire from heaven. In the ſame manner Moſes would, without doubt, have brought the artifices of the Egyptian magicians to a trial, which would have diſcover'd the cheat, if the wonders, which they pretended to perform, had been only deluſive, and not really accompliſhed by them. And as to their being able to exhibit the appearances of ſerpents, frogs, and blood, when no ſuch things really were in being, but only appear'd to be, by the air being ſo directed by the agency of beings who had power over it, as to affect Pharaoh and his ſubjects in ſuch a manner, as to cauſe them to think they ſaw the magicians rods turn'd into ſerpents, frogs produced, and water converted into blood, when none of theſe things were really done: To this we anſwer, That to argue in ſuch a manner, is indeed to be unwilling to allow the Egyptian magicians to be capable of performing a true miracle, and yet, at the ſame time, it ſuppoſes them to have performed wonders, of which we can give as little account as of a miracle. Let any one attempt to give a ſatisfactory account, how any magician could, by a power over the air, either by himſelf, or by the aſſiſtance of a dæmon, repreſent to the naked view of the ſpectators, in oppoſition to a true miracle, ſerpents, frogs, and water converted into blood; nay, and ſo to repreſent them, as that the fictitious appearances ſhould not be diſtinguiſhable from the real, but ſhould bear to be ſeen with them at one and the ſame time, and in the ſame view; (for ſo the rods of the magicians turn'd into ſerpents certainly were, when Aaron's rod ſwallowed up their rods) we ſay, let any one try to give a reaſonable account of this fancy, and he may quickly ſee, that he may more reaſonably ſuppoſe the Egyptians able to perform a true and real tranſmutation, than to aſcribe to them ſuch imaginary powers as this ſuppoſition requires: and which, if they could be conceived, can tend only to deſtroy the certainty of all appearances whatever. The account which Moſes gave of the miracles perform'd by himſelf and Aaron, and of what the magicians perform'd by their inchantments, does not hint any difference as to the reality of the performances of either of them; and undoubtedly the rods of the magicians were truly and really transformed into ſerpents, as well as the rod of Aaron, and were actually ſwallow'd up by it. The frogs which the magicians produced, were true, real, and living animals, as well as thoſe produced by Moſes; and the magicians certainly turn'd water into blood, as really as Moſes himſelf did. There can be nothing offered from the ſacred hiſtory, to ſuppoſe that the one were more real appearances than the other; and if a believer of revelation will aſſert the magicians performances to be only phantaſms, or deceptions of ſight, why may not an unbeliever maintain, with equal aſſurance, that all the miracles of Moſes were of the ſame claſs?

claſs? Nothing but the moſt extravagant ſcepticiſm can be built on ſo wild a ſuppoſition. But,

3. If there were no ſecret arts, no occult ſciences, by the ſtudy of which the Egyptian magicians might think themſelves qualified to perform theſe wonders; how could Pharaoh imagine, that his magicians could effect them, or how could they themſelves be ſo weak or ſo vain, as to attempt their accompliſhment? Our anſwer is this; we read of no miracles of this ſort ever perform'd in the world before this time. God has diſcover'd his will to mankind, by revelation, in all ages. In the moſt early ages by voices or dreams: From Abraham's time the Lord appear'd frequently to his ſervants. But no ſuch wonders as were wrought in Egypt, in the ſight of Pharaoh, are recorded to have ever been perform'd in the world, before Moſes was ſelected for this extraordinary miſſion into Egypt; ſo that they were undoubtedly ſurpriſing to all who ſaw them. And accordingly we find, that Moſes, when he beheld the buſh on fire, and not conſumed, was amazed, and turn'd aſide, to ſee this great ſight, why the buſh was not burnt: And when God turn'd his rod into a ſerpent, Moſes was terrified, and fled from it. God had not as yet enabled any of his ſervants to work miracles, as Moſes and Aaron did in Egypt; and therefore Pharaoh, upon ſeeing them perform'd, might well enquire whether his magicians could exhibit the like wonders to his view; and the magicians might, without abſurdity, endeavour to employ their abilities to that effect. God had, before this time, frequently revealed himſelf to his ſervants by dreams, by voices, by ſending angels, or by appearing to them. And the world, in general, was convinced of the reality of ſuch revelations, until, as human learning increas'd, the conceit of ſcience, falſely ſo call'd, ſeduced the learned to think themſelves able, by philoſophy and ſpeculation, to ſubſtitute a religion of nature ſufficient to render revelation unneceſſary and ſuperfluous. The Egyptians began early, and had proceeded far in this falſe way of thinking: Inſtead of one God, and one Lord, whom Abraham and his deſcendants adored, they corrupted their faith very near as early as the days of that patriarch; and admitted, that there was indeed a ſupreme deity, preſiding over the univerſe (for this the Heathens never really denied, tho' the groſsneſs of polytheiſm, which time introduced, greatly obſcured their knowledge of this truth) but they imagined they had reaſon to think, that the planets and elements were gods alſo, and governed the world by their influence, tho' ſubject to the fate, will or direction of the ſupreme God. And as to what was generally believed of dreams, viſions, and revelations, which had been made to men, the learned in theſe times thought as freely about them, as any of our moderns can. The belief of them was ſerviceable to the legiſlators, who knew how to make them a ſtate engine to govern their people by; but they thought themſelves wiſe enough to know, that they were occaſioned ſine Deo, in a natural way, by the planetary and elementary influences; and that they were made a part of their religion, for the utility of their popular impreſſions. Hitherto the Egyptians had proceeded; and had Moſes come to them, and could only have aſſured them, that he had received a command from God, in a dream, or by a viſion, or by a voice, or any other revelation, neither Pharaoh, nor his wiſe men, would have regarded him at all, but have concluded that ſome natural prodigy had happened; for ſuch they would moſt probably have imagined the buſh on fire to have been, and have ſuppoſed that Moſes had made a political uſe of it; and for this reaſon Pharaoh ordered him to ſhew a miracle; knowing, that if the Deity really ſent him, he could give this proof of it. Hereupon God enabled Moſes to work ſeveral very extraordinary ſigns and wonders, ſuch as had never been ſeen or heard of in the world before: upon ſeeing which, Pharaoh very naturally conſulted his Magi, and they tried all the myſtical operations, and examined all the ſchemes, which their ſyſtem of ſcience furniſhed, to ſee whether theſe things could be done or accounted for by any natural influences, or human learning; and after ſeveral trials acknowledged, that they could not, but that they were the effect of an omnipotent hand, the finger of God. But,

4. If the Egyptian magicians had no myſtical arts, by the uſe of which they could really turn their rods into ſerpents, produce frogs, and change water into blood, how came they to ſucceed in theſe attempts, which they made in oppoſition to Moſes? We have no reaſon to think, that the king knew the works, which he employed his magicians to try to perform, to be within the reach of any art they were maſters of, becauſe he order'd them to try to perform them; rather on the contrary, he order'd them to try to perform them, that he might know whether art could effect them or not, or whether they were indeed true miracles. It was cuſtomary for kings, when any event happened which was thought ominous or ſurpriſing, to ſend for their prieſts and learned profeſſors, and order them to anſwer the difficulties which perplexed them: And tho' much was pretended to, yet they had not advanced ſo far in human nature, but that kings ſometimes thought they might require of their Magi things impoſſible. We have an inſtance of this in the book of Daniel. Nebuchadnezzar dreamed a dream, and forgot it; and required his Magi, not only to tell him the meaning of his dream, but to find out what his dream was; and tho' the Chaldeans anſwered him, that no man upon earth could do it, and that no king, lord, or ruler, had ever aſked ſuch a thing of any magician, aſtrologer, or Chaldean; yet the king was ſo reſolutely ſet upon compelling them to uſe their utmoſt endeavours, that he determined to deſtroy all the Magi, or wiſe men of Babylon. In theſe caſes, the Magi might attempt all poſſible experiments, tho' they had no reaſon to hope for ſucceſs from them. 2. It does not appear, from the magicians here trying their experiments, and ſucceeding in them, that they thought, at firſt, that their arts would be effectual, and that they ſhould be able to perform ſuch works as Moſes and Aaron had done. The prieſts of Baal, in the time of Elijah, had no reaſon to believe, that the invocations of their god, or the cutting themſelves with knives or lancets, would produce the fire from heaven to conſume their ſacrifice; but yet they tried all the artifices they could think of, from morning until evening. So here the Egyptians had no reaſon to ſuppoſe their incantations would produce ſerpents, but they would try all experiments, in order to judge further of the matter; and upon their attempting, God was pleas'd in ſome inſtances, to give an unexpected ſucceſs to their endeavours, in order to ſerve, and carry on his own purpoſes and deſigns by them. For, 3. The ſucceſs they had was certainly unexpected, as evidently appears by their not being able to follow Moſes in all his miracles. They produc'd ſerpents and frogs, and converted water into blood, but when they attempted to produce the lice, were unable to ſucceed. It is here evident, that the magicians did not know the extent of their powers, if they can be conceiv'd to have had any; for they attempted to equal Moſes in all his performances, but, upon trial, found they could do ſome, but in others, tho' no more difficult than the former, they could not obtain any ſucceſs at all. Had they had any effectual rules of art or ſcience to work by, they would at firſt, without trial, have known what to attempt, and what not; but, in truth, they had no arts to perform any thing of this ſort by. In ſome inſtances, God was pleas'd to give a ſucceſs which they little expected, to their endeavours, and which they were ſo far from reſting ſatisfied with, that they took the firſt opportunity that was given them, when their attempts fail'd, to acknowledge that Moſes was aſſiſted by the divine power.

The Talmud has preſerved us a tradition of a proverbial taunt, with which the Egyptians flouted Moſes, when he began to work his miracles among them; thou bringeſt ſtraw to Affra, a place in Egypt where ſtraw abounded; meaning, that he had choſen a wrong place to exhibit his performances, ſince the country was ſo well ſtored with magicians. Origen ſays, that the Egyptians did not abſolutely deny the miracles of Moſes, but only pretended, that they were done by deluſion, and not by a divine power; and Philo introduces the Egyptian magicians ſpeaking to Pharaoh and his court to this purpoſe, Why are ye ſo intimidated? We are not ignorant of ſuch things, ſeeing we profeſs the ſame ourſelves.

The Mohammedans have not failed to crowd this part of Moſes's hiſtory with ſome of their traditions, which we ſhall but juſt intimate to our readers. They tell us, that Moſes having wrought ſome miracles before the king of Egypt, and very much ſurpris'd him with them, he was adviſ'd by his council to amuſe him with plauſible hopes, till he had ſent for ſome of the moſt expert magicians from Thebaide. Accordingly, Sabour, and Gadour, two brothers thers, renowned for their magick skill, were ſent for; but before they repaired to Pharaoh's court, they went to conſult the manes of their father about the ſucceſs of their journey; acquainting him, withal, that the two magicians whom they were ſent to oppoſe, had a rod which they turned into a ſerpent, who devoured all that oppoſed it. Their father's ghoſt anſwer'd, that if that rod turn'd it ſelf into a ſerpent, whilſt they were aſleep, they muſt never expect to prevail againſt them. Upon their arrival at Memphis, their firſt care was to inform themſelves about this material circumſtance, and they found, that their rod did guard them, in the ſhape of a ſerpent, whilſt they ſlept, and let none come near them. However, this did not hinder them from appearing before Pharaoh, at the head of his other magicians, to the number of ſeventy thouſand. Beſides theſe, there were two other excellent magicians, with their diſciples; and, laſtly, the Egyptian prieſt, at the head of all the ſorcerers of the country. All theſe had prepar'd rods, and cords fill'd with quickſilver, which being heated by the ſun, imitated the winding of a ſerpent; but they were ſoon deſtroy'd by that of Moſes, to the great ſurprize of all the beholders, but eſpecially of Sabour and Gadour; who, thereupon, renounc'd their profeſſion, and embrac'd Moſes's religion, and were put to death for it, by order of the Egyptian king, as holding a ſecret correſpondence with Moſes.

From this account, it is plain, that the Mohammedans look'd upon the wonders, wrought by the Egyptians, rather as tricks of legerdemain, than any ſupernatural works.

Ver. 12. For they caſt down every man his rod, and they became ſerpents: but Aaron's rod ſwallowed up their rods.] The rods of the magicians were the ſymbols of their pretended powers; and this, perhaps, might be the reaſon why God annexed to a rod the power of accompliſhing ſuch miracles in the hand of Moſes. Theſe ſorcerers were not a little ſurpriz'd, when the ſerpent, into which Aaron's rod was converted, devour'd their own, by which means, they did not only find themſelves ſurpaſſed in power, but were even depriv'd of their rods, the ſymbols of that power.

This prodigy was ſufficient to have convinced Pharaoh, had they not flatter'd him, as, in all probability, they did, that they would, in time, find a power ſuperior to that of Moſes. Greg. Nyſſen. L. de Vita Moſis, p. 173. takes the devouring of their rods to have been a plain demonſtration that the ſerpents, into which they were converted, had no vital power in them, but were meer illuſions, without any vertue.

Ver. 14. And the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, Pharaoh's heart is hardened, he refuſeth to let the people go.] It is very obſervable, that God doth not ſay, I have hardened Pharaoh's heart, and therefore there ought not to have been any ſuch intimation in the former paſſage, which we have already conſidered, ſince no other obduracy is implied than what proceeded from Pharaoh's own uninfluenc'd reſolution not to diſmiſs the Iſraelites from their ſlavery.

Ver. 15. Get thee unto Pharaoh in the morning, lo, he goeth out unto the water, &c.] Pharaoh either went to walk there for recreation, or in order to worſhip the river Nile; for, as Bochart obſerves, out of Plutarch, δεῖν ἄτω τιμὴ Αἰγυπτίοις ὡς ὁ Νεῖλος, Nothing was in ſuch veneration among the Egyptians, as the Nile: Or, if he himſelf were a magician, as the Hebrews fancy, he might be ſkill'd in what was call'd ὑδρομαντεία, divination by water. The Talmud aſſigns this as the reaſon of Pharaoh's repairing to the river, and this opinion is follow'd by Jonathan, in his paraphraſe. Behold he goeth out to obſerve divination upon the water, as a magician.

We are now entring upon the firſt of the ten plagues, with which God chaſtiſed the Egyptians for diſobeying his ambaſſadors; it will not, therefore, be improper to enquire what time was employ'd by Moſes in the infliction of theſe awful judgments upon Egypt; eſpecially, becauſe ſome chronologers have ſpun it out to ten, and others to twelve months; but, beſide, that their reaſons are very inſufficient, and unſupported by Scripture, it is more likely that they were all accompliſhed within the ſpace of one month. Firſt, Becauſe the ſhort intervals between them would more viſibly diſplay the power of God, and more effectually work upon Pharaoh to diſmiſs the Iſraelites. 2. Theſe plagues were ſo grievous, that if they had laſted much longer, the Egyptians could never have ſupported them. But, 3. We read, that the Iſraelites continued full forty years in the wilderneſs, that Moſes was eighty years old before he appear'd the firſt time before Pharaoh, and that he was an hundred and twenty years old when he died, that is, at the end of their forty years travel. So that there could not be much time ſpent in bringing on theſe plagues. The great archbiſhop Uſher has included them all within the ſpace of one month, from Moſes's own account, as follows:

About the eighteenth day of the ſixth month, which, in the year following, and after, was reckon'd the twelfth month, was ſent the plague of the waters turn'd into blood, which ended ſeven days after, ver. 25. About the twenty-fifth day came on the plague of the frogs, which was remov'd the day following, chap. viii. ver. 10. And about the twenty-ſeventh day came on the plague of the lice, chap. viii. ver. 17. About the twenty-eighth day, Moſes threaten'd them with a fourth plague of flies, and other vermin, which came on the twenty-ninth day, and were all taken away on the thirtieth, chap. viii. verſes 24, and 29.

About the 1ſt day of the next Month, which was afterwards made the 11t Month of the year, Moſes foretold them of another plague to come, the murrain of the cattle, and brought it upon them the day following, chap. ix. ver. 3, 5, 6. About the 3d day, the ſixth plague of boils broke out upon men and beaſts, and upon the magicians, chap. ix. ver. 8, &c.

About the 14th day, Moſes foretold them a ſeventh plague, which he brought upon them upon them on the 5th; which was of thunder, rain, and grievous hail mix'd with fire, with which their flax and barley were ſmitten, chap. ix. ver. 18, &c. But their wheat and rice were not hurt; not being yet out of the ground. Whence Nic. Fuller, lib. 3, Miſcel 1. rightly obſerves, p. 389, that this plague happen'd in the month Abib.

About the ſeventh day, Moſes threatn'd them with an 8th plague, and accordingly ſent a cloud of locuſts the day following, to devour all, which plague he remov'd about the 9th day, chap. x. ver. 4. to 19.

The month Abib, which was hitherto the ſeventh month, was, from this time forward, made the firſt month of the whole year, chap. xii. 2. and xiii. 4 for the memorial of their departure out of Egypt; from the beginning of which month the Epoca of the Jewiſh calendar is from thence forward deduc'd, Numb. ix. 1, 2. though the end of the former account fell on the middle of the month.

Upon the tenth day of this, now the firſt day of the month, which was the 30th of April, according to the Julian calendar upon Thurſday, was inſtituted the feaſt of the paſſover, and ſweet bread, to wit, the paſchal lamb was choſen and kill'd the fourth day after, Exod. xii. ver 3. to 21.

Moſes brings upon them the 9th plague of three days darkneſs, Exod. x. 21, &c. and upon the 14th day, which was May the 4th, upon Monday with us, which was the laſt time he ſpoke with Pharaoh, Moſes foretold him the 10th plague which ſhould come upon him, namely, the deſtruction of all the firſt-born, which came to paſs the night following, and then turned him about in great anger, departed from him, Exod. x. ver. 25. to 29. and chap. xi. 1, 4. 8. At the evening of this day, was the paſſover celebrated, Exod. xii. to ver. 28.

Ver. 20. And Moſes and Aaron did ſo, as the Lord commanded: and he lift up the rod, and ſmote the waters that were in the river, in the ſight of Pharaoh, and in the ſight of his ſervants: and all the waters that were in the river were turned to blood] This plague was the more remarkable, becauſe, as Theodoret here obſerves, the Egyptians having drowned the Hebrew children in this river, God now puniſhes them for their barbarity, by giving them bloody water to drink; and the plague might likewiſe be rendred more dreadful to them, becauſe it fell on the river Nile, to which the Egyptians aſcribed divinity, and paid adorations to it, as to a god, on account of its fertile inundations.

The Hebrew doctors add another reaſon for this particular puniſhment, becauſe the Egyptians had compelled them to diſcontinue their uſual baptiſms, that is, they would not permit them to purify themſelves by bathing in that river.

Ver.

Ver. 21. And the fiſh that was in the river, died, &c.] Diodorus Siculus, in his Deſcription of Egypt, (lib. 1. p. 32.) informs us, that the river Nile abounded with all manner of fiſh; tho' later travellers declare, that there are not many in it at preſent, whether this ſcarcity may be aſcribed to the vaſt quantity of ſoil intermixed with the water, or to the rapaciouſneſs of the crocodiles, is not determined by them. But whether ancient or modern accounts are true in this particular, 'tis very certain, that the ſudden putrifaction of the water, and the deſtruction of the fiſh, was a moſt ſevere judgment upon the Egyptians, who abſtained from eating the fleſh of moſt land animals, and whoſe uſual food was the fruits of the earth, and the fiſh of this river; their drink alſo was water, for the generality: And therefore they muſt have been reduced to extreme calamities, by this tremendous inſtance of the wrath of heaven.

Ver. 23. And Pharaoh turned and went into his houſe, neither did he ſet his heart to this alſo.] He did not ſeriouſly conſider what had been accompliſhed by Moſes, nor examine the difference between the powers exerted by him and the magicians, who imitated this miracle, but whether upon ſea water, brought thither for that purpoſe, as ſome have ſuppoſed, or on freſh water, brought from the land of Goſhen, which, in all probability, was not comprehended within the extent of this calamity; or, laſtly, on ſome of that water which they had drawn out of the wells they ſunk on the edges of the Nile on this melancholy occaſion, is not eaſy to determine, tho' it is more probable that they waited till the river, and its artificial canals, were reſtored to their former complexion and taſte.

Ver. 24. And all the Egyptians digged round about the river for water to drink.] The inhabitants were compelled to procure water, by this laborious expedient; but we are not told in what manner they ſucceeded. It is probable, indeed, that they obtained clear water by percolation through the pores of the earth; for Moſes only ſmote the pits that had been already made, at the time when Aaron ſtretched out his rod, and, conſequently, it might have no effect upon thoſe which were afterwards dug. Why they did not fetch water from Goſhen, is not eaſy to determine, unleſs we may ſuppoſe that their pride would ſuffer them to apply for relief to the ſettlements of the Iſraelites.

Ver. 25. And ſeven days were fulfilled, after that the Lord had ſmitten the river.] The rod of Moſes could not effect any miraculous transformation, without the energy of the Almighty power of God, by whom this change was accompliſhed. This firſt plague continued for the ſpace of ſeven days, by which means the Egyptians were ſufficiently convinced of its reality. Whether Pharaoh, at laſt, intreated to have it removed, is not mentioned by the ſacred hiſtorian; but he, poſſibly, was ſo obſtinate, that he would not condeſcend to ſupplicate for ſuch a favour, and this might be the reaſon of the long continuance of the calamity; which God at laſt diſcontinued, in order to inflict another; or, as ſome think, it continued, together with that of the frogs, and both were removed upon his petition to Moſes.

CHAP. VIII.

1 Frogs are ſent. 8 Pharaoh ſueth to Moſes, 12 and Moſes by prayer removeth them away. 16 The duſt is turned into lice, which the magicians could not do. 20 The ſwarms of flies. 25 Pharaoh inclineth to let the people go, 32 but yet is hardned.

AND the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, Go unto Pharaoh, and ſay unto him, Thus ſaith the LORD, Let my people go, that they may ſerve me.

2 And if thou refuſe to let them go, behold, I will ſmite all thy borders with frogs.

3 And the river ſhall bring forth frogs abundantly, which ſhall go up and come into thine houſe, and into thy bed-chamber, and upon thy bed, and into the houſe of thy ſervants, and upon thy people, and into thine ovens, and into thy kneading-troughs.

4 And the frogs ſhall come up both on thee, and upon thy people, and upon all thy ſervants.

5 ¶ And the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, Say unto Aaron, Stretch forth thine hand with thy rod over the ſtreams, over the rivers, and over the ponds, and cauſe frogs to come up upon the land of Egypt.

6 And Aaron ſtretched out his hand over the waters of Egypt; and the frogs came up, and covered the land of Egypt.

7 And the magicians did ſo with their inchantments, and brought up frogs upon the land of Egypt.

8 ¶ Then Pharaoh called for Moſes and Aaron, and ſaid, Intreat the LORD, that he may take away the frogs from me, and from my people: and I will let the people go, that they may do ſacrifice unto the LORD.

9 And Moſes ſaid unto Pharaoh, Glory over me: when ſhall I intreat for thee, and for thy ſervants, and for thy people, to deſtroy the frogs from thee, and thy houſes, that they may remain in the river only?

10 And he ſaid, To-morrow. And he ſaid, Be it according to thy word: that thou mayeſt know, that there is none like unto the LORD our God.

11 And the frogs ſhall depart from thee, and from thy houſes, and from thy ſervants, and from thy people; they ſhall remain in the river only.

12 And Moſes and Aaron went out from Pharaoh: and Moſes cried unto the LORD, becauſe of the frogs which he had brought againſt Pharaoh.

13 And the LORD did according to the word of Moſes: and the frogs died out of the houſes, out of the villages, and out of the fields.

14 And they gathered them together upon heaps: and the land ſtank.

15 But when Pharaoh ſaw that there was reſpite, he hardned his heart, and hearkned not unto them; as the LORD had ſaid.

16 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Say unto Aaron, Stretch out thy rod, and ſmite the duſt of the land, that it may become lice throughout all the land of Egypt.

17 And they did ſo; for Aaron ſtretched out his hand with his rod, and ſmote the duſt of the earth, and it became lice, in man and in beaſt: all the duſt of the land became lice throughout all the land of Egypt.

18 And the magicians did ſo with their inchantments to bring forth lice, but they could not: ſo there were lice upon man, and upon beaſt.

19 Then the magicians ſaid unto Pharaoh, This is the finger of God: and Pharaohs heart was hardned, and he hearkned not unto them; as the LORD had ſaid.

20 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Riſe up early in the morning, and ſtand before Pharaoh, (lo, he cometh forth to the water) and ſay unto him, Thus ſaith the LORD, Let my people go, that they may ſerve me.

21 Elſe if thou wilt not let my people go, behold, I will ſend ſwarms of flies upon thee, and upon thy ſervants, and upon thy people, and into thy houſes: and the houſes of the Egyptians ſhall be full of ſwarms of flies, and alſo the ground whereon they are.

22 And I will ſever in that day the land of Goſhen, in which my people dwell, that no ſwarms of flies ſhall be there; to the end thou mayeſt know, that I am the LORD in the midſt of the earth.

23 And I will put a diviſion between my people, and thy people: to-morrow ſhall this ſign be.

24 And the LORD did ſo: and there came a grievous ſwarm of flies into the houſe of Pharaoh, and into his ſervants houſes, and into all the land of Egypt: the land was corrupted by reaſon of the ſwarm of flies.

25 ¶ And Pharaoh called for Moſes, and for Aaron, and ſaid, Go ye, ſacrifice to your God in the land.

26 And Moſes ſaid, It is not meet ſo to do; for we ſhall ſacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians to the LORD our God: Lo, ſhall we ſacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes, and will they not ſtone us?

27 We will go three days journey into the wilderneſs, and ſacrifice to the LORD our God, as he ſhall command us.

28 And Pharaoh ſaid, I will let you go, that ye may ſacrifice to the LORD your God in the wilderneſs; only you ſhall not go very far away: intreat for me.

29 And Moſes ſaid, Behold, I go out from thee, and I will intreat the LORD, that the ſwarms of flies may depart from Pharaoh, from his ſervants, and from his people, to-morrow: but let not Pharaoh deal deceitfully any more, in not letting the people go to ſacrifice to the LORD.

30 And Moſes went out from Pharaoh, and intreated the LORD.

31 And the LORD did according to the word of Moſes; and he removed the ſwarms of flies from Pharaoh, from his ſervants, and from his people: there remained not one.

32 And Pharaoh hardned his heart at this time alſo, neither would he let the people go.

Ver. 1. And the Lord ſpake unto Moſes, &c.] Moſes, we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, attended upon the Divine majeſty, every day, to be informed of his ſacred pleaſure; and God now commanded him to addreſs himſelf again to Pharaoh, and threaten him with a new judgment, which, upon Pharaoh's diſregard of that menace, was accordingly inflicted. It was, however, firſt threatened, that the king of Egypt might be rendered ſenſible that it was not any accidental calamity, but was brought on by the preordination of God.

Ver. 6. And Aaron ſtretched out his hand over the waters of Egypt; and the frogs came up and covered the land of Egypt.] The river Nile naturally produces frogs; but ſuch an innumerable multitude of them appearing in this ſudden manner, covering the face of all the country, and then leaving the rivers and fields, to advance into cities and houſes, was really miraculous. Pharaoh had little cauſe to boaſt, in the uſual language of the Egyptian kings, My river is my own, and I have made it for myſelf.

Ver. 7. And the magicians did ſo with their inchantments, and brought up frogs upon the land of Egypt.] The magicians continued to perſuade Pharaoh that Moſes was only ſuch a worker of wonders as themſelves; and, in order to evince the truth of what they declared, they imitated this prodigy, in the production of a new ſwarm of frogs; but they would have employed their skill more to the ſervice of the public and their ſovereign, had they cleared the country of thoſe odious animals. But this was above their abilities to accompliſh, and Pharaoh was at laſt reduced to the neceſſity of ſending for Moſes, and promiſing to diſmiſs the children of Iſrael, if he would deliver the land from that ſecond plague which infeſted it.

Ver. 9. And Moſes ſaid, Glory over me.] The learned Bochart paraphraſes this paſſage in the following manner: "'Tho' it belongs not to thee to determine the time of "thy deliverance, which depends entirely upon the will "and pleaſure of God; yet I, who am his miniſter, per"mit thee to take ſo much upon thee, as to preſcribe "what time thou pleaſeſt for the removal of this plague." For thus he thinks the words of Moſes ought to be tranſlated; Glory over me, by telling me, when I ſhall intercede for thee. But we rather think the true meaning to be this, Glory over me; or, in other words, render me that piece of juſtice, as to aſcribe the removal of the frogs to my interceſſion, on thy behalf, with the God of Iſrael, who inflicts this plague upon thy kingdom; and don't impute the ceſſation of it to the power of any of thy magicians, who have too long deceived thee with their boaſted abilities to perform what thou now beholdeſt them incapable of accompliſhing. We may add, too, that Moſes was ſenſible, that Pharaoh was much prepoſſeſſed in favour of his aſtrologers, who fancied, that all ſublunary affairs were governed by the motion and influence of the ſtars; and therefore, would have him name the particular time when he would have the plague removed, that he might be ſatisfied there was no day, nor hour, under ſuch an ill aſpect, but he could prevail with God, at any moment Pharaoh himſelf ſhould fix upon, to deliver him from the calamity he then complained of.

Ver. 14. And they gathered them together upon heaps.] God could have reduced them into duſt, or ſwept them into the river from whence they came, had he ſo pleaſed; but he would have them lie dead in the full view of all the Egyp-

Egyptians, as an inconteſtable monument that they were real frogs, and no illuſion of their ſight.

Pharaoh, noting this freſh inſtance of the Divine goodneſs and condeſcenſion to him, relapſed into his former inflexibility, and refuſed to diſmiſs the children of Iſrael.

Ver. 16. And the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, ſay unto Aaron, Stretch out thy rod, and ſmite the duſt of the land, that it may become lice throughout all the land of Egypt.] God ſeems not to have given Pharaoh any previous notice of this third plague, but to have inflicted it, immediately, upon the removal of the frogs; for the violation of his promiſe was ſuch an aggravated provocation, that he deſerved no future premonition.

Some expoſitors declare, that the Hebrew word cinim, in this verſe, ſignifies gnats, or ſome ſuch kind of creature; and thus many of the ancients underſtood it. Artaphanes, in particular, calls it ζῶον τι πτιλῶτον, a flying kind of animal. Others would have them to be a new ſpecies called analogically by an old name. But ſuppoſing them to have no worſe than their name in this verſe imports, they were a ſufficient plague to the Egyptians, who affected delicacy and neatneſs in a peculiar manner. Thoſe who think they were a new ſpecies of animals, make that to be the reaſon why the magicians could not counterfeit this miracle; for tho' they could eaſily exhibit the appearance of ſerpents, ſanguine waters, and frogs, becauſe the organs of ſight are more eaſily deluded than the ſenſe of feeling, but they were incapable of tormenting human bodies with viſionary vermin; ſo that it was now time for them to deſiſt, and acknowledge their inability to mimic Moſes any longer. But we have no occaſion to recur to this expedient; and the true reaſon of their impotency in the production of theſe animals ſeems to be no more than this, God would no longer grant ſucceſs to their endeavours, in the inſtance before us, that the obſtinacy of Pharaoh might be the more inexcuſable, in detaining the children of Iſrael, after ſuch a memorable manifeſtation of the Divine Power, which declared in favour of the Iſraelites, and was inimitable by the greateſt magicians in Egypt.

Ver. 19. And the magicians ſaid unto Pharaoh, This is the finger of God; and Pharaoh's heart was hardened, and he hearkned not unto them; as the Lord had ſaid.] Bochart and others are of opinion, that the magicians did not, by theſe words, This is the finger of God, give glory to the Deity; but only endeavoured to ſecure their own reputation, by telling the king that they were not ſurpaſſed by Moſes and Aaron, but by a Divine Power which was ſuperior to them all. But they ought then to have been ſenſible, that the power to which they themſelves had recourſe, was far from being ſupreme; and God undoubtedly intended to confound them, by diſabling them at a time when they leaſt expected it: For why ſhould not their power extend to ſuch an operation as this, after they had performed greater, if God had not determined, that their illuſions ſhould no longer furniſh Pharaoh with an excuſe.

This plague being rather loathſome, than terrible to Pharaoh, might poſſibly be the reaſon, of his not intreating Moſes and Aaron to pray for him; as he had done when he ſaw the frogs; and as he likewiſe did when he ſuffer'd by the next plague of the flies.

Ver. 21. Behold I will ſend ſwarms of flies upon thee, &c.] The Hebrew word Arob is generally ſuppoſed to be derived from a word which ſignifies to mingle, expoſitors, therefore, have commonly thought, that it denotes a mixture of ſeveral ſpecies of creatures, and ſome ſuppoſe it to ſignify all manner of flies, which Aquila calls γαμμᾶαν, all kinds of inſects. Others conceive it to be, as it is in the margin of our Bible, a mixture of noiſome beaſts, and that God ſent lions, wolves, bears, leopards, &c. which deſtroyed, not only the cattle in the field, but the children of the Egyptians, in their houſes. Joſephus thus expounds it, θηρία παντοῖα καὶ πολύτροπα, various beaſts of all kinds; but the learned Bochart hath confuted this opinion with great judgment in his Hierozoicon, p. 2. l. 4. c. 15 where he proves that the Hebrew word Arob ſignifies, not only to mingle, but likewiſe to obſcure and darken, from whence the evening is called Ereb, in the Hebrew language. And therefore he, with great reaſon, approves of the Septuagint verſion, which tranſlates it κυνόμυια, a dog fly, as greatly infeſting thoſe animals. The congruity of this plague ſeems to be the greater, becauſe one of the Egyptian deities, which they called Anubis, was repreſented with the head of a dog.

Ver. 22. And I will ſever in that day the land of Goſhen, in which my people dwell, that no ſwarm of flies ſhall be there; to the end thou mayſt know, that I am the Lord in the midſt of the earth.] The diſtinguiſhing mercy of God to the Iſraelites is amiably expreſſed in this paſſage; and it likewiſe includes the preceding plagues. The Hebrew expreſſion, as well as the Chaldee, ſignifies, I will make a wondrous difference; and Jonathan paraphraſes it, I will work a miracle in the land of Goſhen: And indeed it was very aſtoniſhing, that countries ſo near to each other ſhould be in ſuch a different condition at the ſame time; and it was the more extraordinary becauſe there was ſuch a vaſt quantity of cattle in Goſhen.

No mention is made of Aaron ſtretching out his rod as at other times; and this plague was accompliſhed immediately by God himſelf, that the Egyptians might not imagine there was any ſecret virtue in the rod, but aſcribe all to the divine power.

Ver. 25. And Pharaoh called for Moſes and for Aaron, and ſaid, Go ye, ſacrifice to your God in the land.] He had conſented to let them ſacrifice when he laſt ſent for them, ver. 8. but he did not ſpecify any place, and ſoon repented of the conceſſion. But now he determines it in the land of Goſhen, but this, Moſes tells him, was not fit for them to accept.

Ver. 26. And Moſes ſaid, It is not meet ſo to do; for we ſhall ſacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians to the Lord our God, &c.] Some learned expoſitors interpret this paſſage thus; we muſt ſacrifice to our God, oxen, ſheep, and goats, which the Egyptians adore, and that would give them the higheſt provocation; but it may very juſtly be objected to this gloſs, that the Egyptians themſelves offer'd all thoſe creatures to their gods. For Herodotus relates in his Euterpe, chap. xli. the particular manner in which they ſacrificed an ox, in his time; and tho' ſome of the inhabitants abſtained from ſheep, yet they ſacrificed goats; as on the contrary, others ſpared goats and made immolations of ſheep. It may therefore be a queſtion, whether the words, in this paſſage, do not relate only to the ceremonial of ſacrificing, and to the qualities and condition of the animals that were to be offer'd, about which the Egyptians, in after ages eſpecially, were very curious. For the great hiſtorian above-mentioned, acquaint us in the ſame book, chap. xxxviii. in what manner the ſacrifices were examined by the prieſts, and that none were allowed to be offer'd but thoſe which had his mark upon them. And, to this effect, Plutarch in his treatiſe de Iſid. & Oſir. declares, that the Egyptians, believing Typho to have been red, ſacrificed only ſuch oxen as were of that colour, and made an exact ſcrutiny ὥστε κἂν μίαν ἔχῃ τρίχα μέλαιναν ἢ λευκὴν ἀθύτευτον ἡγεῖσθαι, that if a beaſt were found to have one hair black, or white, it was judged unfit for ſacrifice. Herodotus, indeed affirms, that the Egyptians would not ſacrifice cows, becauſe they were ſacred to Iſis; from whence it is evident that the Egyptians, in his time, were very ſuperſtitious about ſuch creatures; ſo that none durſt offer them the leaſt violence. But, as we have no evidence, that they were infeſted with any ſuch opinions, in the days of Moſes, ſo their ſacrificing ſuch creatures as the Jews offer'd up, long after his time, and which were the general oblation of mankind from the moſt early ages, ſeems contradictory to that conſtruction of the words which is commonly received. But there were ſo many modes of ſacrificing in the world, that it is very probable the Egyptians greatly differed from the Iſraelites, who might likewiſe offer ſuch creatures as the Egyptians thought unclean, and this might provoke them at the imagined prophaneſs of that people.

Maimonides fancied the Egyptians worſhipped the conſtellation called Aries, or the ram, and that this was the occaſion of the declaration made by Moſes in the verſe before us; but we cannot ſee any ground for ſuch a ſuppoſition.

Ver. 27. We will go three days journey into the wilderneſs, &c.] God had directed to this effect, and it was not lawful for the Iſraelites to ſacrifice in any place but where he had appointed. Philo gives this reaſon why they were to repair to ſome ſolitary place, to receive the divine commands, with relation to ſacrifices, and all other circumſtances of God's worſhip; becauſe the Deity intended to give them a law different from thoſe of all other nations, or rather entirely oppoſite to them; and in which there were ſo many ſingular ceremonials, that they would have offended other people, and have ſeem'd to them very prophane, if they had exerciſed their rites among them. And thus Tacitus underſtood the deſign of Moſes, which was not to accommodate the worſhip of the Iſraelites to that of the Gentiles, as ſome in this age are pleaſed to imagine, but to keep them at the greateſt diſtance from all nations, but oppoſite rites. The words of Tacitus are very remarkable. Moſes, quo ſibi in poſterum gentem firmaret, novos ritus, contrarioſque cæteris mortalibus indidit, profana illis omnia, quæ apud nos ſacra: Rurſum conceſſa apud illos, quæ nobis inceſta. Moſes, in order to eſtabliſh a nation to himſelf for the future, inſtituted ſuch rites as were new and contrary to thoſe of the reſt of mankind. Thoſe ceremonials which are reputed ſacred by us, were counted prophane by them, and they were indulged in thoſe things which we eſteem unlawful.

to

Ver. 29. And Moſes ſaid, Behold, I go out from thee, and I will intreat the Lord that the ſwarm of flies may depart, &c.] Pharaoh was not more inclinable to deſire, than God and his ſervant Moſes were ready to grant the total ceſſation of the plague, which was inflicted for his reformation, and not for his deſtruction, if he would have duly attended to it.

Ver. 31. And the Lord did according to the word of Moſes; and he removed the ſwarms of flies from Pharaoh, from his ſervants, and from his people: There remained not one.] This was a greater miracle than the laſt, for the frogs remained in heaps, but the flies were all ſwept away, perhaps by a mighty wind, either into the ſea, or the Lybian deſerts.

Ver. 32. And Pharaoh hardened his heart, at this time alſo, neither would he let the people go.] This obduracy is expreſly repreſented as an act of Pharaoh himſelf, as it undoubtedly was in all his former refuſals to diſmiſs the Iſraelites from ſervitude.

CHAP. IX.

1 The murrain of beaſts. 8 The plague of boyls, and blains. 13 The meſſage about the hail. 22 The plague of hail. 27 Pharaoh ſueth to Moſes, 35 but yet is hardned.

THEN the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Go in unto Pharaoh, and tell him, Thus ſaith the LORD God of the Hebrews, Let my people go, that they may ſerve me.

2 For if thou refuſe to let them go, and wilt hold them ſtill.

3 Behold, the hand of the LORD is upon thy cattel which is in the field, upon the horſes, upon the aſſes, upon the camels, upon the oxen, and upon the ſheep: there ſhall be a very grievous murrain.

4 And the LORD ſhall ſever between the cattel of Iſrael, and the cattel of Egypt: and there ſhall nothing die of all that is the childrens of Iſrael.

5 And the LORD appointed a ſet time, ſaying, To morrow the LORD ſhall do this thing in the land.

6 And the LORD did that thing on the morrow, and all the cattel of Egypt died: but of the cattel of the children of Iſrael died not one.

7 And Pharaoh ſent, and behold, there was not one of the cattel of the Iſraelites dead. And the heart of Pharaoh was hardned, and he did not let the people go.

8 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, and unto Aaron, Take to you handfuls of aſhes of the furnace, and let Moſes ſprinkle it towards the heaven in the ſight of Pharaoh.

9 And it ſhall become ſmall duſt in all the land of Egypt, and ſhall be a boyl breaking forth with blains, upon man, and upon beaſt, throughout all the land of Egypt.

10 And they took aſhes of the furnace, and ſtood before Pharaoh, and Moſes ſprinkled it up toward heaven: and it became a boyl breaking forth with blains, upon man, and upon beaſt.

11 And the magicians could not ſtand before Moſes, becauſe of the boyl: for the boyl was upon the magicians, and upon all the Egyptians.

12 And the LORD hardned the heart of Pharaoh, and he hearkned not unto them; as the LORD had ſpoken unto Moſes.

13 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Riſe up early in the morning, and ſtand before Pharaoh, and ſay unto him, Thus ſaith the LORD God of the Hebrews, Let my people go, that they may ſerve me.

14 For I will at this time ſend all my plagues upon thine heart, and upon thy ſervants, and upon thy people: that thou mayeſt know that there is none like me in all the earth.

15 For now I will ſtretch out my hand, that I may ſmite thee and thy people with peſtilence; and thou ſhalt be cut off from the earth.

16 And in very deed for this cauſe have I raiſed thee up, for to ſhew in thee my power; and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth.

17 As yet exalteſt thou thyſelf againſt my people, that thou wilt not let them go?

18 Behold, to morrow about this time, I will cauſe it to rain a very grievous hail, ſuch as hath not been in Egypt, ſince the foundation thereof, even until now.

19 Send therefore now, and gather thy cattel, and all that thou haſt in the field: for upon every man and beaſt which ſhall be found in the field, and ſhall not be brought home, the hail ſhall come down upon them, and they ſhall die.

20 He that feared the word of the LORD amongſt the ſervants of Pharaoh, made his ſervants and his cattel flee into the houſes.

21 And

21 And he that regarded not the word of the LORD, left his ſervants and his cattel in the field.

22 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Stretch forth thine hand toward heaven, that there may be hail in all the land of Egypt; upon man, and upon beaſt, and upon every herb of the field, throughout the land of Egypt.

23 And Moſes ſtretched forth his rod toward heaven, and the LORD ſent thunder and hail, and the fire ran along upon the ground; and the LORD rained hail upon the land of Egypt.

24 So there was hail, and fire mingled with the hail, very grievous, ſuch as there was none like it in all the land of Egypt, ſince it became a nation.

25 And the hail ſmote throughout all the land of Egypt, all that was in the field, both man and beaſt: and the hail ſmote every herb of the field, and brake every tree of the field.

26 Only in the land of Goſhen, where the children of Iſrael were, was there no hail.

27 ¶ And Pharaoh ſent, and called for Moſes and Aaron, and ſaid unto them, I have ſinned this time: the LORD is righteous, and I and my people are wicked.

28 Intreat the LORD (for it is enough) that there be no more mighty thundrings and hail; and I will let you go, and ye ſhall ſtay no longer.

29 And Moſes ſaid unto him, Aſſoon as I am gone out of the city, I will ſpread abroad my hands unto the LORD: and the thunder ſhall ceaſe, neither ſhall there be any more hail; that thou mayeſt know, how that the earth is the LORDS.

30 But as for thee and thy ſervants, I know that ye will not fear the LORD God.

31 And the flax, and the barley was ſmitten: for the barley was in the ear, and the flax was bolled.

32 But the wheat and the rye were not ſmitten: for they were not grown up.

33 And Moſes went out of the city from Pharaoh, and ſpread abroad his hands unto the LORD: and the thunders and hail ceaſed, and the rain was not poured upon the earth.

34 And when Pharaoh ſaw, that the rain, and the hail, and the thunders were ceaſed, he ſinned yet more, and hardned his heart, he and his ſervants.

35 And the heart of Pharaoh was hardned, neither would he let the children of Iſrael go; as the LORD had ſpoken by Moſes.

Ver. 3. Behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thy cattle which is in the field, upon the horſes, upon the aſſes, upon the camels, upon the oxen, and upon the ſheep: There ſhall be a grievous murrain.] God now threatens the infliction of a great plague or peſtilence upon the cattle of Egypt, and which ſhould be deſtructive to a vaſt number of them; for the Hebrew word caved, which we tranſlate grievous, properly ſignifies numerous, ; ſee chap. viii. 24. But the greater the number was that died, the more grievous, no doubt, was the calamity: God intended to deal more ſeverely than formerly with Pharaoh, becauſe he had been guilty of a fraudulent contempt of his former ſolemn monition, chap. viii. 29.

Ver. 4. And the Lord ſhall ſever between the cattle of Iſrael and the cattle of Egypt, &c.] See chap. viii. 22. This was the greater wonder (as the word imports); becauſe the Iſraelites and Egyptians were mingled together in the land of Goſhen: And their cattle breathed the ſame air, and drank of the ſame water, &c. By which it appeared, that this peſtilence was not natural, but inflicted by the immediate hand of God.

Ver. 6. And all the cattle of Egypt died.] That ſome ſurvived, is plain from ver. 19. therefore the meaning is, either all that were in the field, (ver. 3.) not thoſe in the cities or houſes; or rather, a great many of all ſorts of cattle, as Druſius expounds it, omne genus, all kinds: as the word all muſt be expounded, ver. 26.

Ver. 8, 9. And the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, and unto Aaron, Take to you handfuls of aſhes of the furnace, and let Moſes ſprinkle it towards the heaven in the ſight of Pharaoh. And it ſhall become ſmall duſt in all the land of Egypt, and ſhall be a boil breaking forth with blains, upon man, and upon beaſt, throughout all the land of Egypt.] The Hebrew word ſhechin properly ſignifies an inflammation, which firſt occaſions a tumor or boil (as we tranſlate it) and then turns into a grievous ulcer. Dr Lightfoot indeed obſerves, that, in the book of Job, chap. ii. 7, 8. where the ſame word occurs, it ſignifies only a burning itch, or an inflamed ſcab; an intolerable dry itch, which Job could not ſcratch off with his nails, and was therefore forced to make uſe of a potſherd: but then he confeſſes, that this ſhechin, here ſpoken of, was more rancorous than that, having blains and ulcers that broke out with it, which Job's had not; ſo that the Egyptians, according to this, muſt have ſuffered a treble puniſhment, fitly calculated for the mortification of a delicate and voluptuous people, viz. aching boils, nauſeous ulcers, and a burning itch: And to this, that commination of Moſes to the people, in caſe they proved diſobedient, does undoubtedly allude; The Lord will ſmite thee with the botch of Egypt, and with the emrods, and with the ſcab, and with the itch, whereof thou canſt not be healed, Deut. xxxviii. 27.

Ver. 11. And the magicians could not ſtand before Moſes, becauſe of the boils, &c.] This plague ſeized on them, as well as on the reſt of the Egyptians, and likewiſe in the preſence of Pharaoh (as theſe words ſeem to import); which perfectly confounded them. For tho', ſince the plague of lice, which they could not counterfeit, we read of no attempt they ventured to make, to vie with Moſes and Aaron, in miraculous operations, yet they ſtill continued about Pharaoh, and endeavoured to confirm him in his reſolution, not to let Iſrael go; perſuading him, perhaps, that tho' Moſes, for the preſent, had found out ſome ſecret beyond their skill, they ſhould at laſt be too hard for him. But now, being on a ſudden ſmote with theſe ulcers, they were ſo amazed, that we do not find they appeared again to look Moſes in the face. For as the Apoſtle ſpeaks, their folly was manifeſted to all men, 1 Tim. iii. 8, 9. in that they could not defend themſelves from this terrible ſtroke; which publickly ſeizing on them before Moſes, in the ſight of Pharaoh and all his ſervants, render'd them ſo contemptible, that we never hear more of them.

Ver. 12. And the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh, &c.] If we ſuppoſe that the magicians, who had hitherto confirmed Pharaoh in his obſtinacy, were forced to withdraw in great confuſion, when they were ſmitten with the boils, one would have thought, the next thing we ſhould have heard, would have been, that Pharaoh relented. But here is not the leaſt token of that mentioned in this hiſtory, but rather the expreſs contrary; that God was ſo angry with him, that he himſelf hardened his heart, which he had never done before. This hardening therefore, which is ſaid to be the act of God, was ſomething ſure very extraordinary. Yet it was not an infuſion of any bad qualities, or ungodly reſolutions into Pharaoh's heart, but only that God did not vouchſafe him thoſe convictions that might have ſoftened him, and gave him up to his own inordinate impreſſions; and likewiſe ordered things ſo to fall out, that he ſhould thereafter be render'd more obdurate by them. For he had hardened himſelf againſt five plagues; therefore God leaves him to himſelf, and reſolves he ſhall continue in his inſenſibility. Accordingly, he doth not ſo much as deſire to be freed from this plague, no more than he had done in the laſt, which was nothing ſo grievous. The effect of ſuch induration is well expreſſed by Dav. Chytræus, in theſe words, Cor induratum eſt, quod nec compunctione ſcinditur, &c. An hardened heart is neither cut by compunction, nor ſoften'd by any ſenſe of piety. It is neither moved by prayers and intreaties, nor yields to threatnings, nor feels the ſmart of ſcourges: It is ungrateful for benefits, treacherous to counſels, ſullen to judgments, ſhameleſs to things moſt baſe, fearleſs of dangers, forgetful of things paſt, negligent of things preſent, improvident for the future: in ſhort, it neither fears God, nor reverences man.

Ver. 18. Behold, to-morrow about this time I will cauſe it to rain a very grievous hail, ſuch as has not been in Egypt, ſince the foundation thereof, even until now.] Moſes now threatens Pharaoh with the infliction of a more dreadful plague, in which the voice of the God of Iſrael ſhould be heard in thunder, and his vengeance felt in ſuch dreadful ſtorms of hail, as had not been known ſince the foundation of Egypt. He adviſed him, likewiſe, not to exalt himſelf againſt the Iſraelites, ſeeing their God had hitherto preſerved him from ruin, only to convince him of his allmighty power, by all theſe ſigns and wonders, and to perſuade him to confeſs and adore him, and prevent thereby the future effects of his wrath; for, added he, if all theſe judgments will not humble thee, know that God has a great many in ſtore againſt thee, which ſhall compell thee at laſt to ſubmit, tho' never ſo much againſt thy will.

He who alone did ſee thee on the throne, might indeed have cut thee off at the very moment of thy refuſal, but ſince he hath ſpar'd thee hitherto, remember it is either to force thee to glorify him by thy ſubmiſſion, or to be glorified, in this and future ages, by the puniſhment which thy pride and obſtinacy extort from him, after ſo many gracious invitations and miraculous admonitions. Moſes gave him but that one day to conſider of this menace, aſſuring him that the next would prove a diſmal one to the Egyptians, unleſs he reſolved to diſmiſs the Iſraelites, before that time; between whom and the Egyptians, God would effect ſuch a difference, that the land of Goſhen ſhould be entirely free from the terrible puniſhment with which Egypt would be half undone. However, finding the king ſtill too hardened and incredulous to prevent this new judgment, he forewarn'd him and his court to ſend for ſuch cattle as they had left out in the fields, ſince all that were not under ſome ſtrong ſhelter, would certainly be killed by the hail. Moſes was no ſooner gone from him, but thoſe who gave credit to his words, ſent to have their ſervants and cattle ſafely lodged, whilſt the reſt, lightly regarding it, left them to periſh in the field. For no ſooner had Moſes lifted up his rod towards heaven, the next morning, but the thunders, lightnings and hail followed one another ſo thick, that Egypt was half deſtroyed by them. The hail that then fell was of ſuch prodigious bigneſs, that it killed man and beaſt, ſhatter'd all the trees, and deſtroyed all the barley and flax it chanced to fall upon. The wheat only and the rye eſcaped, becauſe they were not ſufficiently grown, for the barley harveſt, in Egypt, begins about the middle or latter end of March, whereas that of the wheat and rye doth not begin till ſix or ſeven weeks after. As for the land of Goſhen, it was found, upon enquiry, to have been as free from this, as it had been from all the former plagues.

Theſe thunders and lightnings, but eſpecially the hail, which was the more extraordinary, becauſe it ſeldom or never falls in that part of Egypt, ſo terrified the proud king, that he immediately ſent for Moſes and Aaron, and expreſs'd himſelf in ſuch terms to them, as might have paſs'd for certain indications of a real converſion: He own'd himſelf an obſtinate ſinner, juſtly puniſh'd for his diſobedience, and begg'd that they would but deliver him from the noiſe of thoſe dreadful thunders, after which he promis'd not to detain them one moment longer. Moſes was too well acquainted with him by this time, to depend upon this promiſe, which he knew was only extorted from him by his preſent conſternation and made no ſcruple to tell him ſo. However he promiſed him to obtain a ſpeedy ceſſation of theſe inſtances of the wrath of heaven; which he accordingly did, and gave the Egyptians an opportunity to examine into the deſolations which had been occaſion'd by the hail, and theſe they found to be much greater than they had imagin'd. This diſmal ſpectacle inſpired many of the Egyptians with a real and reverential fear of the God of Iſrael; but this was not the care of Pharaoh and his council, who no ſooner perceiv'd that the ſtorm had entirely ceaſed, but they returned to their former inflexibility, with relation to the Iſraelites.

Chap. X.

1 God threatneth to ſend locuſts. 7 Pharaoh moved by his ſervants, inclineth to let the Iſraelites go. 12 The plague of the locuſts. 16 Pharaoh ſueth to Moſes. 21 The plague of darkneſs. 24 Pharaoh ſueth unto Moſes, 27 but yet is hardned.

AND the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, Go in unto Pharaoh: for I have hardned his heart, and the heart of his ſervants; that I might ſhew theſe my ſigns before him:

2 And that thou mayeſt tell in the ears of thy ſon, and of thy ſons ſon, what things I have wrought in Egypt, and my ſigns which I have done amongſt them; that ye may know how that I am the Lord.

3 And Moſes and Aaron came in unto Pharaoh, and ſaid unto him, Thus ſaith the Lord God of the Hebrews, How long wilt thou refuſe to humble thy ſelf before me? Let my people go, that they may ſerve me.

4 Elſe if thou refuſe to let my people go, behold to morrow will I bring the locuſts into thy coaſt.

5 And they ſhall cover the face of the earth, that one cannot be able to ſee the earth: and they ſhall eat the reſidue of that which is eſcaped, which remaineth unto you from the hail, and ſhall eat every tree which groweth for you out of the field.

6 And they ſhall fill thy houſes, and the houſes of all thy ſervants, and the houſes of all the Egyptians; which neither thy fathers, nor thy fathers fathers have ſeen, ſince the day that they were upon the earth, unto this day. And he turned himſelf and went out from Pharaoh.

7 And Pharaohs ſervants ſaid unto him, How long ſhall this man be a ſnare unto us? Let the men go, that they may ſerve the Lord their God: Knoweſt thou not yet, that Egypt is deſtroyed?

8 And

8 And Moſes and Aaron were brought again unto Pharaoh: and he ſaid unto them, Go, ſerve the LORD your God: but who are they that ſhall go?

9 And Moſes ſaid, We will go with our young, and with our old, with our ſons, and with our daughters, with our flocks, and with our herds will we go: for we muſt hold a feaſt unto the LORD.

10 And he ſaid unto them, Let the LORD be ſo with you, as I will let you go, and your little ones: look to it, for evil is before you.

11 Not ſo: go now ye that are men, and ſerve the LORD, for that you did deſire. And they were driven out from Pharaohs preſence.

12 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Stretch out thine hand over the land of Egypt for the locuſts, that they may come up upon the land of Egypt, and eat every herb of the land, even all that the hail hath left.

13 And Moſes ſtretched forth his rod over the land of Egypt, and the LORD brought an eaſt-wind upon the land all that day, and all that night: and when it was morning, the eaſt-wind brought the locuſts.

14 And the locuſts went up over all the land of Egypt, and reſted in all the coaſts of Egypt: very grievous were they; before them there were no ſuch locuſts as they, neither after them ſhall be ſuch.

15 For they covered the face of the whole earth, ſo that the land was darkned, and they did eat every herb of the land, and all the fruit of the trees, which the hail had left: and there remained not any green thing in the trees, or in the herbs of the field, through all the land of Egypt.

16 ¶ Then Pharaoh called for Moſes and Aaron in haſte: and he ſaid, I have ſinned againſt the LORD your God, and againſt you.

17 Now therefore forgive, I pray thee, my ſin only this once, and intreat the LORD your God, that he may take away from me this death only.

18 And he went out from Pharaoh, and entreated the LORD.

19 And the LORD turned a mighty ſtrong weſt-wind, which took away the locuſts, and caſt them into the Red ſea: there remained not one locuſt in all the coaſts of Egypt.

20 But the LORD hardned Pharaohs heart, ſo that he would not let the children of Iſrael go.

21 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Stretch out thine hand toward heaven, that there may be darkneſs over the land of Egypt, even darkneſs which may be felt.

22 And Moſes ſtretched forth his hand toward heaven: and there was a thick darkneſs in all the land of Egypt three days.

23 They ſaw not one another, neither roſe any from his place for three days; but all the children of Iſrael had light in their dwellings.

24 ¶ And Pharaoh called unto Moſes, and ſaid, Go ye ſerve the LORD; only let your flocks and your herds be ſtayed: let your little ones alſo go with you.

25 And Moſes ſaid, Thou muſt give us alſo ſacrifices, and burnt-offerings, that we may ſacrifice unto the LORD our God.

26 Our cattel alſo ſhall go with us; there ſhall not an hoof be left behind: for thereof muſt we take to ſerve the LORD our God; and we know not with what we muſt ſerve the LORD, until we come thither.

27 ¶ But the LORD hardned Pharaohs heart, and he would not let them go.

28 And Pharaoh ſaid unto him, Get thee from me, take heed to thyſelf, ſee my face no more: for in that day thou ſeeſt my face, thou ſhalt die.

29 And Moſes ſaid, Thou haſt ſpoken well, I will ſee thy face again no more.

Ver. 1. And the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, go in unto Pharaoh, &c.] Perhaps Moſes might think, that after the inefficacy of ſeven meſſages to Pharaoh, and the infliction of as many plagues, for his perſiſting in his obſtinacy, and God's declaration that he had hardened his heart, it would be altogether unavailing to make any new application to him, in favour of the Iſraelites; and therefore it is probable, that nothing but this expreſs command could diſpoſe him to addreſs himſelf to this untractable prince a-new.

———For I have hardened his heart, &c.] This is rather a reaſon why he ſhould not go; and therefore the particle ki is not to be tranſlated for, but altho', as it many times is us'd in theſe books; and then the ſenſe is clear, Altho' I have been provoked to let him perſiſt in his obduracy, yet let not that inſtance of my diſpleaſure, which he has juſtly brought upon himſelf, prevent thy going to him, to renew thy demand for his diſmiſſion of my people, becauſe I intend to take occaſion, from his refuſal to obey me, to work greater ſigns and wonders for the deliverance of Iſrael, and the effectual humiliation of this imperious man.

Ver. 4. Elſe if thou refuſe to let my people go, behold to morrow I will bring the locuſts into thy coaſts.] This is the creature which we properly call the graſhopper; and wonderful is the account which ſeveral authors give us of them. Thevenot, in his travels, tells us, That in that part of Scythia which the Coſſacks now inhabit, there are infinite numbers of them (eſpecially in dry ſeaſons) which a north-eaſt wind brings over from Tartary, Circaſſia, and Mingrelia, which are ſeldom or never entirely free from them; that they fly through the air in a dark and compact body, like a vaſt cloud, ſometimes a tract of land fifteen or eighteen miles in length, and about ten or twelve in breadth; ſo that they quite darken the ſky, and render the brighteſt day obſcure; and that wherever they deſcend and ſettle, they devour all the corn, in leſs than the ſpace of two hours, and frequently occaſion a famine in the country.

country. These insects, continues the author above-mentioned, live not above six months; and, when they are dead, the stench of them so corrupts and infects the air, that it frequently breeds dreadful pestilences. God calls the locust, the canker-worm, the caterpillar, and the palmer-worm, his great army, which he sends among a wicked and rebellious people, Joel ii. 25. And how proper the expression is, in relation to the locust in particular, will appear, from the account which Aldrovandus and Finellius give us of these animals, viz. that in the year of our Lord 852. an infinite number of them were seen to fly over a large extent of miles in Germany, in one day, in the manner of a form'd army, divided into several squadrons, and having their quarters a-part, when they rested: That the leading insects marched a day's journey before the rest, and chose the most commodious situations for their camp; that they never removed till sun-rising; at which time they decamped, with as much order, as could even be practised by an army of men: That, at last, having spread desolation wherever they pass'd, publick prayers were offer'd up, and these pernicious animals were driven, by a violent wind, into the Belgick ocean, and there drowned: But that, being cast, by the sea, upon the shore, they cover'd 140 acres of land, and caused a great pestilence in the country; which is sufficient to shew how dreadfully calamitous this judgment must have proved to Egypt; especially considering, that these locusts were such as were never known before, and yet the ordinary locust (as Aristotle and Pliny have described it) was an animal so fierce and formidable, that a single one would kill a serpent, fastening on its jaws and continuing in that position till it had stung the creature to death. [Arist. Hist. Animal. l. 4. c. 23. Pliny's Nat. Hist. l. 11. c. 9.]

Ver. 7. And Pharaoh's servants said unto him, How long shall this man be a snare unto us? Let the men go, that they may serve the Lord their God: Knowest thou not yet, that Egypt is destroyed?] Some of Pharaoh's court who fear'd the word of the Lord, or perhaps the whole court, began now to be sensible of the danger which threatned them; they seem indeed to speak contemptibly of Moses, but this was in order to please Pharaoh, to whom they suspected their counsel would not be acceptable, unless they flatter'd him. The Septuagint, and the Vulgate, render the words in the original, which we translate, how long shall this man be a snare to us, in this manner, how long shall this man be a stumbling block to us; i. e. lay before us the occasion of our falling into one calamity after another, or involve and entangle us in so many disasters? And when they ask, Knowest thou not yet that Egypt is destroyed. It is as if they had said, dost thou not consider, that so many plagues have laid our country desolate.

Ver. 10. And he said unto them, let the Lord be so with you, as I will let you go, and your little ones: Look to it, for evil is before you.] Most expositors take this for a form of imprecation: as if he had said, I wish you may prosper no better, than I will grant your desire. But some look upon it as an irrision or jeer, whose meaning is this; you trust in the Lord, let him do all he can to deliver you, as I am resolved to keep you here. This justifies the truth of their observation, who say that Pharaoh at the first behaved himself like a proud humourist, who slighted all that Moses said or did; but, that, since the plague of murrain on the cattle, and blains upon the Egyptians, he conducted himself like a distracted person, who rav'd as if his brains had been blasted (to use Dr. Jackson's phrase) with the fumes of his sear'd conscience.

As to the words look to it for evil is before you, it is uncertain whether Pharaoh meant evil which they designed against him, or which he intended against them. The former sense is most agreeable to what follows, and if it be approved of, the true meaning will be this. You intended a rebellion, for which reason I will permit none but the men to go, since common prudence makes it necessary for me to detain their wives and children as hostages for their loyalty, and they shall likewise leave their cattle behind them, that they may not be provided with the means of subsistence, if they intend to raise an insurrection in Egypt.

Ver. 13. And Moses stretched forth his rod over the land of Egypt, and the Lord brought an east-wind upon the land all that day, and all that night: And when it was morning, the east-wind brought the locusts.] The Deity, upon Pharaoh's refusal of obedience to his command; immediately orders Moses to inflict this new judgment, which he had denounced against the land of Egypt.

Tho' the Hebrew word kadim properly signifies the east, yet it is sometimes used for the south, as Bochart hath demonstrated, P. 2. Hieroz. l. 1. c. 15. and so the Septuagint understand it in this passage. For tho' Arabia, which lay east of Egypt, was much infested with locusts, yet those noxious insects were much more numerous in Ethiopia, whose situation was southward of Egypt, and abounded with them more than any other region in the world. Some of the inhabitants had no food but locusts, which were wafted to them about the Vernal Æquinox, in prodigious numbers, partly by the western, and partly by the southern gales, as the same Bochart has proved out of good authors, lib. 4. c. 3. It was about that time of the year, when this plague was inflicted on the land of Egypt, by a wind which blew from those southern regions.

The pernicious effects, occasioned by the devastations of these creatures, have been already intimated.

Ver. 16, 17. Then Pharaoh called for Moses and Aaron in haste; and he said, I have sinned against the Lord your God, and against you. Now therefore forgive, I pray thee, my sin only this once, and intreat the Lord your God, that he may take away from me this death only.] Nothing could be attended with more seeming humility and penitence than this supplication, which includes in it also a promise never to offend again; but there was no sincerity in these plausible expressions, which were only the result of a violent consternation, whose first impressions extorted from him this acknowledgment, without any serious intention to persevere in the resolution he now pretended to have taken.

Ver. 19. And the Lord turned a mighty strong west wind, which took away the locusts, and cast them into the Red-sea: there remained not one locust in all the coasts of Egypt.] The name given to this sea in the Hebrew text, and consequently its most ancient appellation that has been transmitted to us, is yam suph, that is, the weedy sea, or the sea of flags, so denominated from the abundance of weeds growing in those waters, and which circumstance is taken notice of by several Heathen writers, as Diodorus, Agatharchides, Artemidorus, Strabo, and others. The European geographers usually distinguish this sea by the name of the Arabian gulph; but as our readers may perhaps be curious to know the true reason of its receiving the denomination of the Red-sea, we shall take this opportunity of clearing up that point in a compendious manner.

It is well known, that 'tis usual for seas to be denominated by those countries whose coasts they wash. 'Tis very probable therefore, that mount Seir, or the mountainous tract denoted in scripture by that name, and given by God to Esau, the eldest son of Isaac, for a possession, extended southward almost to the Red-sea; nay, 'tis certain, that as Ezion Geber was situated on the coast of this sea, so it likewise belonged to the kings of Edom. For Esau being sirnamed Edom, which signifies red, on account of his selling his birth-right to his younger brother Jacob, for a mess of red pottage; hence the mountainous country, possessed by him and his descendants, is called in scripture the land of Edom, or simply, Edom. And this was undoubtedly the name whereby it was generally denoted and known in those early ages. Some of the ancient Greeks, therefore, alter'd the Hebrew word, at first, no more than to give it the mode of their own language, and so, preserving the Hebrew radicals, changed it into Idumæa: But others of them coming to understand, that Edom, in the Hebrew tongue, imported red, retain'd not the word itself, but its signification, and, instead of Idumæa, call'd the country of Edom by the name of Erythræa; or denoted Edom himself, the father of the Edomites, by the name of Erythrus, which signifies red, in the Greek language, as Edom does in the Hebrew. Now Edom himself, or his posterity, becoming famous for their great power, and this country not only extending along the Yam Suph, or weedy sea, but the Edomites being, in all probability, masters of this sea for some time, occasion'd its receiving the denomination of the Idumæan, or Erythræan sea; and since this seems to have been its most usual name among the Greeks, hence the Latins, being well acquainted with the signification of the Greek word Erythrus, distinguish this gulph by the name of mare rubrum, rubrum, the Red-ſea, as it is now called. Some of the Greek writers have themſelves taken notice, that it was called the Erythrean-ſea, from a certain famous and potent king named Erythrus (the ſame as Edom) and not from any redneſs either of its waters, or ſand, which are not more remarkable for that colour, than the ſand or water of any other ſea, as we are aſſured by Thevenot, who ſaw it, and likewiſe declares, that as he went to Mount Sinai, he did, indeed, obſerve ſome mountains all over red, upon the ſides of this ſea, tho' as he adds, he thought not that this was the reaſon of the common name aſſigned it, but offers much the ſame as we have already mentioned.

The name of the Erythrean-ſea, is, in ſome authors, extended beyond the gulph of Arabia, and comprehends all the ocean, between the eaſtern coaſts of Afric, and the Indies, and the reaſon may be the ſame with that already intimated, namely the great power of the poſterity of Edom, and the great fame of their founder through all the adjoining parts of Arabia, the ſouthern and eaſtern parts whereof are waſhed by the Erythrean-ſea, in its larger acceptation, as well as its weſterly coaſt by the Red-ſea, properly ſo called. And in the ſame larger acceptation it is, that the gulph of Perſia, which extends on the eaſtern coaſt of Arabia, as the Arabian gulph does on its weſtern coaſt, is ſometimes denoted by the name of Sinus Erythræus, or Mare Erythræum, the Erythrean gulph, or ſea, and this probably is the Red-ſea, intimated by Origen, when he declares, that among all the Indian pearls, thoſe of the Red-ſea, are moſt valuable.

Some authors have obſerved, that the Red-ſea (ſo called in the Greek, Latin, and other European verſions of the Scripture) is by the Arabians themſelves called Bahr Al Kolzum, that is, as Thevenot and Dr. Wells have ſuppoſed, the Sea of Clyſona, which according to ſome geographers was built at the moſt northern point of that ſea, tho' others have placed it a little more ſouth, on the weſtern coaſt of this ſea, and much about the place where the Iſraelites are ſuppoſed to have paſſed from the weſtern, or Egyptian coaſt of this ſea, to the eaſtern or Arabian ſhore. The learned Dr. Wells adds, that if it be conſidered that the word Clyſona, may denote a drowning, or overwhelming with water, it may not be improbable that the town erected in this place, might have ſuch a name impoſed upon it, in memory of the Egyptians being drowned in this ſea, when they purſued the Iſraelites into its channel. But we durſt not lay much ſtreſs on this conjecture, as ingenious ſo ever as it may ſeem, meer names deciding but little with us, without collateral proofs.

Ver. 21. And the Lord ſaid unto Moſes ſtretch out thine hand toward heaven, that there may be darkneſs over the land of Egypt, even darkneſs which may be felt.] Pharaoh relapſing into his former obſtinacy, upon the ceſſation of the plague of locuſts, this new provocation was ſoon puniſhed by a diffuſion of ſuch dreadful darkneſs over the greateſt part of Egypt, that Moſes repreſents the depth of this diſmal gloom by the expreſſion of darkneſs that may be felt. This is repreſented by the Septuagint and ſome other tranſlations, as ſuch a groſs condenſation of vapours as became tangible by man; but no human creature could poſſibly live three hours, much leſs three days, in ſuch a medium as this; this conſideration has induced ſome learned commentators to ſuppoſe that the Hebrew phraſe may ſignify, a darkneſs wherein men went feeling about for every thing they wanted, and in this ſenſe the author of the life of Moſes certainly takes it.

Ver. 24. And Pharaoh called unto Moſes and ſaid, Go ye, ſerve the Lord; only let your flocks and your herds be ſtayed: let your little ones alſo go with you.] It was a perfect infatuation in Pharaoh to clog his permiſſion for the departure of the Iſraelites with ſuch exceptions, but this was the effect of his avarice which had gain'd upon him to an incurable degree. Moſes repreſented to him the unreaſonableneſs of his demand, ſince the Iſraelites only knew that they were to offer up a ſolemn ſacrifice to God, but had not yet been informed what particular kinds of animals were to be employed in the oblation; he therefore acquainted the king in expreſs terms, that not a ſingle hoof of cattle of the Iſraelites ſhould remain in Egypt. This dauntleſs declaration ſo exaſperated the haughty monarch, that he commanded Moſes not to approach his preſence any more; but the great leader of Iſrael was not a man to be terrified with ſo impotent a menace; and it may reaſonably be ſuppoſed, that, before he retired, he denounced againſt Pharaoh the finiſhing ſtroke of the divine vengeance, which was to be exerted in the impending death of the firſt-born.

CHAP. XI.

1 Gods meſſage to the Iſraelites to borrow jewels of their neighbours. 4 Moſes threatneth Pharaoh with the death of the firſt-born.

AND the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Yet will I bring one plague more upon Pharaoh, and upon Egypt: afterwards he will let you go hence: when he ſhall let you go he ſhall ſurely thruſt you out hence altogether.

2 Speak now in the ears of the people, and let every man borrow of his neighbour, and every woman of her neighbour, jewels of ſilver, and jewels of gold.

3 And the LORD gave the people favour in the ſight of the Egyptians. Moreover, the man Moſes was very great in the land of Egypt, in the ſight of Pharaohs ſervants, and in the ſight of the people.

4 And Moſes ſaid, Thus ſaith the LORD, About midnight will I go out into the midſt of Egypt.

5 And all the firſt-born in the land of Egypt, ſhall die, from the firſt-born of Pharaoh, that ſitteth upon his throne, even unto the firſt-born of the maid-ſervant that is behind the mill; and all the firſt-born of beaſts.

6 And there ſhall be a great cry throughout all the land of Egypt, ſuch as there was none like it, nor ſhall be like it any more.

7 But againſt any of the children of Iſrael ſhall not a dog move his tongue, againſt man or beaſt: that ye may know how that the LORD doth put a difference between the Egyptians and Iſrael.

8 And all theſe thy ſervants ſhall come down unto me, and bow down themſelves unto me, ſaying, Get thee out, and all the people that follow thee; and after that I will go out: and he went out from Pharaoh in a great anger.

9 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Pharaoh ſhall not hearken unto you; that my wonders may be multiplyed in the land of Egypt.

10 And Moſes and Aaron did all theſe wonders before Pharaoh: and the LORD hardned Pharaohs heart, ſo that he would not let the children of Iſrael go out of his land.

This chapter contains God's denunciation of the laſt plague he was preparing to inflict upon the Egyptians, and which he intended ſhould have that dreadful efficacy upon the impious mind of Pharaoh, that he ſhould no longer dare to detain the Iſraelites, but ſhould thruſt them out altogether, from the land of Egypt.

Moſes is likewiſe commanded by the Deity, to give the Iſraelites directions to borrow jewels of ſilver, and jewels of gold of the Egyptians; the juſtice of which injunction has been already proved in a former Annotation, on the 22d verſe of the 23d chapter of this book.

CHAP. XII.

1 The beginning of the year is changed. 3 The paſſover is inſtituted. 11 The rite of the paſſover. 15 Unleavened bread. 29 The firſt-born are ſlain. 31 The Iſraelites are driven out of the land. 37 They come to Succoth. 43 The ordinance of the paſſover.

AND the LORD ſpake unto Moſes and Aaron in the land of Egypt, ſaying,

2 This month ſhall be unto you the beginning of months: it ſhall be the firſt month of the year to you.

3 ¶ Speak ye unto all the congregation of Iſrael, ſaying, In the tenth day of this month they ſhall take to them every man a lamb, according to the houſe of their fathers, a lamb for an houſe.

4 And if the houſhold be too little for the lamb, let him and his neighbour next unto his houſe, take it according to the number of the ſouls; every man according to his eating, ſhall make your count for the lamb.

5 Your lamb ſhall be without blemiſh, a male of the firſt year: ye ſhall take it out from the ſheep or from the goats.

6 And ye ſhall keep it up until the fourteenth day of the ſame month: and the whole aſſembly of the congregation of Iſrael ſhall kill it in the evening.

7 And they ſhall take of the blood, and ſtrike it on the two ſide-poſts, and on the upper door-poſt of the houſes, wherein they ſhall eat it.

8 And they ſhall eat the fleſh in that night; roaſt with fire, and unleavened bread, and with bitter herbs they ſhall eat it.

9 Eat not of it raw, nor ſodden at all with water, but roaſt with fire: his head with his legs, and with the purtenance thereof.

10 And ye ſhall let nothing of it remain until the morning: and that which remaineth of it until the morning, ye ſhall burn with fire.

11 ¶ And thus ſhall ye eat it; with your loyns girded, your ſhoes on your feet, and your ſtaff in your hand: and ye ſhall eat it in haſte, it is the LORDS paſſover.

12 For I will paſs through the land of Egypt this night, and will ſmite all the firſt-born in the land of Egypt, both man and beaſt: and againſt all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment: I am the LORD.

13 And the blood ſhall be to you for a token upon the houſes where you are: and when I ſee the blood, I will paſs over you, and the plague ſhall not be upon you to deſtroy you, when I ſmite the land of Egypt.

14 And this day ſhall be unto you for a memorial; and you ſhall keep it a feaſt to the LORD, throughout your generations: you ſhall keep it a feaſt by an ordinance for ever.

15 Seven days ſhall ye eat unleavened bread, even the firſt day ye ſhall put away leaven out of your houſes: for whoſoever eateth leavened bread, from the firſt day until the ſeventh day, that ſoul ſhall be cut off from Iſrael.

16 And in the firſt day there ſhall be an holy convocation, and in the ſeventh day there ſhall be an holy convocation to you: no manner of work ſhall be done in them, ſave that which every man muſt eat, that only may be done of you.

17 And ye ſhall obſerve the feaſt of unleavened bread; for in this ſelf-ſame day have I brought your armies out of the land of Egypt: therefore ſhall ye obſerve this day in your generations, by an ordinance for ever.

18 ¶ In the firſt month, on the fourteenth day of the month at even, ye ſhall eat unleavened bread, until the one and twentieth day of the month at even.

19 Seven days ſhall there be no leaven found in your houſes: for whoſoever eateth that which is leavened, even that ſoul ſhall be cut off from the congregation of Iſrael, whether he be a ſtranger or born in the land.

20 Ye ſhall eat nothing leavened: in all your habitations ſhall ye eat unleavened bread.

21 ¶ Then Moſes called for all the elders of Iſrael, and ſaid unto them, Draw out, and take you a lamb, according to your families, and kill the paſſover.

22 And ye ſhall take a bunch of hyſſop, and dip it in the blood that is in the baſon, and ſtrike the lintel, and the two ſide-poſts, with the blood that is in the baſon: and none of you ſhall go out at the door of his houſe until the morning.

23 For the LORD will paſs through to ſmite the Egyptians, and when he ſeeth the blood upon the lintel, and on the two ſide-poſts, poſts, the LORD will paſs over the door, and will not ſuffer the deſtroyer to come in unto your houſes to ſmite you.

24 And ye ſhall obſerve this thing for an ordinance to thee, and to thy ſons for ever.

25 And it ſhall come to paſs when ye be come to the land, which the LORD will give you, according as he hath promiſed, that ye ſhall keep this ſervice.

26 And it ſhall come to paſs, when your children ſhall ſay unto you, What mean you by this ſervice?

27 That ye ſhall ſay, It is the ſacrifice of the LORDS paſſover, who paſſed over the houſes of the children of Iſrael in Egypt, when he ſmote the Egyptians, and deliver'd our houſes. And the people bowed the head and worſhipped.

28 And the children of Iſrael went away, and did as the LORD had commanded Moſes and Aaron, ſo did they.

29 ¶ And it came to paſs that at midnight the LORD ſmote all the firſt-born in the land of Egypt, from the firſt-born of Pharaoh, that ſat on his throne, unto the firſt-born of the captive that was in the dungeon; and all the firſt-born of cattel.

30 And Pharaoh roſe up in the night, he and all his ſervants, and all the Egyptians; and there was a great cry in Egypt: for there was not a houſe where there was not one dead.

31 ¶ And he called for Moſes and Aaron by night, and ſaid, Riſe up, and get you forth from amongſt my people, both you and the children of Iſrael: and go ſerve the LORD, as ye have ſaid.

32 Alſo take your flocks, and your herds, as ye have ſaid, and be gone, and bleſs me alſo.

33 And the Egyptians were urgent upon the people, that they might ſend them out of the land in haſte: for they ſaid, We be all dead men.

34 And the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading-troughs being bound up in their cloaths upon their ſhoulders.

35 And the children of Iſrael did according to the word of Moſes: and they borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of ſilver, and jewels of gold, and raiment.

36 And the LORD gave the people favour in the ſight of the Egyptians, ſo that they lent unto them ſuch things as they required; and they ſpoiled the Egyptians.

37 ¶ And the children of Iſrael journeyed from Rameſes to Succoth, about ſix hundred thouſand on foot that were men, beſides children.

38 And a mixed multitude went up alſo with them; and flocks, and herds, even very much cattel.

39 And they baked unleavened cakes of the dough, which they brought forth out of Egypt, for it was not leavened: becauſe they were thruſt out of Egypt, and could not tarry, neither had they prepared for themſelves any victual.

40 ¶ Now the ſojourning of the children of Iſrael, who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years.

41 And it came to paſs, at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the ſelf-ſame day it came to paſs, that all the hoſts of the LORD went out from the land of Egypt.

42 It is a night to be much obſerved unto the LORD, for bringing them out from the land of Egypt: this is that night of the LORD to be obſerved of all the children of Iſrael, in their generations.

43 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes and Aaron, This is the ordinance of the paſſover: there ſhall no ſtranger eat thereof.

44 But every mans ſervant that is bought for money, when thou haſt circumciſed him, then ſhall he eat thereof.

45 A foreigner, and an hired ſervant ſhall not eat thereof.

46 In one houſe ſhall it be eaten, thou ſhalt not carry forth ought of the fleſh abroad out of the houſe: neither ſhall ye break a bone thereof.

47 All the congregation of Iſrael ſhall keep it.

48 And when a ſtranger ſhall ſojourn with thee, and will keep the paſſover to the LORD, let all his males be circumciſed, and then let him come near and keep it; and he ſhall be as one that is born in the land: for no uncircumciſed perſon ſhall eat thereof.

49 One law ſhall be to him that is home-born, and unto the ſtranger that ſojourneth among you.

50 Thus did all the children of Iſrael; as the LORD commanded Moſes and Aaron, ſo did they.

51 And it came to paſs the ſelf-ſame day, that the LORD did bring the children of Iſrael out of the land of Egypt, by their armies.

Ver-

Verſes 1, 2. And the Lord ſpake unto Moſes and Aaron, in the land of Egypt ſaying, This month ſhall be unto you, the beginning of months, &c.] Before God thought fit to ſtrike the great blow that was to accompliſh the deliverance of his people, he eſtabliſhed a memorial thereof, which was to laſt till the coming of the Meſſiah ſhould conſummate the old oeconomy, and call the faithful to turn all their attention to a more remarkable and important deliverance. This memorial is ſtyled the paſſover, that is to ſay, the paſſage, being intended to repreſent the paſſing by of the deſtroying angel; and the original word is borrowed from the Chaldee.

The name of paſſover is given, in Scripture, not only to the feſtival we are preparing to explain, but likewiſe to the lamb that was to be ſacrificed, and to the bleſſed Jeſus who was typified by this ſacrament. The time when it was to be eaten, was the night of the fourteenth of March. It was in that night that the angel deſtroy'd the firſt-born of the Egyptians, and ſcatter'd terror through the whole land of Egypt. This month is call'd in Hebrew Abib, which ſignifies ears of corn. It was ſo call'd, becauſe the corn was then in the ear, as Moſes ſays expreſsly. It ſometimes bears the name of Niſan, which ſome interpreters derive from a word ſignifying ot fly, becauſe the Iſraelites did then take their flight. But the famous Bochart, whom we ſhall follow here, ſhews that it comes from a word ſignifying a banner. He thinks that the month of March is called Niſan, becauſe it was in that month that the armies took the field; for which reaſon the Pagans did alſo name it Mars.

Since this inſtitution, the month of March begins the eccleſiaſtical year among the Jews. That which is called the civil, began in the month of September, named Tiſri. The Iſraelites did at firſt begin their computation with that Epocha of time in which they believed the world was created: That of their deliverance from the Egyptian bondage was afterwards appointed for the ſame purpoſe: And laſt of all, that from the Babyloniſh captivity. It has not been proved, that the Jews were diſpenſed from it afterwards. Moſt of the reaſons that induced them to employ a long term were ſtill ſubſiſting, as has been proved by the learned Biſhop Patrick.

The kid, or lamb deſigned for the paſſover, was to be eight days old at leaſt, and not above one year at the moſt. Eight days at leaſt, the Jews ſay, that there might intervene one ſabbath, after the birth of the victim, and that the ſanctity of that feſtival might render it worthy of being preſented to God. And it was not to exceed the age of one year, poſſibly becauſe it retained its ſimplicity till then.

The lamb was to be free from blemiſh; which might be intended to intimate the purity of the Saviour of mankind, who is ſtyled, by way of excellence, the lamb without ſpot or blemiſh. 1 Pet. i. 9. and whoſe oblation alone was ſufficient to reconcile heaven with earth.

The paſchal lamb was to be offer'd the fourteenth day, between the two evenings, that is to ſay, in the interval, from twelve to ſix of the clock. The evening hour of ſix, was the beginning of the fifteenth day, and this will be cleared up by a paſſage in Maimonides, whoſe words are theſe. The immolation of the paſchal lamb is made after noon; for the performance of it before, would be a prophanation. They do not offer it till after the daily ſacrifice, which is performed between the two evenings, after the offering of incenſe. Then they light up the lamps, and next begin to ſacrifice the lamb till the end of the next day.

The blood of the victim was to be ſprinkled or poured on the altar, and this ceremonial was eſſential. The learned Maimonides calls it the baſis or foundation of the ſacrifice, and St. Paul has the ſame notion of it, Heb. ix. 10. In Egypt the Jews had no altar, but they ſprinkled the ſides and threſholds of their doors; and this circumſtance was peculiar to the paſſover they then celebrated. Afterwards they ſacrificed in the tabernacle, which was as the temple of God, and when the real temple was built, they were forbid to offer the victims of the paſſover, and of the other ſacrifices any where elſe; and 'tis for this reaſon that the modern Jews offer none at all.

A noble paſſage of the Targum of Jonathan upon the ſprinkling the blood of the lamb, as it was performed by the Iſraelites in Egypt, deſerves to be cited. When the glory of the Lord was revealed in Egypt, in the night of the paſſover, and when he ſlew all the firſt-born of the Egyptians, he rode upon lightening. —— He looked into our houſes; he ſtopped behind our walls; he looked through the windows. He perceived the blood of the paſchal lamb, and that of the circumciſion, upon our doors, and view'd his people from the top of heaven, and ſaw them eating the paſſover roaſted with fire —— and he ſpared us, and would not allow the deſtroying angel to hurt us.

St. Epiphanius affirms, that ſome footſteps of this ancient cuſtom of ſprinkling were found among the Egyptians; and that in the beginning of ſpring they mark with red, their ſheep, and trees, becauſe the world is to be deſtroyed by fire at that ſeaſon, and that a red colour has ſome (imaginary) vertue to damp the force of that conflagration.

The people were forbidden to eat the fleſh of the paſchal lamb half raw; in contradiction, perhaps, to a Heathen ſuperſtition. In the feaſts of Bacchus the women, and old men, amidſt their Inebriation, devoured the yet throbbing fleſh of the victims offer'd to that falſe God; and their feaſt was called the feſtival of raw food. A famous Rabbin gives the ſame reaſon for the law that prohibits the eating blood. It is, ſays he, becauſe anciently the idolatrous kings of the Gentiles, tore aſunder the limbs of living creatures, and ate them, in that condition, after ſprinkling them with blood. More Nevoch. p. 3. c. 48. p. 496.

2. God forbad them to boil the fleſh of the lamb, and ordered it to be roaſted. This, perhaps, was likewiſe in contradiction to ſome Pagan ſuperſtition. According to Athenæus, the Egyptians always boiled the proviſions they offered up to the hours, which they adored as goddeſſes.

3. God commanded them not to leave any fragment of the paſchal lamb, or at leaſt to conſume by fire, what remained. This law was not peculiar to the paſſover, but was to be obſerved in all other ſacrifices, except thoſe that were called voluntary. This law was, perhaps, oppoſed to ſome ſuperſtitious rites of the Heathens, who often preſerved the remainder of the ſacrifices, through a perſuaſion that it would prove fortunate to them.

4. God alſo ordered them not to break the bones of the paſchal lamb; and this likewiſe might be in oppoſition to ſome Heathen ſuperſtition. The Bacchantes, in the feaſt of Bacchus, ſhewed all the tokens of frantic rage. They crowned themſelves with ſerpents; abandoned themſelves to dreadful agitations, to appear inſpired by their God: They ate the raw fleſh of the victims they had offered, and brake all their bones. 'Tis thus we may oppoſe the rites of the paſſover, againſt the ſuperſtitions of the Pagans. The paraphraſt Jonathan ſeems to be of the ſame opinion; when, taking notice of theſe words which God directed to Moſes and Aaron, viz. Speak ye unto all the congregation of Iſrael, ſaying, in the tenth day of this month, they ſhall take to them every man a lamb, he offers an explanation of them after the following manner; Draw back your hands from the idolatry of the Egyptians, when ye offer the paſchal lamb.

God took care alſo to order exactly what was to be eaten with the fleſh of the paſchal lamb, namely, unleavened bread and bitter herbs. The reaſon of the latter part of the inſtitution is obvious, and the Jews have juſtly obſerved it. We eat bitter herbs, ſays one of their doctors, becauſe the lives of our fathers in Egypt were very bitter, as it is ſaid in the firſt chapter of Exodus, that the Egyptians made their lives bitter unto them by a hard bondage. This reflection is more ſolid than all that can be collected from the ſcrupulous ſearch they have made after the preciſe nature of the herbs they were allowed to eat.

The lamb was to be eaten with unleavened bread, the reaſon of which is expreſſed in the 39th verſe of this chapter, viz. that, in the night of their departure, the Iſraelites had not time to leaven their dough.

Laſtly, God gave directions, even as to the poſture in which the paſchal lamb was to be eaten, viz with their loins girded, their ſhoes on their feet, and their ſtaff in their hand —— and to eat it in haſte. All which explains itſelf, and denotes the condition of people juſt ſetting out. But the Jews were in the right not to confine themſelves to the ſame poſture in future times; and we ſee that our bleſſed Saviour and his apoſtles, lay down upon beds; which was the cuſtom of the age when they celebrated the paſſover.

Such was the paſſover, which the children of Iſrael celebrated, the night of the fifteenth of the month Niſan, which was the time of their departure from Egypt; and such were the rites with which it was to be attended. We shall hereafter treat of those which the Jews added to it, when we come to explain the history of that passover which was celebrated by Jesus Christ and his apostles, and shall then take that opportunity to examine, and clear up the several disputes to which the Christian passover, or Easter, has given occasion.

Ver. 29. And it came to pass that at midnight the Lord smote all the first-born in the land of Egypt, from the first-born of Pharaoh, that sat on his throne, unto the first-born of the captive that was in the dungeon; and all the first-born of cattel.] Thus did the Almighty inflict this tremendous judgment on the Egyptians; and it was undoubtedly render'd more dreadful by the solemn darkness of midnight; the universality likewise of this punishment must certainly have infused a general consternation among those unhappy parents who were thus deprived of their first-born, by the disobedience of their king, to the God of Israel.

Ver. 30. And Pharaoh rose up in the night, he and all his servants, and all the Egyptians; and there was a great cry in Egypt: for there was not a house where there was not one dead.] It is no improbable conjecture of Fortunatus Scacchus, in his Mirothec. Ebœochrism, l. I. c. 6. that the solemn feast among the Egyptians, wherein they went about with candles in the night, seeking for Osiris with tears and great lamentations, derived its original from Pharaoh's rising out of his bed at midnight, and all the Egyptians with him; who lighting candles, and finding their children dead, bewailed them with loud cries. And it is not unreasonable to think, that Pharaoh's eldest son, who was now slain, had the name of Osiris, whose sudden death by this stroke, all posterity lamented in one night of the year; which was when the moon was at full, as may be observed but of Apuleius: Which is a confirmation of this supposition; the moon being at the full, when this slaughter was made, and the Israelites deliver'd out of Egypt.

Ver. 33. And the Egyptians were urgent upon the people, that they might send them out of the land in haste: For they said, We be all dead men.] In this manner the Israelites were brought out of Egypt; a transaction so wonderful and extraordinary, that the Heathen historians could not avoid taking some notice of it. Justin, the Epitomizer of Trogus Pompeius, affords us intimations of it in his account of the Jewish nation, where he declares, "That some time after the birth of Moses, the Egyptians "had the leprosy amongst them; that upon consulting "their oracle for a cure, they were directed to send away "all the infected persons out of the land, under the con- "duct of Moses. Moses undertook the command of them, "and at his leaving Egypt stole away the Egyptian Sacra. "The Egyptians pursued them in order to recover their "Sacra, but were compell'd by storms to return home "again. Moses in seven days past the desart of Arabia, "and brought the people to Sinai." This account, indeed, is short, imperfect, and full of mistakes; which might be occasioned by the misrepresentation of the Egyptian writers, or the carelessness and want of examination of other historians. We may however conclude from Justin, that it was universally agreed, that the Jews were sent out of Egypt under the conduct of Moses, that the Egyptians might be delivered from plagues inflicted upon them by the divine hand; and that after they were dismiss'd, the Egyptians pursued them, but were disappointed in their intentions, not by force of arms, but by instructions from providence, in the direction of storms and weather to defeat them.

Justin hints a number of particulars, which are so near the truth, in the several parts of the Jewish history, that we imagine, if due pains had been taken to examine them, he would have given a truer account of this, and all other circumstances which he has related of them, and their affairs.

Ver. 35. And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses: And they borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment.] Justin relates, that the Jews at their departure stole the Egyptian Sacra: But Moses records, that they borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment. If they borrowed them, we cannot say that they had any design of returning them again; and therefore the injustice may be thought the same as if they stole them. Some modern writers have taken the greatest liberty of ridiculing this particular, and are pleas'd in thinking it affords them a considerable objection against the Sacred Scriptures; For they insinuate, with more than ordinary assurance, that no one can, consistently with plain and common honesty, which all men know too well to be deceiv'd in, suppose God Almighty to direct, or order the Israelites to borrow in this manner. The wit of the best poet is not sufficient to reconcile us to the retreat of a Moses by the assistance of an Egyptian loan, said lord Shaftsbury, amongst other things, which he thought might bear hard against the morality of the sacred history. Some very judicious writers have endeavoured to justify the Israelites borrowing of the Egyptians; but as we have already considered this point in some measure, we shall not offer any of their arguments, because we cannot find, that the sacred text offers the least inclination, that they borrowed, or attempted to borrow any thing of them. The Hebrew word which our translators have render'd borrow is shaal, which does not signify to borrow, but to ask one to give. It is the very word us'd, Psalm. ii. 8. [Sheal-ve Ettenah] ask of me, and I will give thee the Heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession: And the fact was this: God had told Moses, that the Israelites should not go out of Egypt empty, but that every woman should ask her neighbour, and the person she lived with, to give her jewels and raiment, and that he would dispose the Egyptians to make that donation. And thus, when they were leaving Egypt, the children of Israel ask'd the Egyptians for jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment; and the Lord gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they gave them what they ask'd for, so freely as to impoverish themselves by making presents to them. Josephus represents this fact agreeably to the true sense of the sacred text: He says that the Egyptians made the Hebrews considerable presents; and that some did so, in order to induce them to go the sooner away from them; others out of respect to, and upon account of the acquaintance they had had with them.

Ver. 37. And the children of Israel journeyed from Rameses to Succoth, about six hundred thousand on foot that were men, besides children.] St. Austin thinks that this prodigious increase of the Israelites was altogether miraculous, in which many of the Jews agree with him. Aben Ezra tells us, that the women brought forth three or four at every birth; and affirms that a woman may be the mother of seven children at one birth. This notion seems to have been derived from Aristotle, or else from Trogus, who says, that in Egypt the women were sometimes delivered of seven children at once: But without having recourse to such prodigious and incredible births, we need only suppose, that the Israelites were very fruitful, and intermarried with each other early in their youth, in consequence of which we see no impossibility for seventy males, in the compass of 215 years, to have multiplied in their offspring, to this degree, even by the birth of one child every year; for, according to Simler's computation, seventy persons, if they beget a child every year, will, in the space of thirty years, have above 2000 children; of which, admit that one third part only, enter'd into the nuptial state, in thirty years more, they will amount to nine thousand; the third part of which will, in thirty years more, be multiplied to 45,000: According to which moderate calculation, in 210 years, the whole amount will be at least 2,760,000. If therefore there was any thing miraculous or extraordinary in all this, it was that they should be able to multiply at that rate, notwithstanding their hard labours and cruel bondage.

The plains of Rameses were the general rendezvouz of this vast multitude. Moses places them in the land of Goshen. They were situate at that end of Egpyt that lies nearest to Canaan, whether God intended them. This proximity was one of the reasons that determined Joseph to chuse it for the land of Jacob's residence, lest the length and fatigue of a greater journey should prove fatal to the old man. Accordingly Rameses is called a province or land in Genesis chap. lxvii. ver. 11. 'Tis true, that in this book of Exodus the same name is given to one of the cities or fortresses which were built by the children of Israel, chap. i. ver. 11. But there is nothing incompatible in that. They might build a town in a country, which should bear the name of the country itself. Of all that the interpreters have been able to collect from geographical observations in prophane authors to give a greater light to this article, we find nothing that we can venture to adopt, without violating the reſolution we have form'd, to offer nothing as prov'd, which does not appear capable of being rendered ſufficiently evident.

Ver. 40. Now the ſojourning of the children of Iſrael, who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and twenty years.] The computation of theſe years has been already ſettled in our annotation on the 30th verſe of the 15th chapter of Geneſis.

Ver. 42. It is a night to be much obſerv'd unto the Lord, for bringing them out of the land of Egypt: This is that night of the Lord to be obſerved of all the childten of Iſrael, in their generations.] If any period of time was ever rendered memorable by the Deity's interpoſition in favour of thoſe who adore him, it was this moſt remarkable night, when his avenging arm, made every houſe in Egypt a ſcene of conſternation and ſorrow, as a juſt retribution to thoſe tyrannical people, for all the afflictions they had heaped upon the Iſraelites, by the long ſervitude in which they had detained them.

The remaining part of this chapter, contains particular directions with reſpect to thoſe who ſhould be priviledged, in after times, to partake of the paſſover, and as they are ſufficiently intelligible in themſelves, we think it unneceſſary to offer any remarks upon them.

CHAP. XIII.

1 The firſt-born are ſanctified to God. 3 The memorial of the paſſover is commanded. 11 The firſtlings of beaſts are ſet apart. 17 The Iſraelites go out of Egypt, and carry Joſeph's bones with them. 20 They come to Etham. 21 God guideth them by a pillar of a cloud, and a pillar of fire.

AND the LORD ſpake unto Moſes ſaying,

2 Sanctify unto me all the firſt-born, whatſoever openeth the womb among the children of Iſrael, both of man and of beaſt: it is mine.

3 And Moſes ſaid unto the people, Remember this day, in which ye came out from Egypt, out of the houſe of bondage; for by ſtrength of hand the LORD brought you out from this place: there ſhall no leavened bread be eaten.

4 This day came ye out, in the month Abib.

5 ¶ And it ſhall be when the LORD ſhall bring thee into the land of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Hivites, and the Jebuſites, which he ſware unto thy fathers to give thee, a land flowing with milk and honey; that thou ſhalt keep this ſervice in this month.

6 Seven days ſhalt thou eat unleavened bread, and in the ſeventh day ſhall be a feaſt to the LORD.

7 Unleavened bread ſhall be eaten ſeven days: and there ſhall no leavened bread be ſeen with thee, neither ſhall there be leaven ſeen with thee in all thy quarters.

8 ¶ And thou ſhalt ſhew thy ſon in that day, ſaying, This is done becauſe of that which the LORD did unto me, when I came forth out of Egypt.

9 And it ſhall be for a ſign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes; that the LORDs law may be in thy mouth: for with a ſtrong hand hath the LORD brought thee out of Egypt.

10 Thou ſhalt therefore keep this ordinance in his ſeaſon from year to year.

11 ¶ And it ſhall be when the LORD ſhall bring thee into the land of the Cananites, as he ſware unto thee and to thy fathers, and ſhall give it thee.

12 That thou ſhalt ſet apart unto the LORD all that openeth the matrix: and every firſtling that cometh of a beaſt, which thou haſt, the males ſhall be the LORDs.

13 And every firſtling of an aſs thou ſhalt redeem with a lamb; and if thou wilt not redeem it, then thou ſhalt break his neck: and all the firſt-born of man amongſt thy children ſhalt thou redeem.

14 ¶ And it ſhall be when thy ſon asketh thee in time to come, ſaying, What is this? that thou ſhalt ſay unto him, By ſtrength of hand the LORD brought us out from Egypt, from the houſe of bondage.

15 And it came to paſs when Pharaoh would hardly let us go, that the LORD ſlew all the firſt-born in the land of Egypt, both the firſt-born of man, and the firſt-born of beaſt: therefore I ſacrifice to the LORD all that openeth the matrix, being males; but all the firſt-born of my children I redeem.

16 And it ſhall be for a token upon thine hand, and for frontlets between thine eyes: for by ſtrength of hand the LORD brought us forth out of Egypt.

17 ¶ And it came to paſs, when Pharaoh had let the people go, that God led them not through the way of the land of the Philiſtines, although that was near: for God ſaid, leſt peradventure the people repent when they ſee war, and they return to Egypt.

18 But God led the people about, through the way of the wilderneſs of the Red ſea: and the children of Iſrael went up harneſſed out of the land of Egypt.

19 And Moſes took the bones of Joſeph with him: for he had ſtraitly ſworn the children of Iſrael, ſaying, God will ſurely viſit you; and ye ſhall carry up my bones away hence with you.

20 ¶ And they took their journey from Succoth, and encamped in Etham, in the edge of the wilderneſs.

21 And the LORD went before them by day in a pillar of a cloud, to lead them the way way; and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light: to go by day and night.

22 He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night, from before the people.

Verſes 1, 2. And the Lord ſpake unto Moſes ſaying, ſanctify unto me all the firſt-born, &c.] Whilſt the Iſraelites continued at Succoth, Moſes was commanded by God to conſecrate the firſt-born of men and beaſts to him, to whom they all moſt juſtly belonged. The firſt-born of men, were to be redeemed at the price of five ſhekels of the ſanctuary, whoſe value was double to that of the common ſhekel, and the whole ſum amounted to about twelve ſhillings and ſix-pence, which was afterwards to be given to the prieſts. This redemption of the firſt-born, was founded not only upon the right which God had over all his creatures, but, more particularly, upon the account of his having ſpared the firſt-born of the Iſraelites, when he deſtroyed thoſe of the Egyptians. This law concerning the firſt-born, did not extend to women; for if the firſt fruits of a marriage proved a female, no redemption was to be paid for her. Secondly, as to animals, it related only to the clean; thoſe that were not ſo, being either to be redeemed by ſuch as were clean, as an aſs by a lamb, or elſe they were to be killed. The Iſraelites were likewiſe ordered to communicate the reaſon of this law of redemption to all their offſpring, that their poſterity might be always qualified to account for its inſtitution, and that the wonders wrought in favour of their anceſtors, might never be obliterated.

Ver. 17. And it came to paſs, when Pharaoh had let the people go, that God led them not through the way of the land of the Philiſtines, altho' that was near, &c.] From the arrival of the Iſraelites at Succoth, to their paſſage over the Red-ſea into Midian, it does not appear that Moſes led them one ſtep by his own conduct or contrivance. From Succoth they removed to Etham, a town near the border of the wilderneſs of Arabia; from thence they moved back into the mountainous parts of Egypt, on the weſt ſide of the Red-ſea, and encamped near to Pihahiroth, between Migdol and the ſea. It is probable, indeed, that reaſon might ſuggeſt to Moſes the impropriety of conducting his people directly through Philiſtia to Canaan, ſince, his hoſt, tho' very numerous, was yet compoſed of a mixed multitude altogether undiſciplined for war, whereas the Philiſtines were a ſtrong and martial people, and could not well be thought inclinable to ſuffer ſix hundred thouſand men to enter their dominions: Prudence therefore might intimate to him, that it would be more adviſeable to lead them about by the wilderneſs of Arabia, and to retire with them into Midian, where he was certain of a favourable reception from Jethro, and where he might form them for what undertaking it might pleaſe God to deſign them. All this may be conſiſtent with the Hebrew expreſſion of God's leading them, ſince he is frequently ſaid to do things, by permitting them to be accompliſhed by the inſtrumentality of others: But tho' all this may reaſonably be ſuppoſed, yet the progreſs of the Iſraelites from Succoth to the Red-ſea, was evidently conducted by the immediate direction of the Deity. For, 1. If Moſes had intended to lead the people into Jethro's country, he had a much nearer way from Etham, through the wilderneſs of Sinai, than to conduct them into the mountainous and rocky country, on the Egyptian borders of the Red-ſea, out of which he could not expect to find any paſſage into Midian, without coming back to Etham again. 2. This, as far as we are able to judge, would have been a much ſafer, as well as a much nearer way, and we cannot poſſibly determine, why Moſes ſhould lead them ſo much out of the way, and into ſuch a diſadvantageous country, had it not been with a view to the miraculous deliverance, which God intended to accompliſh for them at the Red-ſea. But, 3. It is evident, that, from Succoth to the Red-ſea, the Iſraelites travelled under the immediate guidance of heaven, for the pillar of the cloud, and of fire, which moved before them, directed them where to go, and Moſes had no room left him to chuſe the way, but was only to obſerve the guidance of this glorious and miraculous ſignal, and to follow, as that led him, from Succoth to Etham, to Pihahiroth between Migdol and Baal-zephon, and to the ſea.

Ver. 19. And Moſes took the bones of Joſeph with him, &c.] The Jews declare, that the Iſraelites placed theſe precious remains of that great patriarch in a ſumptuous car, or open hearſe, which they cauſed to march under the guard and conduct of the tribes of Ephraim and Manaſſeh, the two children of Joſeph. They likewiſe affirm, that every tribe brought away the bones of the heads of their families; but tho' Joſephus afford us no intimation of any ſuch act of filial piety, yet St. Stephen ſeems to allude to ſome ſuch tradition among them, when he ſaid, that Jacob and the fathers went down into Egypt, and were carried over into Sychem, and laid in the ſepulchre which Abraham bought of the ſons of Emmor, Acts vii. 15, 16.

The Jewiſh comment entitled, Elle Haddevarim Rabba, relates, that whilſt the Iſraelites were ſpoiling the Egyptians, Moſes had employed three or four days in ſearching for the body of Joſeph, and that when he at laſt began to deſpair of finding it, an aged woman, whom he met by the Nile, informed him that it lay at the bottom of the river, near the place where they ſtood, but that the weighty coffin was ſunk ſo deep by that time, that it would be abſolutely impoſſible for him to draw it up. Whereupon Moſes having addreſſed himſelf to God in a ſhort prayer, and then called aloud to the patriarch Joſeph, reminding him of his prophecy, and the oath he had exacted from the Iſraelites, with relation to his bones, the coffin immediately ſwam to the ſhore.

CHAP. XIV.

1 God inſtructeth the Iſraelites in their journey. 5 Pharaoh purſueth after them. 10 The Iſraelites murmur. 13 Moſes comforteth them. 15 God inſtructeth Moſes. 19 The cloud removeth behind the camp. 21 The Iſraelites paſs through the Red ſea. 23 Which droweth the Egyptians.

AND the LORD ſpake unto Moſes ſaying,

2 Speak unto the children of Iſrael, that they turn and encamp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the ſea, over-againſt Baal-zephon: before it ſhall ye encamp by the ſea.

3 For Pharaoh will ſay of the children of Iſrael, They are intangled in the land, the wilderneſs hath ſhut them in.

4 And I will harden Pharaohs heart, that he ſhall follow after them, and I will be honoured upon Pharaoh, and upon all his hoſt; that the Egyptians may know that I am the LORD. And they did ſo.

5 ¶ And it was told the king of Egypt, that the people fled: and the heart of Pharaoh and of his ſervants was turned againſt the people, and they ſaid, Why have we done this, that we have let Iſrael go from ſerving us?

6 And he made ready his chariot, and took his people with him.

7 And he took ſix hundred choſen chariots, and all the chariots of Egypt, and captains over every one of them.

8 And the LORD hardened the heart of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and he purſued after the children of Iſrael: and the children of Iſrael went out with an high hand.

9 But

9 But the Egyptians purſued after them (all the horſes and chariots of Pharaoh, and his horſemen, and his army) and overtook them encamping by the ſea, beſide Pi-hahiroth before Baal-zephon.

10 ¶ And when Pharaoh drew nigh, the children of Iſrael lift up their eyes, and behold, the Egyptians marched after them, and they were ſore afraid: and the children of Iſrael cried out unto the LORD.

11 And they ſaid unto Moſes, becauſe there were no graves in Egypt, haſt thou taken us away to die in the wilderneſs? Wherefore haſt thou dealt thus with us, to carry us forth out of Egypt?

12 Is not this the word that we did tell thee in Egypt, ſaying, Let us alone, that we may ſerve the Egyptians? For it had been better for us to ſerve the Egyptians, than that we ſhould die in the wilderneſs.

13 ¶ And Moſes ſaid unto the people, Fear ye not, ſtand ſtill, and ſee the ſalvation of the LORD which he will ſhew to you to day: for the Egyptians whom ye have ſeen to day, ye ſhall ſee them again no more for ever.

14 The LORD ſhall fight for you, and ye ſhall hold your peace.

15 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Wherefore crieſt thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Iſrael, that they go forward.

16 But lift thou up thy rod, and ſtretch out thine hand over the ſea, and divide it: and the children of Iſrael ſhall go on dry ground through the mids of the ſea.

17 And I, behold, I will harden the hearts of the Egyptians, and they ſhall follow them: and I will get me honour upon Pharaoh, and upon all his hoſt, upon his chariots, and upon his horſemen.

18 And the Egyptians ſhall know that I am the LORD, when I have gotten me honour upon Pharaoh, upon his chariots, and upon his horſemen.

19 ¶ And the Angel of God, which went before the camp of Iſrael, removed and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and ſtood behind them.

20 And it came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Iſrael, and it was a cloud and darkneſs to them, but it gave light by night to theſe: ſo that the one came not near the other all the night.

21 And Moſes ſtretched out his hand over the ſea, and the LORD cauſed the ſea to go back by a ſtrong eaſt-wind all that night, and made the ſea dry land, and the waters were divided.

22 And the children of Iſrael went into the midſt of the ſea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left.

23 ¶ And the Egyptians purſued, and went in after them, to the midſt of the ſea, even all Pharaohs horſes, his chariots, and his horſemen.

24 And it came to paſs, that in the morning-watch the LORD looked unto the hoſt of the Egyptians, through the pillar of fire, and of the cloud, and troubled the hoſt of the Egyptians.

25 And took off their chariot-wheels, that they drave them heavily: ſo that the Egyptians ſaid, Let us flee from the face of Iſrael; for the LORD fighteth for them againſt the Egyptians.

26 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Stretch out thine hand over the ſea, that the waters may come again upon the Egyptians, upon their chariots, and upon their horſemen.

27 And Moſes ſtretched forth his hand over the ſea, and the ſea returned to his ſtrength when the morning appeared, and the Egyptians fled againſt it: and the LORD overthrew the Egyptians in the midſt of the ſea.

28 And the waters returned and covered the chariots and the horſemen, and all the hoſt of Pharaoh, that came into the ſea after them: there remained not ſo much as one of them.

29 But the children of Iſrael walked upon dry land in the midſt of the ſea: and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left.

30 Thus the LORD ſaved Iſrael that day out of the hands of the Egyptians: and Iſrael ſaw the Egyptians dead upon the ſea-ſhore.

31 And Iſrael ſaw that great work which the LORD did upon the Egyptians: and the people feared the LORD, and believed the LORD, and his ſervant Moſes.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Iſrael that they turn and encamp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the ſea, over-againſt Baal-zephon: Before it ſhall ye encamp by the ſea.] The word Pi-hahiroth, which, in our Engliſh and ſome other tranſlations, is repreſented as a proper name, is rendered by the Septuagint as two appellative words, but in the book of Numbers, chap. xxxiii. ver. 7, 8. Pi is rendered an appellative (tho' differently, viz. ver. 7. by στόμα, mouth, and ver. 8. together with the adjoining prepoſition ἀπέναντι over-againſt) and Hahiroth is in both verſes rendered as a proper name, Eiroth; the article ha being omitted. Hence ſome are of opinion, that by by the Hebrew word Pi-hahiroth, is to be underſtood a mouth, or narrow paſſage between two mountains, called Chiroth, or Eiroth, and lying not far from the bottom of the weſtern coaſt of the Red-ſea, before which mouth or narrow paſſage, the children of Iſrael encamped.

Migdol was a city on the weſtern-ſhore, and towards the end of the Red-ſea, and it was one of the cities or towns, wherein the Jews dwelt, who took Jeremiah the prophet along with them into Egypt, as that prophet informs us, Jerem. xliv. 1. The Septuagint tranſlation renders this name Magdelus, and ſince we meet with a city of the ſame name in the ancient hiſtorian Herodotus, we may venture to conclude that they were one and the ſame place.

Baal-zephon is thought, by many learned men, to have been the name of an idol, whoſe province it was to protect the borders of the country, and prevent ſlaves from eſcaping out of it. The word Baal ſignifies Lord, in the Hebrew tongue, and hence is the name generally applied to the eaſtern idols. The other word Zephon, is thought to be a derivation from the root Zaphah, which ſignifies to watch, ſpy, and the like. Hence it is conjectured, that this idol had its temple on the top of the adjacent mountains; and that it is peculiarly taken notice of by the ſacred hiſtorian, to ſhew how unable it was to hinder the Iſraelites from departing out of Egypt, notwithſtanding all the notions the Egyptians entertained of its extraordinary power.

Ver. 5. And it was told the king of Egypt, that the people fled: And the heart of Pharaoh and of his ſervants was turned againſt the people, &c.] Pharaoh ſoon repented of the permiſſion he granted the Iſraelites to depart from Egypt; eſpecially upon its being remonſtrated to him that the people fled; and conſequently were not gone a few days journey, meerly to ſerve the Lord, but with an intention to return no more into his dominions. The loſs of ſo many ſlaves was a ſenſible diminution of his grandeur and wealth, and the manner in which their departure had been extorted from him, was conſider'd by him as inglorious to himſelf and his kingdom. He therefore immediately ſummon'd his forces together and purſued the Iſraelites with a numerous army.

Ver. 11. And they ſaid unto Moſes, becauſe there were no graves in Egypt, haſt thou taken us away to die in the wilderneſs?] Never was there a ſituation more diſmal than that of theſe fugitives. On the weſt they were hemm'd in by a chain of mountains: The ſea ſhut up the eaſt and north ſide, and Pharaoh's army the ſouth. What could they do in this condition? Should they croſs the mountains? They were inacceſſible. Should they go by ſea? They had neither pilots nor ſhips. Should they force their way through the army of Pharaoh? They wanted all warlike inſtruments, and courage. There ſtill remained only one choice; which was to turn their eyes and hearts towards that cloud, where their captain ſat, and to put themſelves under the wings of that good providence, which had ſo miraculouſly protected them, and to call to their aſſiſtance that arm, that invincible arm, which had already ſtretch'd itſelf out after ſo dreadfull a manner; which had already wrought ſuch glorious and ſuch terrible wonders on their behalf. But inſtead of thus imploring the help of God, they murmur'd againſt him, in murmuring againſt thoſe miniſters, who, by his orders, and by his miracles, had brought them to this place. They renew'd thoſe ſophiſms of infidelity, of which they had been guilty when Pharaoh redoubled their tasks: Sophiſms that had been confuted after ſo miraculous a manner, and by ſuch manifeſt wonders. They furiouſly ask'd Aaron and Moſes, whether there were not graves enough in Egypt, without ſeeking for them in the wilderneſs, and without being oblig'd to expoſe themſelves to a more tragical kind of death? Moſes had born, with patience and conſtancy, the ſight of the mountains, of the devouring ocean, and of Pharaoh's army; becauſe he relied upon the help of God: But he could not bear that of a rebellious people, who, by their complaints and murmurings, were about to arm heaven alſo againſt him; Heaven, infinitely more formidable than the armies of thoſe Egyptians, than the horror of thoſe mountains, than the waves of that ſea; He pour'd out his ſorrows into the boſom of God. He himſelf has expreſs'd this circumſtance in a manner full of grandeur and majeſty. The book of Exodus does not mention his prayer: We only find there that God ſaid to Moſes, Wherefore crieſt thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Iſrael, that they go forwards. He had, doubtleſs, offered up an internal prayer to God, a cry without a voice, as one of the ancients expreſſes it, or, according to the Apoſtle, ſome of thoſe groanings which cannot be utter'd, which the Holy Ghoſt cauſes to proceed from the center of thoſe hearts which he himſelf animates, and which God always hears: God commanded this law-giver to prepare himſelf to ſtrike the ſea with that rod, which had already wrought ſo many wonders in Egypt; and promiſed he would open a way for him a-croſs the waters.

Ver. 19. And the angel of God, which went before the camp of Iſrael, removed, and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and ſtood behind them.] A wonderful phænomenon, all dark on one ſide, and all ſhining on the other, in the ſhape of a pillar, was a guide to the Iſraelites. It was deſtined to different purpoſes: It ſerved to lead them along the way in the day-time, and to ſcreen them from the ſcorching ſun: It lighted them during the night, that nothing might retard their march: It cover'd them from the eyes of their enemies; and ſo became, as Moſes ſpeaks, "a cloud and darkneſs to the Egyptians, "but it gave light by night to the Iſraelites." Or, as the Jews ſay, "half light and half darkneſs; the light illumi-"nated the people of God; and the darkneſs blinded "their enemies." It was likewiſe as the throne of God, from whence he gave his oracles. 'Tis for that reaſon that Moſes ſays, that "the angel of God went from before the "camp of the Iſraelites, and that the pillar of the cloud "went from before their face;" becauſe the angel himſelf accompanied, and put the cloud in motion. Some Jews affirm, that this angel was Michael the great prince, who had raiſed a wall of fire between the camp of the Egyptians, and that of the Iſraelites. Others maintain, that this was the Shechinah, the preſence of God, which they ſtile, Prince of the world, becauſe it has the government thereof. God is repreſented to us, by Moſes, as ſpeaking from the midſt of this phænomenon, which was the ſign of his preſence. 'Tis from thence, if we believe ſome critics, that proceeded the religious worſhip, of which Clemens Alexandrinus relates ſeveral inſtances, and which was paid to columns or pillars, before that idolatry, which had ſtatues for its object, was eſtabliſhed in the world. Perhaps it is to the ſame ſource that we may refer thoſe notions of the poets, who often repreſent their gods as carried upon the clouds.

Ver. 21. And Moſes ſtretched out his hand over the ſea, and the Lord cauſed the ſea to go back by a ſtrong eaſt wind all that night, and made the ſea dry land, and the waters were divided.] Tho' it were needleſs, as well as endleſs, to trouble our readers with an enquiry into all the particulars, with which the generality of commentators have amuſed themſelves, with reſpect to this wonderful paſſage; it will however be proper, to make a ſhort enquiry into the main and moſt material point, namely, whether it was really miraculous or not; that is, whether the ſea was really divided by a ſupernatural power, or whether Moſes and his hoſt did only coaſt ſome part of it, or croſs but a ſmall branch of it, at low water, having calculated the proper time for this paſſage ſo exactly, that Pharaoh periſhed in his attempt to perform the like. This is ſo far from being a new queſtion, that Artaphanes, an ancient writer, aſſures us, that both theſe opinions were held by the Egyptian prieſts; that is, the former by thoſe of Heliopolis, and the latter by thoſe of Memphis. The laſt of theſe has alſo been followed by many eminent men, both Jews and Chriſtians, who, without denying the main part of this tranſaction to have been miraculous, have fallen into the notion of the Iſraelites not paſſing through the ſea, but only coaſting it along, and making as it were a ſemicircle round the ſea-ſhore at low ebb; or croſſing it only at one narrow point, whilſt the tyde was very low. We ſhall content our ſelves with obſerving, that ſuch an opinion cannot be maintained, without a manifeſt deviation, 1. from the expreſs words of Moſes, and ſeveral other places in the ſacred books, where this tranſaction is mentioned: 2. from reaſon and experience, founded upon the knowledge we have of the ebbing and flowing of the Red-ſea, and the impoſſibility of ſuch a numerous hoſt's performing ſuch a coaſting, or croſſing in ſo little a time as that admits of: 3. from the known character of Moſes as a true hiſtorian, and from ſome concurring teſtimonies of antiquity to his account: and, laſtly, from the great majority of authors, of all religions and ages, who have conſtantly maintained, and ſome of them proved, the contrary opinion. As to the firſt, nothing is plainer, than that the whole tenor of the Moſaic account is directly oppoſite to ſuch a notion. We need mention but ſome few paſſages of it; ſuch as, "That upon his ſtretching out "his rod, by God's command, over the waters, a mighty "wind aroſe and divided them; that they ſtood up on "heaps, and were as a wall on the right and left; that "the bottom of the ſea was dried up, and that the Iſrael-"ites marched through it as on dry land," and the like. "That God divided the Red-ſea into parts, or diviſions, "and made Iſrael paſs through the midſt of it; that he "led them by the right-hand of Moſes, dividing the wa-"ters before them, to make himſelf an everlaſting name; "and that he led them through the deep as an horſe in "the wilderneſs; that he did walk, or rather, cauſed If-"rael to walk, through the ſea;" and many more of the like nature, to ſay nothing of the Apocryphal books, which abound with the ſame expreſſions. If it be objected, that the laſt quoted paſſages out of the Pſalms and Prophets are poetical, and conſequently not to be taken in their literal ſenſe, all that can be inferr'd from thence is, that they conveyed to us loftier ideas of this wonderful event, than Moſes, whoſe ſtyle is far from being ſwoln, has done in his account of it; but it would be unreaſonable to ſay, that they were only deſigned to expreſs a tranſaction ſo purely natural and eaſy, as many have ſuppoſed it to have been. Upon the whole, the ſcriptures repreſenting this action, with all its circumſtances, as altogether miraculous, we muſt either reject their authority, or elſe allow, that this paſſage was more than a mere coaſting along ſome part of the ſea, or croſſing it at ſome narrow creek, when the waters were retired.

Whether Joſephus deſign'd to leſſen the miracle, or make it appear more credible, when he tells us, that the Pamphilian-ſea open'd a paſſage to Alexander in his expedition againſt the Perſians, is not very material; for though we ſhould grant that to be the right meaning of his words, and that he might have met with that account in ſome book then extant; or even that Q. Curtius intimates ſomething like it, when he ſays that that conqueror had opened a new way by the ſea; yet Strabo will ſoon ſet us right; for he tells us, that there is a hill by the Pamphilian-ſea, call'd Clyman, by which there is a paſſage along the ſea-ſhore; the waters of it ſo abating, when the ſea is calm and ſtill, that the ground is left naked, which at the flowing of the waters is cover'd again; and that Alexander coming that way, ſet forward before the waters return'd; but that it happening then to be winter, the waters recoiling before he had paſt it, he was forc'd all that day to wade through the water up to his middle. 'Tis plain then, that there is no parity between the paſſage of the Iſraelites, and the coaſting of Alexander, whatever the Jewiſh hiſtorians deſign might be in mentioning them together.

We come now, ſecondly, to ſhew that the notion of Moſes leading them along the ſea-ſhore, or through a narrow point, is contrary to reaſon; and here we readily grant, that the Red-ſea ebbs and flows like other ſeas that have a communication with the ocean; that is, that the waters of it riſe towards the ſhore, during ſix hours, and after having continued about one quarter of an hour at high-water, they ebb down again during another ſix hours. Thoſe who have examin'd it with the utmoſt exactneſs, likewiſe aſſure us, that the greateſt diſtance that it falls from the place of high-water, is about three hundred yards; and that during the time of low-water one may ſafely travel it, as ſome have actually done. We purpoſely omit ſeveral other minute circumſtances urg'd on both ſides of this queſtion, to avoid prolixity: But from what is here premis'd and allow'd on all hands, it is evident that theſe three hundred paces, which the ſea leaves uncover'd, during the time of low water, can continue ſo, but for the ſpace of half an hour at moſt; for during the firſt ſix hours the ſea gradually retires, and in leſs than half an hour it begins again to flow towards the ſhore. The moſt therefore that can be allow'd, both with reſpect to time and the ſpace of paſſable ground, in a moderate computation, is about two hundred paces, during ſix hours, or one hundred and fifty paces during eight hours. Now it is plain, that a multitude conſiſting at of upwards of two millions and half of men, women, children, and ſlaves, encumbered beſides with numerous flocks of cattle, great quantities of houſhold ſtuff, and the ſpoils of the Egyptians, could never perform ſuch a march in ſo ſhort, we may even ſay, within twice that period of time, tho' we ſhould allow them alſo double the breadth of ground for their march. This argument will hold equally good againſt thoſe who ſuppoſe they only coaſted along ſome part of the ſea, and thoſe who maintain that they croſs'd that ſmall arm or point of it, which is towards the farther end, and near the port of Suez, ſeeing that ſix or eight hours could not have ſufficed for the paſſage of ſo immenſe a multitude, much leſs for Pharaoh to have enter'd it with his whole hoſt.

It will not be amiſs here to obſerve, not only how improbable it is that none of the Egyptians, ſhould know any thing of the ebbing and flowing of the ſea; but how abſurd it is to ſuppoſe, that they ſhould all obſtinately perſiſt in purſuing the Iſraelites through it, when they ſaw it gradually returning upon them, till they were all ſwallowed up by it. Beſides, who can ſuppoſe that the Iſraelites venturing into the ſea was a premeditated thing? Or even that Moſes could entertain the leaſt ſuſpicion that the Egyptians would be ſo ſoon at their heels, they who had been ſo lately and ſo ſeverely plagued for detaining them, and were ſo urgent for their departure? Sure it is, that if he had any ſuch thought, he acted moſt impoliticly, in bringing them into a place, where they were hemm'd in by the ſea on one hand, and the mountains on the other; becauſe had Pharaoh, upon his arrival at Pi-hahiroth, immediately fallen upon them, as it was natural to expect, they muſt have been obliged to plunge into the ſea, long before the tide had opened a paſſage to them, if not at the very time of high water, in which caſe they muſt all have inevitably periſhed.

And this brings us to our third obſervation, that ſuch a notion is repugnant to the known character of Moſes, even as a meer hiſtorian; and that it calls in queſtion, not only his avow'd modeſty and veracity, but even his ſenſe, learning and experience. For on the one hand, who can imagine that the maintainers of it can give any credit to his relation, when he tells them, that God alone, who knew what paſt in Egypt, did unexpectedly make them take this new route? When he deſcribes his own ſurpriſe and the people's conſternation at the ſight of the Egyptian army? When he aſſures them, that God interpoſed with his miraculous power for their preſervation; and, in a word, that he divided the ſea to open a free paſſage for them, and to overwhelm their enemies? What notion muſt they entertain of his ſincerity, when he cauſes all Iſrael to reſound the praiſes of God, as the author of a deliverance which was entirely owing to his own policy. On the other hand, what muſt they think of the conduct and experience of a man who could be guilty of ſuch an overſight, as leading them into the very mouth of the extremeſt danger, and ſo weak as to betray it, tho' cloked with the preſence of a miraculous power and direction? We ſhall only add, that he muſt have been the moſt imprudent man alive, had he imagined it poſſible to make ſuch a vaſt, and not over credulous multitude believe, that their paſſage was as miraculous as he repreſented it to them, when they could not but be well aſſured to the contrary; much leſs could he preſume, to inſtitute a ſolemn feſtival of ſeven days; and enjoin it to be obſerved by them and their poſterity to all future ages, in commemoration of their pretended miraculous paſſage through the Red-ſea, when the experience of a much ſhorter time, than they continued along that coaſt, could eaſily have convinced them that there was no reality in what he had related; and the whole affair was no more than what was natural, and happened every day. Theſe abſurd conſequences, which naturally flow from that opinion, are ſo evident, and the ſyſtem itſelf has been ſo fully confuted long ago by the learned Diodorus Tarſenſis, Chryſoſtom's maſter, that it hath met with few advocates. And even among theſe, the greateſt part, eſpecially Grotius and Le Clerc, acknowledge the interpoſition of a Divine Power, in raiſing and continuing that mighty wind, and cauſing, thereby, the waters to retire much farther than uſual, and to recoil with greater force upon the Egyptians.

We

We obſerv'd farther on this head, that this opinion was contrary to ſeveral concurring teſtimonies of antiquity. We have already mention'd that of the Heliopolites, who acknowledged the miraculouſneſs of this tranſaction, and whoſe authority ought to be of greater weight than that of the Memphites, becauſe ſuch a confeſſion of the Divine Power can be aſcrib'd to nothing but the force of truth, and notoriety of fact, whatever motives their brethren of Memphis might have to diſown it. We ſhall content our ſelves with juſt mentioning one more. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the Ichthyophagi, who inhabited along the coaſts of the Red-ſea, towards the farther end of it, had a conſtant tradition, that the ſea had formerly been divided by a ſtrong wind; and that the waves being parted into two heaps, the bottom, which was left naked, had appeared full of verdure; which can hardly be applicable to any tranſaction but this before us.

We ſhall only add, that among thoſe who acknowledge a Divine Power to have interpoſed in this ſignal tranſaction, ſome have endeavoured to reduce the miracle into a very narrow compaſs, whilſt others, who preſcribed no bounds to their zeal, have enlarged it beyond all meaſure.

Of the former claſs are thoſe who have deſcribed the diviſion of the ſea, and the erect poſition of the waves, to an exceſſive cold wind, which froze them into ſtability, as faſt as it blew them up; after which a warmer gale being ſuffered to riſe, ſoon thawed and rolled them into their former ſtation. Of this ſentiment were, 1. The ſeventy interpreters, who tranſlated the words of Moſes's ſong, the waters were frozen, 2. The Chaldee paraphraſt. 3. The author of the book of Judith, [chap. v. 13.] 4. Some of the verſions of the Septuagint; and laſtly, among the many moderns, father Martianay, in a ſpecimen he has given us of ſome curious diſcoveries which he had made in the ſacred text, mentions this as one of them, that the waters of the Red-ſea were frozen. A Jewiſh Rabbi (R. Maroc. lib. de Advent. Meſſiæ. c. 5.) has fancied that the ſea was not divided, but frozen hard enough for the Iſraelites to paſs over it, tho' it thawed upon their purſuers. On the other hand, Origen, to magnify this great miracle, has preſerved an ancient tradition of the Jews, which affirms, that God opened the ſea in twelve different columns, that every tribe might paſs in a ſeparate track. This tradition ſeems to have been founded on the 13th verſe of the cxxxvi. Pſalm, which declares, that God divided the ſea into parts, but he can hardly think ſuch enthuſiaſtic imagination worth confuting, any more than that of Sadulins, who thinks that God did even overturn the rocks, and root up the plants that grew on the bottom of the ſea, leſt they ſhould obſtruct the rapid paſſage of the Iſraelites.

CHAP. XV.

1 Moſes's ſong. 22 The people want water. 23 The waters at Marah are bitter. 25 A tree ſweetneth them. 27 At Elim are twelve wells, and ſeventy palm-trees.

THEN ſang Moſes and the children of Iſrael this ſong unto the LORD, and ſpake, ſaying, I will ſing unto the LORD, for he hath triumphed glorioufly; the horſe and his rider hath he thrown into the ſea.

2 The LORD is my ſtrength and ſong, and he is become my ſalvation: he is my God, and I will prepare him an habitation; my fathers God, and I will exalt him.

3 The LORD is a man of war: The LORD is his name.

4 Pharaohs chariots and his hoſt hath he caſt into the ſea: his choſen captains alſo are drowned in the Red ſea.

5 The depths have covered them: they ſank into the bottom as a ſtone.

6 Thy right hand, O LORD, is become glorious in power: thy right hand, O LORD, hath daſhed in pieces the enemy.

7 And in the greatneſs of thine excellency thou haſt overthrown them that roſe up againſt thee: thou ſenteſt forth thy wrath, which conſumed them as ſtubble.

8 And with the blaſt of thy noſtrils the waters were gathered together: the floods ſtood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the ſea.

9 The enemy ſaid, I will purſue, I will overtake, I will divide the ſpoil: my luſt ſhall be ſatisfied upon them, I will draw my ſword, my hand ſhall deſtroy them.

10 Thou didſt blow with thy wind, the ſea covered them: they ſank as lead in the mighty waters.

11 Who is like unto thee, O LORD, amongſt the gods? who is like thee, glorious in holineſs, fearful in praiſes, doing wonders!

12 Thou ſtretchedſt out thy right hand, the earth ſwallowed them.

13 Thou in thy mercy haſt led forth the people which thou haſt redeemed: thou haſt guided them in thy ſtrength unto thy holy habitation.

14 The people ſhall hear, and be afraid: ſorrow ſhall take hold on the inhabitants of Paleſtina.

15 Then the dukes of Edom ſhall be amazed, the mighty men of Moab, trembling ſhall take hold upon them: all the inhabitants of Canaan ſhall melt away.

16 Fear and dread ſhall fall upon them, by the greatneſs of thine arm they ſhall be as ſtill as a ſtone: till thy people paſs over, O LORD, till the people paſs over, which thou haſt purchaſed.

17 Thou ſhalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O LORD, which thou haſt made for thee to dwell in: in the ſanctuary, O LORD, which thy hands have eſtabliſhed.

18 The LORD ſhall reign for ever and ever.

19 For the horſe of Pharaoh went in with his chariots, and with his horſemen, into the ſea, and the LORD brought again the waters of the ſea upon them: but the children of Iſrael went on dry land in the mids of the ſea.

20 ¶ And Miriam the propheteſs, the ſiſter of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and and all the women went out after her, with timbrels, and with dances.

21 And Miriam anſwered them, Sing ye to the LORD, for he hath triumphed glorioufly; the horſe and his rider hath he thrown into the ſea.

22 So Moſes brought Iſrael from the Red ſea, and they went out into the wilderneſs of Shur: and they went three days in the wilderneſs, and found no water.

23 ¶ And when they came to Marah, they could not drink of the waters of Marah, for they were bitter: therefore the name of it was called Marah.

24 And the people murmured againſt Moſes, ſaying, What ſhall we drink?

25 And he cried unto the LORD, and the LORD ſhewed him a tree, which when he had caſt into the waters, the waters were made ſweet: there he made for them a ſtatute and an ordinance, and there he proved them,

26 And ſaid, If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the LORD thy God, and wilt do that which is right in his ſight, and wilt give ear to his commandments, and keep all his ſtatutes, I will put none of theſe diſeaſes upon thee, which I have brought upon the Egyptians: for I am the LORD that healeth thee.

27 ¶ And they came to Elim, where were twelve wells of water, and threeſcore and ten palm-trees: and they encamped there by the waters.

Ver. 1. Then ſang Moſes and the children of Iſrael this ſong unto the Lord, &c.] The miraculous eſcape of the Iſraelites inſpired them with the utmoſt tranſports of a religious and grateful joy; and Moſes improved the opportunity preſented to him by this happy Diſpoſition in compoſing this admirable ſong, to celebrate the praiſes of their Almighty deliverer. He then divided the Iſraelites into two choirs, and placed himſelf and his brother Aaron at the head of the men, and his ſiſter Miriam at the head of the women.

Joſephus, l. 11. c. ult. of his antiquities, ſaith this ſong is compos'd ἐν ἑξαμέτρῳ τόνῳ, of Hexameter verſe: Which Euſebius repreſents as the opinion of many others, l. xi. de prepar. Evang. c. 3. but we do not ſee how this can be made out; nor what St. Hierom ſaith concerning ſuch ſongs in many places. And after all the pains that Franc. Gomarus has taken in his Lyra Davidis, to find of what ſort of numbers this and other ſongs of the ſcripture conſiſts, he hath not given any ſatisfaction to learned men; who think (as Ludov. Capellus doth in his Animadverſions on that book) that all the Bible may be made verſe, according to this method: Nay, by his way of reſolving ſentences, all the orations of Tully and Demoſthenes may be turn'd into verſe of ſome ſort or other. The author of Sepher Coris ſeems to deal ingennouſly, who, when the king of Coſar objects to them, that the ſongs in the Bible are not artificially compos'd, according to numbers and quantities of feet and ſyllables, makes the Jew anſwer, that the ſcripture poetry was of a nobler ſort, not form'd to tickle the ear, but affect the heart, by the great heighth and elevation of the ſenſe, together with lofty expreſſions, whereby men were mov'd to attend to it, and to keep it in mind; P. ii. Sect. 69. And ſo much Abarbinel acknowledges upon this place, that no ſuch verſes, conſiſting in the number and quantity of ſyllables, are to be found either in the Bible, or in the Talmud, (either in the Miſchna or the Gemara) but are of later invention among the Jews, in imitation of the Arabians and other nations among whom they dwelt in a long captivity. Yet in the ſcripture poetry, there is a certain diſpoſition of words, which make them melodious, and fit to be ſung to muſical inſtruments; and ſo ſententious, that they might be more eaſily remembered than ſimple narrations: Tho' now, after ſo many ages, they cannot reduce this poetry to rules. He tries indeed to bring this ſong under certain regulations; fancying that it conſiſts of eight orders or ranks (as he calls them) two of which are very ſhort, and two very long; and four of a middle ſize: Which he proſecutes with much ſubtlety, but with little ſatisfaction.

Ver. 3. The Lord is a man of war, &c.] The Lord obtains great victories, as the Targum expreſſes it. The Hebrews, when they would intimate any eminent quality, prefix the word iſch, a man, to it. As 1 Sam. xvii. 33. we meet with this very expreſſion concerning Goliah, a man of war from his youth, that is, a great warrior, and in the preceding chapter David is called iſch milchamah, a man of war, and iſch toar, a man of form or beauty, i. e. a comely or amiable perſon. And in this very book iſch devarim, a man of words, is an eloquent man.

Ver. 7. ——— Thou ſenteſt forth thy wrath.] This ſeems to be alluſion to God's looking upon the Egyptians through the pillar of fire, and of the cloud, and to the thunder and lightning which were darted from that amazing Phænomenon.

Ver. 8. And with the blaſt of thy noſtrils the waters were gathered together.] This may relate to the ſtrong wind, which drove the ſea back. The word Aram, or Haram, ſignifies to heap up together: From whence the Arabians call thoſe great banks which are raiſed for the prevention of inundations, by the name of Arem, or Harem. The paſſage before us may therefore be tranſlated, the waters were heaped up as banks, on each ſide of the Iſraelites.

Ver. 11. Who is like unto thee among the gods?] Or the mighty ones, as it is in the margin; for elim is the plural of el, which comes from ejalah, a word that denotes fortitude, or ſtrength. From him proceeds all power and might, but he himſelf is too ſublime and awful to be likened to any other power.

Fearful in praiſes.] We cannot diſcover any ſolidity in the gloſs of R. Elieſer, that Moſes ſpeaks in the plural number, becauſe the Angels praiſed God above, when the Iſraelites praiſed him below. [Pierke Elief. c. 42.] The plain meaning is, that he ought to be praiſed with the greateſt reverence, for to him alone belongs all honour and glory, who can never be ſufficiently praiſed.

Ver. 17. The mountain of thine inheritance.] Moſes ſeems to have foreſeen, by the ſpirit of prophecy, that God would place his habitation upon mount Sion; which he underſtood, perhaps, from the intended ſacrifice of Iſaac upon mount Moriah.

Ver. 19. The Horſes of Pharaoh went in with his chariots, &c.] This is what the Greeks call the Epiphonema of the ſong, and Moſes briefly comprehends in it the whole ſubject of it, and makes it end as it began.

Ver. 20. And Miriam.] Or as the Septuagint, the Syriac, and others read it, Mariam, which ſignifies bitterneſs (as the Arabic word Marara doth) and that the inhuman treatment which the Iſraelites received from Pharaoh, eſpecially his decree for the deſtruction of all the male children, was the occaſion of this name, for it made their lives bitter to them. But Le Moine conjectures, not improbably, that this name has the ſignification of Mariam, which denotes a drop of the ſea: From which the ſtory of Venus was framed, among the Greeks, who repreſented her as having ſprung from the froth of the ſea, which gave her the name of Aphrodite. The fable of Diana alſo, had no other original but from what is here ſaid of Miriam, as Huetius hath conjectured with reaſon, in his Demonſtratio Evang. propoſ. IV. c. 12. Sect. 4.

The propheteſs.] She perhaps was called by this name, becauſe ſhe had a talent of compoſing hymns, in praiſe of the Divine Majeſty; which it is certain, is ſometimes meant by prophecy in Scripture: See 1 Sam. x. 5, 6. And thus among the Greeks a poet and a prophet were ſynonymous terms, and the Latin word vates ſignifies both. For as as Quintilian has obſerv'd, L. i. c. 10. Muſic was had in ſuch veneration in ancient times, that iidem muſici, & vates, & ſapientes judicarentur. Muſicians, prophets, and wiſemen were the ſame. But there are other paſſages in the ſacred ſcripture, which ſeem to intimate that ſhe likewiſe received revelations from God, for the direction of the people. Particularly, Mich. vi. 4. where ſhe is mentioned as one that conducted Iſrael out of Egypt. To which we may add her own words with Aaron's, Numb. xii. 2. Hath not the Lord ſpoken by us alſo? Perhaps ſhe alſo inſtructed the women, as Moſes and Aaron did the men.

The ſiſter of Aaron.] And why not the ſiſter of Moſes? The common anſwer is, that Aaron and ſhe lived longeſt together; Moſes having been abſent from them 40 years: Or perhaps Moſes was not by the ſame mother. She was married to Hur, if we may credit Joſephus.

Took a timbrel in her hand.] So the manner was in after times, when they propheſied, 1 Sam. x. 5, 6. 2 Kings iii. 15. And when they ſung hymns, Pſal. xxxiii. 2. lvii. 7, 8. And upon any occaſion of great rejoicing, Judg. xi. 34. 1 Sam. xviii. 6. From whence we may learn how ancient muſic was in the ſervice of God; there being nothing in which we can be better employ'd, than in the celebration of his praiſes. And it ought to be remarked, that this harmonious manner of praiſing the Deity was no part of the Moſaical inſtitutions, but received its original from times much more ancient than the promulgation of the law.

Ver. 21. And Miriam anſwered them, &c.] That is, She and the women anſwered Moſes and the people, verſe by verſe, or after every verſe ſung by Moſes and the men, Miriam and the women interpoſed, and repeated this verſe, which is the firſt of the ſong, Sing to the Lord for he hath triumphed glorioufly, &c. And this was the manner of ſinging in after times, as appears from Pſalm cxxxv. and Ezra iii. 11. and of which we intend to give ſome account in our annotations on the book of Pſalms. This practice juſtifies, or rather commends our manner of chanting the Pſalms, interchangeably, by reſponſes, as they are properly called, and which is undoubtedly the moſt ancient cuſtom, and is repreſented in Iſa. vi. 3. as practiſed by the Angels themſelves, when they offer up their adoration to the divine majeſty.

Ver. 22. So Moſes brought out Iſrael from the Red-ſea, and they went out into the wilderneſs of Shur.] From comparing this verſe with Numb. xxxiii. 8. where it is ſaid, that the children of Iſrael paſſed through the midſt of the ſea into the wilderneſs, and went three days journey in the wilderneſs of Etham; it is evident, that Shur and Etham, are names of the ſame wilderneſs. By the name of Shur, is denoted in ſcripture, all the weſtern part of Stony Arabia. We read in the 13th chapter of this book, ver. 20. That the Iſraelites took their journey from Succoth; and encamped in Etham, in the edge of the wilderneſs, and which was near the Red-ſea. If there was any difference, therefore, between the wilderneſs of Shur, and that of Etham, it ſeems to have been only this, that they differ one from the other, as a whole from its part. As Shur ſeems to have been the general name of all that part of Arabia Petræa, which lay next to Egypt, ſo by the wilderneſs of Shur was, probably, denoted all the deſart tract thereof. Whereas, only part of this deſart tract, namely, ſo much as lay neareſt to Etham, was peculiarly called, the wilderneſs of Etham. It is alſo further obſervable, that from what is related by Moſes concerning the paſſage of the Iſraelites over the Red-ſea into the wilderneſs of Shur or Etham, it muſt follow, that they paſs'd this ſea not far from the bottom or northern extremity of it, ſince that was the ſituation of Shur and Etham.

Thevenot tells us, that the place where the Iſraelites are ſuppoſed, by the inhabitants of the country, to have come out of the Red-ſea, is at preſent called Corondal; and that they ſay, the ſea oppoſite to it is always tempeſtuous about the place where Pharaoh and the Egyptians were drowned. But the real place where they came out of the Red-ſea, ſeems to have been rather more north, or nearer the bottom of the gulph.

And found no water.] This muſt have been a very incommodious circumſtance, and ſufficient to have dejected any people, who had not ſo lately experienced the miraculous protection of the Almighty. For their cattle muſt ſuffer extremely, as well as themſelves, by this want of water, and conſequently could not afford them a due quantity of milk to quench their thirſt.

Ver. 23. And when they came to Marah, they could not drink of the water, &c.] When they had advanced three days journey in the wilderneſs, they at laſt came to a place where there was water, but it was ſo bitter and unpallateable, that they could not drink it. This circumſtance gave that place the denomination of Marah; which, in the Hebrew language, ſignifies bitter. We are inclined to think, this may be the place which Thevenot takes notice of, when he acquaints us, that in his ſecond day's journey from Suez, they came to a place where they found ſeveral waters, which were called Ain el Mouſe, the wells of Moſes, or elſe they may be the wells of Elim, where the Iſraelites formed their next encampment.

Ver. 24. And the people murmured againſt Moſes, ſaying, What ſhall we drink?] Perhaps Marah was not far from the place where Hagar apprehended ſhe ſhould periſh with thirſt. This conformity of danger ought to have excited the ſame impreſſions in the Iſraelites, and they ought to have cried, like her, to him who holds our life in his almighty hand, and beg'd of him to have ſupplied them with water, to quench their thirſt, in that burning climate. Moſes, indeed, betook himſelf to God, who manifeſted more compaſſion to the prayer of his ſervant, than diſpleaſure againſt his murmuring people. It is the conceit of Abarbinel, that Moſes conducted the Iſraelites from the Red-ſea, without the direction of the cloud which had guided them thither, which made them imagine their diſtreſs to be the fault of Moſes, who did not know how to lead them to the moſt commodious and likely ſituations for obtaining good water. And therefore they continued at Marah, till the cloud appeared a ſecond time, to conduct them in their progreſs, becauſe it is ſaid, chap. xvii. ver. 1. that they journeyed from Sin, by the commandment of the Lord. But all this is meer imagination, contrived with a view to vindicate his anceſtors, who ſhould rather have offered up their humble prayers to God, than murmured againſt Moſes. For we read expreſly, that God did not take away the pillar of the cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night, from before the people, chap xiii. 22. that is, it guided them in the way wherein they ſhould go, whether they purſued their journey either by day or by night. And in that very place on which Abarbinel founds his opinion, and where it is ſaid, they journeyed according to the commandment of the Lord; it is likewiſe expreſly recorded, that there was no water for the people to drink.

Ver. 25. And he cried unto the Lord, and the Lord ſhewed him a tree, which when he had caſt into the waters, the waters were made ſweet, &c.] Whether this miracle conſiſted in God's revealing to Moſes, in this extremity, a wood that had a natural faculty to ſweeten the waters, or whether he only intended to make his people ſenſible, that he was able to accompliſh the moſt ſurpriſing events, by the ſimpleſt means, is uncertain.

The Jews, however, have thought fit to increaſe the miracle, by affirming, that the wood itſelf was bitter, but that it had diveſted the waters of that bitterneſs which it would naturally have communicated to them, tho' they had been ſweet. Jonathan calls this tree Ardophne. Demetrius mentions this wonderful cure of the waters, in Euſebius's Præp. Evang. l. ix. c. 19.

There he made for them a ſtatute, &c.] This ſeems to ſignify, that God, for their better government, gave them a few rules to be obſerved for the preſent, till he ſhould declare his will to them in a more ample manner from mount Sinai.

And there he proved them.] He began to make a trial of their obedience, by giving them opportunities of declaring, by their conduct, whether they intended to obſerve theſe new laws or not.

Ver. 26. And ſaid if thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, &c.] Maimonides, in his More Nevoch. p. iii. c. 32. expreſſes himſelf to this effect, "It "appears from the Scripture and the Cabala alſo, that the "firſt precept, which God gave us, after we came out of "Egypt, was not concerning burnt-offerings, and ſacrifi-"ces, but it was that given us at Marah. If thou wilt "diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God: "where he gave us a ſtatute and a judgment. And it is "a certain tradition, that the ſtatute was the ſabbath;

« and the judgment was the taking away all iniquity, i. e. « doing juſtly."

We differ, however, from this very learned Rabbi, with reſpect to the time of the inſtitution of the ſabbath, which we ſhall hereafter prove to have been obſerved, much more early than this event at Marah.

Ver. 27. And they came to Elim] this ſeems to have been a pleaſant and fertile ſituation, at leaſt in compariſon of the deſart, and other barren places, that lay around it; and this conſideration has induced ſome learned men to believe, that this is the place taken notice of by Agatharchides Gnidius, in his treatiſe concerning the Red-ſea; and by Diodorus, lib. 3. and likewiſe by Strabo, lib. 16. we meet, in Tacitus and Plutarch, with a ſtory, that the Jews being ready to periſh with thirſt, ſprings of water were diſcovered to them by ſome (tame or wild) aſſes. Which ſtory, Bochart thinks, took its riſe from hence: Thus Joſephus calls this place by the name of Ilim, which word, in the Syrian language, denotes the colts of aſſes.

Where were twelve wells of water, and threeſcore and ten palm-trees.] Thevenot informs us, that theſe twelve wells are now ſhewn to travellers, in ornear a garden of the monks of Tor, which is a ſmall place, but has a good harbour for ſhips, lying on the Red-ſea. But as this gentleman plainly confounds the wells of Elim, with the waters of Marah, ſo it ſeems probable, from comparing the ſacred hiſtory with the account of his travels, that Elim lay to the weſt, or north-weſt of Tor.

Twelve wells of water, according to the number of the twelve tribes; and ſeventy palm-trees, according to the number of the elders of Iſrael, ſays the Jeruſalem Targum, and Jonathan's paraphraſe, which Nachmanides ſo much believed, that he declares, each tribe pitched their tents about one of theſe fountains, and the ſeventy elders ſat down under the ſhadow of the palm-trees, giving thanks to God for the benefits they now receiv'd upon the dry land, as lately they had done in the ſea. But there is no reaſon to think that the high court, conſiſting of ſo many elders, was conſtituted ſo early as this encampment.

Palm-trees delight in watry ſoils, it is therefore no wonder ſo many of them were planted about theſe fountains, for it is obſerved by Pliny, that gaudet riguis, & toto anno bibere amat, the palm-tree delights in places well watered, and loves to drink all the year. There were two ſorts of theſe trees; the common, and that which was called χαρυωτὸν, becauſe it bore dates, and if the trees mentioned in this verſe were of the latter ſpecies, they afforded the Iſraelites very agreeable accommodations.

CHAP. XVI.

1 The Iſraelites come to Sin. 2 They murmur for want of bread. 4 God promiſeth them bread from heaven. 11 Quails are ſent, 14 and manna. 16 The ordering of manna. 25 It was not to be found on the ſabbath. 32 An omer of it is preſerved.

AND they took their journey from Elim, and all the congregation of the children of Iſrael came unto the wilderneſs of Sin, which is between Elim and Sinai, on the fifteenth day of the ſecond month, after their departing out of the land of Egypt.

2 And the whole congregation of the children of Iſrael murmured againſt Moſes and Aaron in the wilderneſs.

3 And the children of Iſrael ſaid unto them, Would to God we had died by the hand of the LORD in the land of Egypt, when we ſat by the fleſh-pots, and when we did eat bread to the full: for ye have brought us forth into this wilderneſs, to kill this whole aſſembly with hunger.

4 ¶ Then ſaid the LORD unto Moſes, behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you; and the people ſhall go out and gather a certain rate every day, that I may prove them, whether they will walk in my law, or no.

5 And it ſhall come to paſs, that on the ſixth day, they ſhall prepare that which they bring in; and it ſhall be twice as much as they gather daily.

6 And Moſes and Aaron ſaid unto all the children of Iſrael, At even, then ye ſhall know that the LORD hath brought you out from the land of Egypt.

7 And in the morning, then ye ſhall ſee the glory of the LORD; for that he heareth your murmurings againſt the LORD: And what are we, that ye murmur againſt us?

8 And Moſes ſaid, This ſhall be when the LORD ſhall give you in the evening fleſh to eat, and in the morning bread to the full; for that the LORD heareth your murmurings which ye murmur againſt him: And what are we? your murmurings are not againſt us, but againſt the LORD.

9 ¶ And Moſes ſpake unto Aaron, Say unto all the congregation of the children of Iſrael, Come near before the LORD: for he hath heard your murmurings.

10 And it came to paſs as Aaron ſpake unto the whole congregation of the children of Iſrael, that they looked toward the wilderneſs, and behold, the glory of the LORD appeared in the cloud.

11 ¶ And the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying,

12 I have heard the murmurings of the children of Iſrael; ſpeak unto them, ſaying, At even ye ſhall eat fleſh, and in the morning ye ſhall be filled with bread: and ye ſhall know that I am the LORD your God.

13 And it came to paſs, that at even the quails came up, and covered the camp: and in the morning the dew lay round about the hoſt.

14 And when the dew that lay was gone up, behold, upon the face of the wilderneſs there lay a ſmall round thing, as ſmall as the hoar froſt on the ground.

15 And when the children of Iſrael ſaw it, they ſaid one to another, It is manna: for they wiſt not what it was. And Moſes ſaid unto them, This is the bread which the LORD hath given you to eat.

16 ¶ This is the thing which the LORD hath commanded, Gather of it every man accord-according to his eating: an omer for every man, according to the number of your perſons, take ye every man for them which are in his tents.

17 And the children of Iſrael did ſo, and gathered, ſome more, ſome leſs.

18 And when they did mete it with an omer, he that gathered much, had nothing over, and he that gathered little, had no lack: they gathered every man according to his eating.

19 And Moſes ſaid unto them, Let no man leave of it till the morning.

20 Notwithſtanding they hearkned not unto Moſes, but ſome of them left of it until the morning, and it bred worms and ſtank: And Moſes was wroth with them.

21 And they gathered it every morning, every man according to his eating: and when the ſun waxed hot, it melted.

22 ¶ And it came to paſs that on the ſixth day they gathered twice as much bread, two omers for one man: and all the rulers of the congregation came and told Moſes.

23 And he ſaid unto them, This is that which the LORD hath ſaid, To-morrow is the reſt of the holy ſabbath unto the LORD: bake that which ye will bake, to day, and ſeethe that ye will ſeethe; and that which remaineth over, lay up for you to be kept until the morning.

24 And they laid it up till the morning, as Moſes bade: and it did not ſtink, neither was there any worm therein.

25 And Moſes ſaid, Eat that to day; for to day is a ſabbath unto the LORD: to day ye ſhall not find it in the field.

26 Six days ye ſhall gather it, but on the ſeventh day which is the ſabbath, in it there ſhall be none.

27 ¶ And it came to paſs, that there went out ſome of the people on the ſeventh day for to gather, and they found none.

28 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, How long refuſe ye to keep my commandments and my laws?

29 See, for that the LORD hath given you the ſabbath, therefore he giveth you on the ſixth day the bread of two days: abide ye every man in his place, let no man go out of his place on the ſeventh day.

30 So the people reſted on the ſeventh day.

31 And the houſe of Iſrael called the name thereof Manna: and it was like coriander-ſeed, white; and the taſte of it was like wafers made with honey.

32 ¶ And Moſes ſaid, This is the thing which the LORD commandeth, Fill an omer of it to be kept for your generations; that they may ſee the bread wherewith I have fed you in the wilderneſs, when I brought you forth from the land of Egypt.

33 And Moſes ſaid unto Aaron, Take a pot, and put an omer full of manna therein, and lay it up before the LORD, to be kept for your generations.

34 As the LORD commanded Moſes, ſo Aaron laid it up before the Teſtimony, to be kept.

35 And the children of Iſrael did eat manna forty years, until they came to a land inhabited: they did eat manna, until they came unto the borders of the land of Canaan.

36 Now an omer is the tenth part of an ephah.

Ver. 1. And they took their journey from Elim, and all the congregation of the children of Iſrael came unto the wilderneſs of Sin, which is between Elim and Sinai, &c.] As to the wilderneſs of Sin, into which the children of Iſrael advanced, after the ſecond decampment from the Red-ſea, we are told by the ſame hiſtorian, that it lay between Elim and Sinai. But now the Iſraelites, in their departure from Elim to the wilderneſs of Sini, making an encampment by the Red-ſea, it ſeems probable that either they were oblig'd to wind their courſe round ſome mountain, that hindered them from proceeding in a direct march, or elſe, that ſome bay or creek of the Red-ſea came up farther into the land in theſe parts, or perhaps both circumſtances might concur. Thevenot ſays, that the plain of Tor, is called in ſcripture the deſart of Sin; but this ſeems improbable, becauſe the encampment in the wilderneſs of Sin, is expreſly ſaid, in the Moſaic hiſtory, to be after the encampment by the Red-ſea.

Ver. 2. And the whole congregation of the children of Iſrael murmured againſt Moſes and Aaron in the wilderneſs.] A new temptation, to which they were expoſed in the wilderneſs, was the occaſion of a new crime. For when they found the proviſions, they had brought from Egypt were ſpent, they regretted their departure from that fertile country. This rebellious people, that were under the immediate and miraculous conduct of providence, ſeemed to be fond of thoſe years of affliction, which they had paſſed under the iron ſcepter of Pharaoh.

God then declared to Moſes, that he would try the Iſraelites, and ſee whether they would diſcharge in a better manner the duties of gratitude in proſperity, than thoſe of reſignation and ſubmiſſion in adverſity. He therefore promiſed to ſatisfy, not only their wants, but even their luſts, at leaſt for a ſeaſon, and afterwards to ſupply them continually with neceſſary ſuſtenance. Moſes imparted to the people this gracious declaration of the Deity; he acquainted them, that they ſhould have fleſh that very evening, and that, the next morning, they ſhould be filled with bread; both which promiſes were exactly accompliſhed.

Ver. 13. And it came to paſs, that at even the quails came up and covered the camp.] In the evening the camp ſwarmed with a kind of animals, which Moſes calls by a name, the true meaning of which not being eaſy to be found out, the opinion of their being quails has commonly prevailed. The Talmudiſts uſe a general expreſſion on this occaſion, which is applicable to ſeveral ſpecies of birds; but we ſhall examine this point more largely, when we come to the hiſtorical account of it in the book of Numbers, chap xi. verſe 31.

Ver. 14, 15. And when the dew that lay was gone up, behold upon the face of the wilderneſs there lay a ſmall round thing, as ſmall as the hoar-froſt on the ground. And when the

the children of Iſrael ſaw it, they ſaid one to another, It is manna: for they wiſt not what it was, &c.] The people no ſooner ſaw this new bread, but they cried one to another, what is this, and whence cometh it? For they were ſurpriſed at the ſtrangeneſs of it; and from thence gave it the name of man, or manna. Commentators have been very diligent to puzzle the text by their various etymologies of that word, but that of the Septuagint, which renders it τι ταυτο ἐστι, what is this? ſeems to correſpond beſt with the Hebrew, and to be moſt agreeable to the text; and is likewiſe followed by Joſephus, and ſeveral other writers. Man hu, in the original, ſignifies what, or whence is this? It is not ſo eaſy to know the true meaning of the word gad, which is rendered coriander ſeed, by our tranſlators, tho', according to the literal ſenſe of the original, which ought to have been tranſlated, and it was white like the ſeed of gad, whereas coriander ſeed is of a brown colour. Some Jews therefore tranſlate it muſtard ſeed, becauſe one ſort of it is whitiſh; and Aben Ezra frankly owns, that he knows not what ſeed it is; but ſince it is ſaid in another place, that it was of the colour of bdellium, which the learned Bochart, and others, have proved to ſignify a kind of pearl, we may eaſily ſuppoſe, that the word gad, doth not denote coriander, but ſome other ſmall white ſeed, and that the manna, ſhining like a hoar froſt, did very much reſemble a ſmall pearl.

We venture to give this manna the epithet of miraculous bread, not that we believe it was prepared without labour, ſince the Iſraelites were obliged to pound and dreſs it; much leſs do we attribute to it all thoſe wonderful qualities which the Jews relate concerning it. But we think it was miraculous upon the following accounts. 1. Becauſe it fell but ſix days in the week. 2. It likewiſe fell in ſuch prodigious quantities as ſufficed near three millions of people. 3. There fell a double quantity every Friday, to ſerve them the ſucceeding day. 4. What was gathered on the firſt five days putrified, and bred worms, if kept above one day; whereas that which was gathered on Friday laſted two days. Laſtly, it continued falling whilſt the Iſraelites remained in the wilderneſs, and ceaſed aſſoon as they came out of it, and had eaten of the corn of the land of Canaan.

Aben Ezra ſays, manna was an Arabic word, and that he had ſeen in the kingdom of Alnatzir, (whatever kingdom that be,) ſomething very like manna, that fell only during two ſummer months of the year; but as he adds, that it is rather fit for phyſic than food, it is plain it muſt be that medicament which we now know by the name of manna, and which is a kind of honey condenſed, and is to be ſeen in the deſarts of Arabia, during the heat of ſummer; it is likewiſe to be gathered, in great quantities, from off the trees, rocks, graſs, and even the ſand: But it is plain, by what we have obſerved of the miraculous ſort which fed the Iſraelites, that the manna mentioned by Aben Ezra, has nothing common with it but the name.

This miraculous care of providence ought certainly to have engaged the Iſraelites in an everlaſting gratitude, but they were unthankful for this mercy at the very inſtant they enjoyed it. God had communicated to them three rules, which they were to obſerve in gathering the manna.

The firſt was, that they ſhould gather as much every morning, as would ſuffice them for that day, ver. 4. This was to teach them to rely continually upon that good providence which they had ſo injuriouſly diſtruſted.

The ſecond rule was, that every one ſhould gather an equal meaſure, called an omer, ver. 18. and which contained about five or ſix pounds of manna, which was more than enough for one man's ſubſiſtence. The deſign of this order was to unite them to each other by the equality of the diviſion.

The third was, that they ſhould never gather manna on the laſt day of the week, which was the day of reſt, the obſervation of which was impracticable, during their captivity in Egypt, but was to be inviolable for the future. And leſt they ſhould be obliged by neceſſity to break this order, God promiſed to ſend down a double quantity of manna the day before the ſabbath, and directed them to gather a double portion, that there might be enough for both days.

What hardſhip were there in theſe laws, and wherein would the Iſraelites have ſuffer'd by ſubmitting to them? They however thought fit to tranſgreſs them, as if they had indulged a kind of deteſtable pleaſure in rebelling againſt God. Scarce had ſome of them ſeen the manna, but they eagerly gathered as much of it, as if they were never to behold it again. But God confounded their iniquitous avidity, by cauſing worms to breed in all that was gathered above the preſcribed meaſure. Thus Moſes himſelf explains what he had ſaid, He that gathered much had nothing over, becauſe it bred worms and ſtank. He ſays alſo, that he that gathered little had no lack; the reaſon of which was, doubtleſs, That the portion of an omer being more than ſufficient for one man, it might be divided to thoſe who had not gathered ſo much.

But that which was moſt provoking to God, was, that ſome of the Iſraelites violated the expreſs law of the ſabbath, and went out upon that ſacred day to look for manna, but found none, by which means they reaped the ſhame of their crime, without any advantage to alleviate it. Moſes reproved them for their behaviour, and they at laſt ſubmitted to the order of not ſeeking for the manna, but only the ſix firſt days of the week.

The famous biſhop of Avranches thinks he has found among the Heathens a monument of the deſcent of manna in the wilderneſs. He pretends, that moſt of the characters which the Pagans beſtowed on their god Pan, are borrowed from what the ſacred hiſtory has recorded of Moſes. The god Pan, like Moſes, lived in the wilderneſs; like Moſes he had rays of fire or light in his hand; like Moſes he did not only follow a paſtoral life, but marched at the head of armies, formed ſieges, and fought battles. And that which chiefly appears to this learned man, to be taken out of the writings of Moſes; is what the Heathens ſay, that their god Pan, being on the mountains of Arabia, was like to periſh with hunger, but that he met, in one of the caves thereof, the goddeſs Ceres, who was bewailing the loſs of Proſerpine, and who ſupplied him with food to ſave his life.

Ver. 33. And Moſes ſaid unto Aaron, take a pot and put an omerfull of manna therein, and lay it up before the Lord, to be kept for your generations] God thought fit to preſerve in the common wealth of Iſrael, an authentic monument of the miraculous food he had provided for his people in the wilderneſs. St. Paul quotes this text, and makes two remarks upon it. Firſt, he ſays, this pot was of gold. Secondly, he explains theſe words, lay it up before the Lord; and informs us that this pot was in the ark, Heb. ix. 4 according to ſome verſions, or, on the ſide of the ark, as ſome others have render'd it. We retain the latter tranſlation, on account of what is ſaid in ſeveral other places of Scripture, namely, that there was nothing in the ark, but the tables of the covenant, and this explication is agreeable to the tradition of the Jews.

CHAP. XVII.

1 The people murmur for water at Rephidim. 5 God ſendeth them for water to the rock in Horeb. 8 Amalek is overcome by the holding up of Moſes hand. 15 Moſes buildeth the altar JEHOVAH-niſſi.

AND all the congregation of the children of Iſrael journeyed from the wilderneſs of Sin, after their journeys, according to the commandment of the LORD, and pitched in Rephidim: and there was no water for the people to drink.

2 Wherefore the people did chide with Moſes, and ſaid, Give us water that we may drink. And Moſes ſaid unto them, Why chide you with me? Wherefore do ye tempt the LORD?

3 And the people thirſted there for water; and the people murmured againſt Moſes, and ſaid, Wherefore is this that thou haſt brought us up out of Egypt, to kill us

us and our children, and our cattel with thirſt?

4 And Moſes cried unto the LORD, ſaying, What ſhall I do unto this people? They be almoſt ready to ſtone me.

5 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Go on before the people, and take with thee of the elders of Iſrael: and thy rod wherewith thou ſmoteſt the river, take in thine hand, and go.

6 Behold, I will ſtand before thee there upon the rock in Horeb, and thou ſhalt ſmite the rock, and there ſhall come water out of it, that the people may drink. And Moſes did ſo in the ſight of the elders of Iſrael.

7 And he called the name of the place Maſſah, and Meribah, becauſe of the chiding of the children of Iſrael, and becauſe they tempted the LORD, ſaying, Is the LORD among us, or not?

8 ¶ Then came Amalek, and fought with Iſrael in Rephidim.

9 And Moſes ſaid unto Joſhua, Chooſe us out men, and go out, fight with Amalek: to-morrow I will ſtand on the top of the hill, with the rod of God in mine hand.

10 So Joſhua did as Moſes had ſaid to him, and fought with Amalek: and Moſes, Aaron and Hur, went up to the top of the hill.

11 And it came to paſs when Moſes held up his hand, that Iſrael prevailed: and when he let down his hand, Amalek prevailed.

12 But Moſes hands were heavy, and they took a ſtone and put it under him, and he ſat thereon: and Aaron and Hur ſtayed up his hands, the one on the one ſide, and the other on the other ſide; and his hands were ſteady until the going down of the ſun.

13 And Joſhua diſcomfited Amalek and his people with the edge of the ſword.

14 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearſe it in the ears of Joſhua: for I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven.

15 And Moſes built an altar, and called the name of it JEHOVAH-niſſi.

16 For he ſaid, Becauſe the LORD hath ſworn that the LORD will have war with Amalek from generation to generation.

We ſhould have taken notice, in our annotations on the preceding chapter, that ſome learned men diſpute about the form of the veſſel which contained the manna. Mr. Reland declares againſt thoſe who pretend it was open, and that it is ſo repreſented in ſome Samaritan medals: He undertakes to prove from the name Στάμνος, which is given to it in the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, that it had ſuch a lid, or cover, as thoſe pots into which they put wine, and like to thoſe by which it is repreſented by other Samaritan medals, of which he gives a draught in his learned diſſertations. He obſerves, that the expreſſion, in the original, is one of thoſe words which are found but once in the Old Teſtament, and of which it is not eaſy to determine the etymology. He thinks, he finds it in an Arabic word, which ſignifies to keep; and is of opinion, that this veſſel had two handles. He likewiſe ſhews, by ſeveral inſtances, that the ancients called theſe handles ears, and that they called ſuch bottles as had two of them, Αμφώτας, or Διώτας, two-ear'd veſſels. Mr. Reland extends this criticiſm farther; for he ſhews, by a variety of authorities, that the Heathen called Ὄνους, (that is, aſſes) theſe ſorts of bottles with two handles, becauſe they had had ſome conformity with the ears of aſſes. By the ſame criticiſm he explains the phraſe in Athenæus, ὄνους γεμον τας οἴνε, which ſignifies, aſſes filled with wine. He, alſo, refutes thoſe who render it, aſſes laden with wine; and maintains, that the aſſes, mentioned in thoſe paſſages, are bottles with two ears, and judges that to be the reaſon, why it is ſaid, by the ancients, that Silenus, the ſervant of Bacchus, was carried upon an aſs. This gentleman does not make theſe remarks, to boaſt of his erudition, on a ſubject ſo dry, and of ſuch ſmall importance to mankind; but employs his criticiſm, to explain the original of a calumny, which was anciently urged againſt the Jews. They were accuſed of keeping an aſs, or the head of that animal, in the holy place, and of worſhipping that brutal idol. Ben Gorion declares, that Appion was the author of this calumny, and that he feigned, that, when Antiochus plunder'd the temple, there was found in it the head of an aſs, of gold, which was worſhipped by the Jews. But the ſame Ben Gorion very ſolidly refutes the accuſation; for he declares, that when Jeruſalem was taken by Theos; by Pompey; by Craſſus; and, laſt of all, by Titus, the conquerors found nothing but tokens of piety in that ſacred place; and he likewiſe affirms, that the prophane authors, even thoſe who mention the expedition of Antiochus, ſuch as Polybius the Megalopolitan, Strabo of Cappadocia, Nicolas of Damaſcus, Caſtor the chronologer, and Appolodorus, ſay nothing that can induce any one to credit this defamation. The Jewiſh hiſtorian, therefore, concludes, that if his countrymen could have been guilty of the idolatry with which they are reproached, yet it did not become ſuch a man as Appion the Egyptian to charge them with it; ſince it is not more contemptible than the deſpicable idolatry of worſhipping goats, and other animals, which the Egyptians ranked among their gods.

Mr. Reland does not adopt any of thoſe conjectures which the learned have made on the origin of this calumniation. Some have thought, that the occaſion of it was, what was ſaid of Moſes in the book of Exodus, that when he returned into Egypt, he put his wife and his ſons upon an aſs. Others think it was becauſe the Jews did not offer aſſes for ſacrifice. This opinion is very probable, becauſe the Heathens charged the Jews with worſhipping an hog; tho' this does not account for that part of the accuſation, which affirms, that the Jews kept the head of an aſs in the holy place.

Mention is often made in Scripture of the mouth of the Lord. Pi Jao are the original words. Pieo, in the Coptic tongue, ſignifies an aſs; and Bochart thought that this ſimilitude of terms was the occaſion of this charge againſt the Jews, of worſhipping the head of that animal; but Mr. Reland produces ſtrong reaſons againſt this opinion, and ſubjoins to his own diſſertation, another of that learned antiquary, and profound divine, John Baptiſt Ott, who maintains, that certain open veſſels, which are to be ſeen upon ſhekels, or Samaritan medals, repreſent the pot that was preſerved in the moſt holy place; and that certain globules, marked over thoſe veſſels, repreſent the manna falling from heaven. We content ourſelves with hinting this elegant controverſy, in which the two antagoniſts have diſcovered an equal modeſty and hearing, in their manner of combating the objections that are oppoſed to their ſentiments.

Ver. 1. And all the congregation of the children of Iſrael journeyed from the wilderneſs of Sin, after their journeys, according to the commandment of the Lord, and pitched in Rephidim: and there was no water for the people to drink.]

Moſes, after having related that which happened in the camp of Sin, carries us at once to that of Rephidim, omitting two encampments that are mentioned in the book of Numbers, chap. xxxiii. verſe 12, &c. namely Dophkah, and Alaſh. It is to be obſerved, that the aim of the ſacred hiſtorian in this laſt book, is different from that which he propoſes in this of Exodus, where his deſign was to collect into one body, all the great events that occurred in the journey of the Iſraelites; whereas the book of Numbers may be conſidered as a journal of their march. From hence it proceeds, that, in Exodus, mention is made of fifteen of their ſtations only; but, in the book of Numbers, forty-two are enumerated.

The ſojourning of the Iſraelites at Rephidim, is diſtinguiſhed by two memorable events. The firſt was, not their murmurings; for where is the place that was free from them? But the miracle which God wrought to appeaſe them. A new ſcarcity of water was the pretext found by this diſcontented people, when Moſes, by the direction of God, ſtruck the rock of Horeb, and a ſtream of water guſhed from it. The ſecond event was the defeat of Amalek, and the triumph of the Iſraelites. We ſhall ſay nothing here concerning the firſt miracle, becauſe we ſhall take occaſion to examine it in the book of Numbers, the ſecond therefore ſhall be the ſubject of our preſent annotations.

In the book of Geneſis, chap. xxxvi. 12. mention is made of Amalek, the grandſon of Eſau, and the Son of Eliphaz by a concubine named Timna. We ſuppoſe, that this Amalek was the head of the people who are called Amalekites. 'Tis true, we find the word Amalekite, even in the time of Abraham himſelf, that is to ſay, long before the birth of Eliphaz. But how often does it happen, that the ſacred hiſtory, in relating a certain period, gives to countries the appellations which did not belong to them, till the following ages?

The country of the Amalekites lay between the frontiers of Idumea, and the coaſts of the Red-ſea. Philo, the learned Jew, calls them, ſometimes, Phœnicians, becauſe they were locked in by Phœnicia, on the weſt of Arabia Petræa. This was the firſt nation the Iſraelites found in their paſſage; and as theſe people were deſcended from Eſau, they might retain ſome ſeeds of that enmity which Eſau bore to Jacob: This is the opinion of the Jewiſh doctors; and the Targum declares, that when the Iſraelites had paſſed the Red-ſea, they were aſſaulted by wicked Amalek, who hated them on account of the birth-right, which Jacob had got from Eſau.

The Amalekites formed the deſign of oppoſing the paſſage of the Iſraelites. Having diſcovered their march, and ſuffered the body of their army to advance, they aſſaulted them in the rear, and attacked thoſe whoſe infirmities had obliged them to continue in that ſituation. This skirmiſh was ſoon ſucceeded by a general action; and, as the Amalekites, by oppoſing the children of Iſrael, ſet themſelves in oppoſition to God himſelf, who was their guide and conductor, they ſoon experienced the truth of this expreſſion, who hath hardened himſelf againſt him and hath proſpered? Job. ix. 4. They came upon the Iſraelites with a formidable army, and the Rabbins ſay, they had likewiſe provided themſelves with magicians and incantations, and employed againſt Moſes that very art, over which this great legiſlator was again to triumph, in the plains of Rephidim. Surely there is no inchantment againſt Jacob, neither is there any divination againſt Iſrael.

Ver. 11. And it came to paſs when Moſes held up his hand, that Iſrael prevailed: and when he let down his hand, Amalek prevailed.] Moſes had recourſe to two expedients in this emergency; action, and prayer. He committed the care of the action to Hoſhea, the ſon of Nun, whoſe battles and triumphs we ſhall find recorded in the ſacred hiſtory, and which acquired him the name of Joſhua, which ſignifies a deliverer. Moſes took upon himſelf the buſineſs of prayer, and aſſociated two perſons in this pious duty. The firſt was his brother Aaron; the ſecond was Hur, whoſe genealogy is not mentioned in Scripture. The common opinion makes him the ſon of Caleb, the husband of Miriam, and the father of Uri, and grandfather of Bezaleel. It is certain, however, that this Hur was a perſon eminent for his rank and piety; and Moſes left him, with Aaron, to judge the people, when he himſelf was to aſcend Mount Sinai to meet the Deity.

Moſes acted upon a right principle, by joining the maxims of human prudence with thoſe of religion; and it is from the union of theſe, that we may hope for ſucceſs in our lawful undertakings. God, however, thought fit to manifeſt, that the ſucceſs of the battle ſhould be owing to the obſervation of the maxims of religion, and not to thoſe of human prudence. Moſes remained upon the mountain of Horeb, from whence he could be a ſpectator of the combat. Every time he lifted up his hands to heaven, the Iſraelites prevailed; but as often as he let them deſcend towards the earth, Amalek was victorious. Moſes ſoon obſerved the different ſucceſs, and then deſired that his hands might be ever ſtretched towards that place, from whence proceeded help to his people. The combat continues; the hands of Moſes become heavy, and nature is ready to yield. The ſpirit is willing, but the fleſh is weak. Moſes, therefore, found out an expedient to ſupply his infirmity; Hur and Aaron ſupported his trembling hands, to the end of the day, until Amalek was routed, and Iſrael had gained a complete victory.

Ver. 14 And the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearſe it in the ears of Joſhua: For I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven.] God commanded Moſes to preſerve a faithful account of the victory the Iſraelites had obtain'd, and to make Joſhua, his intended ſucceſſor, ſenſible that the Amalekites were, by the Divine preordination, to be extirpated from the face of the earth. This order was repeated afterwards, and at laſt rigorouſly executed in the reigns of Saul and David; after which period they are no more mention'd in the Sacred Hiſtory: And if any of them were ſtill remaining, they were confounded, either among the Edomites, or among the other neighbouring nations.

Ver. 15. And Moſes built an altar, and called the name of it JEHOVAH-niſſi.] Moſes erected an altar to ſerve for a monument of this victory; but it is not ſaid that he offered ſacrifices upon it, as Joſephus and Philo pretend, tho' they offer nothing that can oblige us to credit their teſtimony. We have more than one inſtance of altars being erected only as monuments of ſome memorable event. The inſcription on this altar was JEHOVAH-niſſi: The Hebrew word niſſi ſignifies enſign, or banner; and Bochart conjectures, that it is from hence that the Heathens gave to Bacchus the name of Niſius, and that, by ſubſtituting the word Dio, for Jehovah, they call him Dioniſius.

The text adds; For he ſaid, becauſe the Lord hath ſworn that the Lord will have war with Amalek from generation to generation, But, other verſions render it thus; For he ſaid, Becauſe the hand has been lifted up; namely, the hand of Amalek, againſt the throne of the Lord, the Lord will have war againſt Amalek from generation to generation. The words tranſlated in this manner, have no difficulty. The throne of the Lord, will import, either the Divine omnipotence, or the commonwealth of the Jews, of which God himſelf was the Almighty ſovereign. The Lord will have war with Amalek from generation to generation; that is to ſay, the attempts of Amalek againſt the Iſraelites, will be the foundation of a perpetual animoſity againſt that treacherous nation of the Amalekites. The Hebrew text is, however, very dark, and runs thus in a literal verſion, Becauſe the hand on the throne of God, war of God againſt Amalek from generation to generation. The Septuagint is yet more obſcure than the original; Becauſe God fought with a hidden hand againſt Amalek from age to age, &c. For the explication of which, it is pretended, that to put the hand upon the throne, was, in ſome countries, a ceremony that attended a ſolemn oath, as the laying it on the altar was in other places. Juvenal, to expreſs how ſome men ſwear and forſwear themſelves without remorſe, ſays, They laid their hands, with intrepidity, on the altars, Sat. xiii. ver. 89. According to this explication, God obliged his people, by oath, to extirpate the race of the Amalekites; and the Targum of Onkelos preſents us with the ſame ſentiment. This was ſaid with an oath, and proceeds from the face of the terrible One, whoſe majeſty is upon the throne of glory, that Iſrael ſhould fight againſt the men of Amalek, to the end that they may be deſtroyed in the generations to come.

Le Clerc, by making a ſmall change of a letter, for he reads nes, inſtead of kes, and by tranſlating banner, for throne, renders this paſſage thus; Becauſe the hand of Amalek malek is lifted up againſt the Lord, who is my banner, there ſhall be perpetual war between Iſrael and Amalek.

CHAP. XVIII.

1 Jethro bringeth to Moſes his wife and two ſons. 7 Moſes entertaineth him. 13 Jethro's counſel is accepted. 27 Jethro departeth.

WHEN Jethro, the prieſt of Midian, Moſes father in law heard of all that God had done for Moſes, and for Iſrael his people, and that the LORD had brought Iſrael out of Egypt:

2 Then Jethro, Moſes father in law, took Zipporah Moſes wife, after he had ſent her back,

3 And her two ſons, of which the name of the one was Gerſhom (for he ſaid, I have been an alien in a ſtrange land)

4 And the name of the other was Eliezer (for the God of my father, ſaid he, was mine help, and delivered me from the ſword of Pharaoh)

5 And Jethro, Moſes father in law, came with his ſons and his wife unto Moſes into the wilderneſs, where he encamped at the mount of God.

6 And he ſaid unto Moſes, I thy father in law Jethro am come unto thee, and thy wife, and her two ſons with her.

7 ¶ And Moſes went out to meet his father in law, and did obeiſance, and kiſſed him, and they asked each other of their welfare: and they came into the tent.

8 And Moſes, told his father in law all that the LORD had done unto Pharaoh, and to the Egyptians for Iſraels ſake, and all the travel that had come upon them by the way, and how the LORD delivered them.

9 And Jethro rejoyced for all the goodneſs which the LORD had done to Iſrael: whom he had delivered out of the hand of the Egyptians.

10 And Jethro ſaid, Bleſſed be the LORD, who hath delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of Pharaoh, who hath delivered the people from under the hand of the Egyptians.

11 Now I know that the LORD is greater than all gods: for in the thing wherein they dealt proudly, he was above them.

12 And Jethro Moſes father in law, took a burnt-offering and ſacrifices for God: and Aaron came, and all the elders of Iſrael to eat bread with Moſes father in law before God.

13 ¶ And it came to paſs on the morrow, that Moſes ſat to judge the people: and the people ſtood by Moſes, from the morning unto the evening.

14 And when Moſes father in law, ſaw all that he did to the people, he ſaid, What is this thing that thou doeſt to the people? Why ſitteſt thou thy ſelf alone, and all the people ſtand by thee from morning unto even?

15 And Moſes ſaid unto his father in law, Becauſe the people come unto me to enquire of God.

16 When they have a matter, they come unto me, and I judge between one and another, and I do make them know the ſtatutes of God and his laws.

17 And Moſes father in law ſaid unto him, The thing that thou doeſt is not good.

18 Thou wilt ſurely wear away, both thou, and this people that is with thee: for this thing is too heavy for thee; thou art not able to perform it thy ſelf alone.

19 Hearken now unto my voice, I will give thee counſel, and God ſhall be with thee: Be thou for the people to God-ward, that thou mayeſt bring the cauſes unto God:

20 And thou ſhalt teach them ordinances and laws, and ſhalt ſhew them the way wherein they muſt walk, and the work that they muſt do.

21 Moreover, thou ſhalt provide out of all the people, able men, ſuch as fear God, men of truth, hating covetouſneſs; and place ſuch over them, to be rulers of thouſands, and rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens.

22 And let them judge the people at all ſeaſons: and it ſhall be, that every great matter they ſhall bring unto thee, but every ſmall matter they ſhall judge: So ſhall it be eaſier for thy ſelf, and they ſhall bear the burden with thee.

23 If thou ſhalt do this thing, and God command thee ſo, then thou ſhalt be able to endure, and all this people ſhall alſo go to their place in peace.

24 So Moſes hearkned to the voice of his father in law, and did all that he had ſaid.

25 And Moſes choſe able men out of all Iſrael, and made them heads over the people, rulers of thouſands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens.

26 And they judged the people at all ſeaſons: the hard cauſes they brought unto Moſes, but every ſmall matter they judged themſelves.

27 ¶ And

27 ¶ And Moſes let his father in law depart; and he went his way into his own land.

Ver. 2. Then Jethro, Moſes Father-in-law, took Zipporah Moſes wife, after he had ſent her back.] It is uncertain when Moſes ſent Zipporah back to her father, but we may venture to ſuppoſe it was at her own requeſt, when ſhe had conſidered the arduous province he was preparing to undertake in Egypt. The Hebrew expreſſion intimates a divorce, in the opinion of ſome, and is expounded, in that ſenſe, by the Mauritanian Jews; but all the verſions of Chriſtian tranſlators, and even that of the German Jews, and the Perſian, repreſent it as a ſeparation, occaſion'd by the circumſtance we have intimated.

Ver. 5. And Jethro Moſes father-in-law, came with his ſons and his wife unto Moſes into the wilderneſs, where he encamped at the mount of God.] Interpreters are much divided in their opinions of the particular period of time, when Jethro came from Midian, with the wife and children of Moſes; but one would imagine, that he would take the firſt opportunity to viſit his ſon-in-law, after he had received intelligence of his conducting the Iſraelites out of Egypt, and which muſt have been tranſmitted to him in a ſhort time, as he was a borderer upon the wilderneſs in which they were now encamped. The Jews, however, think that Jethro did not viſit Moſes till after the promulgation of the law at Mount Sinai; and many Chriſtian writers have embraced the ſame opinion, particularly the moſt learned archbiſhop Uſher ad A. M. 2514, and Mr. Selden, L. II. de Synedris, c. 2. where he ſaith no other account of it is to be received; but, they are not agreed in what year he came. We, however, think that Jethro's viſit to Moſes was not deferred ſo long as thoſe great men have imagined, ſince no reaſon can be aſſigned why Moſes ſhould relate the account of it in this part of his hiſtory, if it did not happen ſoon after the defeat of the Amalekites. We grant, indeed, that Jethro did not offer his advice to Moſes, with reference to the more effectual and commodious adminiſtration of juſtice, till after God had delivered the law on Mount Sinai.

Ver. 11. Now I know that the Lord is greater than all Gods.] Jethro was not ignorant of the true God before; but he was now fully convinced, that he alone was the moſt high, and infinitely greater than thoſe who were accounted gods by the Pagan world.

For in the thing wherein they dealt proudly, he was above them. Theſe words have a reference to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who are mentioned in the preceding verſe, and the meaning is, that the Lord confounded them who proudly contemned his authority; and to this purpoſe the Chaldee expounds it. In that very thing, wherein they thought to judge (i. e. to puniſh or deſtroy) the Iſraelites, they were judged themſelves, that is, they periſhed in the Red-ſea, as a vengeance on their intention to drown all the male children of the Iſraelites in the river Nile.

Ver. 12. And Jethro, Moſes father-in-law took a burnt offering and ſacrifices for God:] This burnt-offering was to be entirely conſumed upon the altar, and no part of it was to be eaten by any perſon whatever. The word ſacrifices denotes peace-offerings, of which the people, as well as the prieſts, were to participate.

Ver. 14. And when Moſes father-in-law ſaw all that he did to the people, he ſaid, what is this thing that thou doſt to the people, &c.] When Jethro obſerved the indefatigable pains which Moſes took to accommodate the differences that aroſe among the Iſraelites, he was apprehenſive that his ſon-in-law would be overwhelmed with the weight of that province, for which reaſon he judiciouſly recommended to him the choice of a competent number of ſuch elders as ſhould be qualified to ſuſtain part of the burden, which would otherwiſe become inſupportable to Moſes.

Ver. 15. And Moſes ſaid unto his father-in-law, becauſe the people come to me to enquire of God.] The people did not deſire Moſes to conſult the Divine Majeſty, with reference to their affairs, but only to decide their reſpective controverſies according to the mind of God, which had been intimated to him in the laws preſcribed on Sinai, for their regulation. For what was determined according to God's law, was the judgment of God.

Ver. 19. —— Be thou for the people to God-ward, that thou mayſt bring the cauſes to God.] Devote thyſelf to the ſervice and worſhip of God alone, as Joſephus expounds it; but which muſt be underſtood with the exception of greater cauſes which he was to hear himſelf.

Ver. 20. And thou ſhalt teach them ordinances and laws.] Ordinances are commonly taken to concern matters of religion; and laws relate to civil affairs of juſtice and charity.

Ver. 21. Moreover thou ſhalt provide out of all the people, able men, ſuch as fear God, men of truth, hating covetouſneſs; and place ſuch over them to be rulers of thouſands, &c.] The Hebrew words, in this verſe, are ſuch as make it difficult to be determined, whether they relate to the number of rulers, or of people who were to be governed by them. This Mr. Selden has obſerved, l. 1. de Synedr. c. 15. p. 615. where he ſhews, that Decemvir, for inſtance, was not only one ſet over ten, but one of the ten judges who compoſed a court. But the moſt probable conſtruction is, that Jethro did not ſignify the number of judges, but of the people whoſe cauſes they were to decide; and adviſed Moſes to conſtitute greater and leſſer judicatures, according to the diviſion of their tribes into thouſands, hundreds, fifties, and tens.

That the Jewiſh tribes were divided into thouſands, is apparent from the expreſſion of Gideon, Judg. vi. 15. My family (which in the Hebrew is my thouſand) is the meaneſt in Iſrael. Bertram thinks theſe thouſands were families, whom the Hebrews call houſes, and which were divided as many heads as the tribes were into families. And of theſe he thinks Jethro counſels Moſes to make ſuch rulers as are mentioned in this verſe. But others think we are to underſtand only rulers over a thouſand men, not families.

Ver. 27. And Moſes let his father-in-law depart; and he went his way into his own land.] To make his children, or the people of the land proſelytes, ſaith the Chaldee paraphraſe, which Jethro, in all probability, effected, at leaſt in ſome meaſure; ſo that piety was propagated among them to future generations. For the Rechabites came out of this country, 1 Chron. ii. 55, and Jeremiah celebrates the vertue of this people in the latter end of the Jewiſh church, Jerem. xxx.

CHAP. XIX.

1 The people come to Sinai. 3 Gods meſſage by Moſes unto the people out of the mount. 8 The peoples anſwer returned again. 10 The people are prepared againſt the third day. 12 The mountain muſt not be touched. 16 The fearful preſence of God upon the mount.

IN the third month, when the children of Iſrael were gone forth out of the land of Egypt, the ſame day came they into the wilderneſs of Sinai.

2 For they were departed from Rephidim, and were come to the deſert of Sinai, and had pitched in the wilderneſs, and there Iſrael camped before the mount.

3 And Moſes went up unto God, and the LORD called unto him out of the mountain, ſaying, Thus ſhalt thou ſay to the houſe of Jacob, and tell the children of Iſrael;

4 Ye have ſeen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles wings, and brought you unto my ſelf.

5 Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye ſhall be a peculiar treaſure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine.

6 And ye ſhall be unto me a kingdom of prieſts, and an holy nation. Theſe are the the words which thou ſhalt ſpeak unto the children of Iſrael.

7 ¶ And Moſes came and called for the elders of the people, and laid before their faces all theſe words which the LORD commanded him.

8 And all the people anſwered together, and ſaid, All that the LORD hath ſpoken, we will do. And Moſes returned the words of the people unto the LORD.

9 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Lo, I come unto thee in a thick cloud, that the people may hear when I ſpeak with thee, and believe thee for ever. And Moſes told the words of the people unto the LORD.

10 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Go unto the people, and ſanctify them to day and to morrow, and let them waſh their cloaths.

11 And be ready againſt the third day: for the third day the LORD will come down in the ſight of all the people, upon mount Sinai.

12 And thou ſhalt ſet bounds unto the people round about, ſaying, Take heed to your ſelves, that ye go not up into the mount, or touch the border of it: whoſoever toucheth the mount ſhall be ſurely put to death.

13 There ſhall not an hand touch it, but he ſhall ſurely be ſtoned or ſhot through; whether it be beaſt or man, it ſhall not live: when the trumpet ſoundeth long, they ſhall come up to the mount.

14 And Moſes went down from the mount unto the people, and ſanctified the people, and they waſhed their cloaths.

15 And he ſaid unto the people, Be ready againſt the third day: come not at your wives.

16 ¶ And it came to paſs on the third day in the morning, that there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud; ſo that all the people that was in the camp, trembled.

17 And Moſes brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God, and they ſtood at the nether part of the mount.

18 And mount Sinai was altogether on a ſmoak, becauſe the LORD deſcended upon it in fire: and the ſmoak thereof aſcended as the ſmoak of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly.

19 And when the voice of the trumpet ſounded long, and waxed louder and louder, Moſes ſpake, and God anſwered him by a voice.

20 And the LORD came down upon mount Sinai, on the top of the mount: and the LORD called Moſes up to the top of the mount, and Moſes went up.

21 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Go down, charge the people, leſt they break through unto the LORD to gaze, and many of them periſh.

22 And let the prieſts alſo which come near to the LORD, ſanctify themſelves, leſt the LORD break forth upon them.

23 And Moſes ſaid unto the LORD, The people cannot come up to mount Sinai: for thou chargedſt us, ſaying, Set bounds about the mount, and ſanctify it.

24 And the LORD ſaid unto him, Away, get thee down, and thou ſhalt come up, thou, and Aaron with thee: but let not the prieſts and the people break through, to come up unto the LORD, leſt he break forth upon them.

25 So Moſes went down unto the people, and ſpake unto them.

This chapter preſents us with the moſt pompous, and, at the ſame time, with the moſt tremendous ſpectacle that ever eyes beheld. God, by the promulgation of the law, raiſed the ſpiritual glory (if it be lawful to uſe that expreſſion) to its utmoſt height. It was his pleaſure, that the divine law-giver of the Goſpel ſhould derive all his grandeur from the ſublimity of his nature, the purity of his manners, the excellence of his doctrines, the meekneſs of his invitations, and the eminence of his miracles. The whole œconomy of the Meſſiah was calculated for the mind, and had few objects proper to excite the ſenſes.

But God thought fit, in publiſhing the law on Sinai, to ſtrike the imagination, before he would influence the ſoul; to move the ſenſes, before he would touch the heart; and terrify the body, before he would affect the conſcience. Accordingly, as the ſpiritual glory never appeared in a more eminent degree, than in the publication of the new law, ſo the ſenſible pomp never ſhone forth with ſo dreadful a ſplendour, as in the proclamation of the old law. The holy mountain was covered with wreaths of ſmoke, and trembled with the ſolemn rowl of thunders. Lightnings were darted forth, with a diſmal brightneſs, and became formidable barriers, that were not to be paſſed over, without expiating the raſh attempt by a ſudden and tragical death. Thouſands of angels ſtood ready to revenge the contempt of the Almighty's laws, upon the leaſt ſignal. The earth trembled, and ſhrunk to its foundations. Three millions of ſpectators were frozen with fear, and begged, that God would not ſpeak to them, leſt they died. Moſes himſelf, as habituated as he had been to the ſight of God, was ſo terrified at the awful ſpectacle, that he cried out, I exceedingly fear and quake. Theſe, with the God of terrible majeſty deſcending on the holy mount, are the objects that preſent themſelves to our imagination, in this noble chapter.

Ver. 1. In the third month, when the children of Iſrael were gone forth out of the land of Egypt, the ſame day they came into the wilderneſs of Sinai.] The Iſraelites came into this wilderneſs forty-ſeven days after the celebration of their paſſover in Egypt, and, three days after their arrival, the law was proclaimed. It is upon this account that the Jews keep their Pentecoſt, which is the memorial of this proclamation, fifty days after Eaſter.

This wilderneſs was to the eaſt of Paleſtine, and deriv'd its name from an eminence of a mountain that ſtood there. Strabo and Juſtin call it Sinan, and another author ſays, that Moſes aſcended the mountain called Synea, and that he was hid there forty days, Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 8. c. 7.

p. 268. The other eminence of the mountain was named Horeb; but bears ſometimes the title of Sinai, and ſometimes that of Horeb. Thevenot aſſures us, the ſaid mountain hath yet a third eminence, which is, at preſent, ſtyled St. Catharine, and which moſt of the geographers confound with the other.

Moſes was, at firſt, alone with God on mount Sinai, ſeveral times, and God commanded him to make the Iſraelites ſenſible of the value of the mercies they had received from him, and of the greatneſs of the miracles he had wrought in their favour. He likewiſe enjoined him to exhort them, by theſe preſſing motives, to ſubmit to his laws, if they expected the continuation of his powerful protection, and the increaſe of his favours.

Moſes, when he received this commiſſion, was ſeated in a manner fit to render him ſenſible of the reaſon and importance of it; for he was upon an eminence, from whence he could diſcover the way, which led to that Egypt, where God had performed ſo many wonders; that ſea, through which he had ſtruck out miraculous paths for the Iſraelites; that wilderneſs where he had already fed them by miracles; and that land of promiſe, the object of their vows and wiſhes, to which he had reſolved to bring them with a ſtrong hand, and a ſtretched out arm.

Ver. 4. Ye have ſeen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles wings, and brought you unto myſelf] Theſe words, I bare you on eagles wings, denote the protection which God granted to that people. Here we muſt make one obſervation, which it will be neceſſary to apply to a variety of other paſſages, and which relates to the metaphors taken from ſeveral ſorts of animals. It is, that in order to explain them aright, we ought to mind leſs, what they really are in themſelves, than what was aſcribed to them in the age of the ſacred writers. Ancient naturaliſts have left us ſeveral relations of the wonderful care which the eagle takes of its young ones.

Ver. 5. Now therefore if ye will obey my voice, indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye ſhall be a peculiar treaſure unto me, &c.] The original expreſſion which is rendered a peculiar treaſure unto me, deſerves to be conſidered. It implies ſomething that is exceedingly valued, and which men would keep with the utmoſt vigilance. Here follows the gloſs of a certain Rabbin. Segullah, ſays he, ('tis the Hebrew term) "denotes that they ſhould be exceeding dear to "God; that they ſhould be like thoſe treaſures, which a "king does not intruſt to any of the officers of the crown, "but takes them under his own immediate care: 'Tis the "idea he gives us of the children of Iſrael in the book of "Deuteronomy." The Lord's portion is his people: Jacob is the lot of his inheritance. R. Menachem on Exod. xix. 5. Paraſcha Vaiſch. Jethro, fo. 67.

Ver. 6. And ye ſhall be unto me a kingdom of prieſts.] This promiſe was alſo very proper to give the Iſraelites a high conception of the privileges they were to enjoy, if they faithfully obſerved the law, which God was preparing to give them. They were come out of a country where the perſons of the prieſts were inviolable.

Ver. 7. And Moſes came and called for the elders of the people, &c.] Moſes came down immediately from the mount, and having aſſembled the heads of families, and the chief of the people, he acquainted them with what he had heard from God. Scarce had he opened his lips, but all hearts ſeemed to be united; every one ſeemed to have formed the ſame deſire, and accordingly cried, in the ſame words, We will do all that the Lord hath ſpoken. Moſes was the mediator between God and the people; he went up again to the mount, and reported to God the anſwer of the Iſraelites. God acquainted him, that ſince they were in ſo good a diſpoſition to hear his word, he would confirm them in the ſame, and diſperſe all ſhadow of ſuſpicion they might be capable of forming againſt the divinity of his miſſion.

All thoſe impoſtors who have ſet up new religions in the world, have commonly pretended to a correſpondence with the gods; and in order to conciliate a due reſpect to the laws they determined to eſtabliſh, they declared they had received them immediately from heaven. 'Twas thus, Zoroaſter, Lycurgus, Numa, Seleucus, Mohammed, and others of that claſs have acted; and the natural incredulity of the Jews might have excited in them the ſame ſentiments of Moſes; but God had aſſured this law-giver, that he would ſpeak to him after ſo conſpicuous a manner, and before all that numerous people, that there ſhould never remain the leaſt room to doubt, whether he were choſen by God to deliver his commands to them. This ſtep produced the effect for which it was intended; and 'tis a common expreſſion in the mouth of the Jews, We know that God ſpake to Moſes. The ancient Jewiſh doctors have obſerved, that the wavering faith of the people received full conviction from what paſſed at Mount Sinai. Iſrael (ſays a Rabbin) "did not believe our maſter Moſes, for the ſake "of the tokens he gave them. He who believes on the "account of ſigns and tokens, may always lie under the "ſuſpicion, that they have been wrought by magic arts. "All thoſe that were performed by Moſes in the wilder-"neſs, were owing to pure neceſſity; we were preſſed with "hunger and he brought down manna from heaven. We "were periſhing with thirſt and he forced water out of "the rock, and ſo on. But why did we believe in him? "Becauſe, being all of us at the foot of the mount, our "own eyes, and not thoſe of ſtrangers, ſaw the fires, and "the lightnings; our own ears, and not thoſe of ſtrangers, "heard the thunderings and voices; and were alſo near "enough to hear that voice which called to him out of "the thick cloud, ſaying, Moſes, Moſes, go, ſpeak, ſo "and ſo ſhalt thou ſay to them. We can no longer doubt "of what he himſelf tells us in Deuteronomy. The Lord "ſpake to him face to face, from the midſt of the fire on "the mount.

Ver. 10. And the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, Go unto the people, and ſanctify them to day and to-morrow, and let them waſh their cloaths.] God ordered Moſes likewiſe to prepare the people, to the end that they might ſee without profanation, the ſolemn tokens of his preſence upon Mount Sinai. The ceremony which he appointed upon this occaſion, became a law to the Jews, and likewiſe among the Heathens; they religiouſly obſerved them when they diſpoſed themſelves to draw near to the Deity. Waſhing their cloaths, plunging their bodies into water, abſtaining from the moſt lawful things; but ſuch, however, as were capable of diſtracting the mind: Theſe are the rites of which hiſtory furniſhed us with numerous inſtances.

Ver. 12. And thou ſhalt ſet bounds to the people round about, &c.] God ordered Moſes more eſpecially to place barriers about the mount, and to charge the people moſt ſtrictly not to touch any part thereof. Whoever preſumed to violate this law, was to be either ſtoned or ſhot through. The firſt of theſe terms is equivocal in the original, and may likewiſe ſignify precipitated, or thrown down from ſome eminence, The ſame word is uſed in the 15th chapter of this book, verſe 4. on account of Pharaoh; and our tranſlators have rendered it, Pharaoh's chariots and his hoſt hath he caſt into the ſea. The learned Mr. Selden thought, that the word denotes, in this place, a puniſhment like that which was uſed among the Romans, who caſt headlong from the Tarpeian rock, ſuch as were guilty of certain crimes. A like puniſhment was practiſed by the Jews, as ten thouſand Idumeans experienced, in the time of king Amaziah. But, perhaps, God did not command Moſes to execute this threatening, but reſerved it immediately to himſelf. The ſtones with which thoſe, who preſumed to approach the mount, were to be deſtroyed, were probably, ſuch as God himſelf would cauſe to roll down from the mount upon them. And as to ſhooting them through; it might poſſibly mean darts of fire, that were to be launched againſt them from the mount.

When the Trumpet ſoundeth along, they ſhall come up to the mount.] This ſeems to contradict the prohibition that was made of approaching the place, and ſome commentators have conſidered it as a kind of challenge which God uttered to preſumptuous perſons. Juſt as if he had ſaid, Let them approach if they dare when they hear the ſound of the trumpet? Others are of opinion, that by the mount we ought to underſtand the bottom of it; which ſeems to us not to be maintainable. Moſt of the ancient verſions have render'd it in a different manner, and we think our tranſlation might be amended by thoſe, as for inſtance; When the trumpet ceaſes to ſound, they may aſcend the mount. We ſhall not inquire whether the ancient interpreters read the Hebrew text in a different manner than we do, but the meaning which we adopt is moſt reaſonable. The children of Iſrael encamped for the ſpace of a whole year round mount Sinai, and God allowed them to aſcend it, and admire, on it's ſummit, the traces of his divine divine preſence, when the dreadful ceremony of the promulgation of the law was fully compleated.

Three whole days were employed in theſe conferences between God and Moſes, and between him and the people, and in all the preparatory circumſtances for that promulgation. The famous day at laſt arrives; Moſes at the head of the Iſraelites, marched towards mount Sinai, which was rendered terrible by the thunder and lightning, the rolling ſmoke, and fires, the ſound of the trumpet, and the gloom of a thick cloud. At this terrifying ſight, there was not one of the Iſraelites, who admitted ſo much as a thought of violating the command of not approaching it; every individual ſhewed a reſpect to thoſe barriers that were placed between a dreadful God and an intimidated people. None looked upon them without trembling, and they were ſo far from attempting to paſs them, that they wiſhed themſelves at a greater diſtance from them.

Ver. 20. And the Lord called Moſes up to the top of the mount, and Moſes went up.] Moſes himſelf, who had acquainted them with this terrible apparatus, could not behold it without fear, and would have been glad to have ſtay'd among the meaneſt of the Iſraelites, at a reſpectful diſtance. But God commanded him to aſcend to the top of the mount, and there he repeated to him the prohibition he had already made. He ordered him to exhort the heads of the people to ſet an example to them all of an extraordinary purification; which this law-giver executed punctually. After this, God called him up again, and ordered him to bring his brother Aaron with him. When they came up, he pronounced the commandments of the moral law, elſewhere ſtiled the ten commandments. At the ſame time likewiſe he publiſhed the moſt general, concerning the political and ceremonial law, namely, ſuch as might ſerve for principles to particular laws of the ſame kind, and which were to be declared to them thereafter.

CHAP. XX.

1 The ten commandments. 18 The people are afraid. 20 Moſes comforteth them. 22 Idolatry is forbidden. 24 Of what ſort the altar ſhould be.

AND God ſpake all theſe words, ſaying,

2 I am the LORD thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the houſe of bondage.

3 Thou ſhalt have no other gods before me.

4 Thou ſhalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeneſs of any thing, that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth.

5 Thou ſhalt not bow down thy ſelf to them, nor ſerve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, viſiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me:

6 And ſhewing mercy unto thouſands of them that love me, and keep my commandments.

7 Thou ſhalt not take the name of the LORD thy God in vain: for the LORD will not hold him guiltleſs that taketh his name in vain.

8 Remember the ſabbath day, to keep it holy.

9 Six days ſhalt thou labour, and do all thy work:

10 But the ſeventh day is the ſabbath of the LORD thy God: in it thou ſhalt not do any work, thou, nor thy ſon, nor thy daughter, thy man-ſervant, nor thy maid-ſervant, nor thy cattel, nor thy ſtranger that is within thy gates.

11 For in ſix days the LORD made heaven and earth, the ſea, and all that in them is, and reſted the ſeventh day: wherefore the LORD bleſſed the ſabbath-day, and hallowed it.

12 ¶ Honour thy father, and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land, which the LORD thy God giveth thee.

13 Thou ſhalt not kill.

14 Thou ſhalt not commit adultery.

15 Thou ſhalt not ſteal.

16 Thou ſhalt not bear falſe witneſs againſt thy neighbour.

17 Thou ſhalt not covet thy neighbours houſe, thou ſhalt not covet thy neighbours wife, nor his man-ſervant, nor his maid-ſervant, nor his ox, nor his aſs, nor any thing that is thy neighbours.

18 ¶ And all the people ſaw the thundrings, and the lightnings, and the noiſe of the trumpet, and the mountain ſmoaking: and when the people ſaw it, they removed, and ſtood afar off.

19 And they ſaid unto Moſes, ſpeak thou with us, and we will hear: but let not God ſpeak with us, leſt we die.

20 And Moſes ſaid unto the people, Fear not: for God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before your faces, that ye ſin not.

21 And the people ſtood afar off, and Moſes drew near unto the thick darkneſs where God was.

22 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Thus thou ſhalt ſay unto the children of Iſrael, Ye have ſeen that I have talked with you from heaven.

23 Ye ſhall not make with me gods of ſilver, neither ſhall ye make unto you gods of gold.

24 ¶ An altar of earth thou ſhalt make unto me, and ſhalt ſacrifice thereon thy burnt-offerings, and thy peace-offerings, thy ſheep, and thine oxen: in all places where I record my Name, I will come unto thee, and I will bleſs thee.

25 And if thou wilt make me an altar of ſtone, thou ſhalt not build it of hewn ſtone: for if thou lift up thy tool upon it, thou haſt polluted it.

26 Neither ſhalt thou go up by ſteps unto to mine altar, that thy nakedneſs be not diſcovered thereon.

Ver. 1. And God ſpake all theſe words ſaying, &c.] Moſes had no ſooner re-aſcended mount Sinai, with Aaron his brother, in obedience to the Divine Command, than there came a voice from the Shechinah or divine majeſty out of the midſt of the fire, (as we read, Deut. iv, 12. v: 4, 22.) that is of the angelic hoſt which incircled him in the form of flames. This as ſome think, occaſioned the Apoſtle to ſay the law was ordained by angels. Gal. iii, 2. who then attended upon the Divine Majeſty, as his retinue when he uttered theſe words that follow to the end of the ſeventeenth verſe.

Ver. 2 I am the Lord thy God, which [it ought to have been tranſlated who] have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, &c.] In this preface to the ten commandments, God aſſerts his prerogative to give laws to the Iſraelites, not only as he is Lord of all, but by a peculiar title he had to their obedience; and whom he had taken to himſelf after a ſpecial manner, to be his ſelect people, by bringing them out of the land of Egypt, and the ſervice under which they groaned in that inhoſpitable country. This was a benefit freſh in their minds, and moſt adapted to affect their hearts, and therefore the Deity doth not ſay, I am the Lord of heaven and earth! or, I am thy creator; but I am the Lord thy God, to whom I have manifeſted a peculiar tenderneſs and favour by bringing thee out of the land of Egypt.

Ver. 3. Thou ſhalt have no other Gods before me] That is, believe in one God; or believe there is no other God but one, and conſequently worſhip no other. This is the great foundation of the law, for whoſoever confeſſes any other God, denies the whole law. They were therefore not to worſhip any other God, in conjunction with him, as many did, 2 Kings xvii, 33. for in his preſence he could not endure any competitor.

Ver. 4. Thou ſhalt not make unto thee any graven image.] The difference between Peſel, which we tranſlate graven image, and Temunah, which we render likeneſs, ſeems to be, that the former was a protuberant image, or a ſtatue made of wood, ſtone, &c. and the other only a picture, drawn in colours, upon a wall, &c. Both which, ſome have thought, they were here prohibited from making, whether it were the image or picture of the ſtars, or birds, or men, or beaſts, or fiſhes; leſt they ſhould be tempted to worſhip them. The Talmudiſts think it was unlawful to make any figure of celeſtial bodies, either prominent or plain, tho' only for ornament, but that they were permitted to draw prominent figures of brute animals, and might delineate the repreſentations of men on a flat. But the moſt common and reaſonable opinion is, that Moſes did not forbid the formation of an image, but commanded them not to make any ſuch with an intention to render divine worſhip to them.

Ver. 5. Thou ſhalt not bow down thyſelf to them, nor ſerve them. If they ſaw an image in other countries, they are commanded not to uſe any geſture, that might be an indication of religious reverence and honour to it, much leſs to offer ſacrifices, or burnt offerings, at its ſhrine. There ſeems to be a plain gradation in this commandment, three things being here forbidden, if we take the firſt part of it, to ſignify that they might not ſo much as make a graven image, nor any likeneſs of any thing, whatever, leſt they ſhould be tempted to idolatry. But tho' this may be ſuppoſed to have been a ſinful action, yet it was not ſo criminal, as to bow down to them; which was a degree of honour too high to be rendered to any image, but even this action was not equal to the guilt of ſerving them, by offering ſacrifices, burning incenſe, and making vows to them; or ſwearing by them, or conſecrating temples to them, or lighting up candles before them.

For I the Lord thy God am a jealous God.] This reaſon makes it evident, that this commandment is different from the firſt, and not a part of it. For worſhipping of images is forbidden, not meerly becauſe he was their God, and that there is but one God; but becauſe he is a jealous God, who could not endure any corrival, in the adoration that was due to none but himſelf. The ancient Jews, therefore, and Chriſtians, before St. Auſtin, took this for the ſecond commandment. The Arabian Chriſtians, in later times, particularly Elmacinus, diſtinctly name the ten commandments in the ſame order in which they are enumerated by us.

Viſiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation.] This was threatened in order to terrify them from a ſin which proved ſo injurious to their own families: But Aben Ezra underſtands it, and perhaps juſtly, only of ſuch children as trod in the ſteps of their fathers; for if they repented, the puniſhment was mitigated, Lev. xxvi. 40, &c.

Theſe unrighteous fathers might be ſuppoſed to live to the third, and perhaps the fourth generation of their deſcendants, whoſe puniſhment would be an additional affliction to their guilty anceſtor, who muſt inevitably conſider himſelf as the barbarous cauſe of their ſufferings.

Of them that hate me.] It is an obſervation of Maimonides, that in the whole law of Moſes, and in the books of the prophets, we ſhall never find theſe words, fury, anger, indignation, jealouſy, attributed to God, but when they ſpeak of idolatry; nor any man called an enemy to God, or an hater of him but only idolaters. By which it appears, that the worſhippers of images are counted idolatrous perſons, tho' they did not think theſe images were gods, but only intermediate between God and themſelves, as the ſame author declares, More Nevoch. p. 1. c. 36.

This was a law ſo well known to the ancient Heathens, that the beſt men among them, would not ſuffer any images to be ſet up in their temples. Numa, in particular, forbad this to the Romans, which he learnt, as Clemens Alexandrinus thinks, from Moſes. Inſomuch, that for the ſpace of an hundred and ſeventy years, tho' they built temples, yet they made no image, nor ſtatue, nor ſo much as a picture, l. 1. Stromat. p. 304. Plutarch relates the ſame in the life of Numa, and adds this reaſon, that he thought it a great crime to repreſent the moſt excellent Being, by ſuch mean things; and that God was to be apprehended only by the mind. The ancient Perſians pretended to have received the ſame law, from their Zoroaſter, who, in a number of particulars, bears ſuch a reſemblance to Moſes, that Huetius, thinks, and not without reaſon, that his ſtory was framed out of theſe ſacred books.

Ver. 6. And ſhewing mercy unto thouſands.] To invite their obedience to his precepts, God promiſes to be gracious to them and their poſterity for many generations (for this is the true ſignification of thouſands) who adhered to him alone as the only object of adoration. Such is the infinite goodneſs of God, that he delights much more in the manifeſtation of mercy, than in acts of ſeverity, there being ſuch a diſparity between the diſpenſation of the one and the other, as there is between three or four, and thouſands: This rendered the puniſhment of idolaters the more reaſonable, becauſe they might have enjoyed ſuch great and durable bleſſings, if they would have adhered to the religion inſtituted by God himſelf.

Ver. 7. Thou ſhalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain.] By the name of the Lord, in Scripture, is meant the Lord himſelf, and to take, or lift up his name, is to ſwear by him: and to do this in vain, is to ſwear falſely. This relates not to their giving a teſtimony before a judge upon oath, (of which mention is made afterward, in a diſtinct commandment) but to their intercourſe and commerce, one with another. An oath, ſaith R. Levi of Barcelona, ought to eſtabliſh every thing: And we thereby declare ourſelves to be as much reſolved concerning that which we ſwear, as we are concerning the Being of a God.

Heathens themſelves accounted an oath ſo ſacred a thing, that it was capital for a man to forſwear himſelf, as Hen. Stephanus (in his Fontes Juris Civilis) obſerves out of Diodorus Siculus, l. 1. and the reaſon he aſſigns for it is this; that ſuch a man committed two heinous crimes; by violating his piety to God, and his faith to men, in the higheſt degree.

But beſides this, both Jews and Chriſtians always underſtood ſwearing lightly, upon frivolous occaſions, or without any neceſſity, to be here likewiſe forbidden. And Salvian applies this to the trivial naming of God, and our Saviour, upon all occaſions.

For the Lord will not hold him guiltleſs, &c.] If men did not puniſh the falſe ſwearer, the Lord threatens that he will. And ſo mankind always thought, as appears by the law of the twelve tables, mentioned by Stephanus in the book quoted above, perjurii pœna divina, exitium; humana, dederus.

dededus. The divine puniſhment for perjury is utter deſtruction: The human puniſhment is diſgrace or infamy. And Alexander Severus was ſo ſenſible of this, that he thought jurisjurandi contempta religio, ſatis Deum ultorem habet. The contempt of the religion of an oath hath God for a ſufficient avenger. For an oath is the ſtrongeſt bond in ſociety, to bind men to truth and fidelity, as Cicero declares, l. 3. de offic. c. 31. Witneſs, ſaith he, the twelve tables; witneſs our ſacred forms in taking an oath; witneſs our covenant and leagues, wherein we plight our faith to enemies; witneſs the animadverſions of our cenſors, qui nulla de re diligentius quam de jurejurando judicabant; who judged of nothing more diligently, than of an oath.

Nor was the other ſort of vain and unneceſſary ſwearing ſuffered to paſs with impunity, for Mr. Selden obſerves, out of Maimonides, l. 2. de Synedr. c. 11. p. 497. that if any man was guilty of it, the perſon, who heard him ſwear, was obliged to excommunicate him, and if he did not, he was to ſuſtain that puniſhment himſelf. And there is ample reaſon for the inſtitution of theſe civil laws, which have provided a puniſhment for this crime, not only becauſe it is a moſt inſolent diſreſpect to God, to profane his awful name, with ſuch an air of levity, and on every trivial occaſion, but becauſe ſuch an impious contempt of the Divine Majeſty tends to betray men into the dreadful crime of perjury.

Ver. 8. Remember the ſabbath day to keep it holy.] There is no method by which we can more ſolidly evince, that it is impoſſible the hiſtory of the creation of the world ſhould be any invention of Moſes, than by making it appear, that the law of the ſabbath hath a natural reference to the creation of the world, and that it was conſtantly obſerv'd from that time, to the age of Moſes. We are no ſooner informed, that the ſabbath is a ſolemn day, ordained at firſt to celebrate and perpetuate the memory of the creation, but we naturally judge it impoſſible, that ſo important an event, commemorated every ſeventh day, by virtue of a Divine Law, ſhould be an impoſture. But as this impoſſibility is grounded on two propoſitions; the one, that God gave this law of the ſabbath to the firſt man; the other, that the ſame was obſerved by his poſterity ever ſince, till the time of Moſes; and that God only renewed it in the law given from mount Sinai: Theſe are the truths we are to clear up, and it becomes the more neceſſary to prove them, becauſe, tho' the generality of authors, ancient and modern, Jews as well as Chriſtians, are of this opinion, yet ſome of the Chriſtian fathers ſeem to deny, that the ſabbath was ever obſerved by the patriarchs. But it will be eaſy to prove from Moſes, that the antiquity is ſuch as we aſſert, and, at the ſame time, to demonſtrate the truth of the creation, as well as the promiſe of the Meſſiah, which, in a manner, immediately followed it, and which ſhall be fully conſidered in its proper place.

Moſes, in the ſecond chapter of Geneſis, ver. 3. expreſſes himſelf thus: And God bleſſed the ſeventh day, and ſanctified it, becauſe that in it he had reſted from all his work, which he had created. Which words clearly evince a ſolemn conſecration of the ſeventh day to the ſervice of God, by its being made a commemoration of his finiſhing the creation of the heavens and the earth.

But becauſe it may be ſaid, that the intent of Moſes, in this place, was only to record the reaſon, why God ſet apart this day, of all others, to his ſervice, by the law at mount Sinai, we are to take notice, that this appointment was made for the ſake of man, who was already planted in the garden of Eden. This we gather from the order obſerved by Moſes; for he relates, firſt, the formation of man on the ſixth day, and his being placed in Paradiſe, of which he gives a more particular account in the ſecond chapter; and, after theſe, he relates God's reſting from his works, and the conſecration of the Sabbath, with the reaſon of the impoſition of that law on man; and then adds, Theſe are the generations of the heavens and of the earth, when they were created, in the day that the Lord made the heaven and the earth. All that precedes theſe words, is only a relation of what paſſed in the ſeven firſt days, and that which Moſes ſets down concerning God's bleſſing of the ſeventh day, and his conſecration of it, ought as well to be accounted a law appointing the ſeventh day for his ſervice, as thoſe other bleſſings, given to the creatures according to their kinds, are acknowledged as inviolable laws of God, by virtue whereof they ſubſiſt, and are perpetuated, each according to their kind, by the way of generation.

In the ſecond place, it is very remarkable, that the patriarchs maintained a publick worſhip, at leaſt ſince the time of Seth; which it was neceſſary ſhould be determin'd to ſome certain day; and ſince we find, that even at this time they diſtinguiſhed between beaſts clean and unclean, with reſpect to their ſacrifices (which they could not do but from revelation) we have much more reaſon to conclude, that God had ſet apart a time for his own worſhip and ſervice.

And indeed there are many evident ſigns, that even the ſeventh day was obſerved. We will not here peremptorily aſſert that ancient tradition of the Jews, which tells us, that the ninety-ſecond Pſalm, whoſe title is, a pſalm for the Sabbath, was compoſed by Adam himſelf, who was created on the evening before the ſabbath: But this we dare aſſert, as an apparent fact, that what we read in the eighth chapter of Geneſis, concerning the deluge, verſes 10. 12. refers to this cuſtom; when we find Noah ſending forth the dove and the raven, on the ſeventh day, which plainly hints to us his obſerving of that day; for it ſeems, that Noah having, in an eſpecial manner upon that ſolemn day, implored the aſſiſtance of God in the aſſembly of his family, he expected a peculiar bleſſing from it.

And we cannot but make ſome reflection on that which we read in the 29th chapter of Geneſis, concerning the term of a week ſet apart to the nuptials of Leah, where, at the 27th verſe, Laban thus expreſſes himſelf; "Fulfil "her week and we will give thee this alſo, for the ſervice "which thou ſhalt ſerve with me yet ſeven other years. This week ſo plainly ſignifies a week of days, that it cannot be more naturally expreſſed; and indeed, all generally underſtand by this week of the marriage feaſt of Leah, that term of time which, in ſucceeding ages, it hath been cuſtomary to allot to nuptial feſtivals, as appears from the book of Eſther, where the marriage feaſt of Vaſhti, laſted ſeven days, this term having long been conſecrated to nuptial rejoicings.

The ſame we may alſo gather from the time which was generally allotted to mourning for the dead, to which we find the patriarchs appropriated a term proportioned to that of their rejoicing. For we ſee, that the Egyptians mourned ten weeks for Jacob, becauſe of his quality, and we find that Joſeph, and thoſe who accompanied him at the funeral of that patriarch, mourned ſeven days, at his interment in the land of Canaan; and as we find that this cuſtom was afterwards conſtantly obſerved by the Jews, as appears from Eccleſiaſticus xxii. 12. So likewiſe we find the ſame obſerved by the Aſiatics, as may be ſeen in the hiſtory of Ammianus Marcellinus, at the beginning of his 19th book, and from them it paſſed to the Chriſtians, as we find in St. Ambroſe, de fide reſur. in obitu Sat. p. 321.

Thirdly, it appears from Exod. vii. 25. That God obſerved ſeven days, after he had ſmote the river, to change its waters into blood; from whence the Jews conclude, that the three plagues, viz. that of blood, of frogs, and of lice, continued in the land of Egypt ſix days, and were withdrawn on the ſeventh, which was the ſabbath.

We may alſo collect, if we calculate the time exactly, that the Jews in Egypt obſerved the ſabbath. We find, from the hiſtory of their departure out of that country, that the ſame happened on a Thurſday, being the fifteenth of the month Niſan, and the day in which they ſung the hymn for their deliverance, was the ſabbath, which God had particularly ſet apart for this week.

It is evident, alſo, from Exod. xvi. that the keeping of the ſabbath was obſerv'd by the Iſraelites, before the law was given on Mount Sinai. For we find God ſpeaking, in that chapter, concerning the ſabbath, not as of a new inſtitution, but as of an ancient law, which they were not to tranſgreſs, by gathering the manna on that day. We ſee that the reſting of the Iſraelites on the ſeventh day, is there ſuppoſed to be a known and cuſtomary conduct, preſcribed to them by an ancient law.

They who went out to gather manna on the ſeventh day, are repreſented as tranſgreſſors of a known law, as appears from the words of God to Moſes: How long refuſe ye to keep my commandments and my laws? Moſes alſo ſpeaks of the ſabbath, which was to be the next day, as of a thing cuſtomary and receiv'd amongſt them. To mor-

Now, ſaith he, ver. 23. is the reſt of the ſabbath of holineſs unto the Lord. Words which would have been unintelligible to the Iſraelites, and expreſſed a law altogether impracticable, in caſe they had been deſtitute of any other knowledge of it, and had not been ſufficiently acquainted before, that it was the very day in which the great work of creation had been finiſhed.

Our fourth obſervation we ſhall take from the very words of the Decalogue, where, firſt of all, we find God ſpeaking in this manner, Remember the ſabbath day; which words clearly import, that the law he gave, was not a new law, but, indeed, as old as the world, and which had been obſerved by their forefathers. It ſeems probable, alſo, that God expreſſes himſelf in theſe terms, becauſe the tyranny of Pharaoh had compelled them to break this law, by obliging them to deliver their tale of bricks every day, without excepting the ſabbath, which, before, he had allowed them to keep.

This is explained very diſtinctly in the fifth chapter of Exodus, and ſeems to have been the occaſion of Moſes's demanding leave of Pharaoh, for the Iſraelites to go and ſacrifice; in anſwer to which, the king expreſſes himſelf in terms which ſhew that they formerly had obſerv'd a reſt on that day, ver. 5. It is, however, apparent, that God commands them to make their bond ſervants obſerve the ſabbath, becauſe the Egyptians, by their ſeverity, had inclin'd them not to be very careful in exempting their own ſervants from all labour on that day.

We are to take notice, in the ſecond place, that God ſpeaks of the ſabbath, in the laſt words of the fourth commandment, as of a ſolemn day formerly appointed and determined by him; For in ſix days the Lord made heaven and earth, and reſted the ſeventh day, wherefore the Lord bleſſed the ſabbath day, and hallowed it. Which words have a manifeſt and undeniable reference to that which happened the ſeventh day after the creation, and to the law then given to man concerning it.

We may gather, from the fourth chapter of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, that the conſtruction which we have put upon the third verſe of the ſecond chapter of Geneſis, is the ſame which the Jews have always given it. The Apoſtle, diſcourſing from theſe words of David, Pſal. xcv. To whom I ſware in my wrath, that they ſhould not enter into my reſt; ſuppoſes a threefold reſt; the firſt of which is the reſt of the ſabbath, of which mention is made in the ſecond chapter of Geneſis; where we have the firſt inſtitution of it. The ſecond was in the land of Canaan, promiſed to the Jews. The third is the reſt in heaven, of which the two foregoing were but figures. He argues, therefore, that theſe words of David could not be underſtood, concerning the ſabbath day; foraſmuch, as from the beginning of the world, men entered into that reſt of the ſabbath: And he proves this, by that paſſage in Geneſis, of which he only cites the firſt words, viz. That God reſted the ſeventh day from all his works; as ſuppoſing, that the Jews, to whom he wrote, had no need of having the following words quoted to them, and which tell us, that God bleſſed the ſeventh day, and hallowed it: That is, he conſecrated the ſame to his worſhip and ſervice, foraſmuch as nothing was more publickly and univerſally known amongſt them; the obſervation of the ſabbath being an inſtitution generally received, even before the promulgation of the law.

And, indeed, tho' Philo the Jew be of opinion, that the practice of ſolemnizing that day, had ſuffered ſome interruption; and that, for this reaſon, the law of the ſabbath was given to Moſes, yet it is well known, that Ariſtobulus, the Peripatetic, in a treatiſe dedicated by him to Ptolemy Philadelphus, cites ſeveral paſſages of Homer, Heſiod, and Linus, which mention the ſeventh day as a feſtival, and ſolemn day, becauſe all things were finiſhed in the ſame. Euſeb. Præp. Evang. l. xiii. c. 12.

It is likewiſe notorious, that if ſome of the fathers, as Juſtin Martyr, and Tertullian, writing againſt the Jews, have denied, that the patriarchs obſerved the ſeventh day, they did ſo rather with regard to the rigour of that law, which prohibited all manner of work on that day, upon pain of death (which was ſuperadded by God to the firſt law of the ſabbath) than to the obſervation of the ſabbath, as it was a day appointed to make a ſolemn commemoration of the creation of the world.

In a word, we are to take notice, that the difference which God makes between the ſabbath, obſerved by the patriarchs, and that which he appointed to the Jews, conſiſted in two particulars: Firſt, In God's impoſing an abſolute neceſſity upon the Jews to abſtain from all manner of work, even to the very dreſſing of proviſion neceſſary for the ſupport of life. We find this diſtinction very clearly expreſſed in the law which God gave concerning the firſt and ſeventh day of the feaſt of unleavened bread, for he abſolutely forbids all manner of work on thoſe two days, as much as on the ſabbath, even the preparation of neceſſary food, which he permits on the five other days, prohibiting only ſervile laborious works.

Secondly, in that the working on that day is made puniſhable with death by the law, which was not ſo before. This innovation, and additional rigour of the law, eſtabliſhed by God, was authorized, by the puniſhment of him who had gathered ſticks on the ſabbath day; whereas we find, that, before the publication of the law on Mount Sinai, God did not command theſe Jews to be puniſhed with death, who went forth the ſeventh day, to gather manna, according to their ancient cuſtom of dreſſing their food on that day.

We may likewiſe add, that tho' the apoſtles had aboliſhed the rigour of the Moſaic law, relating to the ſabbath, yet they themſelves obſerved it; and this practiſe of theirs, in all probability, gave occaſion to the Chriſtians, for near four centuries, to keep the ſabbath as well as the firſt day of the week: ſolemnizing both thoſe days; the one, as a commemoration of the creation of the world; and the other, of the reſurrection of our bleſſed Saviour Jeſus Chriſt.

But whatever judgment may be paſt on this laſt remark, it is very evident, from Geneſis and this book of Exodus; Firſt, that the law of the ſabbath was obſerved before the time of Moſes: Secondly, that this obſervation was propagated by the firſt patriarchs, among the Heathens alſo, as well as the idea of the creation.

After all this, we muſt conclude againſt the Atheiſt, that Moſes could never have been ſo imprudent as to lay a ſnare for himſelf, in forging a fact, of which not only the Jews, but all the world, were able to convince him, ſince there were none among them but muſt needs be conſcious, whether they had obſerved the ſabbath as a memorial of the creation, as he relates it; or whether it was a perfect novelty; and therefore, that the creation of the world, being a matter of fact ſo generally known, and the commemoration of it ſolemnized every ſeventh day, by all thoſe who preceded him, muſt needs be an inconteſted truth, which we ſhall, hereafter, fully evince, by thoſe obſervations we propoſe to raiſe, from the dependance and connexion, which the events related by Moſes in Geneſis, have with the creation, and the promiſe of the Meſſiah. And we ſhall then demonſtrate, that nothing can be imagined more rational and coherent, than the relations of Moſes, in which the Atheiſts flatter themſelves that they diſcover ſo many abſurdities.

Ver. 12. Honour thy father and thy mother.] In another place they are commanded to fear them, Lev. xix. 3. And as here the father is mentioned before the mother, ſo there the mother is inſerted before the father; to ſhow, (as Maimonides takes it in his treatiſe, call'd Memarim: c. 6.) that we ought not to make any difference between them; but they are both equally to be honoured and reverenced. Which is a duty of ſuch great importance, that we are taught, by the placing of this commandment immediately after thoſe which peculiarly relate to God's worſhip, that, next to his Majeſty, our parents are to be honoured, with that reverence, love, obedience, and maintenance, which is due to them. And therefore notorious diſobedience to them is threatened with death, as well as apoſtacy from God. Wherein this honour or fear doth conſiſt, is taught in all books of religion: And Mr. Selden hath collected a great many particulars, wherein the Jews place it, as the learned reader may ſee, l. ii. de Synedr. c. 13. p. 558.

We ſhall only add that this was a law among the Heathens, mentioned by Saleucus, Charondus and others, in theſe words, τὰ τέκνα τὲς γονεῖς τιμάτωσαν, let children honour their parents. And thus Ulpian expreſſes it, filio ſemper honeſta & ſancta perſona patris videri debet; the perſon of a father ſhould always ſeem honourable and ſacred to a ſon. And afterward, filium patrem & matrem venerari rari oportet, a ſon ought to reverence his father and mother.

That thy days may be long in the land, &c.] As diſobedience to parents is, by the law of Moſes, threatened to be puniſhed with death; ſo, on the contrary, long life (which is the greateſt worldly bleſſing) is promiſed to the obedient; and that in their own country, which God had peculiarly enriched with a vaſt variety of his bleſſings. Heathens alſo gave the very ſame encouragement, ſaying, that ſuch children ſhould be dear to the gods, both living and dead. So Euripides,

Οστις δ' τὸς τεκόνλας ἐν Βίῳ σέβει,
Ὅσ' ἐσὶ κ' ζῶν, κ' θανῶν θεοῖς φίλ@.

Ver. 13. Thou ſhalt not kill.] After the command, which expreſſes the reſpect due to parents, naturally follows the regard we ought to have to all other men. And the greateſt injury we can do another, is to take away his life; whereby he is deprived of all the enjoyments of this world, and humane ſociety itſelf is alſo wounded; nor can it ſubſiſt, if its innocent members are rendered unſafe. We ſay innocent, for this commandment doth not prohibit men from defending themſelves from violence, xxii. 2. nor magiſtrates from puniſhing thoſe with death, who commit crimes which deſerve it; for this is to ſecure the lives of other men, xxii. 18, 19, 20.

Ver. 14. Thou ſhalt not commit adultery.] Next to a man's ſelf, his wife is nearer to him, than any other perſon; they two being one fleſh, which makes the injury done to him in her perſon, a breach of human ſociety next to murder. Nay, the LXX place this commandment before the other, Thou ſhalt not kill: Vertuous women valuing their chaſtity more than their lives; and the crimes to which mere pleaſure tempts men, being more enormous, than thoſe to which they are ſtimulated by Anger. Whoredom is alſo forbidden in the law of Moſes, and Inceſt; as wounding any man is, as well as murder: But in theſe ten precepts, which are a ſhort abridgment of their duty, it was ſufficient only to mention the principal particulars, which were hateful to God and injurious to men.

Ver. 15. Thou ſhalt not ſteal.] This was to injure men in their goods and poſſeſſions; either by open rapine, or by fraudulent dealings; againſt which God intended to ſecure them by this precept. Several ſorts of this ſin, are afterwards mentioned in particular laws.

Ver. 16. Thou ſhalt not bear falſe witneſs againſt thy neighbour.] As our neighbour is not to be injured by us in deeds, ſo not in words; by giving a falſe teſtimony againſt him before a judge; which is the chief ſin of this kind. This is both an injury to our neighbour, and an affront to God; in whoſe place the judge is, whom we go about to deceive.

Large commentaries on theſe commandments are not to be expected; ſince they may be found in many authors, commonly known.

Ver. 17. Thou ſhalt not covet thy neighbours houſe, &c.] This command forbids all intentional prejudice to others, in any of the particulars before-mentioned. For as all injuries in word or deed are prohibited in the four preceding commandments; ſo in this God forbids thoſe, which are only in the heart, or counſels of men, but never come to light. And in the enumeration of the things they were not to covet, he begins firſt with that which was laſt mention'd, and ſo backward to the other. For he ſaith, Thou ſhalt not covet thy neighbours houſe, by deſigning to bear falſe witneſs, or to commit Theft. And then follows, thou ſhalt not covet thy neighbours wife, by intending to injure her chaſtity, if opportunity ſerved; nor his man ſervant, nor his maid ſervant, &c. which are the principle branches of his property. He ſaith nothing of thirſting after his life; which is ſuppos'd to be unlawful becauſe leſs crimes than that are forbidden.

Menander hath ſomething like this,

Μηδ' βελόνης ἔναμμ' ἐπθυμῆς, Πάμφιλε,
Ὁ γὰρ Θεὸς βλέπει σε πλησίον πα@ών.

Do not ſo much as covet the thread of a needle, for God ſees thee, being intimately preſent with thee.

The Moſaic account ſcarce permits us to doubt, whether it was God himſelf who pronounced theſe ten commandments, and this fact could never have been called in queſtion, if St. Paul had not expreſly oppos'd the new law to the old, in ſaying that the latter was annunciated by Jeſus Chriſt, whereas the other was only delivered by Angels or meſſengers; If the word ſpoken by Angels was ſtedfaſt, how ſhall we eſcape if we neglect ſo great ſalvation? Which at the firſt began to be ſpoken by the Lord, and was confirm'd unto us by them that heard him. Heb. xi. c. 2. Several ſolutions have been given of this difficulty.

Some have cut the knot, which they could no otherwiſe untie. They affirm, that the Angel who ſpake from mount Sinai, the Angel who appeared to Moſes in the buſh, and, according to the teſtimony of St. Stephen, was the ſame who gave the law; that Angel who is called the Angel of the covenant, and the Angel of the preſence; he of whom it is ſaid, in the 63d chapter of Iſaiah, that he, in his love and his pity, redeem'd them, and he bare them and carried them all the days of old: That Angel, to whom Abraham paid religious honours, and to whom he ſaid, wilt thou deſtroy the righteous with the wicked? That Angel of whom it is ſaid in the firſt verſe of the 20th chapter of Exodus, God ſpake all theſe words, was no more than a meer creature.

Others have obſerved, that all the texts, wherein it is ſaid, that the law was given by Angels, may be rendered, in the midſt of Angels; it is ſaid, that the Lord came from Sinai, and roſe up from Seir unto them; he ſhineth forth from mount Paran, and he came with ten thouſands of Saints: from his right-hand went a fiery Law for them: and the prophet David ſays, the chariots of God are twenty thouſands of Angels; the Lord is among them as in Sinai, in the holy place. According to this interpretation, St. Paul intended to oppoſe the Goſpel to the law, inaſmuch as when God gave the law, he was ſurrounded with a moſt dreadful equipage; whereas, when he promulgated the Goſpel, he adapted himſelf to our weakneſs.

Others have ſaid, that when God publiſhed his law, it was only mediately, and by the miniſtry of Angels; that it was thoſe bleſſed ſpirits who form'd the voices and the thunders, that made the mountains to reſound, whereas, when he annunciated the goſpel, he did it immediately, and without a veil.

Philo has advanced, but without any intention of conciliating St. Paul with Moſes, that God pronounced by his own mouth the words of the decalogue, but, in promulgating the reſt of the law, he made uſe of the miniſtry of Angels.

It is beyond all diſpute, that the word angel, in the ſacred authors, is not confined to ſignify thoſe celeſtial intelligences, who wait continually upon God. As it imports originally a meſſenger, ſervant, or miniſter, it is ſometimes uſed to denote indifferently any ſort of miniſter. Thus it is ſaid of St. John Baptiſt, Behold I ſend my meſſenger (or angel) before thy face, Mark. i. 2. Thus it is ſaid in another place, Behold, their valiant ones ſhall cry without, the ambaſſadors [angels] of peace, ſhall weep bitterly, Iſa. xxxiii. 7. that is to ſay again, miniſters. In the ſame ſenſe the prieſt is called the [angel] meſſenger of the Lord of hoſts. Thus alſo in the Apocalypſe, the biſhop, or paſtor, is called the angel, Revel. ii. 1. Perhaps alſo we ought in the ſame manner to explain that famous paſſage of the acts, it is his angel. But it is undeniable, as to all the other we have quoted, that the word angel ſignifies meſſenger, miniſter, and ſervant. Perhaps when St. Paul ſaid, in thoſe words which occaſioned the difficulty, that the law was given by angels, he did not mean the firſt promulgation which was made by God himſelf on Sinai, but only ſpake of the notification made of it long after to the Jewiſh nation, by men ſent upon this miniſtry. Perhaps he might underſtand by his angels, Moſes, the prieſts, the prophets, and all thoſe holy men whom God made uſe of to declare his will to the Jews before the coming of the Meſſiah. Another expreſſion of St. Stephen, which ſeems parallel to this, may be eaſily explained in this ſenſe; Who have received the law by the diſpoſitions of angels, Acts vii 53. For, preſently before theſe words; he had made them the following reproach, Which of the prophets have not your fathers perſecuted? It looks as if prophets and angels imported the ſame thing. Conformable to this laſt explanation, St. Paul did not mean any thing more, in the text we have quoted, than what he expreſs'd at the beginning of the ſame epiſtle; " God who at ſundry times, and in di" vers manners, ſpake in times paſt unto the fathers by the

" the prophets, hath, in theſe latter days, ſpoken unto us by his ſon." The apoſtle deſigned to exalt the goſpel above the law, the latter having been preached by men, by ſimple creatures; but the former by Chriſt himſelf.

This is ſufficient to ſhew, that there was no real diſagreement between Moſes and St. Paul, and that the aſſertion of the latter, that the law was given by angels, does not contradict what the former ſaid, that it was given by God himſelf, and that it was he who pronounced all thoſe words.

CHAP. XXI.

1 Laws for men-ſervants. 5 For the ſervant whoſe ear is bored. 7 For women-ſervants. 12 For man-ſlaughter. 16 For ſtealers of men. 17 For curſers of parents. 18 For ſmiters. 22 For a hurt by chance. 28 For an ox that goreth. 33 For him that is an occaſion of harm.

NOW theſe are the judgments which thou ſhalt ſet before them.

2 If thou buy an Hebrew ſervant, ſix years he ſhall ſerve: and in the ſeventh he ſhall go out free for nothing.

3 If he came in by himſelf, he ſhall go out by himſelf: if he were married, then his wife ſhall go out with him.

4 If his maſter have given him a wife, and ſhe have born him ſons or daughters, the wife and her children ſhall be her maſters, and he ſhall go out by himſelf.

5 And if the ſervant ſhall plainly ſay, I love my maſter, my wife, and my children, I will not go out free:

6 Then his maſter ſhall bring him unto the judges; he ſhall alſo bring him to the door, or unto the door-poſt: and his maſter ſhall bore his ear through with an awl; and he ſhall ſerve him for ever.

7 ¶ And if a man ſell his daughter to be a maid-ſervant, ſhe ſhall not go out as the men-ſervants do.

8 And if ſhe pleaſe not her maſter, who hath betrothed her to himſelf, then ſhall he let her be redeemed: to ſell her unto a ſtrange nation he ſhall have no power, ſeeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her.

9 And if he have betrothed her unto his ſon, he ſhall deal with her after the manner of daughters.

10 If he take him another wife; her food, her raiment, and her duty of marriage ſhall he not diminiſh.

11 And if he do not theſe three unto her, then ſhall ſhe go out free without money.

12 ¶ He that ſmiteth a man, ſo that he die, ſhall be ſurely put to death.

13 And if a man lie not in wait, but God deliver him into his hand; then I will appoint thee a place whither he ſhall flee.

14 But if a man come preſumptuouſly upon his neighbour, to ſlay him with guile; thou ſhalt take him from mine altar, that he may die.

15 ¶ And he that ſmiteth his father, or his mother, ſhall be ſurely put to death.

16 ¶ And he that ſtealeth a man, and ſelleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he ſhall ſurely be put to death.

17 ¶ And he that curſeth his father, or his mother, ſhall ſurely be put to death.

18 ¶ And if men ſtrive together, and one ſmite another with a ſtone, or with his fiſt, and he die not, but keepeth his bed:

19 If he riſe again, and walk abroad upon his ſtaff, then ſhall he that ſmote him, be quit: only he ſhall pay for the loſs of his time, and ſhall cauſe him to be throughly healed.

20 ¶ And if a man ſmite his ſervant, or his maid with a rod, and he die under his hand; he ſhall be ſurely puniſhed.

21 Notwithſtanding, if he continue a day or two, he ſhall not be puniſhed: for he is his money.

22 ¶ If men ſtrive, and hurt a woman with child, ſo that her fruit depart from her, and yet no miſchief follow: he ſhall be ſurely puniſhed, according as the womans husband will lay upon him; and he ſhall pay as the judges determine.

23 And if any miſchief follow, then thou ſhalt give life for life,

24 Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot.

25 Burning for burning, wound for wound, ſtripe for ſtripe.

26 ¶ And if a man ſmite the eye of his ſervant, or the eye of his maid, that it periſh; he ſhall let him go free for his eyes ſake.

27 And if he ſmite out his man-ſervants tooth, or his maid-ſervants tooth, he ſhall let him go free for his tooths ſake.

28 ¶ If an ox gore a man or a woman, that they die: then the ox ſhall be ſurely ſtoned, and his fleſh ſhall not be eaten; but the owner of the ox ſhall be quit.

29 But if the ox were wont to puſh with his horn in time paſt, and it hath been teſtified to his owner, and he hath not kept him in, but that he hath killed a man or a woman; the ox ſhall be ſtoned, and his owner alſo ſhall be put to death.

30 If there be laid on him a ſum of money, then he ſhall give for the ranſom of his life, whatſoever is laid upon him.

31 Whether

31 Whether he have gored a ſon, or have gored a daughter, according to this judgment ſhall it be done unto him.

32 If the ox ſhall puſh a man-ſervant, or a maid-ſervant; he ſhall give unto their maſter thirty ſhekels of ſilver, and the ox ſhall be ſtoned.

33 ¶ And if a man ſhall open a pit, or if a man ſhall dig a pit, and not cover it, and an ox or an aſs fall therein;

34 The owner of the pit ſhall make it good, and give money unto the owner of them, and the dead beaſt ſhall be his.

35 ¶ And if one mans ox hurt anothers that he die, then they ſhall ſell the live ox, and divide the money of it, and the dead ox alſo they ſhall divide.

36 Or if it be known that the ox hath uſed to puſh in time paſt, and his owner hath not kept him in; he ſhall ſurely pay ox for ox, and the dead ſhall be his own.

It may be proper to obſerve, with reſpect to the Jewiſh laws, that the greateſt part of them were given to Moſes on mount Sinai, and the reſt at different times, and as occaſion required: whether therefore we look upon them as the firſt body of laws that ever was compiled, whilſt other nations had not ſo much as a name for it, as Joſephus has endeavour'd to prove againſt his learned antagoniſt, from the works of Homer, the moſt ancient writer, in which the word Nomos (Law) is not ſo much as once mentioned; or whether we ſuppoſe, with others, that the Egyptians and other nations had already laws of their own, and that Moſes was permitted by God, to model and improve his own by them, by altering or retaining what he liked or diſliked; it is plain, that the reſt received, if not the finiſhing hand, yet at leaſt their ſanction and approbation from him. And indeed if we conſider, that they extended to all duties, caſes, and exigencies, whether moral, political, or ceremonial; that the moral were to be of eternal obligation; that the political were to endure as long as Jewiſh polity; that great part of the ceremonial were typical of, conſequently to laſt, at leaſt, till the coming of the Meſſiah; if we conſider further, that the prieſts and rulers were to be only the meer guardians of them, and that they were forbid under pain of death, and of the divine curſe, to alter the leaſt part of them; it will be ſcarce credible that Moſes would have given them ſuch a firm and durable ſanction, and backed it with the divine authority, had any but God been the author or confirmer of them.

To the written law, the Jews likewiſe add the oral, which, they pretended, was alſo given by God to Moſes, during his abode on mount Sinai, for, firſt, they think it abſurd to ſuppoſe, that he ſpent all that long interval of twice forty days in the bare writing of the written law, for which leſs than one quarter of that period was more than ſufficient. They affirm therefore, that he employed all the remainder of that time in learning the oral law by heart, which he afterwards carefully delivered by word of mouth, to Aaron, Eleazar, and to his ſervant Joſhua; and theſe to the ſeventy elders; from them it paſſed to all the prophets, the three laſt of whom, Haggai, Zachariah, and Malachi, delivered it to the grand Sanhedrim, from whom the wiſe men of Jeruſalem and Babylon received it. Thus they affirm, that the oral law given to Moſes was tranſmitted from one generation to another, entire and uncorrupted, under the name of Cabbalah, or tradition, which was afterwards committed to writing by ſeveral hands in that volume which they call the Talmud, conſiſting of two parts, the Miſhnah and Gemarrah, and which they much prefer to the ſacred books of the Scripture; ſaying, that the Mikdaſh, or Old-Teſtament, is like water, the Miſhnah like wine, and the Gemarrah, being more plain and perfect, like Hipocraſor, the richeſt of wines. For they add ſecondly, that the obſcurity of the written law, its ſeeming inconſiſtency in ſeveral reſpects, and the ill uſe which God foreſaw would be made of it by the wicked, rendered the oral very neceſſary, ſince, without it, the other would have proved, in many reſpects, uſeleſs, if not dangerous. Theſe learned gentlemen, who love to call themſelves Merabtzehatbora, fixers of, or givers of reſt to the law, are pleaſed to acquaint us, that the obſcurity of it is obvious to every reader: As for inconſiſtencies, they are ſuch as theſe: In one place it is ſaid, thou ſhalt eat of unleavened bread ſeven, and in another, ſix days; in one place it is ſaid, thou ſhalt offer the paſſover to the Lord thy God, ſheep, oxen, &c. and in another, only a male lamb without blemiſh; one text ſays, that the Lord came down upon mount Sinai, to ſpeak to the people; and another declares that he ſpoke to them from heaven. Theſe are the mighty contradictions which, they pretend, cannot be reconciled without the help of the oral law.

Well might the bleſſed Saviour of mankind ſay of them, that they ſtrained at a knat, and ſwallowed a camel; ſince theſe are but trifles, compared to thoſe which we meet with among theſe learned compilers of the Talmud and their commentators; tho' they all pretend to expound theſe ſeeming difficulties, and contradictions of the written, by their traditions.

But we ſhall not enlarge upon this ſubject at preſent, ſince we ſhall have frequent opportunities of making it evident, in the courſe of this work, that their Rabbies have endeavoured to render the word of God ineffectual by their traditions.

Ver. 2. If thou buy an Hebrew ſervant, ſix years he ſhall ſerve: And in the ſeventh he ſhall go out free for nothing.] Some perſons ſold themſelves by reaſon of poverty; of which ſort the Hebrews underſtand that law, Levit. xxv. 39. Others were ſold by the court of judgment, as a puniſhment for their commiſſion of a theft, and for which, not being able to make ſatisfaction to the perſon who had received the damage, they were condemned to be his ſervants. Of theſe, they interpret this place, and Deut. xv. 12. but this ſale, they ſay, did not extend to both ſexes; for a woman was not to be ſold for theft.

——— In the ſeventh he ſhall go out free for nothing.] If the damage was ſo great, that his ſix years ſervice had not ſatisfied for it, yet he was not to be kept longer. And his ſervitude, alſo, might end ſooner, by manumiſſion or redemption, or the death of his maſter. It is remarkable, that he ſets this law in the firſt place, ſays Biſhop Patrick, becauſe mercy, next to piety, is the moſt excellent virtue: And God would have his people, ſays Rabbi Levi Barzelonita, adorned with, and full of the nobleſt qualities, which are benignity and mercy. This year of releaſe, alſo, being a ſacred year, the whole land being holy unto the Lord, ſo that no man might challenge any right or property in it, to ſow his field, or reap that which grew of itſelf, &c. it was ſacrilege for any maſter to keep a ſervant from his freedom, when the year came which was the Lord's releaſe; as we read expreſly, Levit. xxv. and Deut. xv. whence it was, that becauſe the Jews were ſo prophane as to break this law, and not give their ſervants liberty, (as we read in the 34th chapter of Jeremiah) God puniſhed them with a captivity of ſeventy years, in which the land lay waſte, till it had fulfilled the years of reſt which they would not obſerve; as Mr. Mede hath truly noted, at the latter end of his twenty-ſixth diſcourſe.

Ver. 3. If he came in by himſelf, &c.] That is, according to Biſhop Patrick's Comment, a ſingle man, without a wife; ſo he was to depart. But if he was a married man, when he was ſold, as his maſter was not to let his wife and children want food, and raiment, and habitation, while he continued his ſlave: So when he was free, he was not to detain them from their father and husband, Levit. xxv. 41.

Ver. 4. If his maſter have given him a wife.] The maſter might permit ſuch a ſervant as this, who was ſold by the court of judgment, to eſpouſe a Heathen woman; and the children he ſhould have by her, were to be the maſter's ſervants, or ſlaves, for ever. No Hebrew, but ſuch ſervants as theſe, were allowed to marry a Gentile. He who ſold himſelf was not ſubject to this law; but, on the other hand, as his maſter could not impoſe a wife of this ſort upon him, ſo neither was he bound, when the ſervant received his freedom, to beſtow any gift upon him; for this was only due to him who was ſold by the court for theft, Deut. xv. 12. and to whom, the ancient Jews ſay, the maſter was to give thirty ſhekels.

——— The wife and children ſhall be his maſters.] The wife was a ſlave as well as himſelf, when he married her; and as ſhe was given to him meerly that he might beget ſlaves of her; and who, therefore, continued with the maſter, as well as their mother, when the man had his liberty; for they were not ſo much his, as his maſter's property, and he had ſuch a power over them, that he might circumciſe the male children, without their conſent.

Ver. 5. And if the ſervant ſhall plainly ſay, I love my maſter, my wife and children, I will not go free.] If his affection to ſuch a wife and children exceeded his love to liberty, and determined him to continue in his ſtate of ſervitude, his maſter was then to bring him to the judges, that it might appear he was not fraudulently detain'd, againſt his inclinations; and when that court of judicature had given ſentence, the maſter was to bring him to the door, and there bore his ear through with an awl, as an indication that he was now fixed to his houſe, and might not ſo much as ſtep over the threſhold, without his permiſſion. This is to be underſtood only of one who was ſold by the court. This cuſtom of boring the ears of ſlaves, continu'd a long time after this, in Syria and Arabia.

——He ſhall ſerve him for ever.] That is, till the year of jubilee, or the death of his maſter (for his ſon was not to detain him, when the father was dead) unleſs he would releaſe him, or he was redeemed.

Ver. 7. And if a man ſell his daughter to be a maid ſervant, &c.] This daughter, according to the Hebrews, was to be a virgin under age, that is, leſs than twelve years old, and a day. For if ſhe exceeded that age, her father had no prerogative to ſell her. And when ſhe came to be of age, that period, as well as the year of jubilee, redemption, or the death of her maſter, put a period to her ſervitude. Her father likewiſe had no power to ſell her, unleſs he were reduced to a ſtate of extreme poverty; and if he diſpoſed of her without any ſuch previous neceſſity, the court of judgment obliged him to redeem her. We may add to, that ſhe was not to be ſold, unleſs there was ſome probability, that either her maſter, or his ſon, would eſpouſe her.

Ver. 8. If ſhe pleaſe not her maſter, who hath betrothed her to himſelf, &c.] It appears from hence, that ſhe was ſold to him upon the preſumption that he would marry her, but if he afterwards changed his mind, God ordains that he ſhall let her be redeemed.

Ver. 12. He that ſmiteth a man, ſo that he die, ſhall ſurely be put to death.] The Jewiſh doctors will not allow proſelytes of the gate, much leſs Gentiles, to be comprehended within this law; and declare, that if an Iſraelite killed any of theſe he was not to ſuffer death for that action. But Plato, in his book of laws, hath determined more juſtly than theſe Rabbies, that, in the caſe of wilful murder, the ſame law ſhould extend to ſtrangers and citizens.

Ver. 13. And if a man lie not in wait, but God deliver him into his hand; then will I appoint thee a place whither he ſhall flee.] The meaning of the former part of the verſe, is this; when a perſon did not kill another, in conſequence of any premeditated intention againſt him; but meerly by an action which aimed at ſome other end, according to the common expreſſion; which the Scripture expreſſes more religiouſly, by acknowledging God in every occurrence of life, and who permits ſuch caſualties to happen, whereby a man is killed without any ſuch deſign in him who was employed in the action, that occaſioned the death.

There is an expreſs command, in the 14th verſe of this chapter, with relation to wilful murder, that the guilty perſon ſhould be torn even from Gods altar, to be puniſhed with death, from whence one may naturally infer, that the tabernacle was a ſanctuary to him who had killed another only by accident, cities of refuge were likewiſe appointed for this purpoſe, as we read in Numb. xxxv. 11, 12. and of theſe a particular account ſhall be given in the proper place.

Ver. 15. And he that ſmiteth his father or mother, ſhall be ſurely put to death.] The Hebrews ſay that ſuch a criminal perſon was to be ſtrangled, by the ſentence of the judge, after a proof of the fact, by competent witneſſes, there was no need to prohibit, in a particular manner, the killing of parents, ſince all wilful murder was puniſhed with death. Solon made no law with relation to this crime, becauſe it was not to be ſuppoſed any man would be ſo wicked to murder a parent; nor was this moſt impious action known among the Perſians, in the time of Herodotus; neither do we find any mention of it in the law of the twelve tables. But, in after-times, moſt ſevere puniſhments were enacted againſt parricides, and which are deſcribed at large by Modeſtinus.

Ver. 16. He that ſtealeth a man, and ſelleth him; or if he be found in his hand, he ſhall ſurely be put to death.] By a man, the Hebrews underſtand an Iſraelite, and as no other Iſraelite would buy him, the Plagiary was tempted to ſell him to men of other nations, which made it neceſſary to puniſh the crime with death; becauſe it was a moſt aggravated inſtance of barbarity, to take away his liberty, and then ſell him as a ſlave to ſtrangers. But if he had even not ſold him, yet he was to be puniſhed with death, becauſe his intention was rendered ſufficiently evident by his ſtealing him.

Ver. 17. And he that curſeth his father, or his mother, ſhall ſurely be put to death.] The Hebrews take this law to concern thoſe who curſed their dead parents, no leſs than thoſe who curſed them, when they were living; but not without præmonition and witneſſes, as in other capital crimes; and not unleſs they curſed their parents by ſome proper name of God, as Mr. Selden obſerves out of the Jewiſh doctors, l. 2. de Synedr. c. 13. Death was the puniſhment of this crime, becauſe it was a flagrant evidence of deſperate and inſolent malice, and moſt audacious wickedneſs, and was utterly ſubverſive of that domeſtic order, which is the prime part of good government.

Ver. 20. And if a man ſmite his ſervant, or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand; he ſhall ſurely be puniſhed.] With death, ſay the Hebrew doctors, if the ſervant died, while the maſter was beating him, for that is the ſignification of dying under his hand. But it ſeems more likely, that he was to be puniſhed for his cruelty, as the judge, who examined this fact, ſaw proper. For his ſmiting with a rod, and not with a ſword, was an evidence that his intention was only to correct and not to kill his ſervant.

Ver. 21. Notwithſtanding, if he continue a day or two, he ſhall not be puniſhed: for he is his money.] His ſurviving the correction a day or two, might cauſe it to be preſumed, that he did not die of the ſtrokes he received from his maſter, who was therefore ſufficiently puniſhed by loſing the benefit of his ſervice.

Ver. 22. And if men ſtrive, and hurt a woman with child, ſo that her fruit depart from her, and yet no miſchief follow: he ſhall be ſurely puniſhed, according as the woman's husband will lay upon him; and he ſhall pay as the judges determine.] If the wife ſhould not happen to die (which is the meaning of the words and yet no miſchief follow) the husband may, however, require a compenſation, both for the loſs of his child, and the particular injury, or grief, ſuſtained by his wife. Yet he was not to be an abſolute judge in his own cauſe, but it was to be referred to the deciſion of the public magiſtrates.

Ver. 23, And if any miſchief follow, then thou ſhalt give life for life.] " In the interpretation of this, ſaith Iarchi, " our maſters differ; for ſome, by life underſtand that " which is properly ſo called, or the perſon himſelf; ſo " that it ſhould ſignify, being put to death; but others " underſtand by it, a pecuniary mulct; that ſo much mo- " ney ſhould be paid to the heirs, as the perſon killed " might have been ſold for." The Septuagint give it quite another ſenſe; which is, that if a woman miſcarry, and the child was μὴ ἐξεικονισμένον, not yet formed, and faſhioned; that the man, who occaſioned the miſcarriage, was to pay a fine. But if it were formed, then life was to be given for life. So that this whole law is, according to thoſe tranſlators, to be underſtood of an abortion; and according to the condition of the abortive (not the life or death of the mother) ſo the puniſhment was to be inflicted. Philo likewiſe takes it in this ſenſe, and has written a large diſcourſe upon it.

Ver. 24. Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, &c.] Theſe, and all that follow, to the end of the 25th verſe, as conſidered as pecuniary mulcts, by the Hebrews. And there ſeems to be a great deal of reaſon, at leaſt in many caſes, to admit of ſuch a compenſation. Particularly in that mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, l. xii. where the one eyed man complained of this law, as too rigid; becauſe, if he loſt the other eye, he ſhould ſuffer more than the man he had injured, who had ſtill one eye left. 'Tis likewiſe certain, that the ſame member of the body, is more valuable to one man, than it is to another. For inſtance, the right hand of a ſcribe, or a painter, cannot be ſo well ſpared as that of a meer finger. And therefore the law of the twelve tables concerning Taliones, was with this exception; that if he who had put out the eye of another man, or taken away the uſe of any other member, would not come to an agreement, de talione redimenda, to make him ſatisfaction, and buy off the parity of puniſhment, he was then to ſuffer it in kind.

Ver. 28. And if an ox gore a man, or a woman, that they die, then the ox ſhall be ſurely ſtoned, and his fleſh ſhall not be eaten.] Becauſe it was the intention of the Deity, that the owner ſhould loſe all benefit by the fleſh of ſo noxious an animal. Others indeed think, the fleſh could not be eaten, becauſe, as it was a carcaſe that had been ſtoned, the blood remained in it; but Maimonides replies to this opinion, that the ſcope of the law is, that aſſoon as the ſentence for its being ſtoned was pronounced, the animal became unclean; nay, if a man, to prevent this ſentence, killed the ox after a legal manner, no one was permitted to eat any part of the fleſh. And when the beaſt was ſtoned, the fleſh was neither ſold, nor given to the Gentiles, nor even to dogs.

Ver. 29. But if the ox were wont to puſh with his horn in time paſt, and it hath been teſtified to his owner, and he hath not kept him in, but that he hath killed a man or a woman, the ox ſhall be ſtoned, and his owner alſo ſhall be put to death.] In the former caſe the owner was only puniſhed with the loſs of his ox, it being the firſt time the creature was known to puſh. But if he had long been unruly, and the owner, being told of it, had not taken proper care to prevent the conſequences, then both he and the ox were to be put to death. Abarbinel is of opinion, that God doth not decree the ſentence of death againſt the owner, but that he remits ſome part of the ſtrictneſs of this law in the next verſe. And there are three caſes here mentioned relating to this matter; one, in the foregoing verſe, where the ox is ordered to be ſtoned; another in this, where the owner alſo is made liable to ſuffer death; and a third in the next verſe, where a pecuniary mulct is only ſet upon him. By which laſt caſe it appears, there might be an inſtance, wherein the owner of the ox ſhould not be put to death, tho' the ox had been wont to puſh, and he had been told of it. For, either the knowledge which the owner had of the ill condition of his ox, was certain, or uncertain; and his careleſsneſs in preventing the miſchievous conſequences, was greater or leſs; and the friends of the perſon who was killed, preſſed the ſtricteſt juſtice, or were content to remit it. In the former caſes, if the knowledge was certain, the careleſsneſs very groſs, and the friends ſtrict in the proſecution, he was puniſhed with death; but if otherwiſe, he was only fined.

Ver. 33. And if a man ſhall open a pit, and not cover it, and an ox or aſs fall therein.] We muſt ſuppoſe this pit to have been opened in the ſtreet, or ſome other public way, for if a perſon had dug it in his own ground, he was not comprehended in this law. If he likewiſe opened a pit in a public way, and covered it conveniently, tho' in time the cover grew rotten, and a beaſt fell into the pit, the perſon was not bound to make it good.

We are not deſirous of crowding annotations upon our readers, with reſpect to the Jewiſh laws, and think it ſufficient to take notice of ſuch paſſages only, as require a particular explication.

CHAP. XXII.

1 Of theft. 5 Of damage. 7 Of treſpaſſes. 14 Of borrowing. 16 Of fornication. 18 Of witchcraft. 19 Of beſtiality. 20 Of idolatry. 21 Of ſtrangers, widows, and fatherleſs. 25 Of uſury. 26 Of pledges. 28 Of reverence to magiſtrates. 29 Of the firſt-fruits.

IF a man ſhall ſteal an ox or a ſheep, and kill it, or ſell it; he ſhall reſtore five oxen for an ox, and four ſheep for a ſheep.

2 ¶ If a thief be found breaking up, and be ſmitten that he die, there ſhall no blood be ſhed for him.

3 If the ſun be riſen upon him, there ſhall be blood ſhed for him: for he ſhould make full reſtitution; if he have nothing, then he ſhall be ſold for his theft.

4 If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, whether it be ox or aſs or ſheep; he ſhall reſtore double.

5 ¶ If a man ſhall cauſe a field or vineyard to be eaten, and ſhall put in his beaſt, and ſhall feed in another mans field: of the beſt of his own field, and of the beſt of his own vineyard ſhall he make reſtitution.

6 ¶ If fire break out, and catch in thorns, ſo that the ſtacks of corn, or the ſtanding-corn, or the field be conſumed therewith; he that kindled the fire, ſhall ſurely make reſtitution.

7 ¶ If a man ſhall deliver unto his neighbour money or ſtuff to keep, and it be ſtolen out of the mans houſe; if the thief be found, let him pay double.

8 If the thief be not found, then the maſter of the houſe ſhall be brought unto the judges, to ſee whether he have put his hand unto his neighbours goods.

9 For all manner of treſpaſs, whether it be for ox, for aſs, for ſheep, for raiment, or for any manner of loſt thing, which another challengeth to be his: the cauſe of both parties ſhall come before the judges; and whom the judges ſhall condemn, he ſhall pay double unto his neighbour.

10 If a man deliver unto his neighbour an aſs, or an ox, or a ſheep, or any beaſt to keep; and it die, or be hurt, or driven away, no man ſeeing it:

11 Then ſhall an oath of the LORD be between them both, that he hath not put his hand unto his neighbours goods: and the owner of it ſhall accept thereof, and he ſhall not make it good.

12 And if it be ſtolen from him, he ſhall make reſtitution unto the owner thereof.

13 If

13 If it be torn in pieces; then let him bring it for witneſs, and he ſhall not make good that which was torn.

14 ¶ And if a man borrow ought of his neighbour, and it be hurt, or die, the owner thereof being not with it; he ſhall ſurely make it good.

15 But if the owner thereof be with it, he ſhall not make it good: if it be an hired thing, it came for his hire.

16 ¶ And if a man intice a maid that is not betrothed, and lie with her; he ſhall ſurely endow her to be his wife.

17 If her father utterly refuſe to give her unto him, he ſhall pay money according to the dowry of virgins.

18 ¶ Thou ſhalt not ſuffer a witch to live.

19 ¶ Whoſoever lieth with a beaſt, ſhall ſurely be put to death.

20 ¶ He that ſacrificeth unto any god, ſave unto the LORD only, he ſhall be utterly deſtroyed.

21 ¶ Thou ſhalt neither vex a ſtranger, nor oppreſs him: for ye were ſtrangers in the land of Egypt.

22 ¶ Ye ſhall not afflict any widow, or fatherleſs child.

23 If thou afflict them in any wiſe, and they cry at all unto me: I will ſurely hear their cry:

24 And my wrath ſhall wax hot, and I will kill you with the ſword; and your wives ſhall be widows, and your children fatherleſs.

25 ¶ If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou ſhalt not be to him as an uſurer, neither ſhalt thou lay upon him uſury.

26 If thou at all take thy neighbours raiment to pledge, thou ſhalt deliver it unto him by that the ſun goeth down:

27 For that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his ſkin: wherein ſhall he ſleep? And it ſhall come to paſs, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear: for I am gracious.

28 ¶ Thou ſhalt not revile the gods, nor curſe the ruler of thy people.

29 ¶ Thou ſhalt not delay to offer the firſt of thy ripe fruits, and of thy liquors: the firſt-born of thy ſons ſhalt thou give unto me.

30 Likewiſe ſhalt thou do with thine oxen, and with thy ſheep: ſeven days it ſhall be with his dam; on the eighth day thou ſhalt give it me.

31 ¶ And ye ſhall be holy men unto me: neither ſhall ye eat any fleſh that is torn of beaſts in the field: ye ſhall caſt it to the dogs.

Ver. 1. If a man ſhall ſteal an ox, or a ſheep, and kill it, or ſell it; he ſhall reſtore five oxen for an ox, and four ſheep for a ſheep.] The true reaſon of the diſparity in the reſtitution, for a ſtolen ox, and in that for a ſheep, ſeems to be this. An ox was of greater value, and uſeful to more purpoſes in husbandry. Yet there was a difference between a thief, who came and confeſſed his ſin, in a voluntary manner, and him that ſtood out till he was apprehended, and convicted of his crime. For Moſes, in the former caſe, ſeems to require only the reſtitution of what was ſtolen, with the addition of a fifth part of the value, and a ſacrifice, Lev. vi. 4, 5. All this was far more equitable, than the conſtitution of Plato, which for all theſts appoint the ſame puniſhment, which was paying double the value of what was ſtolen.

Ver. 2. If a thief be found breaking up, and be ſmitten, that he die, no blood ſhall be ſhed for him.] The maſter of the houſe might ſlay the robber, when he found him in the act of breaking open his houſe in the night, becauſe it might well be thought, that the robber intended to murder him, rather than loſe his booty. This was likewiſe allowed by the law of the twelve tables.

Ver. 3. If the ſun be riſen upon him, there ſhall be blood ſhed for him.] He might eaſily be known in the daylight, and it might likewiſe be preſumed, that he intended only to ſteal; to kill him, therefore, was accounted murder.

Ver. 14. And if a man borrow ought of his neighbour, and it be hurt, or die.] This, the Hebrew doctors think, relates to ſuch things as were lent to another out of kindneſs, without any conſideration for the uſe of them. About which, if there aroſe any controverſy, it was to be determined by the following rule.

—— The owner thereof not being with it, he ſhall ſurely make it good.] Theſe words, and thoſe in the beginning of the fifteenth verſe, but if the owner be with it, he ſhall not make it good, ſeem to ſignify, that if the owner was with the thing that was lent, at the time of its hurt or death, it was to be preſumed, that he would omit no care to preſerve it, and ſo muſt bear the loſs. But if he was not preſent, the borrower was ſuppoſed to be in fault, and was therefore bound to make it good. Which, tho' it may ſeem a little ſevere, was but neceſſary to make men careful to preſerve what was lent them in pure kindneſs.

Ver. 18. Thou ſhalt not ſuffer a witch to live.] The ſcripture mentions a witch only, ſaith the Gemara of the Sanhedrim, c. 7. n. 10. becauſe, for the moſt part, they were women who were addicted to magic. So Maimonides alſo, "becauſe the greateſt part of evil works were "performed by women, therefore the law ſaith, thou ſhalt "not ſuffer (mchaſſchepha) a witch to live," P. 3. c. 37. More Nevochim. Where he diſcourſes of the ſorts of witchcraft; and in general affirms, that there were no magical works performed, without reſpect to the ſtars. For people held, that every plant, animal, and metal, had their reſpective ſtars. From whence he concludes, that as one intention of the law was to eradicate idolatry, if neceſſarily followed, that all witches ſhould ſuffer death, becauſe they were idolaters, tho' after a peculiar manner. We ſhall not enlarge at preſent upon the witchcraft of ancient times, ſince we intend a particular diſſertation upon that ſubject, when we come to deſcribe the circumſtances of the interview between Saul and the witch of Endor.

Ver. 26. If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou ſhalt deliver it unto him by that the ſun goeth down.] It was contrary to humanity, to detain from him the only accommodation he had to cheriſh him with warmth, in the evening cold; and it was in effect to kill him.

Ver. 28. Thou ſhalt not revile the gods.] Judges are undoubtedly meant by the word gods, and they were not to be reviled with any opprobrious language, becauſe this, as the Jewiſh doctors obſerve, might terrify them from the execution of juſtice, as it would likewiſe expoſe them to the contempt and hatred of the people.

CHAP. XXIII.

1 Of ſlander and falſe witneſs. 3, 6 Of juſtice. 4 Of charitableneſs. 10 Of the year of reſt. 12 Of the ſabbath. 13 Of idolatry. 14 Of the three feaſts. 18 Of the blood and the fat of the ſacrifice. 20 An angel is promiſed, with a bleſſing, if they obey him.

THOU ſhalt not raiſe a falſe report: put not thine hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witneſs.

2 ¶ Thou ſhalt not follow a multitude to do evil, neither ſhalt thou ſpeak in a cauſe to decline after many, to wreſt judgment.

3 ¶ Neither ſhalt thou countenance a poor man in his cauſe.

4 ¶ If thou meet thine enemies ox or his aſs going aſtray, thou ſhalt ſurely bring it back to him again.

5 If thou ſee the aſs of him that hateth thee, lying under his burden, and wouldſt forbear to help him; thou ſhalt ſurely help with him.

6 Thou ſhalt not wreſt the judgment of thy poor in his cauſe.

7 Keep thee far from a falſe matter: and the innocent and righteous ſlay thou not: for I will not juſtify the wicked.

8 ¶ And thou ſhalt take no gift: for the gift blindeth the wiſe, and perverteth the words of the righteous.

9 ¶ Alſo thou ſhalt not oppreſs a ſtranger: for ye know the heart of a ſtranger, ſeeing ye were ſtrangers in the land of Egypt.

10 And ſix years thou ſhalt ſow thy land, and ſhalt gather in the fruits thereof.

11 But the ſeventh year thou ſhalt let it reſt, and lie ſtill; that the poor of thy people may eat: and what they leave, the beaſts of the field ſhall eat. In like manner thou ſhalt deal with thy vineyard, and with thy olive yard.

12 Six days thou ſhalt do thy work, and on the ſeventh day thou ſhalt reſt: that thine ox and thine aſs may reſt, and the ſon of thy handmaid, and the ſtranger may be refreſhed.

13 And in all things that I have ſaid unto you, be circumſpect: and make no mention of the names of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth.

14 ¶ Three times thou ſhalt keep a feaſt unto me in the year.

15 Thou ſhalt keep the feaſt of unleavened bread: thou ſhalt eat unleavened bread ſeven days, as I commanded thee in the time appointed of the month Abib: for in it thou cameſt out from Egypt: and none ſhall appear before me empty:

16 And the feaſt of harveſt, the firſt-fruits of thy labours, which thou haſt ſown in the field: and the feaſt of in-gathering which is in the end of the year, when thou haſt gathered in thy labours out of the field.

17 Three times in the year all thy males ſhall appear before the LORD God.

18 Thou ſhalt not offer the blood of my ſacrifice with leavened bread, neither ſhall the fat of my ſacrifice remain until the morning.

19 The firſt of the firſt-fruits of thy land thou ſhalt bring into the houſe of the LORD thy God. Thou ſhalt not ſeethe a kid in his mothers milk.

20 ¶ Behold, I ſend an angel before thee to keep thee in the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared.

21 Beware of him, and obey his voice, provoke him not: for he will not pardon your tranſgreſſions: for my name is in him.

22 But if thou ſhalt indeed obey his voice, and do all that I ſpeak: then I will be an enemy unto thine enemies, and an adverſary unto thine adverſaries

23 For mine angel ſhall go before thee, and bring thee in unto the Amorites, and the Hittites, and the Perizzites, and the Canaanites, and the Hivites, and the Jebuſites: and I will cut them off.

24 Thou ſhalt not bow down to their gods, nor ſerve them, nor do after their works: but thou ſhalt utterly overthrow them, and quite break down their images.

25 And ye ſhall ſerve the LORD your God, and he ſhall bleſs thy bread, and thy water: and I will take ſickneſs away from the midſt of thee.

26 ¶ There ſhall nothing caſt their young, nor be barren in thy land: the number of thy days I will fulfil.

27 I will ſend my fear before thee, and will deſtroy all the people to whom thou ſhalt come, and I will make all thine enemies turn their backs unto thee.

28 And I will ſend hornets before thee, which ſhall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite from before thee.

29 I will not drive them out from before thee in one year, leſt the land become deſolate, and the beaſt of the field multiply againſt thee.

30 By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increaſed, and inherit the land.

31 And I will ſet thy bounds from the Red-ſea even unto the ſea of the Philiſtines, and from the desert unto the river: for I will deliver the inhabitants of the land into your hand; and thou shalt drive them out before thee.

32 Thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor with their gods.

33 They shall not dwell in thy land, lest they make thee sin against me: for if thou serve their gods, it will surely be a snare unto thee.

Ver. 6. Thou shalt not wrest the judgment of thy poor in his cause.] As they might not favour a man because he was poor; so much less might they wrong him, because he wanted money to prosecute his cause. There seems to be an emphasis (as Conradus Publicanus observes) in the words thy poor: Importing, that they had such a relation to them, that they ought to be as much concern'd for them as for any other member of the body.

But the Jews fancying this to be sufficiently included in the precept before-mentioned, ver. 3. understand here by the poor, a bad man; who is one that wants virtue, not money. To whom a judge might not say, he was a wicked person, and condemn him without any further examination of his cause: For it is the prerogative of God to execute judgment upon the ungodly.

Ver. 13. And in all things that I have said unto you, be circumspect: And make no mention of the name of other gods, neither let it be heard out of your mouth.] Such cautions as these to prevent idolatry, are repeated no less than 44 times in the law, as R. Levi observes. And the meaning of this is, either that they should not swear by other gods, or make any vows in their names; nor, consequently, enter into society with Gentiles, as the best of the Hebrew writers understand it, and as the Vulgar Latins take it; or that they should not so much as simply name the gods of other nations. They who are of this last opinion, differ in the explication of it: For some of them say, only the calling them by such names as attribute some divinity to them, is the thing forbidden; not calling them by their proper names, of Moloch, or Bell, or the like: And thus Tertullian understands it. But there are others who think it unlawful even to pronounce any of their names in common discourse, tho' there be no mention of their divinity. For Chemosh, and Milcom, and such like names, they say, are not mentioned in Scripture, but with detestation and reproach, (as the abomination of the Moabites and Amonites) and therefore they think it unlawful to say, I invite thee, on the feast-day of such an idol of the Gentiles, or the like. Yet some of those, who imagine the simple use of their names to be forbidden, make an exception with respect to the names of those mentioned in Scripture. So Maimonides; the names of the idols of the Gentiles which are mentioned in Scripture, it is lawful for us to name, as Peor, Bell, Nebo, Baal, &c. See Selden l. 11. de jure N. and G. c. 13. p. 269, &c. They say, this precept binds men and women, in all places, and at all times; and the punishment for its violation, was beating.

Neither shall it be heard out of thy mouth.] i. e. With any respect or reverence to them: Otherwise, the simple pronunciation of the name was not unlawful.

Ver. 14. Three times shalt thou keep a feast unto me in the year]. At the Passover, Pentecost, and when they gathered all the fruits of the earth, and dwelt in tabernacles, as it follows in the next verses: the first of which was plainly instituted, in memory of their coming out of Egypt; the second, some think, was in memory of their coming into Canaan, (rather of the overthrow of Pharaoh in the sea, and giving the law on mount Sinai; and the third in memory of their dwelling so long in the wilderness, and of the wonders which God did there; as Maimonides observes in his More Nevoch, p. 3. ch. 43. At these great solemnities three things were to be done; first, they were to make a feast; secondly, to appear before God in the court of the temple; and thirdly, to rejoice. Besides which, they were to bring certain offerings unto God.

Ver. 17 Three times in the year all thy males shall appear before the Lord God.] This verse more fully explains what was said verse 14. by shewing where they should keep these feasts, viz. before the Lord, i. e. in the place where his most glorious Majesty should settle; which was, first, in the tabernacle, and afterwards in the temple; and then, who should appear before him there, viz. all the males. Others were not bound to it; tho' some religious people carried their whole families with them, as appears from Elkanah, 1 Sam. i. This command is repeated, xxxiv. 23. and the true reason of it seems to have been this, that whilst they dwelt in the wilderness, they ate no meat at all at their private tables, but what had been offered to God at the tabernacle, Lev. xvii. 4, 5. which precept was dispensed withal, when they came into the land of Canaan, and dwelt, many of them, so remote from the tabernacle, that they could not come up every day to sacrifice, Deut. xii. 21. instead of which, therefore, there were these three constant and set times appointed in the year, in which every male was bound to come up and see God at his tabernacle, and there eat and drink before him: Whence the sacrifice, which was then offered, was wont to be called a sacrifice of seeing, as Dr. Cudworth hath observed in his little treatise of the Lord's supper. But, as the Doctor interprets it, they were not bound to bring their males to appear before the Lord, till they were able to walk, with their fathers, up from Jerusalem to the temple.

Ver. 19. ——Thou shalt not seethe a kid in its mother's milk.] The Jews commonly take this to be a prohibition against eating a kid so boiled, or tasting of the milk, believing it to be a precept against cruelty. The famous Bochart mentions three other interpretations, but confutes them all, and supposes there was some such custom as this among the Gentiles, which Moses would not permit the Israelites to imitate. But our most learned Cudworth was the first who happily found this in a Karaite writer; who declares, that all the trees, fields, and gardens, were sprinkled with this broth (of a kid seethed in its mothers milk) after a magical manner, to make them more fruitful in the following year.

Ver. 20. Behold I send an Angel before thee.] Many Christians think, this angel was the eternal son of God, which we are afraid to assert, because it seems dangerous to us, to call him simply an Angel, i. e. a minister, or messenger, without any such addition as that in Malachi iii. 3. The Angel of the covenant; for so he was at his incarnation, of which the prophet there speaks; before which, we dare not ascribe to him such ministerial works as these of bringing the children of Israel out of Egypt, and going before them, in order to conduct them to Canaan. This was properly the work of an Angel, to whom Moses attributes it, when he orders his ambassadors to say to the king of Edom, Numb. xx. 16. When we cried unto the Lord, he heard our voice, and sent an Angel, and hath brought us forth out of Egypt. But this Angel was a prime minister in the heavenly host, by whom he was accompanied. So he saith to Joshua, ver. 14. I am come as captain of the host of the Lord. Which is the title of Michael, in Dan. x. 13, 21. But tho' we thus understand it here, this doth not exclude the presence of God himself, but rather proves it: For this Angel, and his host, were sent from the Schechinah, who was in the pillar of the cloud.

Ver. 28. And I will send hornets before thee, &c.] Either before the Israelites came to Canaan, or when they marched against the people of that country. Both, however, seem to be true; insomuch, that many of the inhabitants were oblig'd to quit their country, when it was infested by the hornets God sent in prodigious swarms among them: And they who remained, were, when they came to fight, so stung by these fierce insects, that they could not see to strike a blow. Whence those words of Joshua, xxiv. 12. That the Ammorites were not driven out by the sword and bow of the Israelites, but by the stings of these hornets. Which seem also to have pursued them when they fled away, and killed them in the retreat, where they hid themselves after the fight, Deut. vii. 10.

Ver. 31. And I will set thy bounds from the Red-sea, even unto the sea of the Philistines.] These were the boundaries from East to West: For tho' the Red-sea was towards the South, yet the farthermost part of it lay East. And the Sea of the Philistines is that which is now called the Mediterranean Sea.

And from the desart, unto the wilderness.] That is, from the desart of Arabia, called Shur, to the river Euphrates; phrates; which conſtituted the ſouthern and northern limits of the country God had promiſed the Iſraelites.

CHAP. XXIV.

1 Moſes is called up into the mountain. 3 The people promiſe obedience. 4 Moſes buildeth an altar, and twelve pillars. 6 He ſprinkleth the blood of the covenant. 9 The glory of God appeareth. 14 Aaron and Hur have the charge of the people. 15 Moſes goeth into the mountain, where he continueth forty days and forty nights.

AND he ſaid unto Moſes, come up unto the LORD, thou and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and ſeventy of the elders of Iſrael: and worſhip ye afar off.

2 And Moſes alone ſhall come near the LORD: but they ſhall not come nigh, neither ſhall the people go up with him.

3 ¶ And Moſes came and told the people all the words of the LORD, and all the judgments: and all the people anſwered with one voice, and ſaid, All the words, which the LORD hath ſaid, will we do.

4 And Moſes wrote all the words of the LORD, and roſe up early in the morning, and builded an altar under the hill, and twelve pillars according to the twelve tribes of Iſrael.

5 And he ſent young men of the children of Iſrael, which offered burnt-offerings, and ſacrificed peace-offerings of oxen unto the LORD.

6 And Moſes took half of the blood, and put it in baſons, and half of the blood he ſprinkled on the altar.

7 And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they ſaid, All that the LORD hath ſaid, will we do, and be obedient.

8 And Moſes took the blood, and ſprinkled it on the people, and ſaid, Behold the blood of the covenant, which the LORD hath made with you concerning all theſe words.

9 ¶ Then went up Moſes and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and ſeventy of the elders of Iſrael.

10 And they ſaw the God of Iſrael: and there was under his feet, as it were a paved work of a ſaphire-ſtone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearneſs.

11 And upon the nobles of the children of Iſrael he laid not his hand: alſo they ſaw God, and did eat and drink.

12 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Come up to me into the mount, and be there: and I will give thee tables of ſtone, and a law, and commandments which I have written; that thou mayſt teach them.

13 And Moſes roſe up, and his miniſter Joſhua: and Moſes went up into the mount of God.

14 And he ſaid unto the elders, Tarry ye here for us, until we come again unto you: and behold, Aaron and Hur are with you: if any man have any matters to do, let him come unto them.

15 And Moſes went up into the mount, and a cloud covered the mount.

16 And the glory of the LORD abode upon mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it ſix days: and the ſeventh day he called unto Moſes out of the midſt of the cloud.

17 And the ſight of the glory of the LORD was like devouring fire on the top of the mount, in the eyes of the children of Iſrael.

18 And Moſes went into the midſt of the cloud, and gat him up into the mount: and and Moſes was in the mount forty days, and forty nights.

Ver. 1. And he ſaid unto Moſes, come up unto the Lord, &c.] When God had delivered the preceding laws to Moſes in the mount, he ordered him to deſcend and proclaim them to the people, and when he had engaged them in a covenant to obſerve thoſe inſtitutions, he was commanded to re-aſcend the mount, with Aaron and the others who are mentioned in this verſe.

Moſes, when he had received this command, immediately reared an altar to God, and offered burnt ſacrifices and peace offerings upon it, and having cauſed the contents of this new covenant, to be read to all the people, and likewiſe exacted from them a ſolemn promiſe of their obedience to it, he ratified the ſame by ſprinkling the altar, the book, and the people, with the blood of the victims, and then ordered twelve pillars to be erected, as a durable monument of this alliance between God and them.

Moſes, having compleated this great ceremonial, took with him Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and ſeventy of the elders of Iſrael, ſome part of the way towards the mountain, where they beheld the glory of the God of Iſrael, ver. 10. ſurrounded, we may well ſuppoſe, with a heavenly hoſt of attending Angels. The glorious majeſty of God was repreſented, as having under it a pavement ſuitable to itſelf, and beaming with celeſtial ſplendours: There is a ſort of ſaphire, called χρυσοσιγὴς, ſpotted with little points of gold, which glitter like ſtars interſperſed in the body of it; and this perhaps may afford us ſome faint conception of the luſtre of this amazing pavement.

Ver. 11. And upon the nobles of the children of Iſrael he laid not his hands.] It was the common opinion that thoſe who ſaw God, tho' it was only by the medium of one of his Angels, would immediately die. But God acted, by the elders of Iſrael, on this ſolemn occaſion, with the benignity peculiar to him; and vouchſafed this manifeſtation of his majeſty to them, that they might be fully convinced of his ſacred preſence among them. And they were ſo far from incurring any danger at this awful interview, that they even celebrated a feſtival before him. Moſes ſays, They ſaw God, and did eat and drink. We may ſuppoſe the glory of the Lord ſhone upon them as they ſat down to this repaſt, and that they were not diſpirited, as good men ſometimes were in after-ages, at the appearance of glorious viſions, Dan. x. 8. but rather animated, and rendered more vigorous.

Ver. 12. And the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, come up to me into the mount.] Moſes had hitherto proceeded no farther than the reſt, but was now commanded, by an audible voice, to aſcend to that part of the mount where the majeſty jeſty of God then reſided. He therefore committed the care of the people to the elders, and advanced with his miniſter Joſhua, who attended him farther than thoſe perſons; for God, intending him to be Moſes's ſucceſſor, ſeems to admit him to a nearer familiarity, than any other perſon beſides Moſes; not that Joſhua aſcended to the top of the mountain with his companion, as appears from the 32d chapter, where the deſcent of Moſes being mentioned, Joſhua is not named, till it be ſaid that Moſes was come down from the mount: We may therefore ſuppoſe, that he accompanied Moſes till he ſaw him enter the cloud, and he then ſtop'd, to wait his return at the portal, if we may uſe that expreſſion.

— And I will give thee tables of ſtone, and a law, and commandments which I have written, &c.] What characters were inſcribed upon theſe tables, whether the Samaritan, Hebrew, or Aſſyrian, ſhall be conſidered in our preliminary diſſertation; and therefore we ſhall only obſerve, at preſent, that Moſes declares they were written, or engraved, mize umize, on this and on that ſide; which imports no more, than that they were inſcribed on each ſide, like the two pages of an open book. As to other particulars, relating to theſe tables, ſuch as their number, which ſome Oriental authors have multiplied to ten, and others to ſeventeen; tho' the Talmud, and all the Rabbies, conſtantly call them the two tables of the covenant; or, ſecondly, as to their ſhape, bigneſs, and materials; which laſt, ſeveral Rabbies believe to have been ſome precious ſtone, as a ruby, or carbuncle; or, thirdly, in what order the ten commandments were written, whether all upon each table, or half, or ſome other part, on the one, and the remainder upon the other: Theſe, and ſuch other needleſs enquiries, we purpoſely decline, becauſe the ſcripture has not afforded us any information, with reſpect to theſe particulars. We beg leave, however, to beſtow a ſhort obſervation on the Moſaic expreſſions, that theſe tables were written by the finger of God, and that they were his work, and the like. For tho' ſeveral expoſitors underſtand them in a literal ſenſe, as if they had been written by God himſelf; others, by an angel; and others, by the ſpirit of God, which is ſometimes called the finger of God, Exod. viii. 19. yet we think it evident, by comparing the expreſſion with what Moſes declares, Exod. xxxiv. 27, 28. that God commanded him to write the words of the covenant upon the ſecond table, as they had been written in the firſt, which he had broken; and that he accordingly complied with the divine order: And by comparing this with what he recapitulates in Deut. x. 4. that God wrote on the ſecond table, according to the writing of the firſt: It is evident, we ſay, that the words can imply no more, than that they were written by the command and direction of God; and that Moſes was the perſon who wrote the firſt, as well as the laſt; tho' the common opinion of expoſitors is, that God wrote the firſt, and Moſes the laſt.

The Mohammedans tell us, that God commanded the Angel Gabriel to take the heavenly pen, and dip it into the river of light, and then to write the ten laws upon the tables. And, that after Moſes had broken them, the Angel carried the fragments up to heaven again, except one piece, about half a yard in length, which was afterwards depoſited in the ark. Bibliot. Orient. pag. 649.

Ver. 17. And the ſight of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire, on the top of the mount, in the eyes of the children of Iſrael.] It broke out of the cloud, ſo as to become terrible to the people, under the awful appearance of flaming fire. To which the Pſalmiſt ſeems to allude, Pſal. xcvii. 2, 3. "clouds and darkneſs are round about him, and fire goeth before him."

Ver. 18. And Moſes was in the mount forty days and forty nights.] That he might receive the two tables of ſtone, and the gift of prophecy, as Elmancin, an Arabian Chriſtian, adds; together with proper directions for framing the tabernacle, with all its appendages, and likewiſe the plan of the ſervice to be there performed by the prieſt, habited according to the divine preſcription, &c. And it need not ſeem ſtrange, that Moſes received his laws from God, when the Greeks pretend the ſame of their Minos: only they declare, that he went into Jupiter's cave, and continued nine years there, in order to learn the inſtitutions he had received; whereas Moſes was but forty days in the mount, where God viſibly appeared. They believed, alſo, that Lycurgus had his laws imparted to him by Apollo; and Zaleucus, according to Plato, Ariſtotle, and many other Heathen writers, received his from Minerva. All theſe fictions were firmly believed by the Greeks, who, in not acknowledging the divinity of the Moſaic miniſtration, were very ungrateful; ſince his was the archetype, or pattern, of what was pretended in their ſtories.

It may be a queſtion, whether the ſix days that Moſes continued in the cloud, before the Lord called him higher, be included in theſe forty days, or were only preparatory to his nearer acceſs to God. They may well be both; for it is not ſaid he was in the midſt of the cloud, forty days and forty nights; but that he was ſo long in the mount; part of which time was paſs'd a in the dark cloud, and the reſt in the reſplendent preſence of God. And in all that ſpace, he did neither eat nor drink, chap. xxxiv. 28. Deut. ix. 9.

The Deity, had he ſo pleaſed, could have revealed his mind to Moſes in a leſs time: But the method of the divine wiſdom is to accompliſh all things in a gradual manner. For inſtance, "The ſubſtance of a child in the womb "(ſaith the author of Schalſch. Hakkabalah) is not per-"fected in leſs time than forty weeks, in all which period "it receives no ſuſtenance, (he means at the month) and "ſo many days did the divine power work in Moſes, to "form him into a new eſſence, and give him a full com-"prehenſion of all that God communicated to him. All "this time he did neither eat nor drink; for theſe actions "prejudice the underſtanding; which God intended to ex-"alt, by depreſſing the bodily faculties and powers, which, "for want of food, were reduced very low, that the un-"derſtanding might be exalted the more. And thus we "find, in after-times, that David chaſtened his body for "three entire weeks, the better to diſpoſe him for hea-"venly viſion." x. 2, 3, 12.

This aſcent of Moſes, from the cloudy part of the mountain to its flaming top, was upon the fourteenth of the month Sivan; and we may ſuppoſe, that the cloud accompanied him as he went up, to defend him from the circumambient flame.

CHAP. XXV.

1 What the Iſraelites muſt offer for the making of the tabernacle. 10 The form of the ark. 17 The mercy-ſeat with the cherubims. 23 The table with the furniture thereof. 31 The candleſtick with the inſtruments thereof.

AND the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying,

2 Speak unto the children of Iſrael, that they bring me an offering: of every man that giveth it willingly with his heart, ye ſhall take my offering.

3 And this is the offering which ye ſhall take of them; gold, and ſilver, and braſs,

4 And blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine linnen, and goats hair.

5 And rams ſkins died red, and badgers ſkins, and ſhittim-wood,

6 Oyl for the light, ſpices for anointing oyl, and for ſweet incenſe,

7 Oynx-ſtones, and ſtones to be ſet in the ephod, and in the breaſt-plate.

8 And let them make me a ſanctuary; that I may dwell amongſt them.

9 According to all that I ſhew thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the inſtruments thereof, even ſo ſhall ye make it.

10 ¶ And they ſhall make an ark of ſhittim-ſhittim-wood: two cubits and a half ſhall be the length thereof, and a cubit and a half the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof.

11 And thou ſhalt overlay it with pure gold, within and without ſhalt thou overlay it: and ſhalt make upon it a crown of gold round about.

12 And thou ſhalt caſt four rings of gold for it, and put them in the four corners thereof; and two rings ſhall be in the one ſide of it, and two rings in the other ſide of it.

13 And thou ſhalt make ſtaves of ſhittim-wood, and overlay them with gold.

14 And thou ſhalt put the ſtaves into the rings, by the ſides of the ark, that the ark may be born with them.

15 The ſtaves ſhall be in the rings of the ark: they ſhall not be taken from it.

16 And thou ſhalt put into the ark the teſtimony which I ſhall give thee.

17 And thou ſhalt make a mercy-ſeat of pure gold: two cubits and a half ſhall be the length thereof, and a cubit and a half the breadth thereof.

18 And thou ſhalt make two cherubims of gold: of beaten work ſhalt thou make them, in the two ends of the mercy-ſeat.

19 And make one cherub on the one end, and the other cherub on the other end: even of the mercy-ſeat ſhall ye make the cherubims on the two ends thereof.

20 And the cherubims ſhall ſtretch forth their wings on high, covering the mercy-ſeat with their wings, and their faces ſhall look one to another: toward the mercy-ſeat ſhall the faces of the cherubims be.

21 And thou ſhall put the mercy-ſeat above upon the ark, and in the ark thou ſhalt put the teſtimony that I ſhall give thee.

22 And there I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee, from above the mercy-ſeat, from between the two cherubims which are upon the ark of the teſtimony, of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Iſrael.

23 ¶ Thou ſhalt alſo make a table of ſhittim-wood: two cubits ſhall be the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof:

24 And thou ſhalt overlay it with pure gold, and make thereto a crown of gold round about.

25 And thou ſhalt make it unto a border hand-breadth round about, and thou ſhalt make a golden crown to the borders thereof round about.

26 And thou ſhalt make for it four rings of gold, and put the rings in the four corners that are on the four feet thereof.

27 Over againſt the border ſhall the rings be for places of the ſtaves to bear the table.

28 And thou ſhalt make the ſtaves of ſhittim-wood, and overlay them with gold, that the table may be born with them.

29 And thou ſhalt make the diſhes thereof, and ſpoons thereof, and covers thereof, and bowls thereof, to cover withal: of pure gold ſhalt thou make them.

30 And thou ſhalt ſet upon the table, ſhew-bread before me alway.

31 ¶ And thou ſhalt make a candleſtick of pure gold: of beaten work ſhall the candleſtick be made: his ſhaft, and his branches, his bowls, his knops, and his flowers ſhall be of the ſame.

32 And ſix branches ſhall come out of the ſides of it: three branches of the candleſtick out of the one ſide, and three branches of the candleſtick out of the other ſide.

33 Three bowls made like unto almonds, with a knop and a flower in one branch, and three bowls made like almonds in the other branch, with a knop and a flower: ſo in the ſix branches that come out of the candleſtick.

34 And in the candleſtick ſhall be four bowls made like unto almonds, with their knops and their flowers.

35 And there ſhall be a knop under two branches of the ſame, and a knop under two branches of the ſame, and a knop under two branches of the ſame, according to the ſix branches that proceed out of the candleſtick.

36 Their knops and their branches ſhall be of the ſame: all it ſhall be one beaten work of pure gold.

37 And thou ſhalt make the ſeven lamps thereof: and they ſhall light the lamps thereof, that they may give light over againſt it.

38 And the tongs thereof, and the ſnuff-diſhes thereof, ſhall be of pure gold.

39 Of a talent of pure gold ſhall he make it, with all theſe veſſels.

40 And look that thou make them after their pattern, which was ſhewed thee in the mount.

Ver. 1. And the Lord ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying, &c.] Moſes is now authorized by God, to demand a voluntary offering from the children of Iſrael, proportionable to their abilities, of gold, ſilver, braſs, ſcarlet, ſilk, wool, oyl, ſpices, and all other materials for the tabernacle, ark of the covenant, ſacerdotal robes, and all other things that were to be appointed for the publick worſhip. The care of making all theſe things, was to be committed to Bezaleel, of the tribe of Judah, and Aholiah, of the tribe of Dan, two perſons whom God had endowed with an extraordinary skill and wiſdom, to contrive and execute all theſe grand deſigns, according to his directions.

We ſhall now preſent our readers with a deſcription of the tabernacle, and all its appendages, which we imagine will be more eaſily comprehended, by caſting the account of them into the form of a diſſertation, than by a particular comment on the ſeveral verſes and chapters which contain their deſcription.

The tabernacle is called by ſeveral names in Scripture, the moſt common of which is that of Ohel Mohed, the tent or tabernacle of the congregation or aſſembly, becauſe it was made in the faſhion of a magnificent tent or pavillion. For this reaſon Joſephus calls it μεταφερόμενος νάος a portable temple; it is, in the eighth verſe of this chapter, ſtyled mikdaſh, the holy place, and by the Septuagint ἁγίασμα, becauſe it was render'd holy by God's preſence; it is therefore elſewhere called, by way of excellency, hamiſhcan, the habitation, which the Greek renders σκηνη. Sometimes this laſt is joined with the word hakeduth, teſtimony; the habitation, or tabernacle of teſtimony; becauſe God delivered his oracles from thence. Laſtly, it is in other parts of Scripture called Hecal, a palace, and the palace of the Lord, which name was afterwards given to the temple.

The tabernacle was built by the command and directions of God himſelf, that he might dwell in the midſt of his people. Their rebellion and murmuring having provoked him to prolong the term of their wandering in the wilderneſs, and thereby delayed the time of their entering into the poſſeſſion of the promiſed land; it was neceſſary that this ſacred place, where the moſt ſolemn parts of divine worſhip were to be celebrated, ſhould be fitted to their frequent marches, and be eaſily ſet up and taken down, as occaſion required; for which reaſon, among other names, which it hath in the Moſaical writings, it is commonly called by that of ohel, which properly ſignifies a tent; but ſuch a magnificent one, both in its ſtructure, materials and utenſils, as might inſpire the Iſraelites and all other nations with an awful reſpect and regard to the ſervice of God. To this end the moſt coſtly and precious things, which they had brought with them from Egypt, and from thoſe other kingdoms they had conquered, were liberally beſtowed by the people, and conſigned to the ableſt artificers, to be wrought in a manner ſuitable to the deſign of it, and to the richneſs of the materials.

Our learned Spencer has been at the pains to derive this tabernacle, the ark, altars, and all the appendages, from Egypt. He quotes the ſacred and prophane writings to prove, that the Heathens had ſuch portable temples, in which they depoſited the moſt valuable utenſils that belonged to their religion. It is indeed eaſy enough to prove, that they had both theſe, and many other things very like thoſe of the Jews; but to infer from thence, that they had them before the children of Iſrael, and that God condeſcended ſo far to the genius of this people, as to introduce them into his own worſhip, to prevent their tendency to idolatrous ſuperſtitions, is not only very preſumptuous and improbable, but is directly oppoſite to the known deſign of them, and the typical application which the apoſtle to the Hebrews makes of them. The tabernacle was an oblong ſquare, thirty cubits long, ten broad, and ten in height. It had two appartments within, divided by a row of four columns of Shittim wood. This wood, tho' ſo famous in Scripture, is yet ſo unknown, that interpreters have not ventur'd to tranſlate its name. St. Jerom has retained its Hebrew appellation; and the Septuagint only calls it incorruptible wood; and indeed it is more than probable that it was called Shittim, from the place where it grew, often mentioned in Scripture. Our readers may perhaps be deſirous of all the light we can offer them on this ſubject. The moſt probable account is, that of St. Jerom, who declares, that it is a hard and ſmooth wood, free from knots, and of exquiſite beauty and lightneſs, inſomuch that the rich uſed to make ſcrews of it for their preſſes: That its leaves and colour were not unlike the white thorn, but that it roſe to ſuch a height, that one might ſaw it into boards of a conſiderable length, and that it grew no where in the Roman empire, but only in the uncultivated parts of Arabia. Hence ſome authors have concluded that he meant the black Acacia; not only becauſe it hath all the ſmoothneſs and ſolidity, length and beauty, which he repreſents; but becauſe this latter is the only tree that is to be found in thoſe parts of Arabia. But whoever reads the deſcription which other authors give us of the Acacia, will find that it cannot be the Shittim of St. Jerom, tho' we are told by many modern travellers, that it is the only tree that grows in thoſe deſarts; but be it which of the two it will, 'tis plain, they were both very fit for the purpoſe of Moſes.

The four columns of Shittim wood were cover'd over with maſſy gold, fixed on the ſame number of pedeſtals, or ſockets of ſilver, from which probably might be derived, that ancient method of ſetting porphiry columns on baſes of white marble. Moſes has not informed us, whether they were round or ſquare; but the latter ſeems moſt probable, not only becauſe they became much eſteemed in the inſide of great buildings, under the name of pilaſters, but alſo becauſe they were accommodated to the deſign for which they were intended; and likewiſe more portable with the boards, and other flat pieces, than columns of the other form. To the top, or rather capitals of theſe, was faſtened, by golden hooks, a rich embroidered curtain, which divided the whole breadth of the place, and diſtinguiſhed the outward, called the holy, from the inward appartment called the moſt holy, or the holy of holies. This latter was but ten cubits deep; the other was twenty cubits; and at the entrance into it, at the weſt-end, hung a ſecond curtain to another row of five columns, of the ſame fabrication with the former; only the baſes of theſe were of braſs, and this curtain cover'd the inſide of the holy place from common ſight. The curtain, or as it is called, the veil, that parted the holy from the moſt holy place, was made of the richeſt ſtuff, both for matter and workmanſhip, and adorned with cherubims, feſtoons, and other ornaments embroidered upon it. The whole was incloſed, on the north-weſt, and ſouth-ſides, with a flight of boards of the ſame wood, covered alſo with plates of gold, and fixed, below and above, into ſockets, or mortiſes, like the columns. Theſe boards were ten cubits in length, and one and a half in breadth; ſo that there were twenty on each ſide, and eight at the weſt end. They were likewiſe faſtened to one another by a five-fold row of golden rings, at equal diſtance, one over another, five to each board, and through theſe were run five bars of gilt Shittim-wood, which locked or unlocked them on thoſe three ſides. As for the eaſt-end, it had no boards, but was ſhelter'd by a veil, like that which divided the two appartments, except that this outward one had no cherubims embroidered upon it, as the innermoſt had; for theſe were never expoſed to public ſight: but it was only adorned with flowers, leaves, and ſuch-like embelliſhments of needle-work. The length of this curtain is neither expreſſed in the text, nor agreed among commentators. Some thinking that it flowed down no lower than five cubits, and afforded the people a view of what was tranſacted in the holy place, others believing that it touched the ground and concealed all within; which laſt is the moſt probable of the two. Joſephus adds farther, that there was another curtain, over that which came down to the ground, to preſerve it from the weather, being made of ſtuff that was proof againſt rain, but that it was drawn aſide on the ſabbath, and other feſtivals, to give the people a view of the inner curtain, and its ornaments; if ſo, it muſt at the ſame time expoſe the altar of incenſe, candleſtick, &c. to publick ſight. Philo, on the contrary, pretends that no lay-man was ſuffered to ſee the fumigations, which were performed within that place; the prieſt being the only perſon who had that privilege. This ſeems at leaſt more likely; by what we read of Zachariah's tarrying longer than uſual in the holy place, as of the people waiting without, not knowing what had happened to him, Luke i. 21. However that be, Moſes calls theſe two curtains, or veils, by different appellations; namely this outward one, by the name of muſſack, which only ſignifies a covering, whereas the inward, which divided the holy from the moſt holy place, he calls paroketh, from parak, which ſignifies, to ſnatch away, and figuratively, to deliver, becauſe it covered the mercy-ſeat, and kept it from public ſight.

The Talmud adds another particular concerning this laſt veil; namely, that it conſiſted of two curtains, which hung parallel a-croſs the tabernacle, at the diſtance of two cubits from each other, and that when the high-prieſt went went into the moſt holy place, he lifted up the firſt curtain at one end of it, and ſo walked between them quite to the other end, and then entred within the ſecond curtain, and advanced forward, towards the ark. If ſo it was the moſt effectual way to keep the ſacred place from ſight; but we dare not warrant the truth of that opinion. The Apoſtle to the Hebrews mentions indeed a ſecond Veil: But whether in Alluſion to this double curtain, or, what ſeems more probable, in oppoſition to the Muſſack, or outward veil, we ſhall not determine.

The whole had four different coverings, the two innermoſt of which were by far the richeſt, being of a beautiful light mohair ſtriped with ſcarlet and purple, or crimſon, and adorn'd with cherubims; the other two were made, the under one of rams skins, with the wool on, of a ſcarlet dye, and the uppermoſt of all, of badgers skins of a light blue; theſe were to preſerve the other two from wind and rain, for which reaſon they were made to hang down to the ground, on the three ſides that were boarded, whilſt they left the outward veil open to publick view, on the weſt-end, which was the entrance into that ſacred place. The inſide of both theſe appartments was render'd ſtill more awful, by the darkneſs that reſided in them, for we do not find that there were any overtures made for the admiſſion of light, ſo that the moſt holy place had none but what the cenſer gave it, when the high-prieſt went into it on the day of expiation: as for the holy place, it had the golden candleſtick, with a ſufficient number of branches, to enlighten it in the night. We ſhall follow the jewiſh law-giver no further in his ſuccinct account of every minute part that compoſed this portable edifice, much leſs thoſe who have commented upon him, the greateſt part of whom have given ſuch a ſcope to their luxuriant fancies, that they ſeemed rather to have view'd it with the utmoſt nicety, than to have taken their deſcriptions from him; we think it ſufficient to ſay, that there was nothing wanting in it that could make it rich, ſumptuous, and venerable; as well as firm, laſting and eaſily moved.

The mercy-ſeat and the ark of the teſtimony were the two chief things that were depoſited in the moſt holy place, and the former was as a lid or cover to the latter; for which reaſon ſome interpreters have fancied, that this was all that was meant by the word Kaphoreth, by which it is denominated by Moſes; but moſt verſions more properly render it the propitiatory, others the oracle, and ours the mercy-ſeat: the word Kaphoreth, indeed, comes from the verb Caphar, which ſignifies to expiate, or forgive, in a figurative ſenſe, and, in the primitive one, to cover, according to that of the Pſalmiſt——Whoſe unrighteouſneſs is forgiven and whoſe ſin is cover'd, Pſalm, xxxii. 1. But it would be abſurd to infer from hence, that the word here ſignifies only a bare covering; eſpecially, when the Apoſtle to the Hebrews, who in other caſes has followed the verſion of the Septuagint, departs from it here, and calls it ſimply Ἱλαστήριον the propitiatory, or mercy-ſeat, where they had render'd it Ἱλαστήριον ἐπίθεμα, the propitiatory-lid or covering. It was called the propitiatory or mercy-ſeat, becauſe God is ſaid to have heard their prayers, to have delivered his oracles from thence, and to dwell between the cherubims which cover'd it. Beſides, it is evident, that it had a peculiar ſanctity attributed to it, and was conſidered as the place of God's immediate preſence, for which reaſon the ſevereſt judgments were inflicted on thoſe who preſumed to approach it. Moſes was commanded to make it of pure gold; from which one may conclude, that it was not made of ſhittim-wood, overlaid with gold, like the ark, the golden tables, and other ſacred utenſils. The length of it was two cubits and a half, and the breadth one and a half, ſo that it exactly fitted the dimenſions of the ark. It was fixed, with the cherubims that over-ſhadowed it, in a frame, or, as Moſes calls it, a crown, not of a round, but oblong-ſquare figure, which cloſed the upper part of the ark like a rim, or ogee. As to the cherubims, it is certain that they were made of gold, but whether ſolid, and caſt of the ſame piece, and in the ſame mould with the mercy-ſeat, as ſome Jews and Chriſtians render it, or only chaſed, or hammer'd, as the original, which only expreſſes it by harden'd gold, ſeems rather to intimate, is not worth diſputing; it would indeed be more material, to know ſomething concerning their form, poſition, and attitude; but Moſes has alſo left us in the dark, except where he ſays, that they ſtretched out their wings on high, and covered the mercy-ſeat with them, from end to end, and fronted each other, with their faces declined towards the mercy-ſeat; from which we may reaſonably conclude, that they were at leaſt in a kind of bowing poſture. This attitude, tho' not ſo clearly expreſſed by Moſes, may be further evinced, not only as it was the moſt decent, and reſpectful, but as it ſeem'd to be alluded to by the Pſalmiſt, who having declar'd that God was ſeated between the cherubims; and expreſſed his majeſty, juſtice, and power, adds, proſtrate yourſelves before his footſtool, Pſalm xcix. 1. &c. Neither is it improbable, that what is ſaid of their looking down upon the mercy-ſeat, in a kind of admiring poſture, might give occaſion to that beautiful alluſion of St. Peter, when ſpeaking of the myſtery of our redemption, he ſays, which the very angels deſire to look into, 1 Pet. i. 12. We might likewiſe form a probable conjecture of their height, if it be allowed, that their wings, which met about the middle of the mercy-ſeat, had the uſual proportion to the reſt of their bodies; but theſe enquiries are more curious than uſeful.

As to the form of theſe cherubims, Moſes has not afforded us any Intimations concerning them, or thoſe which were embroidered on the veils and curtains, by which we can fix an idea concerning them: We muſt therefore have recourſe to other paſſages of ſcripture, where they are more particularly deſcribed. The generality both of ancient and modern interpreters, ſuppoſe them to have had human ſhapes, becauſe Moſes declares, that their faces were deflected towards the mercy-ſeat. But this concludes nothing, becauſe face, and even hands, are attributed to beaſts as well as men, in the Hebrew idiom. The greateſt part of the Jews derive the word cherubim, from another word which ſignifies, to be like a child; from which they conclude, that they were like young men, covered with ſome of their wings. But it is certain, that the prophet Ezekiel repreſents them quite otherwiſe, and ſpeaks of the face of a cherubim, as ſynonimous with that of an ox, (compare Ezek. i. 10. with x. 14.) according to which, the author of the apocalypſe calls them ζῶα, beaſts: And it is not improbable, that the different deſcriptions of them which occur in ſcripture, induced Joſephus to declare, they were a kind of winged creature, correſponding with the deſcription of that which Moſes ſaw about the throne of God, but to which no man had ever ſeen the like before.

However, we think, with many learned moderns, that the word is derived from Charab, which in the Syriac, Chaldee, and Arabic, ſignifies to plough: According to which Etymology, Charab, or Cherub, often imports a ſtrong man, or beaſt: And as the ox is known to be a very ſerviceable animal in agriculture, on account of his ſtrength and docility, it is believed by ſome, that the Moſaic cherubims reſembled that creature, if not in the whole, at leaſt in face, and ſome other parts of the body. To theſe we may add, the authority of an ancient father, who believed, that the Egyptian ſphynx, and other hieroglyphic beaſts, were borrowed from thoſe of Moſes and Ezekiel. [Clem. Alexandrin. Strom. lib. v.] And indeed, Moſes ſeems to hint at leaſt, that the cherub-work, which was embroider'd on the veil and curtains within the holy of holies, was full of ſuch ſymbolical figures, after the manner of the famous Phrygian tapeſtry. Whether, therefore, theſe took the hint from Moſes, or he from them, is not very material; ſince either ſuppoſition may be allowed without any harm. If the firſt, Moſes might thereby deſign to intimate the exiſtence and office of thoſe ſpiritual beings: And if the latter, it might ſerve to expoſe the folly of their Pagan worſhippers, who adored beings that were no more than Servants to the tranſcendent and ſupreme God of Iſrael

The ark was a ſmall cheſt made of ſhittim-wood, and cover'd over with beaten gold. We have ſeen the Dimenſions of its length and breadth by thoſe of the mercy-ſeat; its height was equal to its breadth, that is one cubit and a half. It is called the ark of the covenant and the ark of the teſtimony; the firſt, becauſe it was a ſymbol of the covenant made between God and his people, and contained the two tables of it, the pot of manna, and Aaron's miraculous rod, which were depoſited in it, to ſerve as ſo many teſtimonials againſt every deviation of the Iſraelites from their duty. It had, on each ſide, two golden

golden rings, through which were inſerted the two bars by which it uſed to be carried on the prieſts ſhoulders.

Theſe bars were made of the ſame wood with the ark, and like it, overlaid with gold; and were never to be taken off. The ark with its covering ſtood length-wiſe, and not croſswiſe, as ſome have imagin'd, in the midſt of the moſt holy place. Moſes has not intimated whether or no it had either feet, or ſome pedeſtal to ſtand upon; but it is hardly to be ſuppoſed that it reſted upon the bare ground.

Several learned Rabbies have a notion, that there were two arks, the one made by Moſes, and the other by Bezaleel; becauſe Moſes is ſaid to have made an ark of ſhittim-wood into which he put the two tables of ſtone; Deut. x. 3. and it is likewiſe recorded, that Bezaleel made an ark, and cover'd it with gold, Exod. 27. But they might as well conclude, that Solomon built one temple and his workmen another; however they add, that Moſes always carried his own, and the Prieſt the other; and that this latter, which had in it the book of the law, was always carried with them, when they went to engage their enemies. Aben Ezra endeavours to confirm this opinion, by what is ſaid in Joſhua, of the diſtance that was to be kept between the people and the ark; and pretends, that the particle it is in the plural in the original, and that the words ſhould be tranſlated between you and them, that is the two arks. But beſides, that his criticiſm has no foundation, but on different readings of the Mazorites, and thoſe grounded on the diſputed authority of the points; it is certain, that the plural is ſometimes uſed to expreſs the excellency of a thing; ſo that we ſee no reaſon to ſuppoſe two arks, from either of theſe arguments; and yet ſome Chriſtians have given into that opinion.

Beſides the ark and mercy-ſeat, there was ſtill, in the moſt holy place, the volume of the law, which Moſes gave the Levites, to depoſite by the ſide of the ark, whether in the inſide or out, is not agreed, but moſt probably without. St. Paul omits this in his enumeration of the things that were preſerved there, [compare 1 Kings viii. 9. with Heb. ix.] for which no other reaſon can be aſſigned, than that they were ſufficiently known; for it is ſaid elſewhere, that there was nothing in the ark but the two tables of ſtone, which Moſes put into it at Horeb, [1 Kings viii. 97.] tho' it is plain, that the pot of manna, and Aaron's miraculous rod were likewiſe preſerved in it. But we do not think, that either of theſe ſeeming inconſiſtencies, or the diſpoſition of the ſacred volume, and the other utenſils, are matters of ſuch weight, as to deſerve all the pains which ſome learned authors have taken to very little purpoſe. However, as to the book itſelf, we muſt not ſuppoſe it the only copy, ſeeing it would not have been lawful for the high-prieſt to have taken it out but on the day of expiation; whereas the publick reading of it was to be on the feaſt of the tabernacles: We may therefore ſuppoſe, with the Jews, that there were ſeveral copies of it, and that this prototype was thus carefully preſerved, to prevent the reſt being corrupted. They tell us, that there were thirteen copies of it, one for each tribe, and one to be preſerved in the ark, There is nothing improbable in all this, but one particular they add which is not altogether ſo clear; namely, that after the building of the temple, this laſt was taken out of the ſanctuary, and depoſited in the treaſury of the temple; and that it was this volume which was found there by the high-prieſt Hilkiah, in the reign of Joſiah. But if the latter be true, its more likely it was taken out of the ſanctuary, and depoſited in ſome ſuch private place, to prevent its undergoing the ſame fate that all other copies, had ſuffer'd during the wicked reign of Ammon and Manaſſes, than that it was removed thence in Solomon's time, without any neceſſity or command from God. Laſtly, after the ark was brought back from the Philiſtines, they depoſited the cheſt with the golden mice and emrods, not in it, but by the ſide of it.

The utenſils in the holy place were, 1. the altar of incenſe; 2. the golden candleſtick; and, 3. the table of ſhew-bread. The altar of perfume is ſometimes called the golden altar, becauſe, tho' it was made of ſhittim-wood, yet it was ſo well cover'd over with gold, that it looked like a ſolid piece of that metal. It is alſo called the inner altar, to diſtinguiſh it from that of burnt-offerings, which ſtood without the tabernacle. Its uſe was two-fold, namely, to burn incenſe morning and night, and to be ſprinkled with the blood of the ſacrifices, which were offered for ſins of ignorance, committed either by particular prieſts, or by all the people in general. It was one cubit ſquare, and two in height, ſo that the ſmoke had ſtill eight cubits to aſcend. Two bars of the ſame wood, covered with gold, and inſerted into four rings of the ſame metal, ſerved to carry it about, like the ark, only theſe might be taken off. There was a golden crown or ornament like an ogee, round the top of it; and four horns on the four corners, likewiſe covered with gold; the main difficulty is, how to underſtand what is meant by the top or roof of it, and how it could be order'd, ſo as to bear the heat of the burning coals, without injuring the wood through the gold that overlaid it. This has induced St. Jerom, and others, to tranſlate it, a grate through which the ſmall coals and aſhes fell to the bottom, but the conſtruction of the altar is incompatible with that interpretation. Joſephus calls it a golden fire hearth, which is equally liable to the ſame inconveniency, unleſs we ſuppoſe it to have been of a very uncommon thickneſs. The difficulty is ſtill greater with reſpect to the altar of burnt-offerings, which, tho' made of the ſame wood, and only covered with copper, did yet bear a much more intenſe heat, by reaſon of the great number of victims which were conſtantly burnt upon it. Le Clerc has offered two ſolutions of this difficulty; either by ſuppoſing the metal that covered it to be very thick, or that the ſhittim was the ſame with the larix of Vitruvius, which was an incombuſtible wood; and becauſe he found the firſt ſolution to be inſufficient, he publiſhed a ſhort diſſertation, to prove the probability of the latter; but the misfortune is, that we have no ſufficient teſtimony, that any ſuch wood ever grew in the neighbourhood of Sinai, or indeed in any part of Arabia. We ſhall ſpeak of the latter altar by and by; as for this of incenſe, Cunæus ſeems to have found the beſt expedient out of the Jewiſh rabbies, by ſuppoſing that the burning coals were not placed upon the altar itſelf, but upon a cenſer like a chafing-diſh; which conjecture he ſtrengthens by a text or two, where ſuch cenſers are commanded to be filled with coals, and ſet upon the altar. However, if theſe explications ſhould be thought inſufficient, we need only ſuppoſe, that this golden top or roof, with its crown or frame, was ſo fixed, as to be at ſome ſmall diſtance above the altar itſelf; and this would ſuffice to ſecure the wood from the fire, tho' it had not been overlaid with gold, becauſe the heat naturally aſcends. The ſituation of it is not clear in the text, which ſays, that it was to ſtand before the veil, Exod. xxx. 6. Joſephus, who is univerſally followed, places it between the candleſtick, and the table of ſhew-bread, and tho' we cannot contradict this account, yet we think, that if the candleſtick were placed in the midſt, which is the propereſt ſituation for it, and the other two, which were near of the ſame form and dimenſions, were diſpoſed on each ſide, and at a little diſtance between that, and the ſides of the tabernacle, it would be more agreeable to the rules of ſymmetry. The author of the ſecond book of Maccabees tells us, (chap. ii. 1. &c.) that Jeremiah, ſeeing the captivity approaching, took this altar, and the ark of God, to mount Nebo, and hid them in a cave there, and cloſed up the door in ſuch a manner, that it could not afterwards be found. The Talmudiſts give a different account of it, namely, that Iſaiah having been admoniſhed by ſome prophets, that all the precious veſſels of the ſanctuary would be carried away to Babylon, depoſited the holy fire, the ark, the pot of manna, Aarons rod, the breaſt-plate of Urim, and this altar of incenſe, into a ſubterranean place, which Solomon, from the ſame forecaſt, had cauſed to be built with ſuch extreme care and privacy, that, at the return from the captivity, they could never be found, nor ever will be, if we believe the Jews, till the coming of the Meſſiah. One thing indeed, ſeems reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that if they had been carried into Babylon with the reſt of the ſacred utenſils of the temple, they would have been alſo reſtor'd to the Jews at their return, but we find, on the contrary, that they were forced to make new ones. The candleſtick was, by far, the richeſt piece in the ſanctuary, ſeeing it weighed a talent, not the common, but that of the ſanctuary; and was made, from top to bottom, of pure beaten gold, all of a-piece without joint or ſauder. Its baſe or foot, or, as the original words is, its thigh, becauſe it probably reſembled an inverted one, had a trunk over over it, out of which proceeded ſix branches, three on each ſide, and the trunk it ſelf, compoſed the ſeventh in the middle. Theſe branches were adorned with cups, knops, and flowers, alternate and equidiſtant, and on the top of each, was fixed a lamp, ſhaped like an almond, which might be fixed on or taken off, as occaſion ſerv'd, and in them were put the oil, and the wick, or cotton. Theſe had their tongs, or ſnuffers, to draw the cotton in or out, and ſnuff-diſhes to receive the ſparkles and impurity that fell from the lamps. All theſe were likewiſe of pure gold. It was the prieſts buſineſs, in waiting every evening, at the time of incenſe, to go in and light them; and about the ſame time in the morning to extinguiſh, clean, and repleniſh them. Moſes has not given us an account of its height, ſo that while ſome lower'd it to the level of the altar of incenſe, which would have cauſed it to caſt but an imperfect light, eſpecially on the table of ſhew-bread, where the loaves ſtood one upon another; others have raiſed it to the altitude of five cubits, which is a worſe extream, ſince it muſt not only have required a ladder or ſteps to have reached it; but it alſo being above half the height of the place, the ſmoke of it would ſoon have ſoiled the rich curtains above it: It is therefore more reaſonable to ſuppoſe it of ſuch a height, that a man might eaſily reach the top of it, that is, about ſix foot high. It may not however be amiſs, to ſay ſomething of the Oil that fed theſe lamps; and this the text tells us, was to be the pureſt Virgin Oil of Olives, with which the land of Canaan abounded very much; and indeed, none but ſuch would have been fit to burn in that place, where the furniture was ſo exquiſitely rich. We may remember, that when Moſes exacted a free-will offering from the people, of all their coſtly ſpoils, oil was one of the articles; ſince then, there being always a certain quantity required, with their other ſacrifices, beſides, tythes and the free offerings of the devouter ſort, there could not be wanting a conſtant ſupply of it for this purpoſe.

The Babyloniſh Talmud aſſures us, that after the extruction of Solomon's temple, there was a place, near the womens appartment, appropriated for the keeping of it; we ſhall only add, that after the building of the temple, Solomon inſtead of one, placed ten candleſticks in the holy place, all of the ſame metal, with their other appendages; but whether that of Moſes was one of the number, or made the eleventh, is not certain; the latter ſeems the more probable of the two, becauſe the holy place here being conſiderably larger than that of the tabernacle; and all the veſſels being made ſo accordingly; it is likely, that the candleſticks did bear the ſame proportion; in which caſe the old one would not have been uniform with the reſt. But whether it was new caſt, or depoſited iu the treaſury of the temple, or what became of it, is uncertain.

As for the table on which the ſhew-bread was plac'd, it was made of the ſame wood, and covered with gold, like the ark: It was two cubits long, one in breadth, and one and a half high; it had a golden border or crown, which may be ſuppoſed to be a kind of a rim around it, like that of our tea-tables. It was alſo of pure gold, and might have an ogee, or ſome ſuch ornament about it, and it ſtood upon four feet. Moſes ſeems to intimate ſomething like a ſecond crown, or rim, tho' ſome take it to be the ſame with the former, but it is more likely that it was a lower one, which ſurrounded the four feet, near the bottom, and kept them ſteddy. To the upper rim, was faſtened four gold rings, two on each ſide, through which the bars were inſerted that ſerved for its carriage. On the top there were, beſides the two rows of ſhew-loaves, ſome pans or chafing-diſhes of gold, in which the incenſe uſed to be burnt, with ſeveral other ſmall utenſils, which ſerved for inferior uſes in this holy place, which we ſhall not dwell longer upon, becauſe there are almoſt as many various opinions about the ſignification of their names, their form, and uſes, as there are interpreters. This table was afterwards changed for another, by Solomon. Joſephus tells us, that it was larger than the old one, probably to correſpond with the dimenſions of the place. The author of the book of the Chronicles, adds, that he made ten more; five on the north, and five on the ſouth-ſide of the holy-place; which ſerv'd to ſet all the other utenſils upon; 1 Chron. iv. 8. and Joſephus declares, that there were as many more of different forms and ſizes, as ſerved to ſupport twenty thouſand cups, and other veſſels of gold, and twice the number of ſilver ones.

The court of the tabernacle, with its utenſils, is next to be conſidered. The court was an oblong ſquare, an hundred cubits long, and fifty broad; incloſed on all but the eaſt ſide, which had an opening of twenty cubits for the Prieſts and Levites, and the people to go in and out with their offerings. This incloſure was not deſigned to conceal what was tranſacted in the court, ſince the curtains that ſurrounded it, were made of a kind of net or point work, through which, even the heathens might have a view of it. Theſe curtains, which Moſes therefore calls by a particular name, to diſtinguiſh them, from thoſe of the tabernacle, whoſe uſe was of a different nature, were ſupported by four flights of pillars, probably of ſhittim-wood, with brazen pedeſtals, and adorned with ſilver filletts, or rather chapiters, for ſuch they really were. The Hebrew word for the curtains, is Kelah, which ſignifies, either a ſling, or a net, or open work, probably, becauſe thoſe ſlings with which they caſt ſtones, had the bottom made of ſome ſuch kind of open work. For this reaſon, the Chaldee paraphraſt tranſlates it, grate or crib-work, in which he is followed by the generality of chriſtian interpreters. Some indeed pretend, it was a flouriſhing of all ſorts of leaf and flower-work, but they all agree, that the ground was open and tranſparent, ſo that theſe curtains might, in ſome meaſure, reſemble a piece of point or lace. As for the height of the pillars, as Moſes has intimated nothing concerning it, authors have conjectured it variouſly, from ten to five cubits; but as the deſign of them was only to ſupport the curtains, and to hinder the approach to, and not the view of the tabernacle; the altitude of five cubits, ſeems moſt rational, it being the height that Joſephus aſſigns them, as well as that of the curtains; only we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that the ſilver chapiters roſe above the curtain. We are likewiſe left to gueſs at their figure, only a ſquare one may be juſtly imagined fitter, both for carriage, and for holding the hangings tight than a round one. They were fifty ſix in number; twenty on each ſide; ten at the weſt, and ſix at the eaſt end; beſides thoſe which ſupported the blue curtain, which covered the entrance of the court, and was tinged with a fine ſky-blue, flouriſhed, and was made to draw on either ſide, to liſt up; the text doth not ſay which, but the Jews believe the latter.

Thus the whole court had a circuit of three hundred cubits. Thoſe, therefore, who ſuppoſe, that the curtain which ſurrounded it, was one entire piece, ſeem not to conſider what a laborious task it would have been for the Gerſhonites, to have folded or rolled it up; beſides, that the text deſcribes them all along in the plural number, which ſhews, that there was more than one or two. However, tho' this court bore the ſame proportion with the tabernacle, and the four ſides ran parallel to it, yet we are not to imagine that the tabernacle ſtood in the center of it. There was no neceſſity for the Area on the weſt end to be of the ſame extent with that of the eaſt, becauſe we never read of any conſiderable utenſils placed in that; whereas this latter had the altar of burnt-offering, the laver and ſeveral other things, which we are now going to deſcribe; ſo that tho Moſes has not left us the dimentions of either, this laſt is ſuppoſed to have been of equal length with its breadth, that is, fifty foot ſquare; and indeed, leſs than that ſpace could hardly ſuffice for all the work that was performed there, and the multitude of utenſils that were uſed in it, ſince it was the only place, in which all the victims were ſlain, and both they, and all kind of offerings, were brought and offered up. For this reaſon, it is diſputed, both among the Jews and Chriſtians, whether the people who came theither with the victims were ſuffered to enter it, in order to lay their hands on their heads, and to ſtay the whole time of the ceremony, as the letter of the law ſeemed to require? or whether they were not met by the Prieſt and Levites, at the entrance into the court, and having performed the part of impoſition of hands, and confeſſion there, beheld the remainder of the ceremonial, from the openings of the incloſure. If the former ſuppoſition be admitted, it is certain, that they muſt have been very much crowded, at ſome particular times, unleſs no more were admitted, than the place would commodiouſly contain. We need not add, that the braſs ſtakes and cor-dages, which were diſpoſed all around, within, as well as without, in order to ſecure the court and tabernacle from ſtorms and winds, did ſtill ſtreighten the place conſiderably. There have alſo been various conjectures concerning the reaſon of its ſituation, and fronting the weſt; which we ſhall not dwell upon. The beſt we meet with, from the Jews is, that it was done in oppoſition to the Heathens, who worſhipped towards the riſing ſun. As for the myſtical interpretation of ſome Chriſtian divines, they are ſlights of imagination, with which we think it unneceſſary to trouble our readers.

The altar of burnt-offerings was placed, as we have obſerved before, at the eaſt end of the court; and one may ſuppoſe it to have ſtood at ſuch a convenient diſtance from the tabernacle, that neither the ſmoke of its conſtant fire, nor that of the victims which were burnt upon it, might fall upon or damage its outward veil. This altar is alſo called the outward, to diſtinguiſh it from that of incenſe, which was within the ſanctuary. We have already taken notice, that it was made of ſhittim-wood, and cover'd over with braſs. It was five cubits ſquare, and three in height; and becauſe it was portable, like the other, it had four braſs rings; through theſe the two bars, by which it was carried upon the prieſts ſhoulders, were inſerted. It had four horns, at the four corners, of the ſame wood, and covered with the ſame metal, but whoſe ſhape is equally uncertain with thoſe of the other altar. In the cavity of it, which probably went through, and may be ſuppoſed as capacious as the bigneſs of the altar would admit, was hung, by four braſs rings, a croſs-bar grate, which reached down to the middle of the cavity, and through which the aſhes fell. This was to be placed under that part, which is generally render'd the compaſs of the altar, but is variouſly underſtood, or rather fancied, in order to ſave the wood from being conſumed with the copper-work. The word carcob is one of thoſe that occur but once in ſcripture, and whoſe meaning muſt remain uncertain, for want of parallels to fix it. The Jews, inſtead of helping us, in ſuch doubtful caſes, rather embroil them the more. R. Solomon, and, after him, the learned De Lyra, believed it to have been only a kind of ornament, that ſurrounded the altar; and other rabbies, who affirm, contrary to the text, that the altar was ten cubits high, and large in proportion, tell us, that it was a kind of gallery, which the prieſts were obliged to aſcend, in order to lay the wood and victims in due order; and that the three cubits, which Moſes aſſigns to the height of the altar, muſt be reckoned from that gallery, and upwards. But what confutes this wild notion, is, that Moſes ſays, this carcob was to reach to the middle of the altar. If therefore the altar was ten cubits high, there muſt have been five cubits above, as well as five below this imaginary gallery, as Cunæus rightly obſerves. Our commentators have therefore juſtly rejected them, and endeavour'd to remove the principal difficulty without departing from the original, or giving into fabulous traditions. We ſhall therefore offer to our readers the conjecture of a learned commentator, who ſuppoſes, that the cavity of the altar was about ſeven feet and a half wide, from ſide to ſide, and that the ſhittim-wood was cover'd with braſs, within, as well as without. The croſs-bar grate we take to have been a veſſel made in the moſt convenient form, to receive and keep up the fire, which was conſtantly ſupplied with freſh wood, and to have been hung about a foot deep within the cavity. As for the carcob, which we render the compaſs, or circuit, he thinks it was another copper veſſel, capacious enough to contain the fleſh of the victims, which were to be conſumed upon, or in it. This veſſel being likewiſe ſuſpended by four braſs rings over the grate, at a convenient diſtance, was conſequently ſurrounded by the continual flames from below, and might conſume all that was in it, in a very little time, without endangering the wood, of which the altar was made; and both the carcob, and the grate, being thus ſuſpended, might be eaſily fixed on, and taken off, whenever the altar was to be cleared, or tranſported to any other place.

The only objection that can be raiſed againſt this ſuppoſition is, that there are ſome expreſs texts, which enjoin the victims, with the head and the fat, to be laid, not over, but upon the wood, or upon the fire, which is upon (not within) the altar, Levit. i. 8. This ſeems alſo to have been the practice of the ancient patriarchs, before the Moſaic inſtitutions. So that the carcob may ſeem rather to have contained the fire, if it was really a diſtinct utenſil from the grate. As for what is ſaid of the latter hanging in the middle, it may more reaſonably be underſtood of the middle, with reſpect to its ſides, than its height. Since therefore invention muſt ſupply the obſcurity of the text, as our author obſerves, may we not as well ſuppoſe this carcob to have been a kind of cincture to the grate, capacious enough to contain both the wood and the victims; and to have been ſuſpended ſo near the level of the altar, and at ſo convenient a diſtance from its inſides, as not to heat the braſs of it to a degree ſufficient to burn the wood incloſed in it; whilſt the crib might be a kind of bottom to it, calculated for the admiſſion of air from beneath, and to let out the aſhes, and other ſmall rubbiſh, which might otherwiſe clog the fire? We may even venture to declare, that the whole might be ſo artificially contrived, that the fleſh, being thus embraced on all ſides by a fierce and conſtant fire, and this by the circumbent air, might concenter the heat to ſuch a degree, as to conſume every particle, and yet be entirely free from that offenſive ſmell, which ſuch quantities of fleſh and fat muſt inevitably have created. But this we ſubmit to our readers. The truth is, that a man ought to have ſeen and examined the whole ſtructure of the tabernacle, and its apparatus, to be able to remove every difficulty that may be raiſed by the curious. But do not we find the ſame, with reſpect to the Greek and Roman antiquities, tho' we are better acquainted with thoſe languages, and have ſuch multitudes of ancient authors to conſult, in compariſon of thoſe few that relate to the Jewiſh? It was on this altar, that the ſacred fire, which deſcended from heaven at the conſecration of the tabernacle, was to be continually kept. If it be asked, how this could be done in their marches, when this and all other utenſils were wrap'd up in ſeveral coverings, the uppermoſt of which was of badgers skins, without either burning thoſe coverings, or extinguiſhing the fire? We need not have recourſe to miracles, as the rabbies do, here, and every where elſe; but may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that the carcob, or veſſel which held the fire, and was to be taken off when they removed, was carried in ſuch a manner, as to preſerve fire enough to kindle a greater, when occaſion required, as on the morning and evening ſacrifice. The reader, however, muſt be reminded here, not to confound this Moſaic altar, with that ſpacious one which was afterwards rear'd by Solomon, of which this is not a proper place to treat. One common caution, however, belonged to the ſtructure of theſe, and all other altars; that the aſcent to them was to be gradual, and not by ſteps, to prevent all indecency in God's worſhip.

As for this ſacred fire, we need not inform our readers how early it was in uſe among the Chaldeans and Perſians, from whom it paſſed to the Greeks, Romans, and other nations. It was called, in the old Perſic, Oriſmada, which ſome critics pretend to be derived from the Hebrew words urim eſh yah; light and fire of God; or from or eſh men yah, light and fire from God: And from thence infer, that they had this cuſtom from the Jews; but that is what we dare not venture to warrant. As for the Jewiſh fire, we read in the 2d book of the Maccabees, chap. i. 19. that at the approach of Nebuchadnezzar, towards Jeruſalem, the prophet Jeremiah, with ſome other prieſts, took it from the altar, and hid it in the bottom of a dry well, and that at the return from the captivity, Nehemiah ſent ſome of their grand-children to that well, who brought him foul water, inſtead of fire; but, upon his pouring it upon the altar, it immediately blaz'd into a clear flame; which was kept afterwards till the deſtruction of the ſecond temple. This hiſtory is likewiſe apocryphal, but the Jews believe it, only they compare this ſecond fire to a dog; whereas the firſt, they ſay, was like a lion.

The brazen laver is the laſt conſiderable utenſil that was in the court of the tabernacle. It was conveniently ſituate between the eaſt-end of it and the altar of burnt-offerings; its ſhape and capaciouſneſs, not being mentioned by Moſes, we can affirm nothing certain about them. Its uſe was two-fold: Firſt, It ſerved for the prieſts to waſh their hands and feet, who were expreſsly forbid, under ſevere penalties, to preſume to enter upon any part of their function, till they had performed that ceremony. Secondly, To waſh the entrails and legs of the victims. Some Jews fancy, that there was another reſervoir of water for this laſt uſe, uſe, which is not improbable, not only as it was more decent, but becauſe we find it ſo order'd in Solomon's temple, where the brazen ſea was for the ſole waſhing of the prieſts; whilſt there were ten other lavers, beſides, for the waſhing of the victims, 2 Chron. iv. 6. If this was not the caſe here, we muſt ſuppoſe, that they only took the water out of the laver, into ſome other veſſels, to waſh thoſe entrails in; for it was not even lawful for a prieſt to waſh his hands and feet in the ſame water. For this reaſon, they ſuppoſe, that this laver had a quantity of cocks, which diſcharged the water firſt upon their feet, and then upon their hands; after which, it was received into a baſon underneath. This fountain was to be conſtantly repleniſhed with water, and this office belonged to the Levites, unleſs, perhaps, they made the Nethinims bring it to them to the entrance of the court. Moſes tells us, Exod. xxxviii 8. that this braſs laver and its foot was made of the looking-glaſſes of the women, who came in crouds to the door of the tabernacle; which has occaſioned various ſpeculations: And ſome interpreters have even ventur'd to turn the braſs, there mention'd, into ſteel; as if thoſe antient mirrors had been made of no other metal. For our part, we take it for granted, that they were made of other metals: alſo ſuch as braſs, tin, ſilver, and the like; and ſome with braſs mix'd with tin or ſilver; the laſt of which, Pliny tells us, were the moſt eſteem'd: But we are apt to think, that there is an error crept into the text, or an exchange of one letter for another like it; and that it ſhould be render'd, he made the laver and its foot of braſs, like unto the looking-glaſſes of the women, who crouded about the door of the tabernacle. By which is meant, that he made them either of the ſame metal, or that he gave them the ſame degree of brightneſs and ſmooth poliſh. And if what an ancient father tells us, be true, of the Egyptian women, that they uſed to go to the temple, with a looking-glaſs in one hand, and a timbrel in the other, it will ſtill afford us a greater light into the meaning of the Hebrew women wearing ſuch an ornament, when they came to the tabernacle. As for what is ſaid of their repairing thither in crowds, it was no more than what they uſually did; as appears from other places of Scripture.

As we are upon the ſubject of the divine laws, by whoſe preſcriptions all theſe things were made, we muſt by no means forget that altar which God enjoined to be erected to him, either of earth, or of rough ſtones, in all places where he ſhould record his name, Exod. xx. 24. Whoever compares theſe words with the command of building the brazen altar, might be apt to think, that the Iſraelites were left at their liberty to offer up their ſacrifices either upon one or the other, as they liked beſt; and yet we find a ſevere prohibition againſt ſacrificing any where but at this latter, and in the court of the tabernacle. To reconcile this ſeeming contrariety, ſome have conjectured, that this brazen altar was filled with earth and rough ſtones; but there is not the leaſt ground for ſuch a ſuppoſition. We paſs by ſeveral others, equally crude, in order to arrive at the moſt rational. There ſeems indeed a manifeſt difference between the laws relating to thoſe two altars; that of the one, viz. the brazen, confined it to the ceremonial part, in which the prieſts alone were allowed to officiate; whereas the other related properly to extraordinary caſes, when ſome holy perſons were commanded by God to offer ſome kind of ſacrifices, without any regard to the tribes they were of; upon all which occaſions, they were obliged to rear ſuch a plain altar, as is above-mentioned.

The only objection that can be ſtarted againſt this ſolution, is, that the words, thou ſhalt build me an altar of earth —— in every place where I record my name, &c. ſeem rather to imply a fixed, than ſuch an occaſional altar. But the Chaldee paraphraſt has given us a truer ſenſe of theſe words, as all, who underſtand the original, will readily confeſs; which is this. In every place where I cauſe, or command my name to be recorded, or celebrated, &c. the meaning of which is plainly this, by comparing both places together: It ſhall not be lawful for you to offer your ſacrifices whereſoever your fancy may lead you, but only at the court of my tabernacle: Nevertheleſs, when I cauſe my name to be celebrated upon any particular occaſion, in what place ſoever I command my ſervants to ſacrifice unto me, they ſhall there rear me an altar of earth, &c. and there I will meet and bleſs them; but this ſhall not be done without an expreſs command from me. This natural interpretation was not only verified by the ſequel, as appears from all the inſtances we have of theſe extraordinary ſacrifices, but it likewiſe accounts for the reaſon of God's chuſing a plain and artleſs altar upon all ſuch occaſions; about which, both Jews and Chriſtians have racked their inventions to very little purpoſe. For had theſe altars been more elaborate, and laſting, the Iſraelites, who had too much propenſity to ſuperſtition, would, in all probability, have been induced to aſcribe ſome uncommon ſanctity to them, contrary to God's expreſs prohibition; whereas their being rear'd up, juſt to ſerve the preſent emergency, and then being immediately pulled down, or falling of themſelves, could not adminiſter any ſuch temptation.

To theſe appendages of the tabernacle, we might add a multitude of other furniture ſubſervient to various uſes; ſuch as kettles, pans, ovens, ſhovels, tongs, pickaxes, hatchets, cleavers, knives, forks, trays, diſhes, and many more; all of which were either made of braſs, or of wood cover'd with that metal: But it is ſufficient to have named the moſt conſiderable of them. We ſhall only add, that the charge of all theſe was committed, the moſt ſacred to the prieſts, and the reſt to the Levites; whoſe province it was to pack and cover them up with proper cloths and skins, made for that purpoſe, whenever they remov'd. It is obſervable, however, that in all this account we find no mention made of any pavement, or flooring, ſo much as for the tabernacle; and yet 'tis hardly credible, that its rich and ſacred utenſils ſhould ſtand on the bare ground. We may therefore ſuppoſe, that Moſes has given a compendious account of all that was tranſacted before the erection of the tabernacle. And if we conſider their vaſt number and variety, the richneſs and curious workmanſhip of a great part of them, and the ſhort time in which the whole was compleated, and which was little more than five months, we ſhall have reaſon to be ſurpriſed at the expedition with which they were diſpatched, unleſs we ſuppoſe a vaſt number of hands were employed on this occaſion. But this need not hinder us from imagining, that Moſes might add many others, as he ſaw needful, in proceſs of time, among which this flooring might be one.

CHAP. XXVI.

1 The ten curtains of the tabernacle. 7 The eleven curtains of goats hair. 14 The covering of rams skins. 15 The boards of the tabernacle with their ſockets and bars. 31 The veil for the ark. 36 The hanging for the door.

MOreover, thou ſhalt make the tabernacle with ten curtains of fine twined linnen, and blue, and purple, and ſcarlet: with cherubims of cunning work ſhalt thou make them.

2 The length of one curtain ſhall be eight and twenty cubits, and the breadth of one curtain four cubits: and every one of the curtains ſhall have one meaſure.

3 The five curtains ſhall be coupled together one to another: and other five curtains ſhall be coupled one to another.

4 And thou ſhalt make loops of blue upon the edge of the one curtain, from the ſelvedge in the coupling: and likewiſe ſhalt thou make in the uttermoſt edge of another curtain, in the coupling of the ſecond.

5 Fifty loops ſhalt thou make in the one curtain, and fifty loops ſhalt thou make in the edge of the curtain that is in the coupling of the ſecond; that the loops may take hold one of another.

6 And

6 And thou ſhalt make fifty taches of gold, and couple the curtains together with the taches: and it ſhall be one tabernacle.

7 ¶ And thou ſhalt make curtains of goats hair to be a covering upon the tabernacle: eleven curtains ſhalt thou make.

8 The length of one curtain ſhall be thirty cubits, and the breadth of one curtain, four cubits: and the eleven curtains ſhall be all of one meaſure.

9 And thou ſhalt couple five curtains by themſelves, and ſix curtains by themſelves, and ſhalt double the ſixth curtain in the forefront of the tabernacle.

10 And thou ſhalt make fifty loops on the edge of the one curtain that is outmoſt in the coupling, and fifty loops in the edge of the curtain which coupleth the ſecond.

11 And thou ſhalt make fifty taches of braſs, and put the taches into the loops, and couple the tent together that it may be one.

12 And the remnant that remaineth of the curtains of the tent, the half-curtain that remaineth, ſhall hang over the back-ſide of the tabernacle.

13 And a cubit on the one ſide, and a cubit on the other ſide of that which remaineth in the length of the curtains of the tent, it ſhall hang over the ſides of the tabernacle, on this ſide, and on that ſide, to cover it.

14 And thou ſhalt make a covering for the tent, of rams skins died red, and a covering above of badgers skins.

15 ¶ And thou ſhalt make boards for the tabernacle, of ſhittim-wood, ſtanding up.

16 Ten cubits ſhall be the length of a board, and a cubit and a half ſhall be the breadth of one board.

17 Two tenons ſhall there be in one board, ſet in order one againſt another: thus ſhalt thou make for all the boards of the tabernacle.

18 And thou ſhalt make the boards for the tabernacle, twenty boards on the ſouth-ſide, ſouthward.

19 And thou ſhalt make forty ſockets of ſilver under the twenty boards: two ſockets under one board for his two tenons, and two ſockets under another board for his two tenons.

20 And for the ſecond ſide of the tabernacle on the north-ſide, there ſhall be twenty boards.

21 And their forty ſockets of ſilver, two ſockets under one board, and two ſockets under another board.

22 And for the ſides of the tabernacle weſtward, thou ſhalt make ſix boards.

23 And two boards ſhalt thou make for the corners of the tabernacle, in the two ſides.

24 And they ſhall be coupled together beneath, and they ſhall be coupled together above the head of it unto one ring: thus ſhall it be for them both; they ſhall be for the two corners.

25 And they ſhall be eight boards, and their ſockets of ſilver, ſixteen ſockets: two ſockets under one board, and two ſockets under another board.

26 ¶ And thou ſhalt make bars of ſhittim-wood: five for the boards of the one ſide of the tabernacle.

27 And five bars for the boards of the other ſide of the tabernacle, and five bars for the boards of the ſide of the tabernacle for the two ſides weſtward.

28 And the middle bar in the mids of the boards ſhall reach from end to end.

29 And thou ſhalt overlay the boards with gold, and make their rings of gold for places for the bars: and thou ſhalt overlay the bars with gold.

30 And thou ſhalt rear up the tabernacle according to the faſhion thereof, which was ſhewed thee in the mount.

31 ¶ And thou ſhalt make a veil of blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine twined linnen of cunning work: with cherubims ſhall it be made.

32 And thou ſhalt hang it upon four pillars of ſhittim-wood, overlaid with gold: their hooks ſhall be of gold, upon the four ſockets of ſilver.

33 ¶ And thou ſhalt hang up the veil under the taches, that thou mayeſt bring in thither within the veil, the ark of the teſtimony: and the veil ſhall divide unto you between the holy place and the moſt holy.

34 And thou ſhalt put the mercy-ſeat upon the ark of the teſtimony, in the moſt holy place.

35 And thou ſhalt ſet the table without the veil, and the candleſtick over-againſt the table on the ſide of the tabernacle toward the ſouth: and thou ſhalt put the table on the north ſide.

36 And thou ſhalt make an hanging for the door of the tent, of blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine twined linnen, wrought with needle-work.

37 And

37 And thou ſhalt make for the hanging, five pillars of ſhittim-wood, and overlay them with gold, and their hooks ſhall be of gold: and thou ſhalt caſt five ſockets of braſs for them.

God gives directions, in this chapter, for making the ten curtains of the tabernacle; the eleven curtains of goats hair; the covering of rams-skins; the boards of the tabernacle, with their ſockets, and bars; the veil for the ark, and the hanging for the door: All which particulars having been ſufficiently deſcribed in the preceding diſſertation, any additional account of them is altogether unneceſſary in this place.

CHAP. XXVII.

1 The altar of burnt-offering, with the veſſels thereof. 9 The court of the tabernacle incloſed with hangings and pillars. 18 the meaſure of the court. 20 The oil for the lamp.

AND thou ſhalt make an altar of ſhittim-wood, five cubits long, and five cubits broad: the altar ſhall be four-ſquare, and the height thereof ſhall be three cubits.

2 And thou ſhalt make the horns of it upon the four corners thereof: his horns ſhall be of the ſame: and thou ſhalt overlay it with braſs.

3 And thou ſhalt make his pans to receive his aſhes, and his ſhovels, and his baſons, and his fleſh-hooks, and his fire-pans: all the veſſels thereof thou ſhalt make of braſs.

4 And thou ſhalt make for it a grate of net-work of braſs; and upon the net ſhalt thou make four braſen rings in the four corners thereof.

5 And thou ſhalt put it under the compaſs of the altar beneath, that the net may be even to the midſt of the altar.

6 And thou ſhalt make ſtaves for the altar, ſtaves of ſhittim-wood, and overlay them with braſs.

7 And the ſtaves ſhall be put into the rings, and the ſtaves ſhall be upon the two ſides of the altar to bear it.

8 Hollow with boards ſhalt thou make it: as it was ſhewed thee in the mount, ſo ſhall they make it.

9 ¶ And thou ſhalt make the court of the tabernacle for the ſouth-ſide, ſouthward: there ſhall be hangings for the court of fine twined linen of an hundred cubits long for one ſide.

10 And the twenty pillars thereof, and their twenty ſockets ſhall be of braſs: the hooks of the pillars and their fillets, ſhall be of ſilver.

11 And likewiſe for the north-ſide in length, there ſhall be hangings of an hundred cubits long, and his twenty pillars, and their twenty ſockets of braſs: the hooks of the pillars, and their fillets of ſilver.

12 ¶ And for the breadth of the court, on the weſt-ſide, ſhall be hangings of fifty cubits: their pillars ten, and their ſockets ten.

13 And the breadth of the court on the eaſt-ſide, eaſtward, ſhall be fifty cubits.

14 The hangings of one ſide of the gate ſhall be fifteen cubits: their pillars three, and their ſockets three.

15 And on the other ſide ſhall be hangings, fifteen cubits: their pillers three, and their ſockets three.

16 ¶ And for the gate of the court, ſhall be an hanging of twenty cubits, of blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine twined linen, wrought with needle-work: and their pillars ſhall be four, and their ſockets four.

17 All the pillars round about the court ſhall be filleted with ſilver: their hooks ſhall be of ſilver, and their ſockets of braſs.

18 ¶ The length of the court ſhall be an hundred cubits, and the breadth fifty every where, and the height five cubits of fine twined linen, and their ſockets of braſs.

19 All the veſſels of the tabernacle in all the ſervice thereof, and all the pins thereof, and all the pins of the court ſhall be of braſs.

20 ¶ And thou ſhalt command the children of Iſrael, that they bring thee pure oil-olive beaten, for the light, to cauſe the lamp to burn always.

21 In the tabernacle of the congregation without the veil, which is before the teſtimony, Aaron and his ſons ſhall order it from evening to morning before the LORD: it ſhall be a ſtatute for ever unto their generations, on the behalf of the children of Iſrael.

This chapter contains the particular directions which the deity communicated to Moſes, for the conſtruction of the altar of burnt-offering, with the veſſels that were to be appropriated to it. God likewiſe inſtructs him in what manner he intended the court of the tabernacle ſhould be incloſed with hangings, and pillars. The dimenſions of the court are likewiſe aſſigned, together with the particular ſpecies of oil for the lamp. Each of theſe articles has likewiſe been fully conſidered and illuſtrated in the foregoing diſſertation.

CHAP. XXVIII.

1 Aaron and his ſons are ſet apart for the prieſts office. 2 Holy garments are appointed. 6 The ephod. 15 The breaſt-plate with twelve precious ſtones. 30 The Urim and Thummim. 31 The robe of the ephod, with pomgranates and bells. 36 The plate of the mitre. 39 The embroidered coat. 40 The garments for Aarons ſons.

AND take thou unto thee Aaron thy brother, and his ſons with him, from among the children of Iſrael, that he may miniſter unto me in the prieſts office, even Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, Aarons ſons.

2 And thou ſhalt make holy garments for Aaron thy brother, for glory and for beauty.

3 And thou ſhalt ſpeak unto all that are wiſe-hearted, whom I have filled with the ſpirit of wiſdom, that they may make Aarons garments to conſecrate him, that he may miniſter unto me in the prieſts office.

4 And theſe are the garments which they ſhall make; a breaſt-plate, and an ephod, and a robe, and a broidered coat, a mitre, and a girdle: and they ſhall make holy garments for Aaron thy brother, and his ſons, that he may miniſter unto me in the prieſts office.

5 And they ſhall take gold, and blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine linen.

6 ¶ And they ſhall make the ephod of gold, of blue, and of purple, of ſcarlet, and fine twined linen, with cunning work.

7 It ſhall have the two ſhoulder-pieces thereof joyned at the two edges thereof; and ſo it ſhall be joyned together.

8 And the curious girdle of the ephod which is upon it, ſhall be of the ſame, according to the work thereof; even of gold, of blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine twined linen.

9 And thou ſhalt take two onyx-ſtones, and grave on them the names of the children of Iſrael.

10 Six of their names on one ſtone, and the other ſix names of the reſt on the other ſtone, according to their birth.

11 With the work of an engraver in ſtone, like the engravings of a ſignet, ſhalt thou engrave the two ſtones, with the names of the children of Iſrael: thou ſhalt make them to be ſet in ouches of gold.

12 And thou ſhalt put the two ſtones upon the ſhoulders of the ephod, for ſtones of memorial unto the children of Iſrael. And Aaron ſhall bear their names before the LORD, upon his two ſhoulders for a memorial.

13 ¶ And thou ſhalt make ouches of gold;

14 And two chains of pure gold at the ends: of wreathen work ſhalt thou make them, and faſten the wreathen chains to the ouches.

15 ¶ And thou ſhalt make the breaſt-plate of judgment, with cunning work after the work of the ephod thou ſhalt make it; of gold, of blue, and of purple, and of ſcarlet, and of fine twined linen ſhalt thou make it.

16 Four-ſquare it ſhall be being doubled; a ſpan ſhall be the length thereof, and a ſpan ſhall be the breadth thereof.

17 And thou ſhalt ſet in it ſettings of ſtones, even four rows of ſtones: the firſt row ſhall be a ſardius, a topaz and a carbuncle: this ſhall be the firſt row.

18 And the ſecond row ſhall be an emerald, a ſapphire, and a diamond.

19 And the third row a ligure, an agate, and an amethyſt.

20 And the fourth row a beryl, and an onyx, and a jaſper: they ſhall be ſet in gold in their encloſings.

21 And the ſtones ſhall be with the names of the children of Iſrael, twelve, according to their names; like the engravings of a ſignet, every one with his name they ſhall be, according to the twelve tribes.

22 ¶ And thou ſhalt make upon the breaſt-plate chains at the ends, of wreathen work, of pure gold.

23 And thou ſhalt make upon the breaſt-plate two rings of gold, and ſhalt put the two rings on the two ends of the breaſt-plate.

24 And thou ſhalt put the two wreathen chains of gold in the two rings which are on the ends of the breaſt-plate.

25 And the other two ends of the two wreathen chains thou ſhalt faſten in the two ouches, and put them on the ſhoulder-pieces of the ephod before it.

26 ¶ And thou ſhalt make two rings of gold, and thou ſhalt put them upon the two ends of the breaſt-plate, in the border thereof, which is in the ſide of the ephod inward.

27 And two other rings of gold thou ſhalt make, and ſhalt put them on the two ſides of the ephod, underneath towards the fore-part thereof, over againſt the other coupling thereof, above the curious girdle of the ephod.

28 And they ſhall bind the breaſt-plate by the rings thereof, unto the rings of the ephod, with a lace of blue, that it may be above the curious girdle of the ephod, and that the breaſt-plate be not looſed from the ephod.

29 And Aaron ſhall bear the names of the children of Iſrael in the breaſt-plate of judgment, upon his heart when he goeth in unto the holy place, for a memorial before the LORD continually.

30 ¶ And

30 ¶ And thou ſhalt put in the breaſt-plate of judgment the Urim and the Thummim; and they ſhall be upon Aarons heart, when he goeth in before the LORD: and Aaron ſhall bear the judgment of the children of Iſrael upon his heart, before the LORD continually.

31 ¶ And thou ſhalt make the robe of the ephod all of blue.

32 And there ſhall be an hole in the top of it, in the mids thereof: it ſhall have a binding of woven work, round about the hole of it, as it were the hole of an habergeon, that it be not rent.

33 ¶ And beneath upon the hem of it thou ſhalt make pomegranates of blue, and of purple, and of ſcarlet round about the hem thereof; and bells of gold between them round about.

34 A golden bell and a pomegranate, a golden bell and a pomegranate, upon the hem of the robe round about.

35 And it ſhall be upon Aaron, to miniſter: and his ſound ſhall be heard when he goeth in unto the holy place before the LORD, and when he cometh out; that he die not.

36 ¶ And thou ſhalt make a plate of pure gold, and grave upon it, like the engravings of a ſignet, HOLINESS TO THE LORD.

37 And thou ſhalt put it on a blue lace, that it may be upon the mitre: upon the forefront of the mitre it ſhall be.

38 And it ſhall be upon Aarons forehead, that Aaron may bear the iniquity of the holy things, which the children of Iſrael ſhall hallow in all their holy gifts: and it ſhall be always upon his forehead, that they may be accepted before the LORD.

39 ¶ And thou ſhalt embroider the coat of fine linen, and thou ſhalt make the mitre of fine linen, and thou ſhalt make the girdle of needle-work.

40 ¶ And for Aarons ſons thou ſhalt make coats, and thou ſhalt make for them girdles, and bonnets ſhalt thou make for them, for glory and for beauty.

41 And thou ſhalt put them upon Aaron thy brother, and his ſons with him: and ſhalt anoint them, and conſecrate them, and ſanctify them, that they may miniſter unto me in the prieſts office.

42 And thou ſhalt make them linen breeches to cover their nakedneſs: from the loins even unto the thighs they ſhall reach.

43 And they ſhall be upon Aaron, and upon his ſons, when they come in unto the tabernacle of the congregation, or when they come near unto the altar to miniſter in the holy place; that they bear not iniquity, and die. It ſhall be a ſtatute for ever unto him, and his ſeed after him.

Ver. 1. And take thou unto thee, Aaron thy brother, and his ſons with him, from among the children of Iſrael, that he may miniſter unto me in the prieſts office, even Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, Aaron's ſons.] Aaron and his ſons are here appointed to execute the ſacerdotal office, and afterwards the whole tribe of Levi were conſecrated to God, in conſequence of a remarkable act of zeal, which they performed. [chap. xxxii. 26, &c.] And at laſt [Numb. i. 51. and in many other places] it was made capital for any, but them, to officiate at the tabernacle.

The tribe of Levi conſiſted of three main branches, diſtinguiſhed by their principal heads; namely, Gerſhon, Kohath, and Merari. But the prieſthood was given ſolely to the family of Aaron, which was no more than a ſmall branch of that of Kohath, whilſt all the reſt of it, even the ſons of Moſes himſelf, as well as the two other branches, remained in the common rank of Levites, and were only admitted to the interior functions of the miniſtry, whether of the tabernacle, or, afterwards, of the temple, ſo that theſe were always ſubject to, and dependent on the prieſts, as will appear by the ſequel of this work.

Moſes acquaints us, in another place, that God ſelected the Levites inſtead of the firſt-born of Iſrael, to be his own tribe; and it is remarkable, that when the ſums of both were taken, and the number of the latter exceeded that of the former, he commanded that the overplus ſhould be redeemed at the price of five ſhekels, per head, and the price to be given to Aaron, and his ſons. So that it is evident, that here was an actual ſubſtitution, or exchange of the Levitical tribe, in lieu of the firſt-born, which God had claimed to himſelf, for his having ſpared thoſe of Iſrael, when he deſtroyed the firſt-born of Egypt; and a ſuperiority given to the family of Aaron, over all the reſt of that tribe, both as to office and dignity, as will be ſhewn in the proper place.

Ver. 2. And thou ſhalt make holy garments for Aaron thy brother, for glory and for beauty.] As to the ſacerdotal veſtments of Aaron, we ſhall collect thoſe remarks which ſeem moſt important to us, into the following diſſertation.

Theſe veſtments were preſcribed by God himſelf, and conſiſted of every material that could render them truly rich, ſumptuous and venerable; ſuch as a great variety of precious ſtones, gold, ſilver, purple, ſcarlet, the fineſt of ſilk, linen, and the like; but as to the faſhion of them, all that hath been advanced about it, tho' with ever ſo poſitive an air, is meer conjecture; becauſe Moſes ha's contented himſelf with giving us the names of them, without any further deſcription, as altogether needleſs. Joſephus has indeed been more particular in this reſpect; but all we can depend upon him for, is, that he has deſcribed them as they were worn in his time: And how far the faſhion of them might have altered, during ſo long a ſpace, and ſuch a variety of circumſtances, which the Jewiſh common-wealth went thro', is not eaſy to gueſs. The Rabbies have deſcribed them extremely different from him; and St. Jerom repreſents ſome of them differently from thoſe two. So that we may truly ſay, that thoſe moderns, who have lately given us ſuch lively delineations of them, both in writing, and in various prints, have rather furniſhed the world with new models, for maſquerading habits, than acquainted us with any thing either certain, or, indeed, material: This caution being premiſed, we ſhall now endeavour to give our readers the beſt account we can of them, with any tolerable certainty, and refer the reader to Joſephus, and thoſe modern authors, who have treated more fully of them.

They were of two ſorts, the one made of linen, and common to Aaron, and all the other prieſts; and if there was any difference between them, it was in the former, being made of finer linen, and woven in a richer manner, they being the only habit that he is ſuppoſed to have worn when when he went into the holy of holies. Only one would be apt to think, that theſe were made of finer linen; becauſe they are called by another name, namely, Sheſh, which is thought to be a fine Egyptian ſort, whereas that which is called Bad, is more common. Theſe were the mitre, or turban, long robe, or veſt, his drawers, and his girdle. The others, which were peculiar to him, and which he was to wear upon all ſolemn days, and occaſions were ſo rich and magnificent, that the Jews called them Bagde Zahab, veſtures of gold, to expreſs the richneſs of them; and Moſes ſtiles them the glory and ornament of Aaron. The firſt was a blue, or purple robe, which he put on over his linen veſt. But we have no great certainty, with reſpect to theſe colours, eſpecially the blue. The Greek, and old verſions, render the word Tekeleth, by Hyacinth; but as there is a ſtone of that name, which is of a yellow, and a flower of a light blue, or purpliſh colour, it is not eaſy to know to which of theſe the interpreters alluded. The old Flemiſh verſion, among ſome others, renders it, yellow ſilk; but as that colour, when mixed with ſcarlet and purple, is too glaring, eſpecially where there is ſo great a mixture of gold, the generality of interpreters think it to be the colour of the flower ſo called. As for the Argaman, which we tranſlate purple, it is moſt likely to have been made of the blood of a ſhell-fiſh of that name, which was caught upon the coaſts of Paleſtine, and for which the Tyrians came to be ſo famous. Some Jewiſh etymologiſts make Argaman to be a kind of adjective, of the word Regem, which, according to them, ſignifies a prince, or royal perſon; for which reaſon, they chuſe to tranſlate it a princely colour, ſuch as the kings wore themſelves, and cloathed their greateſt favourites with. Thus Daniel was cloathed in purple, by Belſhazar, Dan. v. 9. and Chriſt with a robe of mockery of the ſame tincture, John xix. 5. Neither are we much more certain with relation to the Hebrew words Bad, Sheſh, Piſhtah, and Buzz, whence the byſſus; that is, whether they all ſignify linen made of flax, or hemp, differing only in degrees of fineneſs, or weaving; or whether the Sheſh was not, either a kind of cotton, or ſilk. There is no reaſon to doubt but theſe were both uſed and eſteemed at that time; and as the prieſtly robes were to be made of the moſt coſtly materials, it is not improbable, but theſe went into the compoſition, under one of the three firſt names. As to the Buzz, by which interpreters commonly underſtand the fineſt of Egyptian linen; it is moſt likely to have been a ſilk made of the tail of a fiſh. But this laſt is not to be met with in the Moſaic writings. It is, however, probable, that the Sheſh was a kind of fine cotton; and as for what the Jews ſay, that there could be no linen thread mixed in theſe veſtments, becauſe it was contrary to the law, which forbids all ſuch intermixtures; it is probable, as Cunæus obſerves, that it related only to ſtuffs, made for common wear, or uſe, and to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe that were for ſacred purpoſes, ſuch as the curtains, &c. of the tabernacle, and the robes of the high-prieſt, which were made of every material that was ſplendid and coſtly. This garment had no ſleeves, nor any ſeam, according to Joſephus, being woven, like that of our Saviour's, from top to bottom, with an opening for the head. The border of it, which reached almoſt to the ankles of the high-prieſt, was ornamented with a rich fringe, to which were interchangeably hung little bells, and pomgranates, curiouſly wrought, in pure gold, at equal diſtances one from another; that, by their tinkling, his approach might be the more eaſily diſtinguiſhed. This veſt was ty'd round with a rich girdle, which went twice round his body, and hung down a convenient length before him.

Over this veſt, was a third, called an ephod, curiouſly wrought with gold, and other variegated embroidery, not unlike a ſhort coat, about two foot in length. On the top of it, on each ſide, were two ſhoulder-pieces, to which were faſtened two precious ſtones, ſet in gold, on which were engraven the names of the twelve tribes, ſix upon each ſtone, that the high-prieſt might have always before his eyes, thoſe who were committed to his paſtoral care. Upon the breaſt of it, was a vacancy of about half a cubit in length, and proportionable in breadth, on which the breaſt-plate was to be faſtened. This was a folded piece, of the ſame rich embroidered tiſſue, on which were faſtened twelve precious ſtones, ſet in gold, on each of which, was engravened the name of one of the tribes. Theſe were ſet in four rows, each of which contained three precious ſtones, and the whole was faſtened at the four corners; thoſe on the top, to each ſhoulder-piece, by a golden hook, or ring, at the end of a wreathen chain; and thoſe below, to the girdle of the ephod, by two blue ſtrings, or ribbons, which had likewiſe two rings and hooks, ſo that the whole might be tyed faſt to the garment, beyond the danger of falling off; for theſe were never ſever'd. And the Jews tell us, that if the high-prieſt did at any time, either through inadvertency, or wilful neglect, put on the one, without the other, he was to be puniſhed for that omiſſion. This ornament, therefore, is called the memorial, becauſe it was to remind him, how dear thoſe tribes ought to be to him, whoſe names he wore upon his breaſt. It is alſo called the breaſt-plate of judgment, becauſe it had the divine oracle faſtened to it; at leaſt, the far greater part of interpreters have underſtood the command of God to Moſes, to fix the urim and thummim to the breaſt-plate, as if it implied them to be diſtinct from it: And this has occaſioned a variety of notions, as will appear in the proper place.

We have already obſerved, that the twelve precious ſtones were diſpoſed into four rows, each contained three of thoſe gems; and it will be proper to add, for the better illuſtration of this ſubject, that the jewels were ſeparated from one another by little partitions of gold, into which they were inſerted, and diſpoſed in the following order; to which we have added their Hebrew names, together with the tribe that was engraven on each of them.

1. Odem.	Sardius. Reuben.	2. Phiterah.	Topas. Simeon.	3. Barketh.	Carbuncle. Levi.
4. Nophek.	Emrald. Judah.	5. Saphir.	Saphire. Dan.	6. Jahalom.	Diamond. Naphtali.
7. Leſhem.	Ligure. Gad.	8. Shebo.	Agate. Aſher.	9. Achlamah.	Amethyſt. Iſſachar.
10. Tarſhil.	Beryl. Zebulon.	11. Shohem.	Onyx. Joſeph.	12. Yaſhphe.	Jaſper. Benjamin.

Some of theſe ſtones, it muſt be owned, are of ſo hard a nature, eſpecially the diamond, that one may juſtly queſtion how the art of engraving on them was ſo ſoon acquired? But here the Talmudiſts wonderfully help us out, by aſſuring us, that they were not engraven by any tool, which would have waſted ſome part of the ſtone, but by a miraculous worm, not now in being, which being ſet upon each of theſe ſtones, ſunk it ſelf all along thoſe places which Moſes had chalked to it, and ſo impreſſed the letters into the ſtones, in the ſame manner as we might make impreſſions on ſome bodies of a ſoft and yielding ſubſtance, without taking off any part. They relate, likewiſe, ſeveral other wonders about this worm, and theſe precious ſtones, which we ſhall not trouble our readers with. The Jews, among other particulars, declare, that the names of Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, were engraven, alſo, over the name Reuben, in the firſt ſtone; and, in the laſt, under that of Benjamin, the words Shibtejah; the tribes of the Lord; in order to make up the whole alphabet, ſome letters of which were wanting in the names of the twelve Patriarchs. But this is only to confirm an hypotheſis of their's, that the divine oracle was known by the protuberance, or ſuperior luſtre, of ſuch letters as compoſed the anſwer. But, with reſpect to the Urim and Thummim, we are left ſo much in the dark, that it would require a new oracle, of that nature, to acquaint us with it, becauſe no inſpired writer has given us any intimation concerning it; and thoſe who have ſince wrote their conjectures about it, ſeem to have given ſo great latitude to their imaginations, that one ſhall ſcarce find two or three of them agree in the ſame opinion. Some ancients thought there was a thirteenth ſtone in the breaſt-plate, whoſe extraordinary luſtre and beauty, above the reſt, intimated to the high-prieſt God's approbation or diſlike of the affair enquired about: And tho' St. Auſtin has plainly proved that there was not the leaſt foundation for ſuch a ſupernumerary ſtone; ſome moderns have not ſcrupled to add another, in order to anſwer the two names of Urim and Thummim. An ancient father, who is followed by a great many moderns, thinks, that thoſe two words were either engraven on a plate of gold, or in ſome other manner fixed to the breaſt-plate. And Le Clerc believes, that Urim and and Thummim were the names of two ſpecies of precious ſtones, ſet in a gold chain or collar, and which were hung about the high-prieſt's neck, and came down to his breaſt, probably, as he thinks, in imitation of the Egyptians, whoſe chief magiſtrate wore a gold chain, at the end of which hung the figures of juſtice and truth, engraven on ſome precious ſtones: A modern traveller, in a letter dated from Cairo, tells us, that he ſaw a very ancient Mummy in Egypt, which had a large collar hanging down to his breaſt, with a bird engraven in gold, faſtened to the end of it. Spencer, after Decaſto, believed, that the breaſt-plate had two little golden figures, encloſed in a kind of a purſe, which gave articulate anſwers to the queſtions of the high-prieſt; and for this he quotes St. Jerom and Cedrenus, among the ancients; Cornelius a Lapide, and De Dieu, among the moderns; with ſome Jewiſh writers: But this notion hath been ſo ſeverely anſwered by the learned Pocock, as abſurd and impious, that we believe it has never been embraced by any author ſince. Philo, indeed, ſeems to hint ſomething like it, only with this difference, that he ſays, thoſe two figures, or virtues, namely, manifeſtation and truth, were only embroider'd upon it; and it muſt be own'd, that if there were any ſuch figures, or ſymbols, it is more reaſonable to ſuppoſe them, with him, to have been only embroidered, than, with Spencer, that they were real figures, whether caſt or carved, becauſe this latter ſeems too contrary to the prohibition in the ſecond Commandment.

If it ſhould be objected here, that the cherubims, in the ſanctuary, were as contrary to that prohibition as theſe ſuppoſed figures, we beg leave to obſerve, that there was not the leaſt danger of the former being miſtaken for a ſymbol of the Deity, even by the moſt ſtupid ſpectator; becauſe God is expreſly ſaid, in ſeveral places, to dwell between the cherubims; ſo that they could only look on them as ornaments to the mercy-ſeat, or, at moſt, as ſymbols of thoſe heavenly beings, who continually adore and praiſe the Deity, and fly, with the utmoſt rapidity, to obey his ſacred commands. And this ſeems to be the reaſon of the humble poſture in which they were repreſented, and of their having ſo many wings. We cannot affirm the ſame of the latter, becauſe their delivering the divine oracles in any manner whatever, but more eſpecially by articulate expreſſions, would in all probability have infuſed into the minds of the people, the ſame idolatrous notions, that the reſt of the Heathens entertained concerning their falſe divinities. But we ſee no neceſſity for ſuppoſing any ſuch figures, becauſe Joſephus, who was alſo a prieſt, and may be reaſonably ſuppoſed to have been as well acquainted with this affair, as Philo, has not given us the leaſt intimation of any ſuch figures, but repreſents the oracle as conſiſting in the ſupernatural brightneſs of the twelve ſtones, at the time of enquiring. And as for Spencer, it is plain, that he is too fond of deducing the origin of every thing from Egypt. Sure it is, that whoever conſiders the place, where Moſes mentions the Urim and Thummim, will perhaps be ſurpriſed, that God, who took ſuch particular care, to give him the moſt exact directions for all the other garments, utenſils, &c. ſhould not offer him the leaſt hint, with reſpect to theſe, unleſs we ſuppoſe them to have been ſufficiently known, both to him and to all the people. If therefore we might be permitted to prefer one opinion to all the reſt, it would be that of the judicious Hottinger, who thinks, that when Moſes is commanded to inſert into the breaſt-plate the Urim and Thummim, which words ſignify light and perfection, in the plural, it means only, that he ſhould ſelect the moſt perfect ſet of ſtones, and cauſe them to be poliſhed in ſuch a manner, as to give the moſt conſummate luſtre. And this ſeems moſt agreeable to what Joſephus and Maimonides relate concerning it, except the miraculous radiance which the former attributes to them, in order to account for the oracle. However, we are far from diſapproving of that more ſpiritual notion of the learned Prideaux, who believes, that thoſe two words were choſen, to expreſs the clearneſs and certainty of the oracle, by a particular divine virtue communicated to the breaſt-plate at its conſecration; only we are more inclined to ſuppoſe, that this latter ſenſe was emblematically ſignified by the genuineneſs and brightneſs of the ſtones. At leaſt we find, that the Jews, immediately after their return from the captivity, thought it neceſſary to imitate this breaſt-plate in all its parts, and to call it by the ſame name, tho' they own it had not the oracular virtue of the former. Now it is plain, that ſuch an imitation would have been ridiculous, if not impious, upon any other ſuppoſition, than that they underſtood the words Urim and Thummim to have been deſigned by God, not as abſolutely expreſſive, but as ſymbolical of the light and clearneſs of this oracle.

This divine oracle of Urim and Thummim, which, in the original, ſignifies light and perfection, and the Septuagint and Philo render by the words δήλωσιν and ἀληθείαν, manifeſtation and truth, as having thoſe two diſtinct virtues, was not to be conſulted by private perſons, but only by the judges, whilſt Iſrael was govern'd by them, and afterwards by the kings, or ſuch as were ſent by them, or, according to the Talmudiſts, by the Ab beth din, or the head of the Sanhedrim, and even by the general, in time of war Spencer, indeed, thinks, that the head of the nation alone, and he in his own perſon, was allowed to conſult the Urim, but the contrary ſeems more probable, from David's conſulting the Lord by Abiathar, before he was ſettled upon the throne, 1 Sam. xxiii. 4. xxx. 7, 8. However that be, this ceremony of conſulting by Urim, &c. was not performed without great formality. The high-prieſt alone was the perſon to apply to, he was to be dreſs'd in his pontifical robes, particularly his breaſt-plate, and to go into the holy place, tho' not into the holy of holies, towards which he was only to turn his face, when he enquired of the Lord. Again, he was not to be conſulted upon trivial matters, but upon thoſe of the greateſt moment, ſuch as concerned the public good, and upon any ſudden and unexpected emergency, as the Jews prove from thoſe places of ſcripture, where ſuch counſel was asked. Laſtly, things relating to faith or practice were not to be enquired by the Urim, becauſe they had the old precept, quoted by Iſaiah, to the law and to the prophets, chap. vii. 20.

But how this divine oracle gave its anſwer, whether by the unuſual luſtre of the ſtones in the breaſt-plate, when the anſwer was favourable; and by their dimneſs, in the contrary caſe, as Joſephus, and others after him, have imagined; or, as others think, by virtue of the name Jehovah, written or engraven in or between the double breaſt-plate; or thirdly, by the prominency of the letters engraven upon the 12 ſtones of it, which the high-prieſt, being then inſpired, knew how to range ſo as to give a true anſwer; which opinion is almoſt univerſally received by the Jewiſh rabbies; as for inſtance, they ſay, that when David enquired whether he ſhould go up into any of the cities of Judah, and the Lord anſwer'd, go up, 2 Sam. ii. 1. the Hebrew letters became prominent beyond the reſt; or laſtly, whether God anſwered the high-prieſt, by an articulate ſound, from the mercy-ſeat, where the Cherubims cover'd the ark of the teſtimony, called therefore the oracle; from whence God promiſed, that he would meet and commune with Moſes; or, as the original has it, inſtruct and talk with him; which notion is embraced by the majority of Chriſtians, as being indeed the moſt probable, and conſonant to ſome inſtances in the ſcripture relating to this matter, and eſpecially to that, where the children of Iſrael are blamed for making a peace with the Gibeonites, without conſulting pi Jehovah, the mouth of the Lord, Joſh. ix. 14. Hoſ. iii. 4. All theſe opinions, we ſay, are liable to ſeveral objections, which we ſhall not trouble our readers with, but conclude with the ſaying of a wiſe Jewiſh Rabbi, that he is on the ſafeſt ſide, who ingenuouſly acknowledges his ignorance in this point.

How long the Urim and Thummim continued, is not ſo difficult to decide; the Jews, in general, agree, that it laſted no longer than the tabernacle. It is a maxim with them, that God delivered his oracles, during the ſtanding of it, by Urim and Thummim; by the mouth of his prophets, during the firſt temple; and by the bath-col, from the Babyloniſh captivity, to the deſtruction of the ſecond temple.

Spencer, who has eſpouſed their opinion, has backed it with ſeveral arguments, de congruo, but what weighs more with us, than all his reaſoning, is, that we do not meet with one ſingle inſtance of the Urim being conſulted, from the building of Solomon's temple; on the contrary, we read, that when Hilkiah the high-prieſt found the book of the law in Joſiah's reign; and that good king was not a little perplexed, at the terrible threatnings denounced againſt the tranſgreſſors of it ; he ſent to conſult the propheteſs Huldah about it, 2 Kings, xxiii. which he needed not to have done, had the Urim ſtill ſubſiſted. All that can be objected againſt it, is, that Moſes, in bleſſing the tribe of Levi, prays that the Urim and Thummim may continue with God's holy one ; Deut. xxxiii. 8. but this doth not imply, that it ſhould do ſo, whilſt Levi continued a tribe. Some have urged that paſſage where the prophet threatens the Iſraelites, that they ſhould abide without king, prince, image, ephod, or teraphim ; Hoſ. iii. 4. but it, doth not appear to us, that any of the three laſt have any relation to the Urim and Thummim. As for what Joſephus ſays, that the ſtones of the Urim had loſt their luſtre, but about two hundred years before he wrote ; that is, about one hundred years before Chriſt, we think it not worth confuting ; ſince it is allowed on all hands, that it ceaſed at the Babyloniſh captivity, if not before ; and that it was one of thoſe things, in which the ſecond temple came ſhort of the firſt ; as Ezra and Nehemiah intimate plainly enough, Ezra ii. 63. Jerem. vii. 65.

We ſhall diſmiſs this annotation, with reminding our readers, that the Egyptians had an Oracle, or Teraphim, which they called Truth. This is evident from the teſtimony of ſeveral ancient writers. But as to the queſtion, whether they had it from the Hebrews, or theſe from them, we ſhall refer to what has been ſaid before, in caſes of the like nature.

The laſt garment, peculiar to the high-prieſt, was his mitre or bonnet, and how far it differ'd in faſhion from that of the common prieſts, Moſes has not intimated, neither is it eaſy to gueſs ; tho' their being called by different names, and made at leaſt of different kinds of linnen, inclines one to think, that there was ſome conſiderable difference between them ; if not in ſhape, yet in beauty and richneſs. All that we can gather from Joſephus, St. Jerom, Maimonides, and others, concerning this ornament, is, that it was a kind of cap, not unlike a hemiſphere, which conſequently did not come down lower than the ears, and was wrapped ſeveral times about with a piece of fine cotton, or linnen of a conſiderable length ; and tied behind the head with a blue ribbon or ſtring, to prevent its falling off. Joſephus adds, that the mitre was cover'd with another of fine blue or purple, having a triple crown of gold about it ; and that on the top, juſt in the middle, it had a kind of golden cup turned upwards, reſembling the bud of a plant, which he is there very particular in deſcribing. The Jews further add, that as the crown, or plate of gold, did go but half way round the head, the other, that is, the hinder part, was filled up with artificial flowers, or feſtoons, to the place where it was tied. Both the high-prieſt, and the inferior miniſters, were very careful to tie their bonnets faſt when they officiated, becauſe it was thought a mark of reverence to appear with the head cover'd, and of irreverence and preſumption to be ſeen bareheaded ; according to which notion, the Chaldee paraphraſt renders thoſe places, where the Iſraelites are ſaid to have marched out of Egypt with a high hand, by the word bareheaded, that is, with boldneſs and intrepidity. On the contrary, the greateſt token of reſpect with them was to be barefoot, and this is the reaſon why we find no mention of ſhoes or ſandals among the prieſtly robes, they being all obliged to perform their office barefoot ; and in this they became ſo ſcrupulous, that if they perceived any thing, though but a ſtraw, between their feet and the ground, they were obliged to remove it, or elſe their miniſtry was eſteemed inefficacious. The pontifical mitre, however, was remarkably diſtinguiſhed from the common, by the golden plate, on which were engraven, in Hebrew, the words holineſs to the Lord. This Plate is alſo called, in ſome other places, a crown, and was faſtned to the forepart of the mitre, by two blue ribbons or ſtrings.

Theſe words, HOLINESS TO THE LORD, the Jews tell us, were raiſed by a kind of enamel above the gold, but this ſeems contrary to the meaning of Moſes, who expreſly ſays, that they were to be written like the engraving of a ſignet. However, there is no doubt, but they were deſigned to expreſs the holineſs of the character of the perſon who wrote them ; which was to be ſuch, that the leaſt defilement, though never ſo involuntary, diſqualified him from performing his office, till he had been legally purified from it. Concerning this point, the Jews acquaint us with a particularity, which, tho' not mentioned by Moſes, is well worth inſerting here, as having no ſmall probability. They tell us, out of their Talmud, that on the day of expiation, the high-prieſt being to perform the ſervice of that ſolemn faſt, and it being far from impoſſible, that he might contract ſome impurity, which would unfit him for his office, notwithſtanding all his precautions to the contrary, it was cuſtomary, on the eve of it, to appoint him a vicar to officiate for him, in caſe of ſuch a pollution. This vicar was neither anointed nor conſecrated for the place, tho' his new office obliged him to go into the moſt holy place, inſtead of the high-prieſt.

They add, that aſſoon as the one was cleanſed, he reaſſumed the execution of his office, and the other relinquiſhed it, and returned into the rank of common prieſts, only with this difference, that he had ſome kind of ſuperiority and rule over the reſt ; and if the high-prieſt died before him, he ſucceeded him in that dignity of courſe. Joſephus confirms this, by the inſtance of the high-prieſt Matthias, who having defiled himſelf on the night preceding the expiation, Joſeph the ſon of Eli, a near relation of his, officiated for him. Maimonides calls this vicar, Sagan, and adds, that he had two prieſts to wait upon him, as he himſelf waited on the high-prieſt, with ſome other particulars, which we ſhall not dwell upon, becauſe they appear to be of later inſtitution. However, with reſpect to the high-prieſt, it is plain, that he might be ſullied ſo many unforeſeen ways, and he ran ſuch riſque, if he entered the moſt holy place with any ſuch pollution, that it is more than probable, that there was ſome perſon appointed, by way of precaution, to perform his office, in all ſuch caſes. But who this ſubſtitute was, how, and by whom he was appointed, we dare not affirm ; tho' it is not unprobable, that he might be the head of the other branch, which, as we obſerv'd at firſt, held the next rank to him, and is therefore moſt likely to be the perſon meant in the laſt chapter of Jeremiah, where it is ſaid, that the captain of the guard took Serajah the high-prieſt, and Zephaniah the ſecond prieſt. In this ſenſe likewiſe, it is thought by many of the learned, that Annas and Caiaphas are ſaid by St. Luke to be high-prieſts, in the ſame year ; but concerning the perſon who named him, or the ceremony by which he was qualified for his office, Moſes has left no written direction, any more than about the choice of a ſucceſſor to the pontifical dignity, when the next immediate heir was unfit for it.

CHAP. XXIX.

1 The ſacrifice and ceremonies of conſecrating the prieſts. 38 The continual burnt-offering. 45 Gods promiſe to dwell among the children of Iſrael.

AND this is the thing that thou ſhalt do unto them to hallow them, to miniſter unto me in the prieſts office: Take one young bullock, and two rams without blemiſh.

2 And unleavened bread, and cakes unleavened tempered with oyl, and wafers unleavened anointed with oyl: of wheaten flour ſhalt thou make them.

3 And thou ſhalt put them into one baſket, and bring them in the basket, with the bullock and the two rams.

4 And Aaron and his ſons thou ſhalt bring unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and ſhalt waſh them with water.

5 And thou ſhalt take the garments, and put upon Aaron the coat, and the robe of the ephod, and the ephod, and the breaſtplate,

plate, and gird him with the curious girdle of the ephod.

6 And thou ſhalt put the mitre upon his head, and put the holy crown upon the mitre.

7 Then ſhalt thou take the anointing oyl, and pour it upon his head, and anoint him.

8 And thou ſhalt bring his ſons, and put coats upon them.

9 And thou ſhalt gird them with girdles (Aaron and his ſons) and put the bonnets on them: and the prieſts office ſhall be theirs for a perpetual ſtatute; and thou ſhalt conſecrate Aaron and his ſons.

10 And thou ſhalt cauſe a bullock to be brought before the tabernacle of the congregation: and Aaron and his ſons ſhall put their hands upon the head of the bullock.

11 And thou ſhalt kill the bullock before the LORD, by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

12 And thou ſhalt take of the blood of the bullock, and put it upon the horns of the altar, with thy finger, and pour all the blood beſide the bottom of the altar.

13 And thou ſhalt take all the fat that covereth the inwards, and the caul that is above the liver, and the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, and burn them upon the altar.

14 But the fleſh of the bullock, and his skin, and his dung ſhalt thou burn with fire without the camp: it is a ſin-offering.

15 ¶ Thou ſhalt alſo take one ram, and Aaron and his ſons ſhall put their hands upon the head of the ram.

16 And thou ſhalt ſlay the ram, and thou ſhalt take his blood, and ſprinkle it round about upon the altar.

17 And thou ſhalt cut the ram in pieces, and waſh the inwards of him, and his legs, and put them unto his pieces, and unto his head.

18 And thou ſhalt burn the whole ram upon the altar: it is a burnt-offering unto the LORD: it is a ſweet ſavour, an offering made by fire unto the LORD.

19 ¶ And thou ſhalt take the other ram, and Aaron and his ſons ſhall put their hands upon the head of the ram.

20 Then ſhalt thou kill the ram, and take of his blood, and put it upon the tip of the right ear of Aaron, and upon the tip of the right ear of his ſons, and upon the thumb of their right hand, and upon the great toe of their right foot, and ſprinkle the blood upon the altar round about.

21 And thou ſhalt take of the blood that is upon the altar, and of the anointing oyl, and ſprinkle it upon Aaron, and upon his garments, and upon his ſons, and upon the garments of his ſons with him: and he ſhall be hallowed, and his garments, and his ſons, and his ſons garments with him.

22 Alſo thou ſhalt take of the ram the fat and the rump, and the fat that covereth the inwards, and the caul above the liver, and the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, and the right ſhoulder; for it is a ram of conſecration:

23 And one loaf of bread, and one cake of oyled bread, and one wafer out of the basket of the unleavened bread, that is before the LORD.

24 And thou ſhalt put all in the hands of Aaron, and in the hands of his ſons; and ſhalt wave them for a wave-offering before the LORD.

25 And thou ſhalt receive them of their hands, and burn them upon the altar for a burnt-offering, for a ſweet ſavour before the LORD: it is an offering made by fire unto the LORD.

26 And thou ſhalt take the breaſt of the ram of Aarons conſecrations, and wave it for a wave-offering before the LORD: and it ſhall be thy part.

27 And thou ſhalt ſanctify the breaſt of the wave-offering, and the ſhoulder of the heave-offering, which is waved, and which is heaved up of the ram of the conſecration, even of that which is for Aaron, and of that which is for his ſons.

28 And it ſhall be Aarons and his ſons by a ſtatute for ever, from the children of Iſrael: for it is an heave-offering: and it ſhall be an heave-offering from the children of Iſrael of the ſacrifice of their peace-offerings, even their heave-offering unto the LORD.

29 ¶ And the holy garments of Aaron ſhall be his ſons after him, to be anointed therein, and to be conſecrated in them.

30 And that ſon that is prieſt in his ſtead, ſhall put them on ſeven days, when he cometh into the tabernacle of the congregation to miniſter in the holy place.

31 ¶ And thou ſhalt take the ram of the conſecration, and ſeethe his fleſh in the holy place.

32 And Aaron and his ſons ſhall eat the fleſh of the ram, and the bread that is in the basket, by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

33 And

33 And they ſhall eat thoſe things wherewith the atonement was made, to conſecrate, and to ſanctify them: but a ſtranger ſhall not eat thereof, becauſe they are holy.

34 And if ought of the fleſh of the conſecrations, or of the bread remain unto the morning; then thou ſhalt burn the remainder with fire: it ſhall not be eaten, becauſe it is holy.

35 And thus ſhalt thou do unto Aaron, and to his ſons, according to all things which I have commanded thee: ſeven days ſhalt thou conſecrate them.

36 And thou ſhalt offer every day a bullock for a ſin-offering, for atonement: and thou ſhalt cleanſe the altar, when thou haſt made an atonement for it, and thou ſhalt anoint it to ſanctify it.

37 Seven days thou ſhalt make an atonement for the altar, and ſanctify it: and it ſhall be an altar moſt holy: whatſoever toucheth the altar ſhall be holy.

38 ¶ Now this is that which thou ſhalt offer upon the altar; two lambs of the firſt year, day by day continually.

39 The one lamb thou ſhalt offer in the morning: and the other lamb thou ſhalt offer at even.

40 And with the one lamb a tenth-deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of beaten oyl: and the fourth part of an hin of wine for a drink-offering.

41 And the other lamb thou ſhalt offer at even, and ſhalt do thereto according to the meat-offering of the morning, and according to the drink-offering thereof, for a ſweet ſavour, an offering made by fire unto the LORD.

42 This ſhall be a continual burnt-offering throughout your generations, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, before the LORD: where I will meet you, to ſpeak there unto thee.

43 And there I will meet with the children of Iſrael, and the tabernacle ſhall be ſanctified by my glory.

44 And I will ſanctify the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar: I will ſanctify alſo both Aaron and his ſons, to miniſter to me in the prieſts office.

45 ¶ And I will dwell amongſt the children of Iſrael, and will be their God.

46 And they ſhall know that I am the LORD their God, that brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, that I may dwell amongſt them: I am the LORD their God.

Ver. 1. And this is the thing that thou ſhalt do unto them, to hallow them, to miniſter unto me in the prieſts office, &c.] When God had conſecrated a tabernacle to himſelf, he thought fit likewiſe, to ſet apart prieſts for officiating therein. He made choice of Aaron for chief prieſt, and his ſons for ſubordinate miniſters. And he decreed, the prieſthood ſhould be hereditary in this family. Several authors, in particular Selden, furniſh us with proofs of this ſucceſſion, which was never interrupted but in times of oppreſſion and violence. The prieſthood was likewiſe hereditary in Egypt. It would be in vain to enquire, why God thought fit to perpetuate it in the houſe of Aaron: Many have conjectur'd, that it was for the ſake of his brother Moſes.

We ſhall here relate an inſtance of the ignorance of the Heathens, with reference to the Jewiſh affairs. Juſtin, the abridger of Trogus Pompeius, declares, lib. xxxvi. c. 2. that after the death of Moſes, his ſon Arvas (for ſo he ſtiles Aaron) was created king and prieſt, according to the religion of the Egyptians; and adds, that ever ſince, the regal and ſacerdotal offices have been united among the Jews. Diodorus Siculus is guilty of a different miſtake upon the ſame ſubject; for he maintains, that the Jews conferr'd upon the ſame perſon, the direction of the moral and political laws; that they never had any king among them; but that a prieſt, who was ſuperior to the reſt in virtue and knowledge, govern'd the whole nation.

Moſes himſelf performed the office of prieſt, at the inſtallation of Aaron, and his ſons; but as we are deſirous of avoiding all repetitions as much as poſſible, we ſhall not multiply annotations on the ſeveral verſes of this chapter, which would be altogether needleſs, ſince the following account of this great ceremonial, which we ſhall now preſent to our readers, will render it more intelligible, than it could be, had we purſued the other method; and as it is extracted, in a regular manner, from the ſacred records themſelves, it may be conſidered as a commentary, not only on this chapter, which contains the directions of God to Moſes, for the conſecration of Aaron and his ſons, but likewiſe on the 8th chapter of Leviticus, where Moſes executes his commiſſion, according to the commands recorded in this chapter before us.

Firſt then, Moſes aſſembled all the congregation together, at the door of the tabernacle, Levit. viii. 4. Whether, by this expreſſion, all the congregation, we ſhould here underſtand every individual of the children of Iſrael, as it commonly imports; or whether it means only, in this, as it does in many other places, the elders and magiſtrates; God determined, that the inſtallation of Aaron and his ſons ſhould be made in the preſence of the people, that they might be revered unanimouſly, as miniſters choſen by the Deity himſelf.

Secondly, Moſes waſhed them with water. This ablution muſt be diſtinguiſhed from that which was practiſed in the court, for the prieſts, when they diſcharged their ſacerdotal function. This, of which we now treat, was deſigned for conſecrating them to the prieſtly office. In one caſe, they only waſhed their hands and their feet, becauſe it was only to prepare them for officiating in the tabernacle; but the other was to purify their whole body, they being now to devote their whole life to the ſervice of God, and conſequently to waſh away all the defilements that might render them unfit for ſo holy a vocation. Perhaps our Saviour alluded to this difference, when he ſaid to St. Peter, He that is waſhed needeth not, ſave to waſh his feet, but is clean every whit, John iii. 10.

Thirdly, Moſes inveſted Aaron, and his ſons, with their pontifical habits, and gave Aaron eight ſorts of garments, which we have already conſidered. He likewiſe girded the ſons of the high-prieſt, after having put their coats upon them. The Jews had ſo great an opinion of the virtue of theſe habits, that they ſay, the prieſts who officiated without them, did it with as little efficacy, as any ſtranger, or private perſon among the people, who ſhould have preſumed to lay his hands on the altar. God himſelf gives us a lofty idea of them, in ſtyling them the glory and beauty of Aaron, chap. xxviii. 40.

Fourthly, Moſes took of that ointment, of which he gives us the deſcription, in the xxxth chapter of this book, ver. 23. and poured it upon Aaron's head, and anointed him to ſanctify him. The ſacred hiſtory does not declare, that he poured any on the ſons of this pontiff; but it appears by other places, that they were anointed. The Jews ſay, tho' without producing any authority for it, that it was with different ceremonies. Nothing is leſs rational, than moſt of the opinions they advance upon this occaſion. Selden furniſhes rich collections, for the uſe of ſuch as deſire to be more fully informed in thoſe points.

It is asked, whether the holy oil was poured on Aaron's mitre, or whether he uncover'd himſelf, to receive it on his bare head? The little concern we have for this queſtion, and the little helps we have for anſwering it, hinder us from taking notice of what the interpreters do but gueſs at, for its explanation. It appears, by Pſalm cxxxiii. that this ointment was poured in great abundance upon the whole body of Aaron, and went down to the skirts of his garments.

Fifthly, Moſes ordered Aaron and his ſons, to offer three principal kinds of ſacrifices, which were preſcribed by the law of God. The firſt is called the ſin-offering; the ſecond, the burnt-offering; and the third, the peace-offering. This is not the place to conſider the ſeveral views and ends of theſe ſacrifices. Moſt of the Jews think, that the ſin-offering, was intended to appeaſe the wrath of God; the burnt-offering, to render homage to the creator of this world; and the peace-offering, to acknowledge the bleſſings receiv'd from God, and to beg new benedictions from his divine Majeſty. Theſe different kinds of ſacrifices, were in uſe among the heathens, as biſhop Potter, and ſeveral other learned men have ſhewn.

Moſes, who directed the whole ceremony of the inſtallation of Aaron and his ſons, cauſed all thoſe rites to be obſerved that were practiſed in the ſacrifices. In thoſe that were offered for ſin, calves, ſheep, goats, pidgeons, and doves, were ſacrificed. Aaron and his ſons offered a calf.

The firſt condition required in the victims, was, that they ſhould be without blemiſh, Levit. iv. 3. and this the law commanded, with relation to all the victims preſented to God, who expected, that they ſhould ſhew, by this circumſtance, that they devoted to him nothing, but what was perfect and complete. The Jews have extended the meaning of the law, beyond its juſt bounds; with reſpect to the blemiſhes that render animals unfit for ſacrifice; for whereas, it only points out ten of theſe diſqualifications, or twelve at the moſt, they reckon up a much greater number. Bochart has left nothing to be added on this head; he ſhews, not only the corporal defects of all the victims, but even thoſe of the mind too, if it be lawful to uſe ſuch an expreſſion concerning irrational creatures. As for inſtance, no perſon was allowed to offer furious or untractable animals, and the like. The Gentiles had the ſame ſcruples. They devoted to their gods the beſt and moſt perfect of their flocks and herds. After the perſon, whoſe buſineſs it was, had ſingled out a beaſt, the prieſt examined it with the utmoſt rigour. The imperfections of the body, and thoſe which Bochart calls the defects of the mind, rendered a victim unworthy of being offered to the gods. Herodotus tells us, that in Egypt, particular officers were appointed to inſpect them.

Secondly, The victim was to be brought to the door of the tabernacle, and this was a law which they were obliged conſtantly to put in practice, from the firſt ſtructure of that edifice. Plato likewiſe informs us, that no private perſon was allowed to have any place in his houſe, for the offering of ſacrifices; but that every man ought to repair to the temple, and to refer that part of devotion, to the perſons ſet apart for that purpoſe. Plato, de Legib. Tom. 2. pag. 909

Thirdly, the hand was to be laid on the head of the victim which was to be offer'd. This was practiſed, not only in the ſin-offerings, but alſo in all others. This ceremony had different ſignifications, according to the different ſacrifices in which it was us'd. But when they offer'd a ſacrifice for ſin, it chiefly denoted, that all the crimes for which the victim was immolated, were transferr'd upon the head thereof. From hence it came, that confeſſion preceded the impoſition of hands. When the victim was offer'd for all the people, as in the daily ſacrifice, there were perſons appointed to lay their hands on the head of the beaſt, and when an offering was made for ſeveral, all of them were obliged to lay their hands upon it. There are a great number of paſſages in Scripture alluding to this rite. Herodotus relates, that this formulary was uſed in Egypt, when they made an expiatory ſacrifice: If any evil is to fall upon Egypt in general, or upon any of the inhabitants in particular, let it come upon the head of this victim. lib. 2. p. 115, &c.

Fourthly, After hands had been laid on the victim, the throat of it was to be cut. This was not the particular office of the prieſts and Levites, but it belonged alſo, to thoſe who offer'd the victim, and it was Moſes who officiated at the inſtallation of Aaron and his ſons.

Fifthly, The prieſt was obliged to ſprinkle the points or horns of the altar of burnt-offerings, with the blood of the victim which was ſacrificed. It is thus, Maimonides pretends it was performed, "When the prieſt, ſays he, had "received the blood of the victim in a baſon, he carried "it up to the altar, and having dipped the thumb of his "right hand in it, he ſprinkled one of the horns of the al"tar with it. After which he wiped his finger on the "ſides of the baſon, to prevent any of the blood from "ſticking to it. He then dipped it a ſecond time, and "ſprinkled another horn, and did the ſame to all the "four, beginning at the ſouth-ſide of the altar, &c." It is not ſaid that Moſes did all this, but only that God ordered him to take of the blood of the bullock and put it on the horns of the altar, which he did accordingly, Ver. 12.

Mention is made in the book of Leviticus, chap. iv. 7. ——ii. 25. of a law which imported, that when the high-prieſt offer'd a ſacrifice for his own ſins, he was to take of the blood of the victim, and to ſprinkle therewith the horns of the altar of incenſe, for, it was only at the ſacrifices of private perſons, that the horns of the altar of the burnt-offerings were ſprinkled. It ſeems then, as if Moſes broke this law, ſince he put the blood of the calf, not on the horns of the altar of incenſe, but on thoſe of the altar of burnt-offerings. Upon this occaſion moſt of the interpreters reply unanimouſly, that Aaron and his ſons, for whom Moſes offer'd this ſacrifice, were not as yet inſtalled in the prieſthood, and were only conſidered as ſimple or private perſons, and it is eaſy to obſerve the ſolidity of this opinion. We ought however, to add one more; namely, that this law, related only to the ſacrifices for ſin committed ignorantly; whereas, that we now ſpeak of, was made for all the ſins, both voluntary and involuntary, committed by Aaron and his ſons.

Sixthly, The remainder of the blood was to be poured out at the foot of the altar of burnt-offerings, ver. 16. Levit. viii. 22.

Seventhly, They cauſed the fatteſt parts of the victim to ſmoke upon the altar, namely, that membrane which covers the Inteſtines, and which the Latins call the omentum; in Engliſh, the caul. There was likewiſe conſumed on the altar, at the ſame time, what the text calls, the caul above the liver, or rather, the liver itſelf as Bochart maintains, and the two kidneys; but the commentators are divided upon the queſtion, why this fat ſhould be thus conſumed? Some of them think, becauſe it was an emblem of the greateſt corruption. Others ſay, becauſe the fat was the moſt valuable part of the victim, and ought therefore to be appropriated to the Deity. The defenders of this laſt opinion, ſupport it by many arguments, which it is not neceſſary to produce here. It was decided by the law of God, that all the fat was the Lord's, Levit. iii. 16. That is, all that could be eaſily ſeparated from the fleſh of the victim; for that which was intermixed with it, the Jews eat freely of; the Gentiles alſo devoted the fat to their gods.

The skin, and the fleſh of the victims ſacrificed for ſin, were uſually the perquiſite of the prieſt. Levit. vii. 8, 10, 17. The law of God was poſitive in this particular, and only two caſes were excepted. The one was in the ſacrifices offered for the ſins of the prieſts themſelves; and the other in the ſacrifices offered for the ſins of the whole congregation. The reaſon of this exception is obvious; for in theſe two caſes, the prieſts did as it were diveſt themſelves of their character, and were included in the claſs of thoſe ſinners for whom the ſacrifices were offered, and conſequently were not conſidered as the miniſters of God. But, when they only offer'd for others, they ate the fleſh of the victims, which belonged to the God whom they repreſented. According to this Law, Moſes, who performed the prieſt's office, at the inſtallation of Aaron and his ſons, ought to have had the fleſh of the bullock, which he offer'd for their ſins; and we ſhall ſee by and by, when this Law-giver ſacrificed a ram for them, he retained to himſelf the breaſt, which, in theſe kinds of ſacrifices, belonged to the prieſts. But why was he ordered to burn the fleſh of the bullock, and his skin, and his dung, without the camp? Biſhop Patrick adopts the anſwer of Doctor Jackſon, who ſays, that God intended to make them ſenſible thereby, of the imperfection of the legal œconomy, under which the ſins of the prieſts could not be expiated. Theſe are the principal rites that were to be obſerved in the ſin-offerings, and which Moſes obſerved, in that ſacrifice he made for Aaron and his ſons.

The ſecond offering for Aaron and his ſons, was a ram, which was burnt upon the altar, ver. 15. Moſes made them put their hands likewiſe on the head of this victim; after which, he cut the throat of it, and poured the blood about the altar which was in the court, as was cuſtomary in the burnt offerings: Then he cut it into pieces, and, after having waſhed the entrails, he placed them in order, with the reſt of the parts, upon the altar of burnt offerings, and conſumed them with fire. The Jews ſay, that this arrangement was performed with the utmoſt skill, without which it would not have been acceptable to God: And ſome criticks are of opinion, that the Seventy alluded to this ſcrupulous circumſpection, when they tranſlated the 7th verſe of the 4th chapter of Geneſis, not like our common verſions, and according to the Hebrew text, if thou doſt not well ſin lieth at the door, but if thou doſt not range matters well. There was likewiſe much art uſed by the Heathens, in their manner of dividing the victims, as may be ſeen, if we conſult Bochart's Hierozoic. lib. ii. c. 33. p. 324. It is not ſaid, what Moſes did with the skin of the ram; but it commonly belonged to the prieſt, in the burnt offerings, and conſequently, this fell to the ſhare of Moſes. But he might poſſibly burn it without the camp, as was the cuſtom in the ſacrifices for ſin. The Heathens generally flead their victims, but ſometimes they burn them skin and all.

The third ſacrifice Moſes made for Aaron and his ſons, was what is called the peace offering, verſe 20. On that occaſion he offered a ram alſo; on the head of which they likewiſe laid their hands; and he took ſome of the blood, and mingled it with the holy oil, putting it on the tip of their right ear, on the thumb of their right hand, and on the great toe of their right foot. It was, probably, to inculcate to them, that they ought to be attentive to God's voice, and to apply themſelves, with all diligence, to the functions of their miniſtry. All theſe things, ſays one of the Rabbins, were inſtituted, to make every one of the prieſts ſenſible, that it was his duty, to ſtudy the ſacred law throughly, to imploy his hands in the ſervice of God, and to behave according to his commands. Philo expreſſes himſelf much after the ſame manner. Moſes poured the reſt of the blood about the altar; he ſprinkled Aaron, and his ſons, and their garments therewith, in order to purify them; but the holy penman does not explain one queſtion, which occurs here to the mind, namely, upon what part of the altar this blood was poured, nor how the prieſt could take any of it, to make his ſprinklings after he had poured it out. Fortunatus Scacchus conjectures, and Biſhop Patrick is not averſe to the ſame opinion, that the ceremonies which the Gentiles obſerved in their Taurobolia, or Criobolia, which are the names they gave to their ſacrifices of bulls, and rams, were an imitation of theſe ſprinklings. It was chiefly at the conſecration of their prieſts, that theſe kinds of ſacrifices were offered.

They digged a hole in the ground, and cauſed the perſon who was to be conſecrated, to deſcend into it; they then cover'd it with planks, that were perforated in all parts, after which, they offered a bullock on thoſe planks, in ſuch a manner, that his blood might paſs through all the orifices, and ſprinkle the perſon ſtanding under them, and who was deſtined for the prieſthood. The poet Prudentius thus deſcribes this ſuperſtitious ceremony. Περὶ Στεφάνων, Hymn. x. v. 146.

Hunc, inquinatum talibus contagiis
Tabo recentis ſordidum piaculi,
Omnes ſalutant, atque adorant eminus,
Vilis quod illum ſanguis, & hos mortuus
Fœdis latentem ſub cavernis laverint.

That is to ſay, All the world ſalutes and reverences from afar, a perſon cover'd with the blood of the victim that had been ſacrificed: He is thus honoured, becauſe when he was ſhut up in theſe odious caverns, he was waſhed or ſprinkled with the blood of a bull. The man who was thus purified, was thought regenerated for ever. Gruter gives an account of the following inſcription which he found upon an ancient monument of marble; TAUROBOLIO IN ÆTERNUM RENATUS. Gruter. Corp. Inſcript. Tom. i. p. 28. N. 2. 15. However, this ceremony was renewed every twenty years.

The ſame author gives us likewiſe another inſcription. ITERATO VIGINTI ANNIS EX PERCEPTIS TAUROBOLIIS ARAM CONSTITUIT.

When Moſes had thus poured out the blood of the ram, he took the external fat of it, the tail, the fat which cover'd the entrails, the liver, the two kidneys, and the right ſhoulder. He added a manchet of bread, a cake mixed with oil, and ſome leaven in a basket which was placed upon the altar. He conſigned all theſe things into the hands of Aaron, and his ſons, and they turned or waved them ſeveral ways, in the preſence of the Lord. The Jews make a diſtinction between theſe kinds of motions, and call one ſort, Tenoufah, which ſignifies agitation; and this was made by waving it towards the four corners of the world, to ſhew that the God, to whom they devoted this offering, was Lord of the univerſe. Theſe oblations are ſtiled wave offerings, ver. 26.

They call the ſecond ſort, Theroumah; and theſe were toſſed upwards and downwards, to teſtify, that the men, who are upon the earth, devoted to God the things moved after this ſecond manner. Theſe laſt oblations are called the heave-offerings, ver. 27. It muſt be obſerved likewiſe, that theſe kind of ſacrifices were called, Millaim, that is to ſay, conſecration, becauſe the hands of the perſon who offered them were conſecrated, and from hence comes the expreſſion, of the ram of conſecration. After Moſes had heaved the things which were put into their hands, they returned them to him, and he burnt them on the altar. He alſo took the breaſt of the ram, and this was the only part that was allowed him; for in the 22d verſe of this chapter, the right ſhoulder of the ram is compriſed among the parts or members of the victim, which were burnt upon the altar. Nevertheleſs, ſome interpreters have concluded, from the 26th and 27th verſes, that the ſhoulder and the breaſt, were the ſhare of Moſes, who performed the office of prieſt. 'Tis certain, that if he cauſed the ſhoulder of the ram to be burnt, it was an extraordinary circumſtance; for it was a ſtanding law, in the peace-offerings, that the ſhoulder and breaſt were the property of the prieſt: And this is the meaning of the order given to Moſes, by God, in the twenty-ſixth, twenty-ſeventh, and twenty-eighth verſes of this chapter. And thou ſhalt take the breaſt of the ram of Aarons conſecrations, and wave it for a wave-offering before the Lord: And it ſhall be thy part. And thou ſhalt ſanctify the breaſt of the wave offering, and the ſhoulder of the heave-offering, which is waved, and which is heaved up of the ram of the conſecration, even of that which is for Aaron, and of that which is for his ſons. And it ſhall be Aarons and his ſons by a ſtatute for ever, from the children of Iſrael: for it is a heave-offering, &c.

The right ſhoulder, which Philo calls the token of ſtrength, and the breaſt, which the ſame author calls the token of mercy, were always the perquiſite of the prieſt in the peace-offering. But in that which Moſes offered for Aaron, and his ſons, at their conſecration, they were not eſteemed prieſts as yet; but as laicks, or private perſons: For which reaſon, he gave them the remainder of the ram's fleſh, which they boiled in the court, and ate with the cakes that were left in the basket. And this was a rule in all the peace-offerings; namely, that he who offered, ſhould eat part of the fleſh of the victim, and part of the cakes which he offered. He might eat of them for the ſpace of two days, within the compaſs of the court; but as the ſacrifice of Aaron and his ſons, was more ſolemn than thoſe which were offered upon other occaſions, it was likewiſe attended with this particular circumſtance, that they did not eat of it longer than one day, and they burnt all that was left the ſame day. Finally, this manducation, or eating, which was performed at the peace-offerings, was an eſſential part of the ſacrifice, and it imported, that God admitted thoſe into his communion, who had made thoſe oblations to him. This is the meaning of theſe words in the 33d verſe. And they ſhall eat of thoſe things wherewith with the atonement was made, to conſecrate and to ſanctify them.] This doth not ſignify, that they were to eat of the fleſh of the propitiatory victims, for it was to be burnt with fire, as we have already obſerved; but theſe words may be thus paraphraſed: They ſhall eat of thoſe things, to evince, that God is reconciled to them; or, as ſome criticks underſtand it, they ſhall eat of thoſe things, after the atonement has been made for them at the propitiatory ſacrifice.

The Gentiles had, in ſome meaſure, the ſame notions of their ſacrifices, and the poets feigned, that Prometheus made a law, for the ſake of the poor, that the gods ſhould have but a part of the fleſh of the victims offered to them, and that the remainder ſhould be divided between the prieſts and thoſe for whom the ſacrifices were made. We have ſhewn already, that the fat belonged to the gods; the thigh was likewiſe given to them. Ob honorem hiſce partibus debitum, ſeu membris quæ generationi inſerviebant. The prieſt took his ſhare next, which amounted to about the tenth part of the fleſh of the victim; the reſt was theirs, who offered the ſacrifice; ſometimes they carried it away to their houſes, and at other times, they ſent part to their friends.

Sometimes they ate in the very temple, where there were tables for theſe kind of feaſts; and there it was they committed great exceſſes. The ſaid feaſts were called Θοίνα from Θεὸς, and Οἶνος, becauſe they drank themſelves into inebriation, in honour to the gods, or with the gods; for they reckoned that the gods ſhared in their riots and debauches.

Homer introduces Alcinous, ſpeaking after the following manner, The gods ſhew themſelves to us, when we offer up hecatombs to them; they eat with us, and ſit down at the ſame table. This poet, making mention of a ſolemn feaſt of the Ethiopians, likewiſe ſays, Jupiter came down among them, to aſſiſt at the feaſt they had prepared for him, and was attended by all the gods. Hence it is, that the words, to eat, and to make a feaſt, are uſed ſometimes in the ſame ſenſe, as that which imports to ſacrifice; and 'tis thus we are to underſtand this phraſe, in the prophet Ezekiel, where we find, among the characters of a righteous man, that he hath not eaten upon the mountains, that is to ſay, he did not ſacrifice to the falſe gods. We ſhall conclude this diſſertation with the few following remarks.

Firſt, The conſecration of Aaron and his ſons laſted ſeven days, ver. 35. But it would be difficult to account for the buſineſs of each of thoſe days, and whether all theſe ceremonies, that we have been deſcribing, were repeated every day. It is a common opinion, that none but the ſacrifice for ſin was repeated ſeven times. This ſeems to be the meaning of theſe words, Thus ſhalt thou do unto Aaron, and to his ſons, according to all things which I have commanded thee; ſeven days ſhalt thou conſecrate them, ver. 35.

Secondly, The altar, the veſtments of the prieſts, and all the utenſils devoted to the ſervice, were likewiſe conſecrated, during ſeven days. It is not of any moment to know, whether theſe days were the ſame, as thoſe of the conſecration of Aaron and his ſons. Biſhop Patrick has explain'd the queſtion, but it is asked, what ceremony was obſerv'd in the conſecration of theſe inanimate things? It is evident, they were ſprinkled with the blood of the victim, and with the holy oil. But interpreters diſagree about the ſenſe of theſe words. Thou ſhalt offer every day a bullock for a ſin-offering for atonement: And thou ſhalt cleanſe the altar, when thou haſt made an atonement for it, and thou ſhalt anoint it to ſanctify it, ver. 36. Some interpreters cannot conceive, that an atonement ſhould be made for the altar, and therefore inſtead of reading for, they read upon the altar; but others think, and with more reaſon in our opinion, that the queſtion was not only about conſecrating the altar to the ſervice of God, but to purify or cleanſe it from the defilement it had contracted, by the touch of the workmen who made it. There may be probable reaſons given for each of theſe notions.

Thirdly, God order'd, that the rites which he had juſt then preſcribed for the conſecration of Aaron and his ſons, ſhould be obſerv'd by all their ſucceſſors. The Jews added a great many more, of which Selden gives us the enumeration, in his treatiſe de Succeſſione in Pontif. l. 2. cap. 7.

Fourthly, The conſecration of the Levites was much leſs ſolemn than that of the prieſts. The Levites entered upon the eaſieſt functions of their miniſtry, at twenty-five years of age, and upon the moſt laborious, at thirty; at fifty, they had their Quietus; or, at leaſt, they were then no longer imployed in any of thoſe offices, which required ſtrength and vigour. It is by theſe diſtinctions that we are to reconcile two paſſages in the book of Numbers, which ſeem to contradict each other. In the firſt, it is ſaid, that the Levites began to officiate at thirty years of age; in the other, at twenty-five. The Seventy ſolve this ſeeming contrariety, by reading 25 in both texts, which is unneceſſary. For as the moſt eaſy functions of the Levites were fatiguing, when the tabernacle was tranſported from one place to another, which made it proper for them to be advanced to an age of vigour and activity, and as their ſervice, in proceſs of time, became leſs laborious, David fixed the time of their entering upon their offices, to the age of twenty years, and upwards, 1 Chron. xxii. 27.

Here follows the manner of their conſecration.

Firſt, They were waſhed with that water which is mentioned in the nineteenth chapter of Numbers, ver. 9. and this ablution was the ſame, with that of a man infected with the leproſy, Levit. xiv. 8. or that of a perſon who had touched a dead body, Numb. xix. 12.

Secondly, Their hair was ſhaved like that of the lepers, when they were purified after their recovery: And like that of the Nazarenes, when they had defiled themſelves by touching a dead body, Numb. vi. 18. The Egyptian prieſts likewiſe ſhaved their whole body every third day, leſt any ſort of vermin ſhould be generated on the men who preſided over the worſhip of the gods. Theſe are the words of Herodotus.

Thirdly, The children of Iſrael laid their hands upon the Levites. We ſhall underſtand the deſign of this ceremony, if we recollect the reaſon for which the Levites were ſet apart for divine ſervice. It is repreſented thus in the eighth chapter of Leviticus, ver. 16, 17. They are wholly given unto me (ſaith God himſelf to Moſes) from among the children of Iſrael, inſtead of ſuch as open every womb, even inſtead of the firſt-born of all the children of Iſrael, have I taken them unto me. For all the firſt-born of the children of Iſrael are mine, both man and beaſt; on the day that I ſmote every firſt-born in the land of Egypt, I ſanctified them for myſelf. That is to ſay, That God having a particular right over all the firſt-born of the families of Iſrael, becauſe he had ſpared them, when the deſtroying angel ſmote thoſe of the Egyptians; he therefore accepted the Levites, inſtead of the firſt-born of all the reſt of the Iſraelites. The children of Iſrael teſtified, by the impoſition of their hands upon the Levites, that they ſubſtituted them in their place. But they who thus laid their hands upon them, were not perſons taken out from among the people indifferently; they were not even the elders, nor the magiſtrates, but were, probably, the chief, or firſt of a family. The children of Iſrael, ſays a Rabbin, who laid their hands on the Levites, were, each of them, of the firſt-born of the Iſraelites. And each of thoſe firſt-born laid his hand on the Levite who perſonated him, or took his place. The Gentiles annexed the ſame ideas of ſubſtitution to the victims which they devoted to their gods; and we find a ſingular inſtance to this effect, in the Faſti of Ovid lib. vi. v. 159, &c. Certain birds, which fed upon the fleſh of children, and ſucked their blood, were deſcending upon the young Procas, and juſt ſeizing on him as their prey; the nymph Crane immediately ſacrificed a pig, and holding in her hands the entrails of that victim, expreſſed herſelf in this manner,

—Noctis aves extis puerilibus,
Parcite, pro parvo victima parva cadit.
Cor pro corde precor, pro fibris ſumite fibras,
Hanc animam vobis pro meliore damus.

That is to ſay, Ye birds of the night, ſpare the bowels of this child. We ſubſtitute a tender victim in his ſtead. Accept the heart and the reſt of the entrails for thoſe of the infant. We offer you one life for the preſervation of a better.

The fourth rite which was obſerved at the conſecration of the Levites, was the offering up of ſacrifices, and theſe were of two kinds; the firſt was an offering for the ſins of all thoſe who were conſecrated for the divine ſervice, on which account account they ſacrificed a bullock, which was the victim they uſed to offer, when they were to expiate any crime in which the whole congregation was involv'd. The ſecond, was a burnt offering, at which alſo a bullock was ſacrificed. When all theſe ceremonies were compleated, Moſes offered the Levites as an offering to the Lord, Numb. viii. 13 & 15, 21. the expreſſion in the original is, he waved, and it occurs more than once upon this occaſion. It is the ſame which the ſacred hiſtory uſes to, denote that agitation, or motion, which the prieſt was commanded to to make, of certain parts of the victim which were offered to God. But how could Moſes wave two and twenty thouſand Levites after that manner? The interpreteters are divided about it; ſome pretend, he only waved a few of thoſe miniſters inſtead of the two and twenty thouſand, others ſay, he made them all paſs backwards and forwards before the tabernacle; but it ſeems to us, that one might offer a good explication of this expreſſion, without having recourſe to thoſe ſuppoſitions. The ſame term which is employed, to ſignify a certain external act of religion, is often made uſe of alſo, to denote the internal act, of which the other is only a type, and derives all its efficacy from it. Thus, becauſe ſacrifices repreſent prayers, and that the former are of no validity without the latter; for this very cauſe, we ſay, prayers are called ſacrifices. In like manner, the act of waving the things offered, imported their conſecration to God: and 'tis for this reaſon, probably, that the conſecrating or devoting the Levites to God, is expreſs'd in the original of the ſacred text, by a word that primarily imports waving.

We ſhall conclude this diſſertation with one remark more, namely, that God teſtified, in the ſight of all the people, and after a very ſolemn manner, that he approved of the inſtallation of Aaron. His firſt ſacerdotal functions were confirmed by a miracle. There came a fire out from before the Lord, Lev. ix. 24. and conſumed the fleſh of the victim which Aaron offer'd, immediately after he was conſecrated to the prieſthood. All that the Jews have advanced upon the origin of this fire, is more proper to inform us of the hiſtory of their opinions, then to illuſtrate this queſtion; and 'tis not poſſible to determine, whether it came down from heaven, or out of that cloud, which reſted continually upon the tabernacle. So remarkable a prodigy, which God repeated more than once, was an invincible proof of the divine authority of the Levitical worſhip. It could no longer be objected, that ceremonies approved of heaven, by ſuch extraordinary indications, did not derive their original from the divine inſtitution; nor can it be thought ſurpriſing, that the Gentiles endeavoured to authenticate their worſhip, by the like proofs, and feigned, that their gods ſent down alſo from heaven, a fire which conſumed the victims offered to them.

CHAP. XXX.

1 The altar of incenſe. 11 The ranſom of ſouls. 17 The braſen laver. 22 The holy anointing oil. 34 The compoſition of the perfume.

AND thou ſhalt make an altar to burn incenſe upon: of ſhittim-wood ſhalt thou make it.

2 A cubit ſhall be the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof (four-ſquare ſhall it be) and two cubits ſhall be the height thereof: the horns thereof ſhall be of the ſame.

3 And thou ſhalt overlay it with pure gold, the top thereof, and the ſides thereof round about, and the horns thereof: and thou ſhalt make unto it a crown of gold round about.

4 And two golden rings ſhalt thou make to it under the crown of it, by the two corners thereof, upon the two ſides of it ſhalt thou make it: and they ſhall be for places for the ſtaves to bear it withal.

5 And thou ſhalt make the ſtaves of ſhittim-wood, and overlay them with gold.

6 And thou ſhalt put it before the veil, that is by the ark of the teſtimony; before the mercy-ſeat, that is over the teſtimony, where I will meet with thee.

7 And Aaron ſhall burn thereon ſweet incenſe every morning: when he dreſſeth the lamps, he ſhall burn incenſe upon it.

8 And when Aaron lighteth the lamps at even, he ſhall burn incenſe upon it; a perpetual incenſe before the LORD, throughout your generations.

9 Ye ſhall offer no ſtrange incenſe thereon, nor burnt-ſacrifice, nor meat-offering; neither ſhall ye pour drink-offering thereon.

10 And Aaron ſhall make an atonement upon the horns of it once in a year, with the blood of the ſin-offering of atonements: once in the year ſhall he make atonement upon it, throughout your generations: it is moſt holy unto the LORD.

11 And the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying,

12 When thou takeſt the ſum of the children of Iſrael, after their number; then ſhall they give every man a ranſom for his ſoul unto the LORD, when thou numbreſt them: that there be no plague amongſt them, when thou numbreſt them.

13 This they ſhall give, every one that paſſeth among them that are numbred; half a ſhekel after the ſhekel of the ſanctuary (a ſhekel is twenty gerahs) an half-ſhekel ſhall be the offering of the LORD.

14 Every one that paſſeth among them that are numbred from twenty years old and above, ſhall give an offering unto the LORD.

15 The rich ſhall not give more, and the poor ſhall not give leſs than half a ſhekel, when they give an offering unto the LORD, to make an atonement for your ſouls.

16 And thou ſhalt take the atonement-money of the children of Iſrael, and ſhalt appoint it for the ſervice of the tabernacle of the congregation; that it may be a memorial unto the children of Iſrael before the LORD, to make an atonement for your ſouls.

17 ¶ And

17 ¶ And the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying,

18 Thou ſhalt alſo make a laver of braſs, and his foot alſo of braſs, to waſh withal: and thou ſhalt put it between the tabernacle of the congregation and the altar, and thou ſhalt put water therein.

19 For Aaron and his ſons ſhall waſh their hands and their feet thereat.

20 When they go into the tabernacle of the congregation, they ſhall waſh with water, that they die not: or when they come near to the altar to miniſter, to burn an offering made by fire unto the LORD.

21 So they ſhall waſh their hands and their feet, that they die not: and it ſhall be a ſtatute for ever to them, even to him and to his ſeed throughout their generations.

22 ¶ Moreover the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying,

23 Take thou alſo unto thee principal ſpices, of pure myrrh five hundred ſhekels, and of ſweet cinnamon half ſo much, even two hundred and fifty ſhekels, and of ſweet calamus two hundred and fifty ſhekels,

24 And of caſſia five hundred ſhekels, after the ſhekel of the ſanctuary, and of oyl-olive an hin.

25 And thou ſhalt make it an oyl of holy ointment, an ointment compound after the art of the apothecary: it ſhall be an holy anointing oyl.

26 And thou ſhalt anoint the tabernacle of the congregation therewith, and the ark of the teſtimony.

27 And the table and all his veſſels, and the candleſtick and his veſſels, and the altar of incenſe.

28 And the altar of burnt-offering, with all his veſſels, and the laver and his foot.

29 And thou ſhalt ſanctify them, that they may be moſt holy: whatſoever toucheth them, ſhall be holy.

30 And thou ſhalt anoint Aaron and his ſons, and conſecrate them, that they may miniſter unto me in the prieſts office.

31 And thou ſhalt ſpeak unto the children of Iſrael, ſaying, This ſhall be an holy anointing oyl unto me, throughout your generations.

32 Upon mans fleſh ſhall it not be poured, neither ſhall ye make any other like it, after the compoſition of it: it is holy, and it ſhall be holy unto you.

33 Whoſoever compoundeth any like it, or whoſoever putteth any of it upon a ſtranger, ſhall even be cut off from his people.

34 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Take unto thee ſweet ſpices, ſtacte, and onycha, and galbanum; theſe ſweet ſpices with pure frankincenſe: of each ſhall there be a like weight.

35 And thou ſhalt make it a perfume, a confection, after the art of the apothecary, tempered together, pure and holy.

36 And thou ſhalt beat ſome of it very ſmall, and put of it before the teſtimony in the tabernacle of the congregation, where I will meet with thee: it ſhall be unto you moſt holy.

37 And as for the perfume which thou ſhalt make, you ſhall not make to your ſelves according to the compoſition thereof: it ſhall be unto thee holy for the LORD.

38 Whoſoever ſhall make like unto that to ſmell thereto, ſhall even be cut off from his people.

This chapter contains God's directions to Moſes, with reſpect to the conſtruction of the altar of inceuſe, the braſen laver, and ſeveral other appendages to the tabernacle, which, as they have been already conſider'd at large, in our diſſertation on the form and particularities of that ſacred ſtructure, and its various materials, we think it unneceſſary to trouble the reader with a recapitulation of any remarks, that have been already offer'd, for the illuſtration of that ſubject, in all its branches.

CHAP. XXXI.

1 Bezaleel and Aholiab are called, and made meet for the work of the tabernacle. 12 The obſervation of the ſabbath is again commanded. 18 Moſes receiveth the two tables.

AND the LORD, ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying,

2 See, I have called by name, Bezaleel, the ſon of Uri, the ſon of Hur, of the tribe of Judah:

3 And I have filled him with the ſpirit of God, in wiſdom, and in underſtanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanſhip.

4 To deviſe cunning works, to work in gold, and in ſilver, and in braſs,

5 And in cutting of ſtones to ſet them, and in carving of timber, to work in all manner of workmanſhip.

6 And I, behold, I have given with him, Aholiab the ſon of Ahiſamach of the tribe of Dan: and in the hearts of all that are wiſe-hearted I have put wiſdom; that they may make all that I have commanded thee:

7 The tabernacle of the congregation, and the ark of the teſtimony, and the mercy-ſeat that is thereupon, and all the furniture of the tabernacle.

8 And the table and his furniture, and the pure candleſtick with all his furniture, and the altar of incenſe,

9 And the altar of burnt-offering with all his furniture, and the laver and his foot,

10 And the clothes of ſervice, and the holy garments for Aaron the prieſt, and the garments of his ſons, to miniſter in the prieſts office.

11 And the anointing oyl, and ſweet incenſe for the holy place: according to all that I have commanded thee ſhall they do.

12 ¶ And the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying,

13 Speak thou alſo unto the children of Iſrael, ſaying, Verily my ſabbaths ye ſhall keep: for it is a ſign between me and you throughout your generations; that ye may know that I am the LORD, that doth ſanctify you.

14 Ye ſhall keep the ſabbath therefore: for it is holy unto you. Every one that defileth it, ſhall ſurely be put to death: for whoſoever doth any work therein, that ſoul ſhall be cut off from amongſt his people.

15 Six days may work be done, but in the ſeventh is the ſabbath of reſt, holy to the LORD: whoſoever doth any work in the ſabbath-day, he ſhall ſurely be put to death.

16 Wherefore the children of Iſrael ſhall keep the ſabbath, to obſerve the ſabbath throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant.

17 It is a ſign between me and the children of Iſrael for ever: for in ſix days the LORD made heaven and earth, and on the ſeventh day he reſted, and was refreſhed.

18 ¶ And he gave unto Moſes, when he had made an end of communing with him upon mount Sinai, two tables of teſtimony, tables of ſtones, written with the finger of God.

This Chapter contains an account of God's choice of Bezaleel and Aholiab, for executing the workmanſhip of the materials for the tabernacle. We have already given a ſufficient account of thoſe perſons and their functions, in our deſcription of the tabernacle. The obſervation of the ſabbath, is recommended in the thirteenth verſe of this chapter; which as it is only a recapitulation of the fourth commandment, we refer the reader to what we have already obſerved, with reference to that ſacred day, in our annotations on the eighth verſe of the twentieth chapter of this book, where we have conſidered, at large, the antiquity and importance of this inſtitution. The laſt verſe of this chapter, gives an account of God's delivering the two tables of ſtone, written with the finger of god. A ſufficient explanation of which, has been already offered in our remarks on the 12th verſe of the 24th chapter of this book.

CHAP. XXXII.

1 The people in the abſence of Moſes cauſe Aaron to make a calf. 7 God is angred thereby. 11 At the intreaty of Moſes he is appeaſed. 15 Moſes cometh down with the tables. 19 He breaketh them. 20 He deſtroyeth the calf. 22 Aarons excuſe for himſelf. 25 Moſes cauſeth the idolators to be ſlain. 30 He prayeth for the people.

AND when the people ſaw that Moſes delayed to come down out of the mount, the people gathered themſelves together unto Aaron, and ſaid unto him, Up, make us gods which ſhall go before us: for as for this Moſes, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him.

2 And Aaron ſaid unto them, Break off the golden ear-rings which are in the ears of your wives, of your ſons, and of your daughters, and bring them unto me.

3 And all the people brake off the golden ear-rings which were in their ears, and brought them unto Aaron.

4 And he received them at their hand, and faſhioned it with a graven tool, after he had made it a molten calf: and they ſaid, Theſe be thy gods, O Iſrael, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.

5 And when Aaron ſaw it, he built an altar before it, and Aaron made proclamation, and ſaid, To-morrow is a feaſt to the LORD.

6 And they roſe up early on the morrow, and offered burnt-offerings: and brought peace-offerings: and the people ſat down to eat and to drink, and roſe up to play.

7 ¶ And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Go, get thee down: for thy people which thou broughteſt out of the land of Egypt, have corrupted themſelves.

8 They have turned aſide quickly out of the way which I commanded them: they have made them a molten calf, and have worſhipped it, and have ſacrificed thereunto, and ſaid, Theſe be thy gods, O Iſrael, which have brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.

9 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, I have ſeen this people, and behold, it is a ſtiff-necked people.

10 Now therefore let me alone, that my wrath may wax hot againſt them, and that I may conſume them: and I will make of thee a great nation.

11 And

The Israelites worship the Golden Calf

11 And Moſes beſought the LORD his God, and ſaid, LORD, why doth thy wrath wax hot againſt thy people, which thou haſt brought forth out of the land of Egypt, with great power, and with a mighty hand?

12 Wherefore ſhould the Egyptians ſpeak and ſay, For miſchief did he bring them out, to ſlay them in the mountains, and to conſume them from the face of the earth? Turn from thy fierce wrath, and repent of this evil againſt thy people.

13 Remember Abraham, Iſaac, and Iſrael thy ſervants, to whom thou ſweareſt by thine own ſelf and ſaidſt unto them, I will multiply your ſeed as the ſtars of heaven, and all this land that I have ſpoken of, will I give unto your ſeed, and they ſhall inherit it for ever.

14 And the LORD repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people.

15 ¶ And Moſes turned and went down from the mount, and the two tables of the teſtimony were in his hand; the tables were written on both their ſides; on the one ſide and on the other were they written.

16 And the tables were the work of God, and the writing was the writing of God, graven upon the tables.

17 And when Joſhua heard the noiſe of the people as they ſhouted, he ſaid unto Moſes, There is a noiſe of war in the camp.

18 And he ſaid, It is not the voice of them that ſhout for maſtery, neither is it the voice of them that cry for being overcome: but the noiſe of them that ſing, do I hear.

19 ¶ And it came to paſs aſſoon as he came nigh unto the camp, that he ſaw the calf, and the dancing: and Moſes anger waxed hot, and he caſt the tables out of his hands, and brake them beneath the mount.

20 And he took the calf which they had made, and burnt it in the fire, and ground it to powder, and ſtrawed it upon the water, and made the children of Iſrael drink of it.

21 And Moſes ſaid unto Aaron, What did this people unto thee, that thou haſt brought ſo great a ſin upon them?

22 And Aaron ſaid, Let not the anger of my lord wax hot; thou knoweſt the people that they are ſet on miſchief.

23 For they ſaid unto me, Make us gods which ſhall go before us: for as for this Moſes, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him.

24 And I ſaid unto them, Whoſoever hath any gold, let them break it off: So they gave it me: then I caſt it into the fire, and there came out this calf.

25 ¶ And when Moſes ſaw that the people were naked (for Aaron had made them naked unto their ſhame amongſt their enemies.)

26 Then Moſes ſtood in the gate of the camp and ſaid, Who is on the LORDS ſide? let him come unto me. And all the ſons of Levi gathered themſelves together unto him.

27 And he ſaid unto them, Thus ſaith the LORD God of Iſrael, Put every man his ſword by his ſide, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and ſlay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbour.

28 And the children of Levi did according to the word of Moſes: and there fell of the people that day about three thouſand men.

29 For Moſes had ſaid, Conſecrate your ſelves to day to the LORD, even every man upon his ſon, and upon his brother: that he may beſtow upon you a bleſſing this day.

30 ¶ And it came to paſs on the morrow, that Moſes ſaid unto the people, Ye have ſinned a great ſin: and now I will go up unto the LORD; peradventure I ſhall make an atonement for your ſin.

31 And Moſes returned unto the LORD, and ſaid, Oh, this people have ſinned a great ſin, and have made them gods of gold.

32 Yet now, if thou wilt, forgive their ſin: and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou haſt written.

33 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Whoſoever hath ſinned againſt me, him will I blot out of my book.

34 Therefore now go, lead the people unto the place of which I have ſpoken unto thee: behold, mine angel ſhall go before thee: nevertheleſs, in the day when I viſit, I will viſit their ſin upon them.

35 And the LORD plagued the people, becauſe they made the calf, which Aaron made.

Ver. 1. And when the people ſaw that Moſes delayed to come down out of the mount, the people gathered themſelves together unto Aaron, and ſaid unto him, up, make us gods which ſhall go up before us; for as for this Moſes, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him.] The reſolutions of virtue and holineſs, occaſion'd by a rapid motion of terror, are ſeldom executed: The Iſraelites ſaid to Moſes, at the ſight of the lightning, and at the awful voice of the thunder, all that the Lord hath ſpoken we will do, chap. xix. 8. But when the lightning glared no more and the thunder was no longer heard; in a word, when Moſes ceaſed to be among them, to remind them of their ſolemn vows and promiſes, they immediately broke them.

Some

Some Jewiſh Doctors have affirmed, that the children of Iſrael believ'd their law-giver had been devoured by the flames of Sinai. They add, that the devil betrayed them into this miſtake; and ſhew'd them the dead body of Moſes, or perſuaded them to believe they ſaw it, by perſonating a phantom in the air to their view. What render'd their abſence the more inſupportable, was the abſence of the pillar of ſmoke which ſeem'd quite to have left them, as well as Moſes; and their underſtandings were too groſs, to let them worſhip an inviſible God, who gave them no ſenſible manifeſtations of his preſence. They were reſolved to ſupply the abſence of the cloud, and to have ſome other ſymbol of the Deity among them. They therefore ſaid to Aaron, up, make us gods, or make us a god, (for the Hebrew text is ſuſceptible of either verſion) which ſhall go before us; for as for this Moſes, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him. Not that they were ſo ſtupid as to think, that the hands of a man could give a being to a God; but they were inclinable to have an external object, to which they might pretent the homage they would render to the ſupreme God Thus it is, that the Rabbins have explain'd the text of Moſes; make us a ſenſible object of divine worſhip, which may be always before our eyes, and ſupply the place of God, when we ſhall be told of all the wonders he wrought for us in Egypt.

It is amazing, that Aaron, ſhould not make any oppoſition to ſuch an impious demand from the children of Iſrael; and if he did, it is no leſs ſurprizing, that Moſes ſhould not have recorded it, and that we ſhould have no better warrant for it than the teſtimony of ſome of the Rabbins. And, yet it is only from them, that we are told, if not to juſtify Aarons entirely, yet, at leaſt, to extenuate his crimes, that it was his fear which occaſion'd his condeſcention; that Hur had been maſſacred for oppoſing the importunity of the people; and that Aaron, being on the point of ſuffering the ſame barbarity, lifted up his eyes to heaven and ſaid, O Lord, I look up to thee, who knoweſt the hearts of men, and who dwelleſt in the heavens: Thou art witneſs, that I act againſt my inclination.

Moſes, however, relates the criminal condeſcenſion of of Aaron immediately after his account of the iniquitous demand of the Iſraelites; and declares, that Aaron anſwer'd, break off the golden ear-rings, which are in the ears of your wives, of your ſons, and of your daughters, and bring them unto me. ver. 2. Some of the ancients have thought, that he made this anſwer, only to diſcourage thoſe enthuſiaſtic people from purſuing their deſires; and, that he thought, they would not have inſiſted upon having an idol which was to coſt them ſo dear. If this be a mitigation of Aaron's offence, it aggravates that of the children of Iſrael. They brought in, without the leaſt heſitation, thoſe gold rings which they had taken from the Egyptians, and which were given them by God, by virtue of that ſupreme right he has over the world and all its inhabitants. Thus did they anticipate a reproach, which a prophet caſt upon their poſterity ſeveral ages after; as a wife that committeth adultery, which taketh ſtrangers inſtead of her husband. They give gifts to all whores, but thou giveſt gifts to all thy lovers, and hireſt them, that they may come unto thee from every ſide for thy whoredoms. Ezek. xvi. 32, 33.

The Moſaic hiſtory adds, that Aaron took the offerings from the children of Iſrael, and formed them into a molten calf, but the words immediately introduced before theſe laſt, afford us, one of the moſt ſingular examples, that can be, of the ambiguity of the holy language; for they may be equally render'd, either, that Aaron received thoſe rings into a purſe, or, that he faſhioned them with a graving tool, as it is uſually render'd. Bochart prefers the firſt of theſe interpretations, and founds his preference upon ſuch plauſible arguments, they might have been thought unanſwerable, if they had not been refuted by Le Clerc, who oppoſes very ſolid reaſons againſt him; inſomuch, that the chief concluſion we can draw from this diſpute is, that it is an argument in favour of ſceptical criticiſm.

A more famous queſtion is agitated among the learned, and it is no leſs important in fixing this concluſion, and proving, that there are ſubjects, upon which one may advance things equally probable, with reſpect to the moſt oppoſite ſentiments. It is asked, what determin'd Aaron to make choice of a calf, to render it the emblem of the Deity? In anſwer to which, we will relate the chief opinions of the learned upon this article.

Some of the commentators have thought, that Aaron entertained this imagination on the very mount, where he had been permitted to come one time with Moſes, and another with Nadab, and Abihu, and the ſeventy elders. They pretend, that God appeared to them riding on a cherubim, which had the form of an ox; and 'tis on this notion, that the whole treatiſe, entitled, Aaron vindicated, turns: But this opinion is inconſiſtent with the great care God took upon Sinai, not to furniſh the leaſt pretext for idolatry; and with what he himſelf ſaid to the Iſraelites, by his ſervant Moſes. Take ye therefore good heed unto your ſelves (for ye ſaw no manner of ſimilitude on the day that the Lord ſpake unto you in Horeb, out of the midſt of the fire) leſt you corrupt yourſelves, and make you a graven image, the ſimilitude of any figure, the likeneſs of any male or female, the likeneſs of any beaſt that is on the earth, the likeneſs of any winged fowl that flyeth in the air, the likeneſs of any thing that creepeth on the ground, the likeneſs of any fiſh, &c. Deut. iv. 15, &c. The Holy Spirit hath, in theſe words, collected the animals of all kinds, and expreſly declares, that none of their forms or figures appeared upon the mount.

The learned biſhop Patrick, who had an inclination to excuſe Aaron, declares, that the deſign of this prieſt was only to offer an hieroglyphick, of the ſtrength and power of the Deity; and he finds ſome monuments of the ancients, by which he endeavours to prove, that the ox was the emblem of royal or ſovereign authority, among the Phœnicians: Euſebius has helped him to ſome; Diodorus Siculus, and Valerius Maximus, to others; whereby he makes it evident, that the Romans had the ſame hieroglyphic of old. Upon this principle, he aſſerts, that Aaron's deſign was to remind the Iſraelites of the power and ſtrength of God, and to revive the illuſtrious manifeſtations they had ſeen thereof; and it is thus that he explains thoſe words, Theſe be thy gods, O Iſrael, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt, ver. 4. And likewiſe the following paſſage, in the next verſe, To-morrow is a feaſt to the Lord. The opinion is ingenious, indeed, but let any one conſider, whether ſuch an hieroglyphic was uſed, ſo early as the days of Moſes; and whether the commentator can account for the ſilence of Aaron, who never offer'd this for a reaſon of his complacency, and for the wrath of God, that would have been ſo fatal to him, if Moſes had not interceded in his behalf.

But the torrent of interpreters have eſpouſed a third notion; namely, that Aaron made choice of a calf, becauſe that creature was worſhipped in Egypt, and endeavour to prove, that the Iſraelites were infected with the idolatry of the Egyptians, of which there are ſufficient confirmations, as may appear by the following exhortation of Joſhua to the people, Now therefore fear the Lord, and ſerve him in ſincerity and truth, and put away the gods which your fathers ſerved on the other ſide of the flood, and in Egypt, and ſerve ye the Lord, Joſh. xxiv. 14. And again, by the prophet Ezekiel Caſt ye away every man the abominations of his eyes, and defile not yourſelves with the idols of Egypt. But they rebelled againſt me, and would not hearken unto me; they did not every man caſt away the abominations of their eyes, neither did they forſake the idols of Egypt, Ezek. xx. 7, 8, &c. Hitherto the opinion of theſe latter criticks is demonſtrable.

They prove further, that all ſorts of animals were adored by the Egyptians: This, indeed, is not ſo very certain, but it is attended with ſome probability. If the diſpute related to ſucceeding times, we might find numberleſs proofs among the prophane authors. Pomponius Mela expreſly declares, that the Egyptians worſhipped the images of various animals, and even the living animals themſelves, Pomp. Mela de ſitu orbis, l. 1. c. 9. p. 18 The hiſtorian Joſephus ſays, "If the religious ceremonies of "the Egyptians were received in all countries, they would "be ſoon over-run by the beaſts, and there would not be "any room for men, Joſeph. contra Appion. l. 2. c. 5. p. "1069." There is alſo a paſſage from Strabo, which furniſhes us with a more particular account of the matter. "There are, ſays he, animals which all the Egyptians "adore, ſuch as, among the terreſtrial, the ox, the dog, "and the cat; among the aerial, the ſparrow-hawk, and "the ibis. There are ſome likewiſe, to which each "country

" country pays a particular veneration, ſuch as the ſheep " at Thebes, &c." Strabo, lib. 17. p. 812. It is alſo to be preſumed, that the adoration of animals was already eſtabliſhed in Egypt, during the ſojourning of the Iſraelites in that land. This evidently follows, from what Moſes ſays to Pharaoh, If we ſacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes, will they not ſtone us? Exod. viii. 26. It is demonſtrable too, that, the ox was adored in Egypt after a ſingular manner. Strabo aſſures us, in the book we juſt now quoted, that at Memphis there was an ox kept, and reſpected as a deity; and Pliny ſays the ſame expreſly, Hiſt. lib. 8. c. 46. p. 145. He likewiſe adds, that the Egyptians call'd this ox Apis; that they had two kinds of temples, the entrance into one of which was pleaſing, but that of the other frightful. Herodotus deſcribes the ſaid idol thus, " Apis, or Epatus, is a calf proceeding from a cow, " which never brings forth more than one, nor can ſhe " teem that, without a clap of thunder. The calf they " call Apis, has certain marks by which it may be known, " and it is black over all the body," &c. Lib. 3. cap. 38. p. 172.

It remains now to be enquired, whether the worſhip of the Egyptian calf, was prior to the adoration which the Iſraelites render'd to the golden calf, or whether it was not eſtabliſhed long after. If it ſhould be proved, that the Egyptian worſhip was firſt, it will be a kind of demonſtration, that it was the reaſon why Aaron preferr'd the image of a calf, to that of any other animal: And a great number of interpreters, eſpecially among the fathers of the church, have been of the ſame opinion. Some commentators have thought, that the worſhip of Apis, owed its original to the advantages which the Egyptians receiv'd from the adminiſtration of Joſeph; and that the ox was the hieroglyphic of this patriarch. The famous Voſſius has employed abundance of learning, to eſtabliſh this notion; and ſupports it by the evidence of ſome of the ancients, particularly, that of Julius Maternus, an author who lived under Conſtantine the great; to theſe he adds, the teſtimony of Rufinus, and ſome others; and he alſo builds upon a paſſage in Deuteronomy, where Joſeph is called an ox. He ſupports himſelf likewiſe, by the very nature of Pharaoh's dream, in which he ſaw kine aſcending out of the Nile, a dream, that preſerved all the land of Egypt. He founds himſelf again, upon the uſual cuſtom of the ancients, in repreſenting plenty under the emblem of an ox; and alledges a variety of other reaſons for his opinion, to which he ſubjoins a ſet of arguments to prove, that Apis and Serapis were one and the ſame deity with the Egyptians. But all theſe learned conjectures have been refuted by Bochart, and are indeed overturned by this one conſideration, that no evidence hath been produced, to prove, that the gods, which we acknowledge to have been worſhipped by the Egyptians, under the ſimilitude of an ox, ſince the time of Moſes, were already conſidered as deities in his age. We ſhall even find ſtrong preſumptions, not to ſay demonſtrations, of the contrary opinion, in the treatiſe of idolatry, written by archbiſhop Teniſon; and ſhall therefore ſuſpend our judgment, as to the particular motive which determined Aaron to make a calf, the object of the Iſraelites idolatry, and conclude this enquiry with the following reflection; namely, that whatever other object he had offered to their worſhip, the learned might have asked, why that rather than any other? and they would have been divided upon the queſtion, and maintained ſeveral opinions, each of which would, in all probability, have had ſome traces of antiquity for its vindication. Aaron built an altar, and placed this idol upon it; he then proclaimed a feaſt, to be kept the day following, and told the people, it was conſecrated to the Lord, tho' it was intended to be employed in the abolition of his true worſhip, and a direct violation of that law, which Moſes had given them in his name, and by which they were expreſly commanded not to make gods of ſilver, or gods of gold: The children of Iſrael exulted at the publication of a ſolemnity, which was ſoon to become ſo fatal to them, and were uneaſy at the delaying it ſo long as the ſucceeding day. They roſe up early on the appointed morning, and offered burnt-offerings, and brought peace-offerings to the idol, which ought to have been offered to none but God. They ate of the fleſh of the victim, as was cuſtomary in the offerings of peace; by which action they made it evident, that they would have the ſame communication with the idol, as Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and the ſeventy elders, had with God, when they did eat in his preſence. After this, they ſhewed, by their ſongs and dances, the joy with which they were inſpired by this communion. It was an eſtabliſhed cuſtom among the idolaters, to make rejoicings upon ſuch ſolemn occaſions, and this was more particularly obſerved, in thoſe that were made in honour to the god apis, in the following ages. When they had kept him a whole century, they threw him into the Nile; after which, they lamented his death, and look'd out for another; and as ſoon as they found him, all places reſounded with acclamations of joy. The courtiers, the prieſts, and the people aſſembled, and great feſtivals were celebrated: The Iſraelites did the ſame, and this is the import of theſe words of Moſes, the people ſat down to eat, and to drink, and roſe up to play. ver. 6. Some have given a more odious ſenſe to this laſt expreſſion, and imagine, that the Iſraelites being intoxicated with pleaſure, paſſed, from the ſin of idolatry, to that of impurity. Men are never more inclined to trample down the barriers of morality, than when they tranſgreſs thoſe of religion. The Heathens frequently committed ſuch abominations, after the repaſts they had taken on their ſacrificing. The word play, which is uſed in the laſt cited text, may perhaps bear the like ſenſe in other places, but nothing obliges us to underſtand it ſo here: The crime of the Iſraelites did not conſiſt in making merry after their devotions, and God himſelf required them them to do it, after thoſe which he ordained, but it was for conſecrating mirth to an idol, inſtead of hallowing it to the rock of their ſalvation.

It was thus, that whilſt Moſes was making an everlaſting covenant between God and the Iſraelites, thoſe unhappy people violated the moſt fundamental clauſe of it; namely, to worſhip none but God. Nothing can be more emphatical, then the words which the Holy Spirit employs on this occaſion. Ver. 7, &c. Go, get thee down, for the people which thou broughteſt out of the land of Egypt have corrupted themſelves. They have turned aſide quickly out of the way which I commanded them: they have made a molten calf, and have worſhipped it, and have ſacrificed thereunto, and ſaid, theſe be thy Gods, O Iſrael, which have brought thee up out of the land of Egypt. God even required of Moſes, that he ſhould conſent to the deſtruction of this whole nation, and promiſed that law-giver to make him the center of thoſe promiſes granted to Abraham, and according to which, the poſterity of that patriarch, were to be as numerous as the ſtars of heaven. The words of the text are very remarkable on that occaſion, now therefore let me alone, that I may conſume them, and I will make of thee a great nation. Ver. 10. God prepares to execute his dreadful vengeance on the offenders, but finds himſelf ſtopped, on the part of Moſes. That arm, that invincible arm, which ſmote Egypt with ſo many fatal blows; which exterminated the firſt-born of the Egyptians, and caſt into the red-ſea, Pharoah and all his hoſt; that arm, we ſay, felt it ſelf bound by the prayers of Moſes; and God ſeemed to wait for a ſignal from his ſervant, to begin the deſtruction of a rebellious people.

Moſes knew how to prove the advantage, which the goodneſs of God and the efficacy of his own prayers had render'd him maſter of; he redoubled his efforts, and the Deity, according to the expreſſion of the Pſalmiſt, would have deſtroy'd them, had not Moſes his choſen ſtood before him in the breach. Pſal. cvi. 23. When this great man had at leſt obtained a ſuſpenſion of their chaſtiſement, he returned to thoſe guilty perſons who ſo juſtly deſerv'd it; he bore in his hands, thoſe tables of ſtone on which the law of the ten commandments was engraven; and Joſhua then rejoined him: It is not ſaid, exactly, where; but it was when he came down from the mount. He was ſoon amazed at the great noiſe he heard, at a great diſtance, in the camp, and took it to be of ſuch a kind as was made by people ingaged againſt one another in battle; he expreſſed his amazement to Moſes, who knew well enough, that this noiſe proceeded from a yet more fatal cauſe. Scarce were they arrived at the camp, but their eyes met the idol. Moſes was inflamed with a holy indignation, at this dreadful ſight, and in a rage broke the tables of the law, which contained the chief clauſes of the covenant, that theſe idolaters had juſt now violated, verſe 19. He broke them in their preſence, after having made them ſenſible, as a Jewiſh doctor wiſely obſerves, of the greatneſs of their loſs, in the next place, he brake their idol to pieces, grinding it into a fine powder, which he ſcattered upon the waters that ran from the brook Horeb, and obliged theſe image-worſhippers to drink thereof, verſe 20. Thoſe who are of opinion, that Aaron mimicked the worſhip of the god Apis; believe, that Moſes alluded to the ceremony of the Egyptians, who threw that idol into the Nile; but this conſequence is as uncertain as the principle on which it is founded. But what greater contempt could he caſt upon this idol, than to cauſe it to be eaten, even by thoſe very perſons who had juſt before paid it divine adorations? This comment varies from that of ſome interpreters, who fancy, they have diſcover'd in this tranſgreſſion, the greateſt myſteries of the chriſtian religion; and think, that Moſes taught the Iſraelites, by this proceeding, that it was only the Meſſiah, typified by this book, who was capable of expiating their crime.

A very particular opinion, with relation to the water which the children of Iſrael drank, deſerves to be cited here: There was an ancient tradition, that the beards of all thoſe who drank of this water, were tinged with gold, and this tradition was long retained in the church. The famous Bochart, gives us a fragment of a verſion of Exodus, which was begun in the 13th century, and which renders the 27th verſe of this chapter thus: "Slay every one his "brother, his friend, his neighbour, even all thoſe who "have golden beards." From which text, this ridiculous gloſs is drawn. "Thoſe who worſhipped the calf, had "their beards turned into a golden colour; for the pow-"der ſtuck to the hair miraculouſly." And there is a Bible printed at Antwerp, in the year 1531, in which this very gloſs occurs. What unaccountable chimeras are ſometimes entertain'd in the minds of men!

Moſes addreſſed himſelf afterwards to Aaron, and reproached him for diveſting the people of their moſt precious ornaments. Some Rabbins have advanced, that the Iſraelites wore two crowns, on which were impreſſed the name of Jehovah, and of which Aaron had ſpoiled them. The brother of Moſes anſwered like a man that knew not what to ſay, and had therefore recourſe to frivolous excuſes, of whoſe invalidity he himſelf was ſenſible. I ſaid unto them, replies he, whoſoever hath any gold, let them brake it off: So they gave it me; then I caſt it into the fire, and there came out this calf, ver. 24. What a miſerable vindication is this? and what could elſe come out of a mould that has the form of a calf, and into which one pours a quantity of gold ſufficient to fill it? There is not the leaſt foundation for the opinion of thoſe who pretend, that Aaron had no mould at all, but that the Devil formed the idol; and ſo it is they underſtand his anſwer, but the words of this Prieſt ſhew the diſpoſition of a perſon who is deſirous to juſtify himſelf, but finds nothing on which he can build a ſufficient apology, and yet cant prevail on himſelf to be ſilent.

This conduct of Moſes, in melting, grinding, and powdering, the golden idol, in order to make the people drink it with the water into which he threw it, is ſo contrary to our preſent Philoſophy, and the account which the Alchymiſts give us of the nature of gold, that it hath been ſtrangely canvaſed by the incredulous, and very aukwardly defended by others. However it is plain, that gold may be reduced to a fine and almoſt impalpable powder, and it is no more then all our Gold-Beaters are capable of accompliſhing. It is true, Moſes might have ſome particular ſecret for doing it, which we know nothing of, neither is it improbable, that the Egyptians and other nations might be acquainted with ſome particulars concerning that metal, which have been ſince loſt. Nothing has been more commonly received, than the notion that gold cannot be deſtroyed; and yet the royal Academy at Paris have a burning glaſs that will vitrify it in an inſtant, by evaporating all the ſulphur of it, which crackles and flies up in a thick ſmoak, whilſt the glaſs that remains can never be reduced into any other form. And Borichius aſſures us, that he has, by a conſtant trituration of that metal, in ſome ſimple diſtilled water, during the ſpace of thirty days, raiſed this ſulphur up to the ſurface of the water, upon which it appeared like a fine red oil; whilſt all the reſt that ſubſided, was only a greyiſh powder which could never be reduced into any thing afterwards, but appeared in all reſpects the ſame with that which he had got out of baſer metals by the ſame proceſs of trituration; though none of the latter, not even ſilver, ever afforded any thing like that beautiful oil which may be extracted from gold.

The Rabbies tell us, that Moſes made the people drink this gold powder, in order to diſcover the idolaters from the reſt, and that as ſoon as they had drank it, the beards of the former turned red; and the Caballiſts add, that the idol weighed 125 quintals, or hundreds, which they gather from the Hebrew word Maſſekah, whoſe numerical letters make 125. but they aſſign no Reaſon, why quintals ſhould be the quantity, rather than pounds, Ounces, or talents.

After this Moſes was determined that a puniſhment ſhould be inflicted on ſome of the guilty to deter the reſt from relapſing into the like crime, and to ſerve as a perpetual barrier againſt idolatry. He called for all thoſe who were conſcious of the warmth of an uncommon zeal, for the glory of God, and he was immediately ſurrounded by the Levites; upon which he gave them that ſevere commiſſion by which he ſhewed, that the charity with which his ſoul was affected for thoſe criminals, did not hinder him from entertaining a lively reſentment for the affronts they had offered to God, the principal object of his love; Thus ſaith the Lord God of Iſrael, put every man his ſword by his ſide, and go in and out from gate to gate, throughout the camp, and ſlay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbour. The Levites obeyed him, and ſacrificed three thouſand men to the wrath of Heaven. A paſſage in St. Paul miſunderſtood, (1 Corinth. x. 7, 8. where mention is made of the plague related, Numb. xxv. 9.) has cauſed ſome to tranſlate twenty-three thouſand men, and the error of one bad verſion has diffuſed it ſelf into ſeveral others.

The cloſeſt union, is that we have with God; and all the intercourſes which are incompatible with that, ought to be broken off without mercy. As bloody as this action of the Levites appears, it is yet commendable in its own nature, becauſe the commands of God, and the zeal for his glory, were the principles from which it proceeded. The word made uſe of by Moſes, to induce them to it, deſerves obſervation: It is borrowed from the ſacrifices; Conſecrate yourſelves to day to the Lord, ver. 29. But, Obedience is better than ſacrifice, 1 Sam. xv. 22. Moſes gives us an encomium on this expedition, four years after its accompliſhment, ſpeaking of Levi in the following manner; who ſaid unto his father, and to his mother, I have not ſeen him, neither did he acknowledge his brethren, nor knew his own children, Deut. xxxiii. 9.

Moſes, after having offered 3000 victims to the indignation of God, re-aſcended the mount, where he continued 40 days; part of which he ſpent in ſolliciting the pardon of the remaining criminals. Nothing is more worthy our imitation than the charity he diſcovered in imploring the Divine compaſſion, in this conjuncture. O this people, ſaid he, have ſinned a great ſin.——Yet now, if thou wilt, forgive their ſin: And if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of the book which thou haſt written, ver. 31, &c. Some divines have thought, that this law-giver offer'd to renounce his everlaſting ſalvation, for the ſake of the Iſraelites. And Mr. La Placette ſays of Moſes, "That he conſented "to be blotted out of the book of life, on condition that "God would pardon the children of Iſrael. In ſuch a "caſe, one might ſuſpect, that he deſired to ſacrifice his "ſalvation to theirs: But quite contrary, he deſires to be "blotted out of God's book, in caſe his prayer ſhould be "rejected; Forgive their ſin, or blot me out of thy book. "Now who does not ſee, that this would be inſupportable, "if it were to be underſtood of eternal damnation; but "it is worthy of praiſe, when explain'd into an untimely "death. What could be more impious than for a man to "ſay, I deſire eternal perdition, if thou doſt not grant me "the favour I implore? And, on the contrary, what could "be more pious and laudable than to ſay, If thou haſt "determined to deſtroy this nation, ſpare me the grief of "ſurviving, and of hearing the inſults and blaſphemies of "our enemies? Take me out of this world, where I ſhall "only lead a life of bitterneſs, which will be leſs tole-"rable than death it ſelf." We will add, to the words of this author, a parallel paſſage from the book of Numbers bers. Moſes ſaid unto the Lord, wherefore haſt thou afflicted thy ſervant? And wherefore have I not found favour in thy ſight? That thou haſt laid the burden of all this people upon me. Have I conceived this people? Have I begotten them? That thou ſhouldſt ſay unto me, Carry them in thy boſom (as a nurſing father beareth his ſucking child) unto the land which thou ſweareſt unto their fathers——— I am not able to bear all this people alone, becauſe 'tis too heavy for me. And if thou deal thus with me, kill me, I pray thee, out of hand, if I have found favour in thy ſight; and let me not ſee my wretchedneſs, Numb. xi. 11, &c.

We think it may be proved, not only that Moſes did not deſign to ſacrifice his ſalvation, but alſo that ſuch a ſacrifice ought not to be ſo much as ſuppoſed. It ſeems to us, that there is an exceſs of zeal in thoſe perſons, who have rendered themſelves famous in myſtical divinity; neither can we ſubſcribe to the following propoſition; "The will of God is the ſupreme object of an indifferent "ſoul, inſomuch that it would rather go to hell by the "will of God, than to heaven without it. Yea, it would "prefer hell before heaven, if it thought it to be ever ſo "little more pleaſing to God." See J. B. Boſſuet, biſhop of Meaux, Inſtruct. Paſt. p. 333.

We do not find, among thoſe ſaints whom the Scripture propoſes to us for a pattern, any thing like the ſubmiſſion of Angelo de Foligni, who, in the tranſports of his zeal, made uſe of ſuch enthuſiaſtic rant as this that follows: "Tho' I were ſure to be damned, I would not ceaſe "my penitential acts, but would diveſt my ſelf of all "things for the love of God. If I am to be caſt into "hell, O my God, ſtay no longer, make haſte; and ſince "thou haſt forſaken me, finiſh, and precipitate me into "the bottomleſs pit." We likewiſe as much condemn the emotions of Catharine of Sienna; "Tho' it were poſſible, cries this enthuſiaſt, "to feel all the torments of the de"vils, and all the damned ſouls, yet ſhould I never call "them pains, ſo much pleaſure would the pure love of "God make me find therein." See Tom. 3. of the Sermons of J. Saurin, on Sublime Devotion.

This ſyſtem of diſintereſted love is not to be maintained, not even with the reſtrictions which ſome divines have added, and particularly Elias Saurin, in his treatiſe of the love of God. This author maintains, that the devotion we owe to God, ought to extend itſelf ſo far, as to induce us to ſacrifice even our ſalvation to him; and that ſuch a reſolution ought to be fixed in the heart of every Chriſtian. "I love God, ſays he, and, by the movements of "that love, I give him all I am able to beſtow. I give my "ſelf to him, and, with my ſelf, I give him all that I am, "and all that I hope to be. I renounce all things, pro"vided it be for God's glory; inſomuch, that if my very "ſalvation could become a ſacrifice to the glory of my "God, my ſalvation ſhould be of no value to me, in op"poſition to his glory, as I myſelf am nothing in oppo"ſition to him."

Such an hypotheſis, namely, that the glory of God requires us to ſacrifice our ſalvation, is, as we think, not only impoſſible, but even contradictory. The rules of logic allow us to make impoſſible, but not contradictory, ſuppoſitions. It is indeed allowable to lay down a falſe principle, to try what concluſion would neceſſarily follow from it; but it is not lawful to advance any ſuch principle as would deſtroy the very concluſion we would derive from it. It is not lawful to ſuppoſe, that God atteſts a contradiction, and to maintain, that in ſuch a caſe, we ought to give credit to his word, becauſe it is infinitely true. For the ſuppoſition, that God atteſts a contradiction, is equal to maintaining, that he is not ſupremely true; and conſequently it deſtroys the concluſion which we would infer from it. Now we think it is a demonſtration, that the obligation of ſacrificing one's ſalvation, ſuppoſing that the glory of God requir'd it, is not only an impoſſible, but a contradictory condition likewiſe. Why is God entitled to ſo great a ſacrifice from an intelligent being, according to the opinion of thoſe very perſons we oppoſe? It is, becauſe God is infinitely amiable; but if he requires ſuch a ſacrifice as this, he would be no longer that infinitely amiable God; and conſequently would not deſerve to be infinitely beloved: He would be a God whoſe capricious glory would require that which is leaſt glorious to a perfect being; that is, the damnation of a creature infinitely devoted to him. He would be a cruel divinity, taking pleaſure in the everlaſting torments of men, who were capable of reſolving to ſuffer eternally for his glory. We conclude from all this, that the example of Moſes, does, by no means, favour the ſyſtem of diſintereſted love, and the ſacrifice of our own ſalvation.

It is ſubjoined, that God repented of the evil he had threatned to bring upon the people. Nothing but a great ſtock of ignorance, or malice, could ever have induced Julian the apoſtate to infer from this expreſſion, that God is given to change; ſince it ſignifies only, that God granted to Moſes a pardon for the Iſraelites, or rather, a reprieve, for that time; but the innumerable crimes they afterwards committed, did, as it were, compel him to exterminate them at laſt: And, accordingly, when God yielded to the inſtances of Moſes, he told him, In the day when I viſit, I will viſit their ſin upon them, ver. 34. We muſt underſtand by the day, thoſe dreadful times, at which God ſeems to re-unite in one period, the crimes which a people has committed at ſeveral others: And the Jews have ſeen ſeveral of ſuch; they even ſay, to this day, as their fathers did before, that no evil befals them, in which there are not ſome ounces of the golden calf. They celebrate, to this day, by a ſolemn faſt, the anniverſary of the breaking of the tables of the law; and St. Jerome, with ſome other interpreters, have thought, that the prophet Zachariah alluded thereto, when he made mention of the faſt of the fourth month, Zach. viii. 19.

CHAP. XXXIII.

1 The Lord refuſeth to go, as he had promiſed, with the people. 4 The people mourn thereat. 7 The tabernacle is removed out of the camp. 9 The Lord talketh familiarly with Moſes. 12 Moſes deſireth to ſee the glory of God.

AND the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Depart, and go up hence, thou and the people which thou haſt brought up out of the land of Egypt, unto the land which I ſware unto Abraham, to Iſaac, and to Jacob, ſaying, Unto thy ſeed will I give it.

2 And I will ſend an angel before thee; and I will drive out the Canaanite, the Amorite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, the Hivite, and the Jebuſite:

3 Unto a land flowing with milk and honey: for I will not go up in the midſt of thee, for thou art a ſtiff-necked people, leſt I conſume thee in the way.

4 ¶ And when the people heard theſe evil tidings, they mourned: and no man did put on him his ornaments.

5 For the LORD had ſaid unto Moſes, Say unto the children of Iſrael, Ye are a ſtiff-necked people: I will come up into the midſt of thee in a moment, and conſume thee: therefore now put off thy ornaments from thee, that I may know what to do unto thee.

6 And the children of Iſrael ſtript themſelves of their ornaments, by the mount Horeb.

7 And Moſes took the tabernacle, and pitched it without the camp, afar off from the camp, and called it the Tabernacle of the congregation. And it came to paſs, tha:

that every one which ſought the LORD, went out unto the tabernacle of the congregation, which was without the camp.

8 And it came to paſs, when Moſes went out unto the tabernacle, that all the people roſe up, and ſtood every man at his tent-door, and looked after Moſes, until he was gone into the tabernacle.

9 And it came to paſs, as Moſes entred into the tabernacle, the cloudy pillar deſcended, and ſtood at the door of the tabernacle, and the LORD talked with Moſes.

10 And all the people ſaw the cloudy pillar ſtand at the tabernacle door: and all the people roſe up and worſhipped, every man in his tent-door.

11 And the LORD ſpake unto Moſes face to face, as a man ſpeaketh unto his friend. And he turned again into the camp; but his ſervant Joſhua, the ſon of Nun, a young man, departed not out of the tabernacle.

12 ¶ And Moſes ſaid unto the LORD, See, thou ſayeſt unto me, Bring up this people: and thou haſt not let me know whom thou wilt ſend with me. Yet thou haſt ſaid, I know thee by name, and thou haſt alſo found grace in my ſight.

13 Now therefore, I pray thee, If I have found grace in thy ſight: ſhew me now thy way that I may know thee, that I may find grace in thy ſight: and conſider that this nation is thy people.

14 And he ſaid, My preſence ſhall go with thee, and I will give thee reſt.

15 And he ſaid unto him, If thy preſence go not with me, carry us not up hence.

16 For wherein ſhall it be known here, that I and thy people have found grace in thy ſight? Is it not in that thou goeſt with us: So ſhall we be ſeparated, I and thy people, from all the people that are upon the face of the earth.

17 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, I will do this thing alſo that thou haſt ſpoken: for thou haſt found grace in my ſight, and I know thee by name.

18 And he ſaid, I beſeech thee, ſhew me thy glory

19 And he ſaid, I will make all my goodneſs paſs before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the LORD before thee; and will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will ſhew mercy on whom I will ſhew mercy.

20 And he ſaid, Thou canſt not ſee my face: for there ſhall no man ſee me, and live.

21 And the LORD ſaid, Behold, there is a place by me, and thou ſhalt ſtand upon a rock.

22 And it ſhall come to paſs, while my glory paſſeth by, that I will put thee in a clift of the rock; and will cover thee with my hand while I paſs by.

23 And I will take away mine hand, and thou ſhalt ſee my back-parts: but my face ſhall not be ſeen.

Ver. 1. And the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, depart and go up hence, thou and thy people, &c.] This is a recapitulation of the command God had already given to Moſes, chap. xxxii. 34. and, which he further explains, by expreſly aſſuring him, that he would verify his promiſe to their anceſtors; and of which Moſes had remembred him, chap. xxxii. 13. but they were not ordered to remove, till Moſes had been again in the mount, and the tabernacle was ſet up, and all the ſervice of it preſcribed.

And I will ſend an angel before thee, and I will drive out the Canaanite, the Amorite, &c.] I will not wholly withdraw my protection from you, (as the Deity had for the preſent, chap. xxxii. 25.) but will ſend one of my miniſters to diſcomfit your enemies, till you obtain poſſeſſion of their land.

Ver. 3. For I will not go up in the midſt of thee.] I intended, indeed, to have reſided among you my ſelf, by my ſpecial preſence, (which was in the SCHECHINAH chap. xxv, 8. chap. xxix. ver. 43, 45, 46) But you juſtly forfeited that favour. The Chaldee gives the true ſenſe of this ſpeech. "I will not make my majeſty (ſo the "SCHECHINAH or divine glory was called) go up in "the midſt of thee; and accordingly it follows, ver. 7, 8, 9. that God removed to a diſtance from them.

[Leſt I conſume thee in the way.] It is not fit for me, to ſee my ſelf affronted to my face, by a ſet of contumacious offenders, and not puniſh them with utter deſtruction. This is an argument, that the angel whom God promiſes to ſend before them, was not the Deity himſelf, (as the eternal λόγος is) for then he would have had the ſame reaſon to conſume them for their diſobedience.

Ver. 4. And when the people heard theſe evil tidings, they mourned and no man put on his ornaments.] They were ſeiſed with anguiſh, at the menace of ſo dreadful a puniſhment; they faſted, perhaps, and wept; they hung down their heads with guilty ſhame and confuſion; they laid aſide their uſual attire, and appear'd in the humble habit of penitents, which, in after times, was ſackcloth.

Ver. 5. For the Lord had ſaid unto Moſes, ſay unto the children of Iſrael, ye are a ſtiff-necked people: I will come up into the midſt of thee in a moment and conſume thee.] This verſe aſſigns a reaſon for their mourning; Moſes had, by the command of God, declared to them, that they were ſuch a perverſe people, it was not ſafe for them that their divine ſovereign ſhould continue among them, ſince he would certainly be provoked, by their tranſgreſſions, ſuddenly to deſtroy them.

Therefore now put off thy ornaments from thee.] Theſe words declare, that God had not peremptorily reſolved to forſake them, (as he threaned ver. 3.) but might be moved by their repentance to continue with them; and therefore, God orders them to array themſelves in a mourning habit, as an indication of their ſincere ſorrow for their Offence.

Ver. 7. And Moſes took the tabernacle and pitched it without the camp, afar off from the camp, and called it the tabernacle of the congregation, And it came to paſs, that every one which ſought the Lord, went out unto the tabernacle of the congregation, which was without the camp.] The tabernacle which Moſes took, is interpreted by the Septuagint, τὴν σκηνὴν αὐτοῦ to be his own tent, meaning, as we ſuppoſe, not his own private tent, where he and his family reſided, but the publick pavilion, where he gave audience, heard heard cauſes, and enquired of God; which Bonaventura C. Bertramus calls Caſtrorum Prætorium, in his book de Repub. Jud. c. 4. (for ſuch a place, we cannot but think there was, before that tabernacle was erected, whoſe pattern he ſaw in the mount) where all great affairs were tranſacted, and where religious offices, in all probability, were performed.

Moſes pitched this tent without the camp, at the diſtance of two thouſand cubits, as R. Solomon interprets it; which was done to humble them, when they ſaw the diſpleaſure of God, and of his ſervant, againſt them, declared by this departure far from them; for they might be juſtly apprehenſive, that he would remove quite out of their ſight.

Moſes, likewiſe, gave this tent the ſame name, which was afterwards appropriated to the tabernacle, built for divine ſervice alone: Becauſe, God here met with that law-giver, and communicated his mind to him, and hither they were all to reſort, who had any affairs to tranſact with Moſes, or would receive an anſwer to their enquiries from God.

The latter part of this verſe is commonly underſtood, of thoſe who came to deſire a ſolution in any caſe of difficulty, which they could not have, as formerly, within the camp; but were obliged to apply for it without: Which, as it indicated God's diſpleaſure, ſo it likewiſe afforded them ſome hope of mercy; becauſe, it plainly appeared, that God was not entirely alienated and eſtranged from them.

Ver. 8. And it came to paſs, when Moſes went out unto the tabernacle, that all the people roſe up, and ſtood every man at his tent door, and looked after Moſes, until he was gone into the tabernacle.] The people roſe up in reverence to Moſes as their leader, whom they had lately deſpiſed; or, it may be thought alſo, a poſture, wherein they implored his interceſſion for them, that God would be graciouſly pleaſed to return to them. They likewiſe looked after Moſes, in expectation of what would be the event of this tranſaction.

Ver. 11. And the Lord ſpake unto Moſes face to face.] In a familiar manner, which did not affright or aſtoniſh him, by a dreadful diſplay of his awful majeſty; which, in the ſight of the children of Iſrael, was cloathed with terror, and had the appearance of devouring fire, chap. xxiv. 17. but was repreſented to Moſes, in a milder and more chearful brightneſs. The like expreſſion, in Numb. xii. 8. ſeems to relate only, to the diſcourſe he had with Moſes, which was attended with a condeſcending perſpicuity, delivered by an articulate voice; not in viſions and dreams, and obſcure reſemblances: And ſo it may be underſtood here, as Maimonides takes it, More Nevoch. p. iii. ch. 45. But Abarbinel thinks, that theſe expreſſions intimate, that God treated with Moſes in his own perſon, not by an ambaſſador, but juſt as one friend converſes with another; and it is a common notion among the Jews, that God did not ſpeak to Moſes by an angel, but immediately by himſelf; which they take to be the import of this phraſe, face to face; but it ſeems to us, rather to imply, the clearneſs and evidence of that divine light, wherein God revealed himſelf to Moſes; whether it was by himſelf, or an angel, is not material: The New Teſtament, however, ſeems to determine this queſtion, when it declares, that, the law it ſelf was given by angels in the hand of a mediator; and accordingly, the old tradition was, that Moſes ſaw things in a clear and bright glaſs; but the reſt of the prophets, in a glaſs that was dim and cloudy.

——— As a man ſpeaks to his friend.] This is added, to ſhew how differently God treated Moſes from all other men; for he is ſaid to have talked face to face with all the Iſraelites, Deut. v. 4. but it was out of the midſt of fire, which infuſed a terror into their ſouls; whereas, he converſed with Moſes, out of the midſt of a glorious but reviving radiance, which filled him with the utmoſt ſatisfaction.

—— And he turned again into the camp.] After ſome time ſpent in converſation with the Divine Majeſty, Moſes returned to comfort the people, and, in all probability, with hopes of recovering the favour of the Deity they had offended, of which they might have entirely deſpaired, if this leader had been long abſent from them.

But his ſervant Joſhua a young man, departed not out of the tabernacle.] It is difficult to determine for what end Joſhua ſtay'd behind his maſter, and it ſeems not decent, that Moſes ſhould return alone, without his ſervant to attend him. They who are of opinion that he ſtay'd to guard the tabernacle, have no foundation for that ſuppoſition; and they have as little, who ſay he ſtay'd to give judgment in ſmall cauſes which needed not the determination of Moſes, (according to chap. xviii. 26.) for we never read that Joſhua was a judge, but a conſtant attendant upon Moſes's perſon, and therefore the words may better be tranſlated, as they plainly run in the Hebrew, he turned again to the camp, and his ſervant Joſhua the ſon of Nun, a young man; at which there is a ſtop in the Hebrew over the word Naar, young man, to diſtinguiſh theſe from the following words, which are,—Departed not out of the tabernacle.] That is, the Lord departed not from them, but his preſence remained there, and would advance into the camp as Moſes did: This interpretation is the more conſonant to probability, becauſe the laſt words in the Hebrew are out of the midſt of the tabernacle, which cannot refer to Joſhua, becauſe he did not go thither, but only Moſes, who converſed alone with the Divine Majeſty. Why Joſhua is called a young man, when he was near 60 years old, is not eaſy to be accounted for. Perhaps, it ſignifies a valiant man, for ſuch he really was; or, he had waited on Moſes from his youth; or, as Maimonides, this is the phraſe of the Hebrew nation, who call all men young, till they begin to decay; as Joſeph is ſo ſtyled when he was 30 years old, Gen. xlii. 2. More Nevoch. P. ii. c. 32.

Ver. 12. And Moſes ſaid unto the Lord.] When or where Moſes ſpake what follows, we are not here informed: It is likely, that after he was ſatisfied the Iſraelites were very penitent, he returned to the tabernacle, and there made this addreſs to the Divine Majeſty, for a perfect reconciliation with his choſen people. —See thou ſay'ſt unto me, bring up this people, and thou haſt not let me know, whom thou wilt ſend with me, yet thou haſt ſaid, I know thee by name, and thou haſt alſo found grace in my ſight.] Thou haſt only ſaid thou wilt ſend an angel before me, but I hope to obtain greater favour from thee, which thou haſt not yet declared to me; and I have no heart to proceed, if thou thy ſelf wilt not guide us in the pillar of cloud, as thou haſt hitherto done, and dwell among us as thou didſt promiſe in thy ſanctuary. This ſeems to be the ſenſe, (if this verſe be compared with the 15th,) and not barely, that he did not know what angel he would ſend with him.

With reſpect to this expreſſion, yet thou haſt ſaid, I know thee by name, the Chaldees take it to be the ſame with what is ſaid of Bezaleel, whom God called by name, ch. xxxi. 2. that is particularly deſigned him to be employed in making the tabernacle, and all its veſſels and appendages. But to know, is more than to call, and it intimates God's ſpecial love and kindneſs to Moſes, above all men, as the Seventy interpret it.

Ver. 13. Now therefore I pray thee, if I have found grace in thy ſight, ſhew me now thy way.] The interpretation of Maimonides (More Nevoch. p. i. ch. 54) is too much ſtrained, who thinks Moſes here deſires to be inſpired with a knowledge of the Divine Attributes; as, ver. 18 he deſires the ſight of his glory. But the plain meaning of this prayer is, that God himſelf would conduct him, and ſhew him the way wherein he ſhould lead his people, unto their reſt in the land of Canaan, ch. xxxii. 34. —That I may know thee, that I may find grace in thy ſight.] that I may be fully aſſured of thy gracious acceptance of me, —And conſider that this nation is thy people.] I do not beg this meerly upon my own account, but for thoſe who have been redeemed by thee, out of the land of Egypt, and have engaged themſelves to be thine by a ſolemn covenant, and now return unto thee by repentance, ver. 6.

Ver. 14. And he ſaid, my preſence ſhall go with thee.] In the Hebrew, it is my face; i. e. I my ſelf, as the LXX. tranſlate it My Majeſty; as the Chaldee. God promiſes to continue with them as he had hitherto done, and not to ſend an angel to accompany them, but to lead and guide them himſelf, by the pillar of the cloud, and his glorious preſence in the tabernacle.

——— And I will give thee reſt.] Some think theſe words are particularly ſpoken to Moſes, and ſignify, that God would give him eaſe in this point, and quiet his mind, (which was now very anxious with reſpect to the departure of the divine preſence from the Iſraelites) by returning to them; but as the foregoing words are a promiſe from the Deity, that he would take the conduct of the people again upon himſelf, ſo is this, that he would not leave them, till he had brought them to the reſt he had pre-ordained them to enjoy in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 15. And he ſaid unto him, if thy preſence go not with us.] Some tranſlate theſe words thus; for he, (i. e. Moſes) had ſaid unto him, (i. e. to God,) if thy preſence, &c. ſo that theſe words and the following, are the reaſon of God's anſwer to him, verſe 14. and if they be not thus taken, one would have expected Moſes ſhould rather have given God thanks for his gracious promiſe, than further preſſed him to it; but the 17th verſe doth not well agree with this, and therefore theſe words are to be conſidered, only as part of what Moſes ſaid to God, after his promiſe, that his preſence ſhould go with him; which he acknowledged to be the greater favour, becauſe otherwiſe, he had rather never ſtir from the place where they now were.

—— Carry us not up hence.] Let us go no further, if thou thy ſelf do'ſt not lead and guide us in our way.

Ver. 16. For wherein ſhall it be known here, that I and thy people have found grace in thy ſight?] How ſhall all the people round about us be convinced, that we are not abandoned by thee in this wilderneſs? — Is it not in that thou goeſt with us?] Is not this the great demonſtration of it, that thou leadeſt us in a pillar of cloud and fire, day and night? — So ſhall we be ſeparated, I and thy people, from all the people that are upon the face of the earth.] This will diſtinguiſh us, while it continues among us, from all the other people whatſoever; none of whom have ſuch an indication of thy preſence with them. The manna indeed continued all this time to deſcend for their ſuſtenance, and it really was a miraculous food, but it might have been aſcribed to other cauſes, if this glorious manifeſtation of God's preſence had not ſtill appeared among them.

Ver. 17. And the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, I will do this thing alſo that thou haſt ſpoken.] That is, I will diſtinguiſh you from all other people, not only by leading you in a pillar of cloud and fire, but by dwelling among you as I deſigned, chap. xxv. 8.

—— For thou haſt found grace in my ſight, and I know thee by name.] God owns Moſes ſtill, to be moſt acceptable and dear to him, as he had been, ver. 12. and therefore, at his interceſſion, promiſes to be perfectly reconciled, and to return to his people.

Ver. 18. And he ſaid, I beſeech thee, ſhew me thy glory.] In the Hebrew the word is hareni, make me to ſee thy glory; where Maimonides takes the word ſee to ſignify, apprehend with the underſtanding, not with the bodily eye, More Nevoch. P. 1. c. 4. For by glory, he there underſtands the divine eſſence, which he repreſents Moſes as ſollicitous to apprehend. But it is not likely that ſuch a man as he ſhould think this poſſible. The ſame author thus explains himſelf, in his book De fundamentis legis, c. 1. n. 10. Moſes deſired to know the truth of the Divine eſſence, as one man knows another whoſe face he beholds, and whoſe image is ſo engraven in his mind, that he exiſts there, diſtinguiſh'd from all other men: So he begs that the Divine eſſence might be diſtinct, in his mind, from all other eſſences, till he knew the truth of it, as it is in it ſelf. But he confeſſes, in another place in that book, ch. 64. that, by the glory of the Lord, is many times underſtood a created light, or ſplendor, whereby God miraculouſly diſplays his majeſty. And we can ſee no reaſon, why it ſhould not ſo ſignify here, and the meaning be, That he deſired to ſee that glorious preſence (or face of God, as it is call'd) which he promiſed ſhould go with them; not veiled in a cloud, but beaming in its full ſplendor and majeſty. For, hearing him ſpeak from the Schechinah, he ſuppoſed, perhaps, that God appeared there in ſome viſible ſhape, with which he deſired to be acquainted. To confirm this, it is obſervable, that God himſelf, in his anſwer to Moſes, calls this glory his face, ver. 20. as he had done ver. 14, 15. And thus Rabbi Jehudah, in the book of Coſri, part 4. ſect. 3. (towards the latter end of it) ſeems to have underſtood it.

Ver. 19. And he ſaid, I will make all my goodneſs paſs before thee.] The ſignification of this paſſage, according to Maimonides, is, that God enabled Moſes to underſtand the nature of all creatures, and how they are knit and united together, and after what manner they are governed, both in general, and particular; becauſe, when God had made all his works, he ſaw that they were very good, Gen. i. 31. But that text is a very ſlender ground for ſuch an interpretation. The LXX. ſeem to have thought better, who interpret this paſſage, παρελεύσομαι σοῦ τὴν δόξην μου. I will paſs before thee with my glory. That is, God promiſes to give him a tranſient view of his glory, while it paſſed by him, ver. 22. tho' it could not be ſeen in its full majeſty; and then the word tobh, which we tranſlate, my goodneſs, muſt rather be render'd, my beauty; it being the ſame with glory, only a ſofter word, to expreſs ſuch a degree of its ſplendor as would not hurt him, but be rather delightful to him. And thus the word tobh is uſed, in the ſecond chapter of this book, ver. 2. and 1 Sam. ix. 2. Or, if this be not the meaning, all his goodneſs muſt ſignify his gracious intentions concerning the children of Iſrael, to whom, he aſſures him, he would fulfil all his promiſes, which was ſufficient for Moſes to know.

——And I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee.] The LXX. ſeem to have underſtood this right, when they tranſlated it, "I will call to thee by my name, (ſaying) "The Lord is before thee." That is, leſt, when I paſs by thee, thou ſhouldſt not obſerve it, I will admoniſh thee, by a voice calling to thee, and telling thee, that now the Lord is preſenting himſelf to thee: And ſo we find he did, ch. xxxiv. 6.

——And will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will ſhew mercy on whom I will ſhew mercy.] This is the ſubſtance of the words, which God tells him he would proclaim, after notice given of his preparing to paſs by him: And their meaning is, that he would diſpenſe his favours, according to his own good pleaſure, as he did now to Moſes, unto whom he vouchſafed ſuch a revelation of himſelf, as he did not make to others. For thus he explains it, ch. xxxiv. 6, 7. where he tells him, he would be very gracious, patient, and long-ſuffering unto ſome; but puniſh ſeverely the iniquity of others.

Ver. 20. And he ſaid, Thou canſt not ſee my face: for there ſhall no man ſee me, and live.] This paſſage is well explained by Rabbi Jehudah, in Sepher Coſri, p. 4. ſect. 3. "As for the glory mentioned in Scripture, there is one "of ſuch a nature, that the eyes of the Prophets could "ſuſtain it; another ſo pure and bright, to ſuch an high "degree, that no Prophet is able to apprehend it: But if "he venture to look upon it, his compoſition is diſſolved, "i. e. he dies." Such was the glory here ſpoken of; a ſplendor ſo great and piercing, that none could behold it.

Ver. 21. And the Lord ſaid, Behold there is a place by me.] It is not very evident, by the hiſtorical account given by Moſes, from what particular place God ſpake to him; it is moſt likely, from the mount, where he had long converſed with him. Or, if it was from the tabernacle, where his glory appeared, ver. 9. and continued, ver. 11. that was not far from the mount, where he tells him he would make his glory paſs before him.

——And thou ſhalt ſtand upon a rock.] It is probable this was the rock in Horeb, where the Lord had formerly appeared to Moſes, ch. xvii. 6.

Verſes 22, 23. And it ſhall come to paſs while my glory paſſeth by, that I will put thee in a cliſt of the rock; and will cover thee with my hand while I paſs by. And I will take away mine hand, and thou ſhalt ſee my back parts: but my face ſhall not be ſeen.] It muſt be owned, that the account which Moſes gives us of this divine viſion, is none of the cleareſt, and that ſome of the expreſſions he uſes, ſuch as that he ſhould not ſee God's face, but only his back, &c. have induced ſome free-thinkers to tax him, and all the Jews after him, with being Anthropomorphites, till they learned a more refined divinity from the Babylonians, during their captivity. But it muſt be remembered, that Moſes ſpake to a groſs and carnal people, in a language far from being copious, eſpecially in words or idioms, ſuitable either to the Deity, or to the dignity of the preſent glorious tranſaction: And that it is therefore no wonder, if he borrows his expreſſions from outward and ſenſible objects and actions. It is plain, that thoſe who wrote in Greek, which is vaſtly more rich than the Hebrew, even the very writers of the New Teſtament, and the primitive fathers, fathers, who were the fartheſt from having any ſuch abſurd ideas of the Godhead, have been forced to make uſe of the ſame figurative expreſſions, in many places of their writings, for want of more proper and intelligible words, which were equally wanting in that, as well as in the other tongue. Neither doth it appear, that the Jews themſelves underſtand the words of Moſes, in that groſs ſenſe; becauſe it is plain, that they had a notion that this angel, or apparition, which directed them through the wilderneſs, was the Meſſiah, who did then take a viſible appearance, which they called Schechinah, from ſhakan, to dwell under, which delivered his oracles and commands to them. Which Schechinah, tho' ſome underſtand it of all the appearances of God from the beginning; and others, either of the Schechinah of fire and water, or of the fiery and cloudy pillar; yet all agree, that it was the Kiſſe hakabod, the throne of glory; which was one of the ſeven things which they affirm to have been created before the world.

However, to diſculpate at once the Jewiſh law-giver from ſuch an imputation, we need but call to mind the glorious deſcriptions he gives, almoſt every where, eſpecially in Deuteronomy, of the Godhead; what pains he takes, to deter the Jews from making any repreſentation of it under any form whatſoever, by reminding them, that when God was pleaſed to diſplay his glory upon mount Sinai, at the promulgation of the Ten Commandments, they ſaw no ſhape nor likeneſs, but only heard his dreadful voice. Theſe ſo frequent inculcations may therefore be looked upon as a key to them, how to underſtand all thoſe other expreſſions which he had been obliged to accommodate to their capacity, that is, not in a literal ſenſe, but in ſuch a one as was worthy of the Deity, and the dignity of the ſubject.

CHAP. XXXIV.

1 The tables are renewed. 5 The name of the LORD proclaimed. 8 Moſes entreateth God to go with them. 10 God maketh a covenant with them, repeating certain duties of the firſt table. 28 Moſes, after forty days in the mount, cometh down with the tables. 29 His face ſhineth, and he covereth it with a vail.

AND the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Hew thee two tables of ſtone like unto the firſt: and I will write upon theſe tables the words which were in the firſt tables which thou brakeſt.

2 And be ready in the morning, and come up in the morning unto mount Sinai, and preſent thy ſelf there to me, in the top of the mount.

3 And no man ſhall come up with thee, neither let any man be ſeen throughout all the mount: neither let the flocks nor herds feed before that mount.

4 ¶ And he hewed two tables of ſtone, like unto the firſt; and Moſes roſe up early in the morning, and went up unto mount Sinai, as the LORD had commanded him, and took in his hand the two tables of ſtone.

5 And the LORD deſcended in the cloud, and ſtood with him there, and proclaimed the name of the LORD.

6 And the LORD paſſed by before him, and proclaimed, The LORD, The LORD God, merciful and gracious, long-ſuffering, and abundant in goodneſs and truth,

7 Keeping mercy for thouſands, forgiving iniquity and tranſgreſſion and ſin, and that will by no means clear the guilty; viſiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the childrens children, unto the third, and to the fourth generation.

8 And Moſes made haſte, and bowed his head toward the earth, and worſhipped.

9 And he ſaid, if now I have found grace in thy ſight, O Lord, let my Lord, I pray thee, go amongſt us (for it is a ſtiff-necked people) and pardon our iniquity and our ſin, and take us for thine inheritance.

10 ¶ And he ſaid, Behold, I make a covenant: before all thy people I will do marvels, ſuch as have not been done in all the earth, nor in any nation: and all the people amongſt which thou art, ſhall ſee the work of the LORD: for it is a terrible thing that I will do with thee.

11 Obſerve thou that which I command thee this day: Behold, I drive out before thee the Amorite, and the Canaanite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, and the Hivite, and the Jebuſite.

12 Take heed to thy ſelf leſt thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land whither thou goeſt, leſt it be for a ſnare in the midſt of thee.

13 But ye ſhall deſtroy their altars, break their images, and cut down their groves.

14 For thou ſhalt worſhip no other God: for the LORD, whoſe name is Jealous, is a jealous God:

15 Leſt thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land, and they go a whoring after their gods, and do ſacrifice unto their gods, and one call thee, and thou eat of his ſacrifice.

16 And thou take of their daughters unto thy ſons, and their daughters go a whoring after their gods, and make thy ſons go a whoring after their gods.

17 Thou ſhalt make thee no molten gods.

18 ¶ The feaſt of unleavened bread ſhalt thou keep: Seven days ſhalt thou eat unleavened bread, as I commanded thee in the time of the month Abib: for in the month Abib thou cameſt out from Egypt.

19 All that openeth the matrix is mine: and every firſtling among thy cattle whether ox or ſheep, that is male.

20 But

20 But the firſtling of an aſs thou ſhalt redeem with a lamb: and if thou redeem him not, then ſhalt thou break his neck. All the firſt-born of thy ſons thou ſhalt redeem: and none ſhall appear before me empty.

21 ¶ Six days thou ſhalt work, but on the ſeventh day thou ſhalt reſt: in earing-time and in harveſt thou ſhalt reſt.

22 ¶ And thou ſhalt obſerve the feaſt of weeks, of the firſt-fruits of wheat-harveſt, and the feaſt of in-gathering at the years end.

23 ¶ Thrice in the year ſhall all your men-children appear before the Lord GOD, the God of Iſrael.

24 For I will caſt out the nations before thee, and enlarge thy borders: neither ſhall any man deſire thy land, when thou ſhalt go up to appear before the LORD thy God, thrice in the year.

25 Thou ſhalt not offer the blood of my ſacrifice with leaven, neither ſhall the ſacrifice of the feaſt of paſſover be left unto the morning.

26 The firſt of the firſt-fruits of thy land thou ſhalt bring unto the houſe of the LORD thy God. Thou ſhalt not ſeethe a kid in his mothers milk.

27 And the LORD ſaid unto Moſes, Write thou theſe words: for after the tenour of theſe words I have made a covenant with thee and with Iſrael.

28 And he was there with the LORD forty days and forty nights; he did neither eat bread, nor drink water: and he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments.

29 ¶ And it came to paſs when Moſes came down from mount Sinai (with the two tables of teſtimony in Moſes hand when he came down from the mount) that Moſes wiſt not that the skin of his face ſhone, while he talked with him.

30 And when Aaron and all the children of Iſrael ſaw Moſes, behold, the skin of his face ſhone, and they were afraid to come nigh him.

31 And Moſes called unto them; and Aaron and all the rulers of the congregation returned unto him: and Moſes talked with them.

32 And afterward all the children of Iſrael came nigh: and he gave them in commandment all that the LORD had ſpoken with him in mount Sinai.

33 And till Moſes had done ſpeaking with them, he put a vail on his face.

34 But when Moſes went in before the LORD to ſpeak with him, he took the vail off, until he came out. And he came out, and ſpake unto the children of Iſrael, that which he was commanded.

35 And the children of Iſrael ſaw the face of Moſes, that the skin of Moſes face ſhone: and Moſes put the vail upon his face again until he went in to ſpeak with him.

Ver. 1. And the Lord ſaid unto Moſes, Hew thee two tables of ſtone like unto the firſt: and I will write upon theſe tables the words that were in the firſt tables, which thou brakeſt.] Moſes having obtained a promiſe of pardon for the people, and of greater favour to himſelf than had been hitherto ſhewn him, God directs him here to diſpoſe things for the performance of both.

With reſpect to the new tables of ſtone, which are here repreſented to be the work of God himſelf, we, to avoid repetitions, refer the reader to our annotations on the 12th verſe of the 24th chapter of this book, where the ſeeming contradictions in the Moſaic account of theſe tables have received a ſolution.

Ver. 5. And the Lord deſcended in the cloud, and ſtood with him there, and proclaimed the name of the Lord.] The Schechinah, or Divine Majeſty, called alſo the glory of the Lord, deſcended in the cloud, wherein it had appeared from the beginning of the deliverance of the Iſraelites, and which had lately appeared to Moſes in the tabernacle, ch. xxxiii. 9. when the cloudy pillar deſcended, and ſtood at the door of that ſacred place, while the Lord converſed with Moſes there: After which, 'tis probable, the divine glory in the cloud re-aſcended toward heaven, and now came down again upon this occaſion, and reſted on the top of the mount where Moſes now was, and where the name of the Lord was proclaimed; the import of which expreſſion is, that God gave Moſes notice of his ſacred preſence, agreeable to his promiſe in chap. xxxiii. ver. 19.

Ver. 6. And the Lord paſſed by before him.] This paſſage is tranſlated by Onkelos thus, the Lord made his Majeſty to paſs before him; which expoſition Maimonides acknowledges to be right, and confirmed by the ſcripture itſelf, when it declares, chap. xxxiii. 22. While my glory paſſeth by, &c. which, he confeſſes, ſignifies, not the divine eſſence itſelf, but ſome created ſplendour, which no eye was able to behold, More Nevoch. P. 1. ch. 21.

— And proclaimed.] As the glory of the Lord paſſed by, Moſes heard a voice proclaiming this deſcription of the divine nature.

— The Lord.] Some join the next word to this, as if the voice ſaid, The Lord, the Lord, the more to awaken the attention of Moſes to what he heard; ſee chap. xxxiii. 19. This name of God ſignifies, his ſelf-exiſtence, and his abſolute dominion over all creatures, who received their being from him; ſee chap. vi. 3.

— God.] The Hebrew word el ſignifies ſtrong and mighty, in one word, i. e. his irreſiſtable power, Job. ix. 4.

— Merciful.] The word rachum ſignifies tender mercies, ſuch as parents are affected with towards their children, when their bowels yearn over them.

— And gracious.] We call that chaninah (grace or favour) ſaith Maimonides, which we beſtow on any man to whom we owe nothing, Gen. xxxiii. ver. 5. and 11. and therefore God is here called Chanum, gracious, with reſpect to thoſe whom he created, and whom he likewiſe preſerves and governs, tho' he is not obliged by any right to theſe acts of beneficence, More Nevoch. P. 1. ch. 45.

— Long-ſuffering.] So ſlow to anger, that he doth not preſently puniſh thoſe who offend him, but bears long with their guilty conduct.

Abundant in goodneſs.] The Hebrew word cheſed, which we tranſlate goodneſs, ſignifies, as Maimonides obſerves, (More Nevoch. P. iii.) the exceſs and higheſt degree of any any thing whatſoever; but eſpecially the greateſt benignity: And therefore, with the addition of rabb, abundant, it denotes, long continued kindneſs, as is more fully declared in the next verſe.

—— And truth.] Moſt faithful and conſtant to his promiſes; which he ſtedfaſtly keeps throughout all generations. The word abundant refers both to this, and to his benignity, Pſalm cxlvi. 6.

Ver. 7. Keeping mercy for thouſands.] The ſame word cheſed, which we before tranſlated goodneſs, is here render'd mercy: And the Hebrews, obſerving the letter nun to be greater in the word notzer, keeping, than is uſual, fancy, that it denotes the immenſe treaſures of the divine bounty. But the word thouſands fully explains how abundant his mercy is.

— Forgiving iniquity, and tranſgreſſion, and ſin.] Here are three words, to ſignify all ſorts of offences which God paſſes by, till men grow intolerably wicked. Some diſtinguiſh them, by making iniquity ſignify, offences againſt men; the word tranſgreſſions, offences againſt God himſelf; and the word ſin, all the errors and follies which men are guilty of, in the conduct of themſelves; but they may as well ſignify the offences which were committed againſt the moral, ceremonial, and political laws.

—— And that will by no means clear the guilty.] Theſe words, according to Maimonides, belong ſtill to the loving-kindneſs of God, as all the foregoing do; ſignifying, that when he puniſhes, he will not utterly deſtroy, and make deſolate. For ſo the Hebrew words, nakkeh lo jenakkeh, he thinks, are to be literally rendred, in extirpating he will not extirpate; as the word nakah, he obſerves, is uſed, Iſa. iii. 26. ſhe ſhall ſit deſolate on the earth. And to the ſame ſenſe theſe words are expounded by many modern interpreters; particularly, Lud. Dieu, when he empties, he will not empty, or make quite deſolate. For the maxim of the Hebrew is, (as Maimonides there obſerves, More Nevoch. P. 1. ch. 54.) "That the property of "goodneſs far excels that of ſeverity, for here being thir-"teen properties of God mentioned," (tho' we can find but ten, beſides the name of the Lord) "there is but one of "them belongs to the latter (viz. that which follows) all "the reſt belong to the former." And indeed, we find, that Moſes urges thoſe very words, among others, why God ſhould not deſtroy the Iſraelites, as one man, Numb. xiv. 18. which had been very improper, if God would by no means clear the guilty.

— Viſiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children.] This is meant, ſays the ſame Maimonides, only of the ſin of idolatry; for which God threatens, in the ſecond commandment, this puniſhment to the third and fourth generations, upon thoſe that hate him; for no man is called an hater of God but an idolater; according to what we read, Deut. xii. 31. Every abomination which the Lord hateth, &c.

— Unto the third and fourth generations.] God mentions, ſaith the ſame author, no generation beyond theſe; becauſe the utmoſt that any man can live to ſee of his ſeed, is the fourth generation; and therefore when an idolatrous city was deſtroyed, the old idolater, with his children, grand-children, and great-grand-children, were all cut off, according to the precept, Deut. xiii. 15. Deſtroy it utterly, and all that is therein. The ſenſe of the whole ſeems to be, that this is the glory of the divine majeſty, that he hath a ſovereign dominion over all, becauſe he is the fountain of being, the original of all things, moſt powerful to accompliſh what he pleaſes, and ſo merciful, that he delights to beſtow his benefits unasked, and ſo gracious, as to continue them to the unthankful; bearing long with them, when they provoke him; multiplying favours on thoſe who have no merit; and faithfully performing his promiſes, tho' never ſo great; doing good to a thouſand generations of thoſe who adhere faithfully to him, and do not apoſtatize from him: for he pardons innumerable offences, of all ſorts, that are committed againſt his laws; and when the provocations are ſo great, that they call aloud for puniſhment, he proceeds not to the utmoſt extremity, till there be no remedy; but then he puniſhes idolaters in a terrible manner, to the third and fourth generation.

Ver. 8. And Moſes made haſte, and bowed his head toward the earth, and worſhipped.] This humble deportment was occaſioned by the tranſport of joy with which Moſes was affected at ſo glorious a ſight, and ſuch glorious words: He immediately worſhipp'd God with the moſt profound reverence, acknowledging his great condeſcenſion to him.

Ver. 9. And he ſaid, If now I have found grace in thy ſight, O Lord, let my Lord, I pray thee, go among us.] Upon the mention of the laſt property of the Divine majeſty, namely, Viſiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children; Moſes ſeems to have been afraid, that God might be provoked to proceed to thoſe ſeverities againſt the Iſraelites, who lately had apoſtatized from him. He therefore again beſeeches him he would be ſo gracious, tho' they ſhould again offend him, as to continue his preſence among them, which he had threatened to withdraw, ch. xxxiii. 3.

For it is a ſtiff necked people.] If we adhere to this tranſlation, the meaning is, they needed ſuch a governour, by whoſe authority and preſence, they might be kept in awe, and cured of their perverſeneſs. But the particle Ki, which we here tranſlate for, often ſignifies tho', and may be very fitly ſo rendered here: and then the meaning is, tho' they be very refractory, chap. xxxii. 9. yet do not forſake them, and leave them to themſelves; but ſtill conduct them as thou haſt done.

And pardon our iniquity and our ſin, and take us for thine inheritance.] Since thou art ſo ready to forgive, (ver. 7.) do not cut us off for our late offences, but ſtill continue to own us for thy peculiar people. This Moſes had begg'd of God before, and obtained a promiſe of it, ch. xxxiii. 16, 17. (and ſee xix. 5.) and now he beſeeches him, out of his goodneſs which he had proclaimed, to confirm that promiſe, and not to revoke it upon every new provocation.

Ver. 10. And he ſaid, behold I make a covenant.] Herein God verified the truth of what he had proclaimed, being ſo merciful and gracious, as not only to confirm his promiſe, but to turn it into a covenant, like that at the giving of his laws from mount Sinai, chap. xxiv. 3, 7, &c. which he renews with them in the next verſe, where he engages to drive out the inhabitants of Canaan before them; and then requires them to take care not to imitate their idolatry.

——Before thy people will I do marvels, ſuch as have not been done in all the earth, &c.] This ſeems to relate to all the wonderful works he intended to accompliſh in their introduction into the land of Canaan, by making the waters of Jordan retire, and the walls of Jericho fall down, with the reſt that followed, till they got poſſeſſion of their inheritance.

— For it is a terrible thing that I will do with thee.] Such as ſhall declare the almighty power of the Divine Majeſty; and ſtrike a terror into all thoſe who oppoſe him, at the ſame time that it ſhall demonſtrate (in an aſtoniſhing manner) his fidelity to his people. For all this is ſaid, to confirm their belief of the covenant God promiſed to make with them, in the beginning of the verſe.

Ver. 12. Take heed to thy ſelf.] God now renewing that covenant with them, which they had broken by worſhipping the golden calf, repeats the principal precepts which concerned his worſhip and ſervice, (which had been delivered to them before) and excites them to the obſervation of them, by the addition of a very gracious promiſe, ver. 24.

Leſt thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land whither thou goeſt.] Nothing could be more reaſonable then this, that they ſhould not enter into friendſhip with thoſe nations, whom he commanded them to expel for their abominable wickedneſs; unleſs they would renounce their idolatry, and come under their government. See 23, 32. and Mr. Selden lib. 6. de Jure N. and G. in the latter end of the 13th chapter, and beginning of the next.

Ver. 13. But ye ſhall deſtroy their altars, break their images, and cut down their groves.] This more largely explains what was briefly and ſummarily delivered in ch. xxiii. 32. Thou ſhalt not make a covenant with their gods; and ver. 24. Thou ſhalt quite break down their images. Which images and altars were uſually ſet up in groves, as ſacred places; being the temples of their gods. See 2 Kings xxiii. 24. For when Tacitus declares, lib. de Moribus Germanorum, that the Old Germans went to war as if God, whom they believed to be preſent with them, had commanded them to have recourſe to arms; he tells us, Effigieſque & ſigna quædam detracta lucis ad prælium ferunt. They carried with them into the battles certain images and ſigns, which they took out of their groves. Theſe, in all probability, were the images of their gods, who, they imagined, fought for them, as Joh. Filesacus conjectures, lib. 2. Selectorum, c. 5. de Ceremoniis, sec. 7. where he observes, that these groves were impure places, not only on account of the images and altars of their false gods that were erected there, but likewise because all manner of impurities were committed under those shades, which made Horace call them Parum castos lucos, in the latter end of the 12th Ode.

Some of the Hebrews restrained this precept only to the land of Canaan, where they were bound to destroy all things belonging to the religion of those idolatrous people, in whose place they were planted, that they might not be infected with their impiety. See Deut. xii. 2, 3. But in other countries, which they conquer'd, they imagined they were not bound to root it out. Yet, afterwards, they saw it necessary to extend this precept to all idolatrous countries, which came under their power, where they destroyed their idols, as they had done in Canaan, lest, by imitation, their polity should have been quite subverted, as Josephus declares. See Mr. Selden, lib. 2. De Jure, N. & G. c. 2.

Ver. 15. Lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land.] That is, a covenant of marriage, (for covenants in general were forbidden before, ver. 12.) which he commands them not to contract with the inhabitants of Canaan, nor with any idolaters whatever. For tho' some of the Jews would restrain this to the seven nations only; yet the generality of them agree, that it is meant of all other idolatrous people; and there is an illustrious argument of it in the 9th and 10th chapters of Ezra, and Nehemiah xiii. 25. This they will have to be as old as the law of circumcision, which they gather from Gen. xxxiv. 14. and it held throughout all following ages; insomuch, that Mohammed forbids all the women of his religion to marry any one who is not made a musselman, i. e. a believer of his doctrine. As for such as were converted from idolatry, it was always lawful to marry them; but they were so far from having any such alliance with others, that the Talmudists held it absolutely unlawful to have any congress with a Pagan woman. Whence that character which Tacitus gives of the Jews, Projectissima ad libidinem gens, alienarum concubitu abstinet. See Selden, lib. 5. De Jure, N. & G. c. 12.

——And they go a whoring after their gods, and do sacrifice to their gods.] Of which there was great danger, if they loved their wives; who would have a great ascendant over them (as appears by Solomon, 1 Kings xi. 2, 3, &c.) to entice them to their religion. Of this phrase, Going a whoring after their gods, see Seld. Uxor. Hebr. l. 3. c. 23.

——And one call thee.] Invite thee (as the manner was) to the feast that was usually made, upon the sacrifices offered to their gods: As the Israelites ate of the peace-offerings, and invited their friends to partake with them.

——And thou eat of his sacrifice.] By this we see how ancient and universal the custom of feasting upon sacrifices was, which Mr. Mede truly calls epulæ fœderales, federal feasts, (upon Malachi ii.) for the food was God's, being set upon his table; of which he inviting the offerers to partake, they were his guests; whom he entertain'd at his table, in token of reconciliation and friendship with him. And therefore all those who ate of the sacrifices offered to other gods, professed themselves to be their worshippers and servants; which made the Jews so cautious in this matter, that they would not so much as drink the wine, or the water, or use the salt of an idolater, not knowing but it might have been set before an idol. See Rabbi Levi Barzelonita, in the explication of the 112th Precept. This explains the discourse of the Apostle, 1 Cor. x. 20.

Ver. 27. And the Lord said unto Moses, Write thou these words: For after the tenour of these words, I have made a covenant with thee, and with Israel.] The Jews are so blind as to found their oral tradition upon this place, and upon one small word, (Pi) which signifies, indeed, mouth: But, it is likewise an expletive particle, denoting the manner and value of any thing; as appears from Gen. xiv. 7. Lev. xxvii. 18. and therefore here rightly translated the tenour of these words. Yet Rabbi Johannes, in the very beginning of Halicoth Olam, gathers from hence, that God made a covenant now with their fathers, concerning all the unwritten laws delivered by word of mouth; unto which, while they adhere, they can never understand their divine writings: For what can be more plain, than that the covenant, here mentioned, was ordered to be written.

Ver. 28. And he was there with the Lord forty days and forty nights; he did neither eat bread, nor drink water: And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments.] Buxtorf quotes a Jewish proverb out of the large comment on Exodus, with respect to this miraculous fasting of Moses; which is to this purpose: "That above, where there is neither eating nor drinking, "Moses stay'd 80 days, and became like the angels; and "below, where men do eat and drink, ministring angels "came down and eat and drank like them." By which one would be apt to think they attributed both the one and the other, rather to a change of climate, than to a miracle. However, without enquiring whether Moses, and, afterwards, Christ, were miraculously supported, without any kind of sustenance, or not; we beg leave to observe, that the words which Christ quotes from Moses, that man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word which proceeds out of the mouth of God, Matth. iv. 4. out of Deut. viii. 3. contain an Hebraism which cannot be retained in a version, without conveying a wrong idea. Word, in the original, often signifies thing, and is frequently used in that sense, in the New Testament; as where it is said, and we are witnesses of these words, that is, of these things, or transactions. The text ought therefore to have been rendered, Man doth not live by bread alone, but by every thing that God hath appointed or ordained for his nourishment. Since it is plain, that Moses speaks in the place quoted, not of his fasting, but of the manna which God gave the Israelites, instead of bread.

Ver. 29. And it came to pass, when Moses came down from mount Sinai (with the two tables of testimony in Moses hand, when he came down from the mount) that Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone.] There was a radiant splendor in his countenance; which is the import of the Hebrew Karan, which the Vulgate translates horned; not imagining Moses had horns, but rays of light, which imitated horns; and therefore, the Hebrew word Karnaim signifies both; and R. Solomon Jarchi, upon this place, calls these rays on the face of Moses, horns of magnificence, as Mr. Selden observes, L. ii. de Jure, N. & G. c. 9. p. 292. it is not improbable, that the hair of his head was interspersed with beams of light, as well, as that rays came from his face; which dazzled the eyes of the beholders. And painters would have shewn more judgment, if, instead of expressing horns upon the forehead of this great law-giver, they had represented him with a glory crowning his head, as the saints are usually painted in the Roman Church; and which manner, perhaps, came from the ancient custom among the Heathens, who thus represented their gods; as Tho. Bartholinus observes, (de Morbis Biblicis, cap. v.) out of Lucian de Dea Syria, where he saith, that she did ἐπὶ τῇ κεφαλῇ ἀκτῖνας φορέειν carrry beams upon her head. Whence it was, that the Roman emperors, who were raised so much above the rest of mankind that these honoured them as a sort of deities, were thus represented; as appears by many testimonies, particularly Pliny, who in his panegyrick to Trajan, ridicules the radiatum Domitiani caput.

——While he talked with him.] While he conversed so familiarly with the divine majesty, and both saw his glory, and heard him proclaim his name, ver. 5, 6, 7. At his first being in the mount, there was no such brightness left upon his countenance; for he did not see the divine majesty in so much splendor, as he did now; when the Lord, upon his petition, vouchsafed him such a sight of his glory, as he could bear, cap. xxxiii. 18, 23. which was so exceeding piercing, that it alter'd the skin of Moses's face, and made it luminous, of which Moses doth not seem to have been sensible, 'till some time after he came down from the mount, (when Aaron as well as others, were afraid to come nigh him) having his thoughts wholly possessed with the far more transcendant glory of the divine majesty, of which he had a glimpse.

From this familiar conference which Moses had with God, the Heathens might probably take occasions to invent the stories of their Xamolxis, who pretended to receive his laws from Vesta; and of Minos and Lycurgus, who declared, they received theirs from Jupiter and Apollo; with several others mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, l. i. who adds, that Moses had his from the God Jao; so they pronounced pronounced the word Jehovah; but theſe Pagan legiſlators had no ſuch teſtimony as this, of their communication with the divine majeſty; much leſs were their laws confirmed by ſuch miracles, as continued for the ſpace of forty years, under the conduct of Moſes, in the ſight of all the people.

Ver. 30. And when Aaron and all the children of Iſrael ſaw Moſes, behold the skin of his face ſhone.] This circumſtance eſtabliſhed the authority of this great law-giver, and created in the Iſraelites a reverence to the laws he introduced among them: They all beheld the brightneſs or glory of his countenance, (as the Apoſtle calls it, 2 Cor. iii. 7.) which was a demonſtration, that he had been admitted to an interview with God, as he affirmed, and had beheld the glory of his Majeſty, and received from him the tables of teſtimony, by all the children of Iſrael, in this verſe, ſeems to be meant all the rulers of the congregation, mentioned in the next.

——And they were afraid to come nigh him.] The refulgent emanations which darted from his countenance, preſented ſuch an exceſſive radiance to the view, that it dazzled the eyes of the beholders, even of Aaron himſelf; who was uncertain whether it would be ſafe to approach him: This was an illuſtrious teſtimony, that he had been with God, who dwells as the Apoſtle declares, in light inacceſſible.

Ver. 35. And the children of Iſrael ſaw the face of Moſes, and the skin of Moſes face ſhone.] Some great men have thought, that the brightneſs continued upon Moſes's face till his death: ſo that he ſpake to them with a vail on his face, from this time as long as he lived, of which we cannot be certain; tho' thus much is evident, from this and the following verſe, that the ſplendor of his countenance remain'd for ſome time, after he came down from God's preſence in the mount. But during the continuation of his intercourſe with the majeſty of heaven, he took off his vail, as often as he went in to addreſs him, and when he came out to ſpeak to the people he put it on; until he returned to God again. How long it was before this luſtre diſappeared, none can reſolve: Perhaps, not 'till he had ſet up the tabernacle, and conſecrated Aaron and his ſons, and delivered all the laws he had received, with relation to the ſervice of God, which are recorded in the book of Leviticus. That is, all the time they remained near mount Sinai, from whence they removed a little more than half a year after this. Numb. x, xi, xii. &c.

CHAP. XXXV.

1 The ſabbath. 4 The free gifts for the tabernacle. 20 The readineſs of the people to offer. 30 Bezaleel and Aholiab are called to the work.

AND Moſes gathered all the congregation of the children of Iſrael together; and ſaid unto them, Theſe are the words which the LORD hath commanded, that ye ſhould do them.

2 Six days ſhall work be done, but on the ſeventh day there ſhall be to you an holy day, a ſabbath of reſt to the LORD: whoſoever doth work therein, ſhall be put to death.

3 Ye ſhall kindle no fire throughout your habitations upon the ſabbath-day.

4 ¶ And Moſes ſpake unto all the congregation of the children of Iſrael, ſaying, This is the thing which the LORD commanded, ſaying,

5 Take ye from amongſt you an offering unto the LORD: Whoſoever is of a willing heart, let him bring it, an offering of the LORD, gold, and ſilver, and braſs.

6 And blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine linnen, and goats hair,

7 And rams skins died red, and badgers skins, and ſhittim-wood,

8 And oyl for the light, and ſpices for anointing oyl, and for the ſweet incenſe,

9 And onyx-ſtones, and ſtones to be ſet, for the ephod, and for the breaſt-plate.

10 And every wiſe-hearted among you ſhall come and make all that the LORD hath commanded;

11 The tabernacle, his tent, and his covering, his taches, and his boards, his bars, his pillars, and his ſockets,

12 The ark and the ſtaves thereof, with the mercy-ſeat, and the vail of the covering.

13 The table and his ſtaves, and all his veſſels, and the ſhew-bread,

14 The candleſtick alſo for the light, and his furniture, and his lamps, with the oyl for the light,

15 And the incenſe-altar, and his ſtaves, and the anointing oyl, and the ſweet incenſe, and the hanging for the door at the entering in of the tabernacle,

16 The altar of burnt-offering with his braſen-grate, his ſtaves, and all his veſſels, the laver and his foot,

17 The hangings of the court, his pillars, and their ſockets, and the hanging for the door of the court,

18 The pins of the tabernacle, and the pins of the court, and their cords,

19 The clothes of ſervice, to do ſervice in the holy place, the holy garments for Aaron the prieſt, and the garments of his ſons to miniſter in the prieſts office.

20 ¶ And all the congregation of the children of Iſrael departed from the preſence of Moſes.

21 And they came, every one whoſe heart ſtirred him up, and every one whom his ſpirit made willing, and they brought the LORDS offering to the work of the tabernacle of the congregation, and for all his ſervice, and for the holy garments.

22 And they came both men and women, as many as were willing hearted, and brought bracelets, and ear-rings, and rings, and tablets, all jewels of gold: and every man that offered, offered an offering of gold unto the LORD.

23 And

23 And every man with whom was found blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine linen, and goats hair, and red ſkins of rams, and badgers ſkins, brought them.

24 Every one that did offer an offering of ſilver and braſs, brought the LORDS offering: and every man with whom was found ſhittim-wood for any work of the ſervice, brought it.

25 And all the women that were wiſe-hearted, did ſpin with their hands, and brought that which they had ſpun, both of blue, and of purple, and of ſcarlet, and of fine linen.

26 And all the women whoſe heart ſtirred them up in wiſdom, ſpun goats hair.

27 And the rulers brought onyx ſtones, and ſtones to be ſet, for the ephod, and for the breaſt-plate:

28 And ſpice, and oyl for the light, and for the anointing oyl, and for the ſweet incenſe.

29 The children of Iſrael brought a willing offering unto the LORD, every man and woman, whoſe heart made them willing to bring for all manner of work, which the LORD had commanded to be made by the hand of Moſes.

30 ¶ And Moſes ſaid unto the children of Iſrael, See, the LORD hath called by name Bezaleel the ſon of Uri, the ſon of Hur, of the tribe of Judah:

31 And he hath filled him with the ſpirit of God, in wiſdom, in underſtanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanſhip;

32 And to deviſe curious works, to work in gold, and in ſilver, and in braſs,

33 And in the cutting of ſtones to ſet them, and in carving of wood to make any manner of cunning work.

34 And he hath put in his heart that he may teach, both he and Aholiab the ſon of Ahiſamach, of the tribe of Dan.

35 Them hath he filled with wiſdom of heart, to work all manner of work, of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer, in blue, and in purple, in ſcarlet, and in fine linen, and of the weaver, even of them that do any work, and of thoſe that deviſe cunning work.

Ver. 1. And Moſes gathered all the congregation of the children of Iſrael together.] Moſes having told them, what orders he had received from the Lord, and ſufficiently convinced them of his authority, chap. xxxiv. 32, 33. he now proceeds to put them in execution, and in order to it, he gathered col-kadath, all the congregation; which ſometimes ſignifies, all the elders and judges, &c. the prime governours of the people; and ſometimes the whole body of the people, as Corn. Bertram obſerves. De Repub. Jud. c. 6. It ſeems here to be uſed in the firſt ſenſe, for he could not ſpeak theſe words to the whole body of the people, but to the principal perſons of the ſeveral tribes, by whom what he ſaid was communicated to all Iſrael.

Ver. 2. Six days ſhall work be done, but on the ſeventh day there ſhall be to you an holy ſabbath, &c.] This commandment was particularly repeated to Moſes, at the end of all the directions about the building of the tabernacle; and it was now repeated to them, as it was at the late renewal of God's covenant with them, xxxiv. 21. that they might not imagine any of the works here to be done about the tabernacle, &c. would licence them to break the ſabbath: The obſervation of which being the great preſervative of religion, is the reaſon of its being ſo often enjoined. And it is not to be omitted, that he calls it here, as he did, chap. xxxi. 16. where the end and uſe of it is ſet down, the ſabbath of ſabbaths, that is, the great ſabbath or reſt, to repreſent the extraordinary ſolemnity and reverence that were to be inſeparable from that ſacred day.

Ver. 10. And every wiſe hearted among you ſhall come and make all that the Lord hath commanded.] Every skilful perſon in the art of making the things following. The ſame is ſaid of the women, ver. 25. The Hebrew word cochmah, which we tranſlate wiſdom, is uſed variouſly, as Maimonides obſerves; ſometimes for the underſtanding of divine things; ſometimes for moral virtue; and ſometimes for skill in any art (of which he alledges this place as an inſtance) and ſometimes for craft and ſubtilty. See More Nevoch, P. iii. c. 54. The word leb, or heart, is uſed here according to the vulgar opinion of thoſe days, that the heart is the ſeat of the underſtanding. And thus excellent artiſts were by the heathens called wiſe men; and this is the language of Homer himſelf, whoſe verſes concerning Margites are quoted by Ariſtotle in more places than one, (l. 6. Moral. ad Nichomach. c. 7. & l. 5. Moral. ad Eudemum, c. 7.) where he ſaith he was ſo fooliſh, that,

Τὸν δ' ὔτε ἄρ' ϛκαπτῆρα θεοὶ ἔθεσαν ὔτ' ἀρότῆρα
Υ̓́υτ' ἄλλως τι ϛοφόν.

The gods neither made him a ditcher, nor a plowman, nor any other ſort of wiſe man. Upon which Ariſtotle notes, Τὴν δὲ ϛοφίαν ἐν ταῖς τέχναις, τοῖς ἀκριβεςάτοις τὰς τέχνας ἀποδίδομεν. We aſcribe wiſdom in arts to thoſe who excel in them. And then he inſtances in Phidias and Polycletus, two celebrated ſtatuaries.

Ver. 21. And they came, every one, whoſe heart ſtirred him up, and every one whom his ſpirit made willing, and they brought the Lord's offering to the work of the tabernacle of the congregation, and for all his ſervice, and for the holy garments.] They were no leſs forward to offer to the ſervice of God, than they had been to the making the golden calf, for which offence they now make ſome ſort of ſatisfaction, being more liberal in contributing to this work than they were to that; for we read only of their earrings which they brake off from their ears, and brought to Aaron, but here of their bracelets alſo, and rings, with other things; for tho' they may be ſuppoſed to have parted with a great deal, on that impious account, it did not make thoſe, who were touched with what Moſes ſaid, leſs willing to contribute anew to a ſacred uſe.

The Hebrew word comaz, or camaz, which we tranſlate tablets, is of a very uncertain ſignification; for ſome make it an ornament of the arms, and others of ſome other part: But the Chaldee takes it for ſomething about the breaſt; a faſcia, ſaith Elias, wherewith women tied up, and compreſſed their breaſts, to make them appear more beautiful by being round. This interpretation Bochartus approves in his Canaan, l. 2. c. 5.

Ver. 25. All the women, that were wiſe hearted, did ſpin with their hands, and brought that which they had ſpun, &c.] Not only the men, but the women, brought materials for the houſe; and ſuch as were skilful among them ſpun both yarn and thread, which was the proper work of women, not of men. Unto which work alone they were bound to apply themſelves, if by the cuſtom of the place no other work was uſually performed by them, as Mr. Selden obſerves, L. 3. de Uxor. Heb. c. 10. where he treats of all the employments of their women.

Ver.

Ver. 26. And all the women whoſe heart ſtirred them up in wiſdom, ſpun goats-hair. This work was not ſo eaſy, as that of ſpinning wool and flax; for tho' their goats were ſhorn in thoſe countries, as ſheep are here (their hair being longer than ours) yet there was much skill required to work it into a thread, and to make ſtuff of it. See Bochart. Hierozoic. P. 1. l. 2. c. 51. In old time alſo, it was cuſtomary for women to weave as well as ſpin, as appears, not only out of the ſacred books, but by Homer, Plato, Cicero, and many other authors mentioned by Brannius, in his book de Veſtitu Sacerd. Hebr. l. 1. c. 17. where he obſerves (N 33.) out of Herodotus, that he ſhewing the Egyptian cuſtoms to be different, in many inſtances, from thoſe of other nations, mentions this among the reſt, that their men κατ' οἶκους ἐοῦσιν ὑφαίνουσι ſat at home and weaved, while their women went abroad and bought and ſold, l. 2. c. 35.

Ver. 27. And the rulers brought onyx ſtones, and ſtones to be ſet for the ephod, and for the breaſt-plate:] The great men alſo offered ſuitable to their quality; ſuch things as the people could not furniſh, viz. precious ſtones, for uſes mentioned ch. xxv. 7. ch. xxviii. v. 9, 17, 18, &c.

Ver. 28. And ſpice, and oil for the light, and for the anointing oil, &c.] Such principal ſpices (as we tranſlate it) mentioned ch. xxx. v. 23, 34. together with the oil for the light, ch. xxvii. 20. which was ſo pure, that ordinary perſons had it not; for there were ſeveral ſorts of olives, as Fort. Scacchus ſhews, Myrothec. Sacr. Elæochriſm. P. 1. c. 4. and 5. Some of which were not ſo common as the other, and therefore of greater value.

Ver. 29. The children of Iſrael brought a willing offering, &c.] To ſum up all in a few words, they brought whatſoever was neceſſary, for all manner of work which the Lord had commanded to be made.

———By the hand of Moſes,] whom he employed to deliver theſe commands to his people.

Ver. 30. And Moſes ſaid, ſee, the Lord hath called by name, &c.] Hath principally made choice of Bezaleel to undertake and perform this work; this is ſaid, that he might not be ſollicitous about artiſts to make all that was propounded; for they knew that there were none among them, bred to ſuch employments: Moſes therefore informs them, in the firſt place, that God had provided himſelf of a maſter workman as he aſſured him, chap. xxx. ver. 1, 2, &c.

Ver. 31. And he hath filled him with the ſpirit of God in wiſdom.] The extraordinary skill which any man had, without teaching, in common arts, was, by the Heathens, aſcribed to their gods, and there are ſeveral inſtances to this effect, obſerved by Maximus Tyrius, Diſſert. 22. where he argues, that it ſhould not be thought ſtrange, if a man be made vertuous by a divine inſpiration, when ſome have no other ways become admirable artiſts. Among which, he mentions Demodocus a Muſician, whom Homer introduces ſpeaking thus of himſelf

Αὐτοδίδακτος δ' εἰμί, θεοὶ δέ μοι ὤπασαν ἀοιδήν.
Odyſ. x.

I am ſelf taught, my voice the gods beſtow'd.

The latter end of which verſe is a little otherwiſe in Homer, as we now have him, but to the ſame ſenſe; and it is Phemius, not Demodocus who there ſpeaks

Ver. 32. And to deviſe curious works.] The Hebrew word Caſchab ſignifies to deviſe and excogitate; whence Machaſchaboth, which we tranſlate curious works (and in the end of the next verſe cunning works) is as much as ingenious inventions, deviſed with much art. Such were the engines made by king Uzziah, which are ſaid to be invented by cunning men or excellent engineers, as we now ſpeak. 1 Chron. xxvi. 15.

Ver. 34. And he hath put in his heart that he may teach.] Inſtruct others in his arts, for this was a gift of God, as much as any of the reſt, to be able to inform others dextrouſly in thoſe things which he knew himſelf: As it was, to be able to comprehend what Moſes told him God had ordered, and put it in execution. For God gave Moſes the pattern, according to which all things were to be wrought; and as it was a peculiar gift of God, which enabled him to repreſent to Bezaleel, what had been ſet before him; ſo it was by an extraordinary operation on his mind, that he conceived preſently what was repreſented, and had skill to perform it according to direction.

Ver. 35. Them he hath filled with wiſdom of heart to work all manner of work, &c.] This is repeated ſo often, and ſuch particular mention is here again made of their skill in every thing, tho' of ever ſo difficult contrivance; to aſſure the Iſraelites, that they were ſo well qualified for the work, that they might be intruſted with the offerings they had made, and accordingly they were.

CHAP. XXXVI.

1 The offerings are delivered to the workmen. 5 The liberality of the people is reſtrained. 8 The curtains of cherubims. 14 The curtains of goats hair. 19 The covering of ſkins. 20 The boards with their ſockets. 31 The bars. 35 The vail. 37 The hanging for the door.

THEN wrought Bezaleel and Aholiab, and every wiſe-hearted man, in whom the LORD put wiſdom and underſtanding, to know how to work all manner of work for the ſervice of the ſanctuary, according to all that the LORD had commanded.

2 And Moſes called Bezaleel and Aholiab, and every wiſe-hearted man in whoſe heart the LORD had put wiſdom, even every one whoſe heart ſtirred him up to come unto the work to do it.

3 And they received of Moſes all the offering which the children of Iſrael had brought for the work of the ſervice of the ſanctuary, to make it withal. And they brought yet unto him free offerings every morning.

4 And all the wiſe men that wrought all the work of the ſanctuary, came every man from his work which they made.

5 ¶ And they ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying, The people bring much more then enough for the ſervice of the work which the LORD commanded to make.

6 And Moſes gave commandment, and they cauſed it to be proclaimed throughout the camp, ſaying, Let neither man nor woman make any more work for the offering of the ſanctuary. So the people were reſtrained from bringing.

7 For the ſtuff they had was ſufficient for all the work to make it, and too much.

8 ¶ And every wiſe-hearted man among them that wrought the work of the tabernacle, made ten curtains of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and ſcarlet: with cherubims of cunning work made he them.

9 The length of one curtain was twenty and eight cubits, and the breadth of one curtain four cubits: the curtains were all of one ſize.

10 And he coupled the five curtains one unto another: and the other five curtains he coupled one unto another.

11 And he made loops of blue on the edge of one curtain, from the ſelvedge in the coupling: likewiſe he made in the uttermoſt ſide of another curtain, in the coupling of the ſecond.

12 Fifty loops made he in one curtain, and fifty loops made he in the edge of the curtain which was in the coupling of the ſecond: the loops held one curtain to another.

13 And he made fifty taches of gold, and coupled the curtains one unto another with the taches. So it became one tabernacle.

14 ¶ And he made curtains of goats hair, for the tent over the tabernacle: eleven curtains he made them.

15 The length of one curtain was thirty cubits, and four cubits was the breadth of one curtain: the eleven curtains were of one ſize.

16 And he coupled five curtains by themſelves, and ſix curtains by themſelves.

17 And he made fifty loops upon the uttermoſt edge of the curtain in the coupling, and fifty loops made he upon the edge of the curtain, which coupleth the ſecond.

18 And he made fifty taches of braſs to couple the tent together, that it might be one.

19 And he made a covering for the tent, of rams skins died red, and a covering of badgers skins above that.

20 ¶ And he made boards for the tabernacle, of ſhittim-wood, ſtanding up.

21 The length of a board was ten cubits, and the breadth of a board one cubit and a half.

22 One board had two tenons, equally diſtant one from another: thus did he make for all the boards of the tabernacle.

23 And he made boards for the tabernacle: twenty boards for the ſouth-ſide, ſouthward.

24 And forty ſockets of ſilver he made under the twenty boards: two ſockets under one board for his two tenons, and two ſockets under another board for his two tenons.

25 And for the other ſide of the tabernacle which is toward the north-corner, he made twenty boards,

26 And their forty ſockets of ſilver: two ſockets under one board, and two ſockets under another board.

27 And for the ſides of the tabernacle weſt-ward, he made ſix boards.

28 And two boards made he for the corners of the tabernacle in the two ſides.

29 And they were coupled beneath, and coupled together at the head thereof, to one ring: thus he did to both of them in both the corners.

30 And there were eight boards, and their ſockets were ſixteen ſockets of ſilver, under every board two ſockets.

31 ¶ And he made bars of ſhittim-wood: five for the boards of the one ſide of the tabernacle,

32 And five bars for the boards of the other ſide of the tabernacle, and five bars for the boards of the tabernacle for the ſides weſt-ward.

33 And he made the middle bar to ſhoot through the boards from the one end to the other.

34 And he overlaid the boards with gold, and made their rings of gold to be places for the bars, and overlaid the bars with gold.

35 ¶ And he made a vail of blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine twined linen: with cherubims made he it of cunning work.

36 And he made thereunto four pillars of ſhittim-wood, and overlaid them with gold: their hooks were of gold, and he caſt for them four ſockets of ſilver.

37 ¶ And he made an hanging for the tabernacle-door, of blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine twined linen, of needle-work.

38 And the five pillars of it with their hooks: and he overlaid their chapiters, and their fillets with gold: but their five ſockets were of braſs.

Ver. 1. Then wrought Bezaleel, and Aholiab, and every wiſe hearted man.] This verſe is only a general account of what follows more particularly, concerning the execution of that which God had commanded, and for the effecting of which the people had liberally contributed. It is not ſaid where they wrought, but ſome think it was in that very ſpace of ground where the tabernacle was ſet up when perfected.

Ver. 2. And Moſes called Bezaleel, and Aholiab, and every wiſe hearted man, in whoſe heart the Lord had put wiſdom.] It appears by this, that all the lower artificers, who were taught by the maſter workmen, Bezaleel and Aholiab, were alſo diſpoſed by God to learn; he giving them a quickneſs of apprehenſion and ſagacity beyond what was natural to them.

Even every one whoſe heart ſtirred him up, to come unto the work to do it.] This however implies, that they had alſo a natural genius, which inclined and prompted them to ſuch imployments.

Ver. 3. And they received of Moſes all the offering which the children of Iſrael had brought, for the work of the ſervice of the ſanctuary, to make it withal. And they brought yet free-offerings every morning.] The hearts of the people were ſo inlarged, that every day they brought new contributions unto Moſes; who ſent them (as appears by the next verſe) to the workmen, aſſoon as he received them.

Ver. 5. And they ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying, the people bring much more than enough for the ſervice of the work, &c.]

&c.] A wonderful inſtance of integrity that there ſhould not be one man among them (for the words in the Hebrew are very emphatical, iſch, iſch, man, man, that is, none excepted) who was inclined to purloin any thing for his own proper uſe: The artiſts, by common conſent, left their work, to put a ſtop to all further contributions; which proves they were men endued with extraordinary virtue, as well as skill in their imployments.

Ver. 6. And Moſes gave commandment, and they cauſed it to be proclaimed throughout the camp, ſaying, Let neither man nor woman make any more work for the offering of the ſanctuary. So the people were reſtrained from bringing.] It ſeems ſome men prepared and made ready ſeveral of the materials which they offered; as the women ſpun yarn and hair, and brought them to Moſes, for it was not difficult to plane boards (for inſtance) tho' the joyning them together, as God appointed, was beyond the skill of common people.

Ver. 8. And every wiſe hearted man, among them that wrought the work of the tabernacle, &c.] They began firſt (as was but fit) with the houſe of God, before they made the furniture. For that was firſt ordered in general words, chap. xxv, 8. tho' the ſtructure of it be not directed till the 26th chapter. As all the particulars relating to the tabernacle and its furniture have been already comprehended in our diſſertation on that ſtructure, it will be unneceſſary to offer any explication of the remaining verſes of this chapter.

CHAP. XXXVII.

1 The ark, 6 The mercy-ſeat with cherubims. 10 The table with his veſſels. 17 The candleſtick with his lamps and inſtruments. 25 The altar of incenſe. 29 The anointing oyl, and ſweet incenſe.

AND Bazaleel made the ark of ſhittim-wood: two cubits and an half was the length of it, and a cubit and an half the breadth of it, and a cubit and an half the height of it.

2 And he overlaid it with pure gold within and without, and made a crown of gold to it round about.

3 And he caſt for it four rings of gold, to be ſet by the four corners of it: even two rings upon the one ſide of it, and two rings upon the other ſide of it.

4 And he made ſtaves of ſhittim-wood, and overlaid them with gold.

5 And he put the ſtaves into the rings, by the ſides of the ark, to bear the ark.

6 ¶ And he made the mercy-ſeat of pure gold: two cubits and an half was the length thereof, and one cubit and an half the breadth thereof.

7 And he made two cherubims of gold, beaten out of one piece made he them, on the two ends of the mercy-ſeat:

8 One cherub on the end on this ſide, and another cherub on the other end on that ſide: out of the mercy-ſeat made he the cherubims on the two ends thereof.

9 And the cherubims ſpread out their wings on high, and covered with their wings over the mercy-ſeat, with their faces one to another; even to the mercy-ſeat-ward were the faces of the cherubims.

10 ¶ And he made the table of ſhittim-wood: two cubits was the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof.

11 And he overlaid it with pure gold, and made thereunto a crown of gold round about.

12 Alſo he made thereunto a border of an hand-breadth, round about and made a crown of gold for the border thereof round about.

13 And he caſt for it four rings of gold, and put the rings upon the four corners that were in the four feet thereof.

14 Over againſt the border were the rings, the places for the ſtaves, to bear the table.

15 And he made the ſtaves of ſhittim-wood, and overlaid them with gold, to bear the table.

16 And he made the veſſels which were upon the table, his diſhes, and his ſpoons, and his bowls, and his covers to cover withal, of pure gold.

17 ¶ And he made the candleſtick of pure gold: of beaten work made the candleſtick, his ſhaft and his branch, his bowls, his knops, and his flowers were of the ſame.

18 And ſix branches going out of the ſides thereof: three branches of the candleſtick out of the one ſide thereof, and three branches of the candleſtick out of the other ſide thereof.

19 Three bowls made after the faſhion of almonds, in one branch, a knop and a flower; and three bowls made like almonds, in another branch, a knop and a flower: ſo throughout the ſix branches, going out of the candleſtick.

20 And in the candleſtick were four bowls made like almonds, his knops and his flowers.

21 And a knop under two branches of the ſame, and a knop under two branches of the ſame, and a knop under two branches of the ſame, according to the ſix branches going out of it.

22 Their knops and their branches were of the ſame: all of it was one beaten work of pure gold.

23 And he made his ſeven lamps, and his ſnuffers, and his ſnuff-diſhes, of pure gold.

24 Of a talent of pure gold made he it, and all the veſſels thereof.

25 ¶ And

25 ¶ And he made the incenſe-altar of ſhittim-wood: the length of it was a cubit, and the breadth of it a cubit (it was four-ſquare) and two cubits was the height of it; the horns thereof were of the ſame.

26 And he overlaid it with pure gold, both the top of it, and the ſides thereof round about, and the horns of it: alſo he made unto it a crown of gold round about.

27 ¶ And he made two rings of gold for it under the crown thereof, by the two corners of it, upon the two ſides thereof, to be places for the ſtaves to bear it withal.

28 And he made the ſtaves of ſhittim-wood, and overlaid them with gold.

29 ¶ And he made the holy anointing oyl, and the pure incenſe of ſweet ſpices, according to the work of the apothecary.

This chapter contains a particular of the manner in which Bezaleel made the ark; the mercy-ſeat with the cherubims; the table with its veſſels; the candleſtick, with its lamps and inſtruments; the altar of incenſe, with other particulars; all which have been deſcribed at large in the ſaid diſſertation on the tabernacle.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

1 The altar of burnt-offerings. 8 The laver of braſs. 9 The court. 21 The ſum of that the people offered.

AND he made the altar of burnt-offering of ſhittim-wood: five cubits was the length thereof, and five cubits the breadth thereof (it was four-ſquare) and three cubits the height thereof.

2 And he made the horns thereof on the four corners of it: the horns thereof were of the ſame, and he overlaid it with braſs.

3 And he made all the veſſels of the altar, the pots, and the ſhovels, and the baſons, and the fleſh-hooks, and the fire-pans: all the veſſels thereof made he of braſs.

4 And he made for the altar a braſen grate of net-work, under the compaſs thereof, beneath unto the midſt of it,

5 And he caſt four rings for the four ends of the grate of braſs, to be places for the ſtaves.

6 And he made the ſtaves of ſhittim-wood, and overlaid them with braſs.

7 And he put the ſtaves into the rings on the ſides of the altar, to bear it withal; he made the altar hollow with boards.

8 ¶ And he made the laver of braſs, and the foot of it, of braſs, of the looking-glaſſes of the women aſſembling, which aſſembled at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

9 ¶ And he made the court: on the ſouth-ſide ſouthward, the hangings of the court were of fine twined linen, an hundred cubits.

10 Their pillars were twenty, and their braſen ſockets twenty: the hooks of the pillars and their fillets were of ſilver.

11 And for the north-ſide the hangings were an hundred cubits, their pillars were twenty, and their ſockets of braſs twenty: the hooks of the pillars and their fillets, of ſilver.

12 And for the weſt-ſide were hangings of fifty cubits, their pillars ten, and their ſockets ten: the hooks of the pillars and their fillets, of ſilver.

13 And for the eaſt-ſide eaſt-ward fifty cubits.

14 The hangings of the one ſide of the gate were fifteen cubits, their pillars three, and their ſockets three.

15 And for the other ſide of the court-gate, on this hand and that hand, were hangings of fifteen cubits, their pillars three, and their ſockets three.

16 All the hangings of the court round about were of fine twined linen,

17 And the ſockets for the pillars were of braſs: the hooks of the pillars, and their fillets of ſilver; and the overlaying of their chapiters of ſilver; and all the pillars of the court were filleted with ſilver.

18 And the hanging for the gate of the court was needle-work, of blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine twined linen: and twenty cubits was the length, and the height in the breadth was five cubits anſwerable to the hangings of the court.

19 And their pillars were four, and their ſockets of braſs four, their hooks of ſilver, and the overlaying of their chapiters, and their fillets, of ſilver.

20 And all the pins of the tabernacle, and of the court round about, were of braſs.

21 ¶ This is the ſum of the tabernacle, even of the tabernacle of teſtimony, as it was counted, according to the commandment of Moſes for the ſervice of the Levites by the hand of Ithamar ſon to Aaron the prieſt.

22 And Bezaleel the ſon of Uri, the ſon of Hur, of the tribe of Judah, made all that the LORD commanded Moſes.

23 And with him was Aholiab, ſon of Ahiſamach, of the tribe of Dan, an engraver and a cunning workman, and an embroiderer broiderer in blue, and in purple, and in ſcarlet, and fine linen.

24 All the gold that was occupied for the work, in all the work of the holy place, even the gold of the offering was twenty and nine talents, and ſeven hundred and thirty ſhekels, after the ſhekel of the ſanctuary.

25 And the ſilver of them that were numbred of the congregation was an hundred talents, and a thouſand ſeven hundred and threeſcore and fifteen ſhekels, after the ſhekel of the ſanctuary.

26 A bekah for every man, that is half a ſhekel, after the ſhekel of the ſanctuary, for every one that went to be numbred, from twenty years old and upward, for ſix hundred thouſand and three thouſand and five hundred and fifty men.

27 And of the hundred talents of ſilver, were caſt the ſockets of the ſanctuary, and the ſockets of the vail; an hundred ſockets of the hundred talents, a talent for a ſocket.

28 And of the thouſand ſeven hundred ſeventy and five ſhekels, he made hooks for the pillars, and overlaid their chapiters, and filleted them.

29 And the braſs of the offering was ſeventy talents, and two thouſand and four hundred ſhekels.

30 And therewith he made the ſockets to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the braſen altar, and the braſen grate for it, and all the veſſels of the altar.

31 And the ſockets of the court round about, and the ſockets of the court-gate, and all the pins of the tabernacle, and all the pins of the court round about.

The Conſtruction of the altar of burnt-offering, the laver of braſs, and the court, is deſcribed in this chapter; and we refer the reader to what we have already obſerved, with relation to thoſe particulars, in our copious deſcription of the tabernacle and all its appendages.

CHAP. XXXIX.

1 The clothes of ſervice and holy garments. 2 The ephod. 8 The breaſt-plate. 22 The robe of the ephod. 27 The coats, mitre, and girdle of fine linen. 30 The plate of the holy crown. 32 All is viewed and approved by Moſes.

AND of the blue, and purple, and ſcarlet they made clothes of ſervice, to do ſervice in the holy place, and made the holy garments for Aaron; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

2 And he made the ephod, of gold, blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine twined linen.

3 And they did beat the gold into thin plates, and cut it into wiers, to work it in the blue, and in the purple, and in the ſcarlet, and in the fine linen, with cunning work.

4 They made ſhoulder-pieces for it, to couple it together; by the two edges was it coupled together.

5 And the curious girdle of his ephod that was upon it, was of the ſame, according to the work thereof; of gold, blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine twined linen; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

6 ¶ And they wrought onyx-ſtones incloſed in ouches of gold, graven as ſignets are graven, with the names of the children of Iſrael.

7 And he put them on the ſhoulders of the ephod, that they ſhould be ſtones for a memorial to the children of Iſrael; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

8 ¶ And he made the breaſt-plate of cunning work, like the work of the ephod; of gold, blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and fine twined linen.

9 It was four-ſquare, they made the breaſt-plate double: a ſpan was the length thereof, and a ſpan the breadth thereof being doubled.

10 And they ſet in it four rows of ſtones: the firſt row was a ſardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle: this was the firſt row.

11 And the ſecond row, an emeraud, a ſaphire, and a diamond.

12 And the third row a ligure, an agate, and an amethyſt.

13 And the fourth row, a beryl, an onyx, and a jaſper: they were incloſed in ouches of gold in their incloſings.

14 And the ſtones were according to the names of the children of Iſrael, twelve, according to their names, like the engravings of a ſignet, every one with his name, according to the twelve tribes.

15 And they made upon the breaſt-plate chains at the ends, of wreathen work of pure gold.

16 And they made two ouches of gold, and two gold rings: and put the two rings in the two ends of the breaſt-plate.

17 And they put the two wreathen chains of gold in the two rings on the ends of the breaſt-plate.

18 And the two ends of the two wreathen chains they faſtned in the two ouches, and put them on the ſhoulder-pieces of the ephod, before it.

19 And they made two rings of gold, and put them on the two ends of the breaſt-plate, upon the border of it, which was on the ſide of the ephod inward.

20 And they made two other golden rings, and put them on the two ſides of the ephod underneath, toward the fore-part of it, over againſt the other coupling thereof, above the curious girdle of the ephod.

21 And they did bind the breaſt-plate by his rings unto the rings of the ephod, with a lace of blue, that it might be above the curious girdle of the ephod, and that the breaſt-plate might not be looſed from the ephod; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

22 ¶ And he made the robe of the ephod of woven work, all of blue.

23 And there was a hole in the midſt of the robe, as the hole of an habergeon, with a band round about the hole, that it ſhould not rent.

24 And they made upon the hems of the robe, pomegranates of blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, and twined linen.

25 And they made bells of pure gold, and put the bells between the pomegranates, upon the hem of the robe, round about between the pomegranates.

26 A bell and a pomegranate, a bell and a pomegranate, round about the hem of the robe to miniſter in; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

27 ¶ And they made coats of fine linen, of woven work, for Aaron and for his ſons.

28 And a mitre of fine linen, and goodly bonnets of fine linen, and linen breeches of fine twined linen,

29 And a girdle of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and ſcarlet, of needle-work; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

30 ¶ And they made the plate of the holy crown of pure gold, and wrote upon it a writing, like to the engravings of a ſignet, HOLINESS TO THE LORD.

31 And they tied unto it a lace of blue, to faſten it on high upon the mitre; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

32 ¶ Thus was all the work of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation finiſhed: and the children of Iſrael did according to all that the LORD commanded Moſes, ſo did they.

33 ¶ And they brought the tabernacle unto Moſes, the tent, and all his furniture, his taches, his boards, his bars, and his pillars, and his ſockets,

34 And the covering of rams ſkins died red, and the covering of badgers ſkins, and the vail of the covering,

35 The ark of the teſtimony, and the ſtaves thereof, and the mercy-ſeat,

36 The table, and all the veſſels thereof, and the ſhew-bread,

37 The pure candleſtick, with the lamps thereof, even with the lamps to be ſet in order, and all the veſſels thereof, and the oyl for light,

38 And the golden altar, and the anointing oyl, and the ſweet incenſe, and the hanging for the tabernacle-door,

39 The braſen altar, and his grate of braſs, his ſtaves, and all his veſſels, the laver and his foot,

40 The hangings of the court, his pillars, and his ſockets, and the hanging for the court-gate, his cords and his pins, and all the veſſels of the ſervice of the tabernacle, for the tent of the congregation,

41 The clothes of ſervice to do ſervice in the holy place, and the holy garments for Aaron the prieſt, and his ſons garments to miniſter in the prieſts office.

42 According to all that the LORD commanded Moſes, ſo the children of Iſrael made all the work.

43 And Moſes did look upon all the work, and behold, they had done it as the LORD had commanded, even ſo had they done it: and Moſes bleſſed them.

This chapter contains a particular deſcription of the ſacerdotal veſtments; the ephod, the breaſt-plate, the robe of the ephod; the coats, mitre, and girdle of fine linen; the plate of the holy crown; the formation of all which has been amply repreſented in our annotations on the 28th chapter of this book, where the pontifical and other prieſtly habits are appointed by God himſelf.

CHAP. XL.

1 The tabernacle is commanded to be reared, 9 and anointed; 13 Aaron and his ſons to be ſanctified. 16 Moſes performeth all things accordingly. 24 A cloud covereth the tabernacle.

AND the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying,

2 On the firſt day of the firſt month ſhalt thou ſet up the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation.

3 And thou ſhalt put therein the ark of the teſtimony, and cover the ark with the vail.

4 And thou ſhalt bring in the table, and ſet in order the things that are to be ſet in order upon it, and thou ſhalt bring in the candleſtick, and light the lamps thereof.

5 And thou ſhalt ſet the altar of gold for the incenſe before the ark of the teſtimony, and put the hanging of the door to the tabernacle.

6 And

6 And thou ſhalt ſet the altar of the burnt-offering, before the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation.

7 And thou ſhalt ſet the laver between the tent of the congregation and the altar, and ſhalt put water therein.

8 And thou ſhalt ſet up the court round about, and hang up the hanging at the court-gate.

9 And thou ſhalt take the anointing oil, and anoint the tabernacle and all that is therein, and ſhalt hallow it, and all the veſſels thereof: and it ſhall be holy.

10 And thou ſhalt anoint the altar of the burnt-offering, and all his veſſels, and ſanctify the altar: and it ſhall be an altar moſt holy.

11 And thou ſhalt anoint the laver and his foot, and ſanctify it.

12 And thou ſhalt bring Aaron and his ſons unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and waſh them with water.

13 And thou ſhalt put upon Aaron the holy garments, and anoint him, and ſanctify him, that he may miniſter unto me in the prieſts office.

14 And thou ſhalt bring his ſons, and clothe them with coats.

15 And thou ſhalt anoint them, as thou didſt anoint their father, that they may miniſter unto me in the prieſts office: for their anointing ſhall ſurely be an everlaſting prieſthood, throughout their generations.

16 Thus did Moſes, according to all that the LORD commanded him, ſo did he.

17 ¶ And it came to paſs, in the firſt month in the ſecond year, on the firſt day of the month, that the tabernacle was reared up.

18 And Moſes reared up the tabernacle, and faſtened his ſockets, and ſet up the boards thereof, and put in the bars thereof, and reared up his pillars.

19 And he ſpread abroad the tent over the tabernacle, and put the covering of the tent above upon it; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

20 ¶ And he took and put the teſtimony into the ark, and ſet the ſtaves on the ark, and put the mercy-ſeat above upon the ark.

21 And he brought the ark into the tabernacle, and ſet up the vail of the covering, and covered the ark of the teſtimony; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

22 ¶ And he put the table in the tent of the congregation, upon the ſide of the tabernacle northward, without the vail.

23 And he ſet the bread in order upon it before the LORD; as the LORD had commanded Moſes.

24 ¶ And he put the candleſtick in the tent of the congregation, over-againſt the table, on the ſide of the tabernacle ſouth-ward.

25 And he lighted the lamps before the LORD; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

26 ¶ And he put the golden altar in the tent of the congregation before the vail.

27 And he burnt ſweet incenſe thereon; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

28 ¶ And he ſet up the hanging, at the door of the tabernacle.

29 And he put the altar of burnt-offering by the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation, and offered upon it the burnt-offering, and the meat-offering; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

30 ¶ And he ſet the laver between the tent of the congregation and the altar, and put water there, to waſh withal.

31 And Moſes, and Aaron, and his ſons, waſhed their hands and their feet thereat.

32 When they went into the tent of the congregation, and when they came near unto the altar, they waſhed; as the LORD commanded Moſes.

33 And he reared up the court round about the tabernacle and the altar, and ſet up the hanging of the court-gate: ſo Moſes finiſhed the work.

34 ¶ Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the LORD filled the tabernacle.

35 And Moſes was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation, becauſe the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the LORD filled the tabernacle.

36 And when the cloud was taken up from over the tabernacle, the children of Iſrael went onward in all their journeys:

37 But if the cloud were not taken up, then they journeyed not, till the day that it was taken up.

38 For the cloud of the LORD was upon the tabernacle by day, and fire was on it by night, in the ſight of all the houſe of Iſrael, throughout all their journies.

Ver.

Ver. 2. On the firſt day of the firſt month ſhalt thou ſet up the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation.] As we have already given a full deſcription of the tabernacle and all its appendages, inſtead of offering any additions on that ſubject, we ſhall here attempt to anſwer this queſtion, What became of the tabernacle, from the time of its erection, to the deſtruction of the firſt temple?

The tabernacle wandered with the children of Iſrael in the wilderneſs, till they arrived at the land of Promiſe. When they came thither, it was placed in Gilgal; where, according to the computation of the Jews, it remained 14 years; from thence it was tranſported to Shiloh, where it continued 369 years: It was afterwards kept 13 years at Nob; namely, from the death of the high-prieſt Eli, to that of Samuel. Since then it was 50 years at Gibeon; from whence it was taken and depoſited in Solomon's temple. Thus the Jews reckon; but it will not be eaſy to juſtify their calculations from ſcripture, which ſpeaks very conciſely of theſe ſeveral ſtations of the tabernacle.

After the building of the temple, they brought up the ark and the tabernacle of the congregation, and placed the ark in the oracle of the houſe, in the moſt holy place, under the wings of the cherubims; but it is not ſaid, where the tabernacle was depoſited. The Jews conjecture, and reaſonably enough, that it was in one of the apartments of the temple.

But we cannot trace the hiſtory either of the ark, or tabernacle, any farther than the time that Jeruſalem was plunder'd by the armies of Nebuchadnezzar. All that the Rabbins have ſaid upon this article, and which Buxtorf the ſon hath carefully collected, is leſs proper to give us any light into the fate of the tabernacle, than to furniſh us with an inſtance of the fondneſs of ſome people, for the moſt fabulous narrations; and it is ſurpriſing, that any one could prevail upon himſelf to impoſe the following ſtory upon the world, viz. that Joſiah, foreſeeing the invaſion of the king of Babylon, hid the ark in ſome ſubterraneous part of the temple, together with Aaron's rod, the golden pot, and the oil of the ſacrifice, and that by this means they were all ſaved.

Nor will it be eaſy to reconcile what is ſaid concerning the ark, by the author of the ſecond book of Eſdras, ch. x. 23. with 2 Maccab. ch. ii. 5, &c. for the one ſays, that the ark was carried away by the Chaldeans; and the other, that Jeremiah hid it in a cave, with the tabernacle and altar of incenſe; and that he reproved thoſe who had the curioſity to know where they were lodged.

If we can't determine what became of theſe things, when Jeruſalem was deſtroyed by the Chaldeans, it will be yet more difficult to ſhew, what became of them after the reſtoration of that city. Thoſe among the Jewiſh Doctors who think, that the ark was hid by Joſias, pretend, that when the Meſſiah comes, the ark will be returned to them, together with the tables written by the finger of God, the book of the law, the oil of anointment, and all the holy veſſels that were hid, at the firſt deſtruction of the temple. All theſe things, according to the opinion of ſome Jews, and particularly of Abarbinel, whoſe very words we now quote, will be reſtored to their nation, to the end that the Holy of Holies may be in the houſe of God, with all its utenſils.

But moſt of thoſe Rabbins, who believe that the ark was carried away to Babylon, are likewiſe perſuaded, that it was brought back to Jeruſalem, and depoſited in the ſecond temple, when the Jews were re-eſtabliſhed.

One of the moſt plauſible reaſons alledged by thoſe who pretend, that the ark was in the ſecond temple, is borrowed from the triumphal arch of Titus and Veſpaſian, which is ſtill to be ſeen in the Via ſacra at Rome. They ſay, that the veſſel carried before the car of Titus, is the ark of the covenant. But ſeveral great men have proved, that what is there taken for the ark, is the table of ſhew-bread; and in order to be convinced of that truth, one need only ſurvey the figures of that triumphal arch, in the delineations which have been made of that ſtructure.

We have, therefore, no authentic monuments of antiquity, by which we can determine the deſtiny of the ark, after Nebuchadnezzar took Jeruſalem; but as no mention is made of it, neither among thoſe veſſels that were tranſported to Babylon, nor among thoſe brought back again to Jeruſalem, 'tis likely it became part of the plunder of the Chaldeans. We form the ſame judgment of the tabernacle, and the reſt of the utenſils; the fate of which is not related in the ſacred hiſtory. A learned perſon conjectures, that the reputation of the holineſs which the ark bore, even among the Gentiles, and the plagues it had brought upon the Philiſtines, for laying hands on it, prevented the Chaldeans from taking away ſo awful and venerable a veſſel.

Ver. 17. And it came to paſs in the firſt month, &c.] This and the following verſes, to 34, give an account of the execution of what God commanded, in the foregoing part of this chapter; but it is not eaſy to reſolve, whether every thing was executed at this very time, or not; for full underſtanding of which, it will be neceſſary to attend carefully to the order, wherein God requires all the preceding commands to be performed. And, firſt, he orders Moſes to ſet up the tabernacle, and put every thing belonging to it in its place, ver. 2, 3. and ſo on to ver. 9. And next to conſecrate it, and all the veſſels that were appropriated to it, with the altar of burnt-offerings, and its appendages, &c. ver. 9, 10, 11. and then to proceed to the conſecration of Aaron, and his ſons, ver. 12, 13, 14, 15. Now it is expreſly affirmed, that Moſes performed the firſt of theſe injunctions; that is, he erected the tabernacle, and depoſited every thing appertaining to it in its proper place, on the firſt day of the firſt month, of the ſecond year after their departure from Egypt: At which time, we muſt likewiſe ſuppoſe, he began to conſecrate the tabernacle, and the altar of burnt-offerings; and employed ſeven days in that ſolemnity, agreeably to the divine appointment, chap. xxix. 37. But the difficulty is to determine, when he conſecrated Aaron and his ſons, as he is here required, in which ſeven days were alſo ſpent, as we read, Lev. viii. Some think, there were but ſeven days in all ſet apart for this work, and conſequently they were conſecrated together. So Torniellus in his Annals, and Abulenſis before him, who follow Seder Olam, and other Jewiſh writers, who maintain this opinion; the ground of which is, that the tabernacle being erected on the firſt day of the month before-mentioned, and its conſecration finiſh'd on the eighth, there was a ſolemn paſſover kept upon the fifteenth, (Numb. ix. 1, 2, &c.) which could not be held, they ſuppoſe, unleſs there were prieſts to offer the paſſover; who therefore were conſecrated at the ſame time with the tabernacle, becauſe on the eighth day began the offering made by the princes of the tribes, every one in their day, Numb. vii. 1. but the principal ground is, that in Lev. viii. 10, 11, &c. Moſes ſpeaks of the anointing (i. e. conſecrating) the altar, and of conſecrating Aaron and his ſons, as done both at the ſame time. But there is a weighty objection againſt all this, which is, that in the conſecration of Aaron and his ſons, there were three ſacrifices offered upon the altar, one for a ſin-offering, another for a burnt-offering, and the ram of conſecration for a peace-offering, Lev. viii. 4. xviii. 22. none of which could be acceptable for their ſanctification, till the altar itſelf was made holy, and therefore the ſeven days, appointed for that purpoſe, were ended before the conſecration of the prieſts began, which continued ſeven days more; and then the next day was the feaſt of unleavened bread; which was famous on a double account; firſt, becauſe it was the firſt day of unleavened bread; and ſecondly, it was the octaves of the conſecration; and this appears more plainly from Lev. i. 1. where we find the following commands were given to Moſes out of the tabernacle by the Divine Majeſty; who therefore dwelt there, when he commanded the prieſt to be conſecrated; which he did not, till the tabernacle was ſolemnly conſecrated to be his habitation; there the prieſts alſo are commanded to abide, during the ſeven days of their conſecration, Lev. viii. 33. which ſhews, that all things belonging to its ſanctification were finiſhed, before their conſecration began: As to that which is alledged from Lev. viii. 10, 11, &c. we ſhall conſider it there.

Ver. 19. And he ſpread abroad the tent over the tabernacle.] The ohel which we tranſlate tent, ſometimes ſignifies the whole houſe of God, (ſee ver. 19.) but here only the external part of it, which covered that which was properly called Miſchechan (the tabernacle) which Moſes having erected with all its ſockets, boards, bars and pillars, verſe 18. (and hung it, we muſt ſuppoſe, with the inward hangings, which were the richeſt) he ſpread abroad over them the curtains of goats hair, called the tent, xxvi. 11. to be a covering over the tabernacle, ch. xxvi. verſe 7. chap. xxxvi.

xxxvi. ver. 14, 19. So the tabernacle was an houſe within an houſe, incloſed with ſtrong walls (as we call them) to ſecure it from the injury of the weather.

Ver. 21. And he brought the ark into the tabernacle.] It is probable, that he had placed the ark, after it was made, in his own tent, which, for the preſent, was called the tabernacle of the congregation, and had the glory of the Lord in it, xxxiii. 7, 9. but now he brought it into this tabernacle which by Gods order was prepared for it.

Ver. 22. And he put the table in the tent of the congregation.] Here the whole houſe is called the ohel (or tent) but immediately the word Miſchehan (which we tranſlate tabernacle) is uſed as the moſt proper expreſſion for the inſide of the houſe; as the other beſt denotes the outſide of it. The whole is rendered more evident in the 34th verſe; where we read, that the cloud covered the tent of the congregation, that is, the out-ſide of the houſe; and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle within, tho' afterwards, verſe 38. the cloud is ſaid to be upon the tabernacle, as, verſe 36. it is ſaid to be over the tabernacle, becauſe it was over the tent which covered it.

Ver. 25. And he lighted the lamps before the Lord, &c.] In this and all that follows, of burning ſweet incenſe, ver. 27. offering the burnt-offering and meat-offering, ver. 29. Moſes acted as a prieſt, appointed by an extraordinary commiſſion from God, only for this time; that he might conſecrate the houſe of God, and the prieſts that were to miniſter therein; which being done, his prieſthood ceaſed, and he did all that is mentioned in theſe verſes, when the tabernacle was conſecrated, and the glory of the Lord had filled it; teſtifying the divine preſence to be there.

Ver. 31. And Moſes, and Aaron, and his ſons, waſhed their hands, &c.] This ſhews, that Moſes now performed the functions of a prieſt, and therefore waſhed himſelf, before he went to ſacrifice at the altar; as the prieſts afterwards were always obliged to do, xxx. 19, 20, 21. but it muſt be underſtood, that neither this waſhing here ſpoken of, nor his offering ſacrifice, mentioned, verſe 29. was performed till ſome days after this, ſee ver. 17.

Ver. 33. So Moſes finiſhed the work.] He then anointed the tabernacle, and all contained in it, according to God's order, ver. 9, 10, 11. the execution of which, tho' now not here mentioned, is expreſly ſaid to be on the ſame day that he had compleatly ſet up the tabernacle, Numb. vii. 1.

Ver. 34. Then a cloud (or then the cloud) covered the tent of the congregation.] After it was anointed and ſanctified for the divine reſidence, (and the princes, perhaps, had finiſhed that large offering which we read, Numb. vii. was made on this day,) God was pleaſed to fill this place with his glorious preſence, for the cloudy pillar, which deſcended upon Moſes's tent, and ſtood there before the door of it, xxxiii. 9. removed now from thence, and came hither; not ſtanding at the door of it like the form of a pillar, but ſpreading it ſelf all over the outſide of the tabernacle, ſo that it was covered with it, as we read alſo, Numb. ix. 15.

——— And the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle.] See ver. 22. What God promiſed, ch. xxv. 8. 22. he now performed, notwithſtanding their revolt from him, by worſhiping the golden calf. Which made him withdraw himſelf from them, xxxiii. 7, &c. till upon Moſes's interceſſion for them, and their repentance, he graciouſly conſented to return to them and abide among them, ver. 14, 15, &c. as he now did, by ſettling his glorious preſence in this tabernacle, which was ſet up in the midſt of them; for, whereas the other tabernacle of Moſes was removed a mile or two from the camp, xxxiii. 7. this tabernacle was pitched (a month after this, Numb. i. 1.) in the midſt of their camp, as we read, Numb. ii. 2, 17.

Ver. 35. And Moſes was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation.] For the glory of the Lord ſhone ſo bright and ſo ſtrong, beyond all that it had ever done, that no eye could look upon it, and it filled not only the moſt holy place, but the whole body of the tabernacle; ſo that he durſt not adventure to come within it, till he was called, Lev. i. 1. After which time, he ſeems to have had liberty to go in unto God when he pleaſed, Numb. vii. ver. 9. chap. ix. ver. 8, 9. For, after this great day, the glory of the Lord retired into the moſt holy place, within the veil; and reſided conſtantly there, over the ark of the teſtimony: From whence he ſpake to Moſes, when he came to conſult him in the holy place. See the fore-mentioned Numb. vii. 89. whence he is ſaid to dwell between the cherubims; tho' on ſome occaſion, this glory appeared without upon the tabernacle, (over the ark it is likely) Numb. xvi. 42. and ſo perhaps it did, ch. xi. 17, 15. and ſometimes at the door of the tabernacle, Deut. ch. xxxi. 14, 15.

——Becauſe the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the Lord filled the houſe.] The cloud, and the glory of the Lord, were not two different things, but one and the ſame; as the pillar of cloud and of fire were; for outwardly it was a cloud, and inwardly it was a fire: And accordingly here, the external part of it cover'd the tabernacle without; while the internal part ſhone in full glory within the houſe. Thus it was upon mount Sinai, where Moſes is ſaid to draw near to the thick darkneſs where God was, ch. xx. ver. 21. that is, the glory of the Lord was in that thick darkneſs, and ſo we read before, that the glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud, ch. xvi. 10. And ſo thoſe words are to be interpreted, ch. xxvi. 16. The glory of the Lord abode upon mount Sinai, and the cloud cover'd it, (that is, cover'd the glory of the Lord, not the mount) ſix days. After which, on the ſeventh day, the glory of the Lord broke through it, and appeared like devouring fire in the ſight of all the people, ver. 17.

Ver. 36. And when the cloud was taken up from over the tabernacle, the children of Iſrael went onward in their journeys.] That is, the Lord (whoſe glorious preſence was in this cloud) led and conducted them in all their removals. And therefore they are ſaid to have journeyed at the commandment of the Lord, becauſe, when the cloud (wherein the Lord was) was taken up, then they journeyed, Numb ch. ix. ver. 17, 18, 20, 23.

Ver. 37. But if the cloud were not taken up, then they journeyed not, till the day that it was taken up.] they were wholly govern'd by its motions, and followed its directions.

Ver. 38. For the cloud of the Lord.] So it is called alſo in Numb. ch. x. ver. 34. becauſe the glory of the Lord was in it.

———Was upon the tabernacle by day.] And ſo it was by night, but then had another appearance, as it here follows.

———And fire was on it by night.] The fire and the cloud (as we ſaid, ver. 5.) were not different things, but the ſame pillar that was dark by day, when there was no need of light, ſhone like fire by night, when the dark part could not be ſeen, to lead and conduct them; it appeared like a cloud by day, and turned the light ſide to them (which was as bright as fire) by night, that they might march, if there were occaſion, by its direction, both by day and night. And thus it is deſcribed, ch. xiii. 21, 22. Numb. ix. ver. 15, 16, &c. and ſo this verſe may be tranſlated, the cloud of the Lord was upon the tabernacle by day, and the fire was in it, i. e. in the cloud, by night, for ſo they are elſewhere deſcribed, as one within the other, Deut. v. 22. the Lord ſpake unto all your aſſembly, out of the midſt of the fire of the cloud, and of thick darkneſs.

——— In the ſight of all the children of Iſrael throughout all their journeys.] The whole congregation had conſtantly this comfortable token of God's preſence among them, by the cloud in the day time, and fire in the night; which never left them all the time they were in the wilderneſs, but brought them to Canaan.

Before we cloſe our annotations on this book of Exodus, we think it will not be improper to collect the obſervations of a late learned commentator on this queſtion, What was that phænomenon which was called the glory of God?

This wonderful appearance, which had been at the head of the Iſraelites camp, ſtood on the tabernacle, as ſoon as that ſacred edifice was finiſhed. It commonly appeared in the day-time, like a pillar of cloud, and in the night, like a pillar of fire; but upon any extraordinary occaſion, it changed both its form and ſituation: The cloud was thicker and more diffuſed, the fire was more bright and terrible God thereby convinced the Iſraelites, who were eye-witneſſes of it, that he watched their behaviour at that juncture more than uſually, whether it were to puniſh them for their rebellions, or to reward them for acts of obedience. And this is what the holy writers call, the glory of the Lord.

In ſhort, all the circumſtances of the paſſages where it is ſaid, that voices from God were directed to Moſes, and the high Prieſt, to prove, that it was God himſelf, who pronounced them, and all the circumſtances of the paſſages, where mention is made of the pillar of the cloud, and of the Glory of the Lord, denote, that it was God who manifeſted himſelf in this Phænomenon. Several of the Jewiſh doctors affirm, that it was an angel who reſided there, and formed theſe voices on the mercy-ſeat. This manner of expreſſing themſelves has made ſome Chriſtians think, that the Rabbins believed the myſtery of the Trinity. Hear what Abarbinel ſays, concerning the Glory of the Lord, as it appeared in the tabernacle. He affirms, "That it flowed from a ſuperior heavenly light, namely, "from that which was created the firſt day; that the firſt "light was the principle production of God, the begin-"ning of his creatures, and his ways; that ſuperior light "(from whence was an emanation of the inferior) that "was diffuſed over the tabernacle, to appear to the Iſra-"elites; that after the great luminaries were created, "God hid it, and kept it by him, to the end, that in the "ſequel of ages, it might be made uſe of, in favour of "the righteous; that is, not to be perceived by human "eyes, nor attainable during this mortal life: that this "was the glory which Moſes wiſhed in vain to ſee; that "the name of this light is the ſame as that of God him-"ſelf; that it is the ſeal of God, and therefore bears "his name; that it is the chief of all ſpiritual and intel-"lectual beings; that it is a meſſenger which communi-"cates it ſelf both to heaven and earth; that every thing "which exiſts, depends upon it, that it is the indwelling "of God with men, which is ſo frequently mentioned by "the Rabbins.

The End of the Second Book of MOSES called EXODUS.

Critical and Explanatory ANNOTATIONS

ON THE

THIRD BOOK of MOSES,

CALLED

LEVITICUS.

The ARGUMENT.

The third of the five books of Moſes, is called Leviticus, by the Greeks and Latins, becauſe it contains the laws and regulations, which God commanded to be obſerved by thoſe of the tribe of Levi, who miniſtred at the altar: It likewiſe comprehends the laws relating to the religion of the Jews, and which principally conſiſted in various ſacrifices; for which reaſon, the Jews call this book the Prieſt's Law; becauſe it includes many ordinances concerning oblations; it treats at large of all the functions of the Levites, of the ceremonies of religion, of the different ſorts of ſacrifices, of the diſtinction of clean and unclean beaſts, of the different feſtivals, and of the year of jubilee: We have likewiſe an account here, of what happen'd to the people of God, for the ſpace of one month and a half; that is, from the time the tabernacle was erected, which was the firſt day of the firſt month of the ſecond year, after the Iſraelites came out of Egypt, to the ſecond month of the ſame year, when God commanded the people to be numbred, as we ſee in the beginning of the following book. Moſes relates in this book, the manner in which the prieſts were conſecrated, and what ſacrifices were obſerved upon this ſolemnity; together, with the fatal misfortune which happened to Nadab and Abihu, who were conſumed with fire, for attempting to offer incenſe to the LORD with ſtrange fire: Upon this occaſion, Moſes preſcribes ſome laws, appointing what the mourning of the prieſts ſhould be, and forbids them to drink wine, while they are in waiting at the temple. God likewiſe appoints, in this book, the ceremonies which were to be obſerved upon the day of ſolemn expiation; regulates the degrees of relation, wherein any one was permitted or forbidden to marry: prohibits alliances with the Canaanites, idolatry, theft, perjury, calumny, hatred, the ſuperſtitions of the Gentiles, magick, divinations, ſoothſayings, proſtitution and adultery; he forbids any one to uſe the fruits of a tree, during the firſt five years after it is planted. He requires ſomething to be left in the field, for the benefit of the poor, when the corn is cut, he mentions the defects which make ſacrifices unfit to be offered to the LORD. Laſtly, he concludes, with regulations concerning vows and tythes, which were to be offered in the tabernacle.

The Hebrews call this book Vaicre, which is, the firſt word of it, and ſignifies, And he called; they alſo ſtile it, Thora Hacohanim, that is, the law of the prieſts.

Leviticus is generally allowed to be a canonical book, and of divine athority, and is unanimouſly believed to be the work of Moſes, as well as the reſt of the Pentateuch; it contains the hiſtory of what paſſed during the eight days of Aaron and his ſons conſecration, which was performed in the year of the world 2514, according to the Hebrew computation; before Jeſus Chriſt; 1486, before the vulgar Æra 1490. The laws which were preſcribed in it, upon other ſubjects beſides ſacrifices, have no other chronological characteriſtick, whereby we may be directed to judge at what time they were given.

CHAP.

CHAP. I.

1 The burnt-offerings. 3 Of the herd. 10 Of the flocks. 14 Of the fowls.

AND the LORD called unto Moſes, and ſpake unto him out of the tabernacle of the congregation, ſaying,

2 Speak unto the children of Iſrael, and ſay unto them, If any man of you bring an offering unto the LORD, ye ſhall bring your offering of the cattle, even of the herd, and of the flock.

3 If his offering be a burnt-ſacrifice of the herd, let him offer a male without blemiſh: he ſhall offer it of his own voluntary will, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the LORD.

4 And he ſhall put his hand upon the head of the burnt-offering: and it ſhall be accepted for him to make atonement for him.

5 And he ſhall kill the bullock before the LORD: and the prieſts Aarons ſons ſhall bring the blood, and ſprinkle the blood round about upon the altar, that is by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

6 And he ſhall flay the burnt-offering, and cut it into his pieces.

7 And the ſons of Aaron the prieſt ſhall put fire upon the altar, and lay the wood in order upon the fire.

8 And the prieſts Aarons ſons ſhall lay the parts, the head and the fat, in order upon the wood that is on the fire which is upon the altar.

9 But his inwards and his legs ſhall he waſh in water: and the prieſt ſhall burn all on the altar, to be a burnt-ſacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a ſweet ſavour unto the LORD.

10 ¶ And if his offering be of the flocks, namely of the ſheep, or of the goats, for a burnt-ſacrifice; he ſhall bring it a male without blemiſh.

11 And he ſhall kill it on the ſide of the altar north-ward before the LORD: and the prieſts Aarons ſons ſhall ſprinkle his blood round about upon the altar.

12 And he ſhall cut it into his pieces with his head and his fat: and the prieſt ſhall lay them in order on the wood that is on the fire which is upon the altar.

13 But he ſhall waſh the inwards and the legs with water: and the prieſts ſhall bring it all, and burn it upon the altar: it is a burnt-ſacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a ſweet ſavour unto the LORD.

14 ¶ And if the burnt-ſacrifice for his offering to the LORD be of fowls, then he ſhall bring his offering of turtle-doves, or of young pigeons.

15 And the prieſt ſhall bring it unto the altar, and wring off his head, and burn it on the altar: and the blood thereof ſhall be wrung out at the ſide of the altar.

16 And he ſhall pluck away his crop with his feathers, and caſt it beſide the altar, on the eaſt-part, by the place of the aſhes.

17 And he ſhall cleave it, with the wings thereof, but ſhall not divide it aſunder: and the prieſt ſhall burn it upon the altar, upon the wood that is upon the fire: it is a burnt-ſacrifice, an offering made by fire of a ſweet ſavour unto the LORD.

Ver. 1. And the Lord called unto Moſes.] Moſes then ſtood without, waiting for the call of the Deity, who then commanded him to draw near, and not be afraid, becauſe of the glory of that light which was in the tabernacle, Exod. ii. 35. for this is a word of love, as the Hebrew doctors ſpeak; who obſerve, that God is not ſaid to call the prophets of the Gentiles; but we only read, that God jikar, met Balaam; not jikra, called to him, as he did here to Moſes, who, as Procopius Gazæus hath well obſerved, upon this word, appointed no ſervice of God, in his houſe which he had lately erected, without his order: Whereas the worſhip performed in the honour of dæmons, was without any authority from him; nay, there were magical operations in it, and invocations of dæmons; and certain tacit obligations which their prieſts contracted with them, for which he produces Porphyry as a witneſs.

——— And ſpake unto him out of the tabernacle.] Hitherto he had ſpoken to him out of heaven, or out of the cloud, but now out of his own houſe; into which it is not here ſaid, he bade him come, (as he did afterwards, when the glory of the Lord dwelt only in the inner part of the houſe over the ark) but he ſtood, it is likely, without the door of the tabernacle, till the ſacrifices were appointed (as it here follows) and the high-prieſt enter'd into it with the blood of expiation. We can find no time, in which this can ſo probably be done, as immediately after the conſecration of the tabernacle, as ſoon as the glory of the Lord enter'd into it; and ſo we find Heſychius underſtood it, who obſerving this book to begin with the word And, which is a conjunction uſed to join what follows, with that which goes before, thence concludes, that the beginning of this book is knit to the concluſion of the laſt; and conſequently, what is here related was ſpoken to Moſes, on the ſame day he had ſet up the tabernacle, and the glory of the Lord filled it; when Moſes might well think (as the Hieruſalem Targum explains it) that if mount Sinai was ſo exalted, by the Divine preſence there for a ſhort ſpace, that it was not ſafe for him to approach it, much leſs come up into it, till God commanded him; he had much more reaſon not to go into the tabernacle, which was ſanctified to be God's dwelling place for ever, till God called to him by a voice from his preſence; nay, he durſt not ſo much as come near the door, where we ſuppoſe he now ſtood, without a particular direction from the Divine Majeſty.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Iſrael, and ſay unto them, If any man bring an offering unto the Lord.] The tabernacle being erected, it was fit in the next place, to appoint the ſervice that ſhould be performed in it: And there could not be a more natural order, in ſetting down the laws delivered by Moſes, than this which is here obſerved.

There are divers kinds of ſacrifices here preſcribed, ſome by way of acknowledgment to God for mercies either deſired or received; others by way of ſatisfaction to God for mens ſins; others were mere exerciſes of piety and devotion. And the reaſon why there are ſo many kinds kinds was, partly, in reſpect to the childiſh eſtate of the Jews, who by the cuſtom of nations, and their own natural inclinations, were much addicted to outward rites and ceremonies, that they might have full employment of that kind in God's ſervice, and thereby be kept from temptations to idolatry; and partly to repreſent as well the ſeveral perfections of Chriſt, the true ſacrifice, and the various benefits of his death, as the ſeveral duties which men owe to their Creator and Redeemer, all which could not be ſo well expreſs'd by one ſort of ſacrifices.

—— Ye ſhall bring your offering of the cattle, even of the herd and of the flock.] Or, of the ſheep; tho' the Hebrew word contains both the ſheep and goats, as appears both from the uſe of the words, Gen. xii. 16. and xxvii. 29. and xxxviii. 17. and from verſe the tenth, and other places of ſcripture. Now God choſe theſe kinds of creatures for his ſacrifices, either, firſt, in oppoſition to the Egyptian idolatry, to which divers of the Iſraelites had been uſed, and were ſtill in danger of revolting to it again; that the frequent deſtruction of theſe creatures might bring ſuch ſilly deities into contempt; or, ſecondly, becauſe theſe are the fitteſt repreſentations both of Chriſt and of true Chriſtians, as being gentle and harmleſs, and patient, and moſt uſeful to men; or, thirdly, as the beſt and moſt profitable creatures, with which it is fit God ſhould be ſerved, and which we ſhould be ready to part with, when God requires us to do ſo; or, fourthly, as things moſt common and obvious, that men might never want a ſacrifice when they needed, or God required it.

Ver. 3. If his offering be a burnt-ſacrifice of the herd.] This was a burnt-ſacrifice ſtrictly ſo called, and it was to be entirely conſumed, the skin excepted, Lev. vii. 8. So, Gen. viii. 20. and 1 Kings iii. 15. for otherwiſe every ſacrifice was burnt, more or leſs. The ſacrifices did partly ſignify, that the whole man, in whoſe ſtead the ſacrifice was offered, was to be entirely and unreſervedly offer'd or devoted to God's ſervice; and that the whole man did deſerve to be utterly conſumed, if God ſhould deal ſeverely with him; and directed us to ſerve the Lord with all ſingleneſs of heart, without ſelf-ends, and to be ready to offer to God even ſuch ſacrifices, wherein ourſelves ſhould have no part or benefit.

—— Let him offer a male.] As being more perfect than the female, and more truly repreſenting the bleſſed Saviour of the world.

——Without blemiſh.] To ſignify, firſt, that God ſhould be ſerved with the beſt of every kind; ſecondly, that man, repreſented by theſe ſacrifices, ſhould aim at all purity and perfection of heart and life, and that Chriſtians ſhould one day attain to it, Eph. v. 27. and, thirdly, to intimate the ſpotleſs and compleat holineſs of Chriſt, Heb. ix. 13, 14. 1 Peter i. 18, 19. and ii. 22.

—— He ſhall offer it of his own voluntary will.] According to this tranſlation, voluntary offerings alone were meant by the command in the paſſage before us, or ſuch as were not preſcribed by God to be offered in courſe, but were offered at the pleaſure, and by the voluntary devotion of any perſon, either by the way of ſupplication for any mercy which he needed or deſired, or by way of thankſgiving for any favour or bleſſing received; but it may ſeem improper to reſtrain the rules here given to free-will offerings, which were to be obſerved in other offerings alſo: And the Hebrew word is by the Seventy, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, and others, render'd, to this purpoſe, for his acceptation, or that he may be accepted with God, or that God may be atoned, as it is, ver. 4. and ſo this phraſe is uſed, Lev. xxiii. 11.

——At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] Where the altar of burnt-offerings was placed, Exod. xi. 6, 29. and this was ſo neceſſary, that it is required, upon pain of death, to be brought hither, and offered in no other place, chap. xvii. 3, 4, &c. for which cauſe, it is likely, the door of the tabernacle is here mentioned rather than the altar, that it might be underſtood to be unlawful to offer at any other altar, but that which ſtood at the door of the tabernacle.

Here the people might likewiſe be ſpectators of the oblation; and this further ſignified, that men could have no entrance neither into the earthly tabernacle, the church, nor into the heavenly tabernacle of glory, but by Chriſt, who is the door, John x. 7, 9. by whom alone we have acceſs to God.

Ver. 4. And he ſhall put his hand upon the head of the burnt-offering.] Both his hands; as ſome gather from chap. xvi. 21. and (as Maimonides ſaith) he was to do it with all his might. This was a rite belonging to the peace-offerings as well as to burnt-offerings, chap. iii. 2. and to ſin-offerings alſo, chap. iv. 4. the meaning of which, in this ſort of offerings, ſeems to have been, that he who brought the ſacrifice renounced all his intereſt in it, and transfer'd it wholly to God, unto whoſe ſervice he entirely devoted it, it being like the old ceremony among the Romans, who laid their hands upon their ſervants, when they gave them their liberty, and abdicated their own right in them, ſaying, Hunc hominem liberum eſſe volo, I will that this man be free; which is called manumiſſion. In other offerings, it had another meaning, as we ſhall obſerve in due place: And it was imitated by the Gentiles, tho' not without the addition of impious ſuperſtitions; for they wreathed back the head of the beaſt upward, when they ſacrificed to the gods above; and thruſt down its head towards the ground, when they ſacrificed to their infernal deities.

—— And it ſhall be accepted for him, to make an atonement for him.] It ſhall be ſo acceptable, as to recommend him to the favour of the Divine Majeſty; for ſo the Hebrew word caphar ſeems here to ſignify, not properly to make an atonement, which was the buſineſs of a ſin-offering, but to own him to be in a ſtate of reconciliation with God, unto whom he was ſuppoſed to give up himſelf wholly, as he did this beaſt. The Jews, indeed, who ſtick to the literal ſignification of the word, fancy, that theſe burnt-offerings expiated evil thoughts and deſires: But there is no ground for this in ſcripture; and the moſt that can be made of it is, that God accepted his prayers, which he made in general for the forgiveneſs of all his ſins, when he laid his hand on the head of this ſacrifice; for it muſt be here obſerved, that laying on the hands was always accompanied by prayer, as appears by Jacob's laying them on the head of Manaſſeh and Ephraim, Gen. xvii. 14, 16, 20. But if a man had committed any ſin, there are other ſacrifices peculiarly appointed by the law for their expiation, which he was bound to offer, with confeſſion of ſin, and prayer to God for pardon.

Ver. 5. —— And he ſhall kill the bullock before the Lord.] That is, the man himſelf who brought it, as Raſi interprets; or one of the Levites, as others underſtand it; for they killed the paſchal lamb, at that great paſſover mentioned in 2 Chron. xxx. 17. as Bochart obſerves. But he ſhould have added the reaſon of it, which Raſi there gives; that a great many of the congregation not having ſanctified themſelves, (as we read in that place) therefore the Levites had the charge of killing the paſſover for every one that was not clean, to ſanctify themſelves unto the Lord. Otherwiſe, every man might kill his own paſſover, Exod. xii. 6. as they might do all their other ſacrifices. For certain it is, this was not the work of prieſts, as Maimonides ſhews in a paſſage mentioned by Dr. Cudworth, (in his book concerning the Lord's ſupper) p. 27. out of Biath Ammik-dath, where he quotes this place, to prove, that the killing of the holy things might be lawfully done by a ſtranger; yea of the moſt holy things, whether they were the holy things of private perſons, or of the whole congregation. The common objection to this is, that none might come into the court where the altar was, except the prieſts: To which the anſwer is plain, that upon this occaſion, other perſons might come ſo far within the court, becauſe it was indiſpenſibly neceſſary, that the man, who brought the ſacrifice, ſhould lay his hand upon the head of it; which was to be done at the altar, when it was to be ſlain.

— And the prieſts, Aaron's ſons, ſhall bring the blood.] Now begins the work of the prieſts: The receiving the blood, and that which immediately followed, belonging to their office, they received it in a baſon, as the manner alſo was among the heathens, which our learned Sherringham obſerves upon Codex Joma, p. 85. out of Homer's Odyſſ. l. iii. where Thraſymedes is repreſented as cutting the ox aſunder with a cleaver, and Perſeus as receiving the blood in a baſon.

—— And ſprinkle the blood round about upon the altar, &c.] That this might be done readily, one prieſt received the blood, and another took it from him, and ſprinkled it about the altar; or, as the Jews underſtand it, on every ſide of the altar; which they performed by two ſprinklings, at the oppoſite corners of it. This was a rite alſo uſed in peace and treſpaſs-offerings; but, in ſin-offerings, the blood was poured out at the foot of the altar; ſee chap. vii. 22. Thus the heathens alſo themſelves took care, that the blood of their ſacrifices ſhould not run upon the ground, but be received, in veſſels prepared for that purpoſe; and then poured upon their altars, and ſo offered and conſecrated to their gods. So Lucian, in his book of ſacrifices, repreſents the prieſt as pouring the blood upon the altar.

Ver. 6. And he ſhall flay the burnt-offerings.] Next followed the taking off the skin; which God ordered to be given to the prieſt, chap. vii. 8. Tho' the heathens burnt skin and all, in ſome places, as Bochart obſerves out of Plutarch and Lucian, (Hieroz. P. ii. l. 1. p. 324.) but whoſe work it was to flay the beaſt, is not here expreſſed. The Jews ſay, it belonged not to the prieſt to do this, but to the man himſelf, who brought the beaſt to be offered. For, (to ſhew in brief what belonged to the owners of the ſacrifice, and what to the prieſts,) it may be proper to note out of Abarbinel, that each of them had five things to perform. The owner of the ſacrifice laid his hand upon it, killed, flay'd, cut it up, and waſh'd the inwards; and then the prieſt received the blood in a veſſel, ſprinkled the blood, placed fire on the altar, ordered the wood to be laid on the fire, and directed the pieces of the ſacrifice to be placed upon the wood. And that the beaſt might more eaſily be flay'd, there were eight ſtone pillars, (as the Jews tell us, in Middoth, chap. 3.) and beams laid over them, on each of which were three iron hooks fixed; that the greateſt beaſts might hang upon the higheſt, the leſſer upon the middlemoſt, and the leaſt of all upon the loweſt; and ſo be more commodiouſly ſtript of their skins.

This burnt-offering was to be flay'd, partly for decency, becauſe the ſacrifices being, as it were, God's food and feaſt, it was incongruous to offer to the Deity that which men refuſed to eat; and partly to ſignify, that the great thing which God required and regarded in men, was, not their outward appearance, but their inſide; and that as he ſees the internals of all men, Heb. iv. 13. ſo he will one day make them viſible to others.

——— And cut it into pieces.] This followed the excoriation among the Gentiles alſo; and it was performed with ſuch accuracy, that Homer ſaith, they diſſected the ſacrifice with much prudence and skill: From whence ſome great men have thought, St. Paul borrowed the word ἐρθοτομεῖν, to expreſs the care the miniſters of the Goſpel ſhould have, in dividing rightly the word of truth, 2 Tim. ii. 15. Theſe pieces were not the very ſame in bullocks and goats; as they were in ſheep; and, therefore, the greater care was to be uſed in cutting them, eſpecially when, beſides thoſe parts which were offered to God, the prieſt and the people were to have their ſhare alſo.

Ver. 7. And the ſons of Aaron the prieſt ſhall put fire upon the altar.] This was one of the works of the prieſt, who did not put fire daily upon the altar, (for being once kindled, they were to keep it always burning, chap. vi. 13.) but ſtirred it up, and blowed the coals. Which is meant by giving fire, as the phraſe is in the Hebrew; that is, diſpoſing it ſo, that it might burn quick. Yet, if the fire was taken off from the altar, as when they removed the camp, Numb. iv. 14. none might lay it on again but the prieſts. Or, if it were extinct, as it was in the days of Ahaz, who ſhut up the door of the houſe of God, which was not opened till Hezekiah reigned, 2 Chron. xxviii. 24. xxix. 34. none but they might kindle it again.

—— And lay the wood in order upon the fire.] This the prieſts did every morning, and every evening; that the fire might be preſerved from going out. And when the time of the morning and evening ſacrifice came, they brought new wood, and laid it in ſuch order upon the fire, that it might the better conſume the parts of the ſacrifice, that were laid thereon.

Ver. 8. And the prieſts, Aarons ſons, ſhall lay the parts, the head and the fat.] The Hebrew word peder doth not ſimply ſignify the fat; (for which they have an other word cheleb) but that fat which is ſeparated from the reſt of the fleſh. So it is to be underſtood here, and in chap. iii. 9. iv. 34. which being gathered together, and thrown into the fire, fed the flame, and made it burn more fiercely; by which means the other parts, into which the ſacrifice was divided, were the more eaſily and ſooner conſumed. Particularly, St. Jerom takes it for that fat which adhered to the liver: and both Solomon Jarchi and David Kimchi obſerve, that this peder was thrown upon the head of the ſacrifice, when it was caſt into the fire, juſt in the place where the head was cut off from the body; becauſe, otherwiſe, the gore which iſſued from it might have extinguiſhed the flame, ſee Exod. xxix. 17.

——— In order upon the wood.] That they might lie upon the wood, ſo as to have the ſame ſituation in the altar as they had in the beaſt, when it was alive: So Maimonides, in Maaſe Korban, cap. 6.

Ver. 9. But his inwards and his legs ſhall he waſh in water.] Theſe parts were not to be burnt upon the altar, till they were well cleanſed by waſhing them in water; for which end there was a private room afterward, in the court of the temple, as now it is likely there was in the tabernacle, called the waſhing-room; as we find in Codex Middoth, cap. 5. ſect. 2. There they having waſhed them privately, and freed the inwards from their impurity, they brought them into the court, where were two marble tables between the pillars before-mentioned, ver. 6. and there they were waſhed more exactly, as we read in the ſame book, cap. 3. ſec. 5. Where Conſt. l'Empereur obſerves, out of R. Hobadia, the reaſon why they uſed to lay the fleſh upon ſuch table, was, becauſe marble made it cold and ſtiff, and preſerved it from contracting an offenſive odour in very hot weather.

———And the prieſt ſhall burn all upon the altar.] From whence this ſacrifice is called iſcheh, an offering made by fire; (from iſch which ſignifies fire) becauſe it was altogether conſumed in the fire, and no part of it left, ſo much as for the prieſt to eat of it.

———Of a ſweet ſavour unto the Lord.] i. e. moſt acceptable. For it is a form of ſpeech taken from men, who are delighted with the good taſte of meat and drink. But none can reaſonably imagine, it was the meer ſacrifice that was pleaſing unto God; but, as Conrad Pellicanus well notes, the devotion, faith, obedience, and ſincerity of their minds who made the oblation.

Ver. 10. And if his offering be of flocks, namely of the ſheep or of the goats, &c.] If a man was not able to bring a bullock for a burnt ſacrifice (which could not be ſo well ſpared, being of great uſe in agriculture) he might bring one of theſe creatures, that were of leſs value; only perfect in their kind, as it here follows.

———He ſhall bring it himſelf without blemiſh.] See Exod. xii. ver. 5. What the blemiſhes were, that made any animal unfit to be offered on the altar; Moſes tells us in this book, chap. xxii. ver. 22, 23, 24. where he mentions twelve, which ſhall be there conſidered.

Ver. 11. And he ſhall kill it on the ſide of the altar northward.] The greater ſacrifices, which the Jews call the moſt holy things, had this peculiar place aſſigned them, where they were to be kill'd, viz. all the burnt-offerings, (whether of bullocks, ſheep, or goats,) and all offerings for ſin, chap. vi. 25. and all treſpaſs-offerings, chap. vii. 2. But all the other ſacrifices, which they call the leſſer holy things, (ſuch as the peace-offerings of particular men, the paſchal lamb, the firſt-born, and that which was tythed,) might be killed in any part of the court, where the altar ſtood; there being no peculiar place appointed by the law for that purpoſe; but only at the entrance of the tabernacle. Yet a peace-offering for the whole congregation, was look'd upon as belonging to the things moſt holy, and ſo were ſlain, (as Maimonides tells us) at the north-ſide of the altar, where there were certain rings fixed, to which the head, or, as ſome ſay, the feet of the beaſt was tied, in order to its being killed. But they were not perfect rings as, l'Empereur obſerves, being rather half ſegments of rings, one part of which were faſtned to the pavement, and by the other the neck of the beaſt was tied to it. See Codex Middoth, chap. iii. ſect. 5. The reaſon of this difference ſeems to be, only to be underſtood of the four-footed beaſts before mentioned, not of birds which were ſacrificed after another manner, as appears from ver. 15.

Ver. 14. And if the burnt-ſacrifice for his offering to the Lord be of fowls, then he ſhall bring his offering of turtle-doves or of young pigeons.] Theſe birds were appointed for the relief of the poor, who could not bring better, and they were preferred before others; becauſe they were eaſily to be obtained: The pigeons were to to be young, becauſe they are then beſt; but the turtle doves are better when they are more grown up.

Ver. 15. And the prieſt ſhall bring it into the altar, and wring off his head.] Pinch it off with his nails, (as the Jews ſay) at one of the corners or horns of the altar; viz. the whole burnt-offering at the ſouth-eaſt corner, and the ſin-offering at the north-weſt, as Maimonides ſaith, in his treatiſe called Korbanoth, cap. v. But their heads were ſo to be wrung or pinched, as not to be ſeparated from the body, but to be left ſtill hanging to it, for ſo it is ordered in that ſacrifice mentioned ver. 8. and therefore the Jews ſuppoſe it was ſo in all.

———And the blood thereof ſhall be wrung out, at the ſides of the altar.] The reaſon, why the prieſt alone might kill the bird, (though others might kill the beaſt, ſee ver. 5.) was, becauſe the ſprinkling of the blood, which none might do but the prieſt, was immediately conjunct with the wringing off his head.

Ver. 16. And he ſhall pluck away his crop,] or the ſtomach, that the ſacrifice might be free from all impurity.

———With his feathers,] Which were no more to be offered, than the skin of the beaſt, ver. 6.

———And caſt it beſide the altar on the eaſt part.] as far as might be from the moſt holy place, which was in the weſt.

Ver. 17. And he ſhall cleave it with the wings thereof, but ſhall not divide it aſunder.] The wings were to be ſo cloven, as not to be quite ſeparated from the body, but ſtill to remain hanging to it; and ſalt being ſprinkled upon the whole body, it was thrown into the fire; ſo Maimonides obſerves, in the forementioned treatiſe; where he takes notice alſo, that it was otherwiſe in fowls offered for ſin, of which nothing but the blood belonged to the altar; the fleſh of them being eaten by the prieſts and their ſons. Whence it was, that no ſin-offering of birds was accepted, unleſs it was accompanied, with an whole burnt-offering; that the altar might not be without a feaſt, when they who miniſtred there were entertained. Thus it is required in ſeveral caſes mentioned ver. 7. xii. 6, 8. xiv. 22. xv. 15, 30. and Numb. vi. 11. The ſame Maimonides likewiſe obſerves, that this ſacrifice of birds was one of the moſt difficult works in the ſanctuary; whereby, the mind of the prieſt was kept as intent upon the pooreſt ſacrifice, as upon the moſt ſplendid.

———And the prieſt ſhall burn it upon the altar, upon the wood that is upon the fire.] This was in part ſaid before, but here repeated more diſtinctly; to ſhew, there was no difference to be made, between the ſacrifices of the meaneſt and of the greateſt.

———It is a burnt ſacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a ſweet ſavour unto the Lord.] The ſame is ſaid of this, as of all other Holocauſts (ver. 9, 15.) to ſhew, that whether the oblation was of the greater animals, or the leſs, or only of birds, it made no difference in its acceptance with God; who graciouſly ordered theſe various ſorts of offerings, that the poor, as well as the rich, might be capable of teſtifying their devotion to him, and be confident to find favour with him.

CHAP. II.

1 The meat-offering of flour with oil and incenſe, 4 either baked in the oven, 5 or on a plate, 7 or in a frying-pan: 12 or of the firſt-fruits in the year. 13 The ſalt of the meat-offering.

AND when any will offer a meat-offering unto the LORD, his offering ſhall be of fine flour; and he ſhall pour oyl upon it, and put frankincenſe thereon.

2 And he ſhall bring it to Aarons ſons the prieſts: and he ſhall take thereout his handful of the flour thereof, and of the oyl thereof, with all the frankincenſe thereof; and the prieſt ſhall burn the memorial of it upon the altar, to be an offering made by fire, of a ſweet ſavour unto the LORD.

3 And the remnant of the meat-offering ſhall be Aarons and his ſons: it is a thing moſt holy of the offerings of the LORD made by fire.

4 ¶ And if thou bring an oblation of a meat-offering baked in the oven, it ſhall be an unleavened cake of fine flour mingled with oyl, or unleavened wafers anointed with oyl.

5 ¶ And if thy oblation be a meat-offering baked in a pan, it ſhall be of fine flour unleavened, mingled with oyl.

6 Thou ſhalt part it in pieces, and pour oyl thereon: it is a meat-offering.

7 ¶ And if thy oblation be a meat-offering baked in the frying-pan, it ſhall be made of fine flour with oyl.

8 And thou ſhalt bring the meat-offering, that is made of theſe things, unto the LORD, and when it is preſented unto the prieſt, he he ſhall bring it unto the altar.

9 And the prieſt ſhall take from the meat-offering a memorial thereof, and ſhall burn it upon the altar: it is an offering made by fire of a ſweet ſavour unto the LORD.

10 And that which is left of the meat-offering, ſhall be Aaron and his ſons: it is a thing moſt holy, of the offerings of the LORD made by fire.

11 No meat-offering which ye ſhall bring unto the LORD, ſhall be made with leaven: for ye ſhall burn no leaven, nor any honey, in any offering of the LORD made by fire.

12 ¶ As for the oblation of the firſt-fruits, ye ſhall offer them unto the LORD: but they ſhall not be burnt on the altar for a ſweet ſavour.

13 And every oblation of the meat-offering ſhalt thou ſeaſon with ſalt: neither ſhalt thou ſuffer the ſalt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking from thy meat-offering: with all thine offerings thou ſhalt offer ſalt.

14 And if thou offer a meat-offering of thy firſt fruits unto the LORD, thou ſhalt offer for that meat-offering of thy firſt fruits, green ears of corn dried by the fire, even corn beaten out of full ears.

15 And thou ſhalt put oyl upon it, and lay frankincenſe thereon: it is a meat-offering.

16 And the prieſt ſhall burn the memorial of it, part of the beaten corn thereof, and part of the oyl thereof, with all the frankfrankincenſe thereof: it is an offering made by fire unto the LORD.

Ver. 1. And when any will offer a meat-offering unto the Lord.] This was of two kinds; the one joined with other offerings, Numb. xv. 4, 7, 10. which was preſcribed, together with the meaſure or proportion of it; the other, of which this paſſage treats, was a diſtinct and ſeparate offering, and left to the offerer's good-will, both for the ſubſtance and the quantity. The matter of this offering was things without life, as meal, corn, cakes, &c. Now theſe ſorts of ſacrifices were appointed; Firſt, becauſe the materials that compoſed them were moſt neceſſary and beneficial to mankind, for which reaſon it was expedient that God ſhould be ſerved with them, and owned and praiſed as their beneficent donor; Secondly, in condeſcenſion to the poor, that they might not want an offering for God, and to ſhew that he would accept even the meaneſt ſervices, when offered to him with an humble ſincerity; Thirdly, theſe were neceſſary proviſions for the feaſt, that was here to be preſented to God, and for the uſe of the prieſts, who were to attend upon theſe holy miniſtrations.

—His offering ſhall be of fine flour.] Namely, of wheat flour; for all the oblations of this kind, whether for the congregation, or particular men, were of pure flour, ſifted from the bran; except, only, the omer of firſt-fruits of their harveſt, chap. xxiii. 13, 14. and that which was called the mincha of jealouſy, Numb. v. 15. which were of barley. Of theſe voluntary offerings there were five ſorts, as appears by this chapter; for they were either of raw meat, (mentioned in this verſe) or meal made into cakes, baked in an oven, (which was of two ſorts, ver. 4.) or baked in a pan, verſe 5. or in a frying-pan, verſe 7. The firſt of which was the moſt ancient, as appears from Gen. iv. 3. and from what the heathens ſay of it, particuly Plato, L. vi. de Legibus, and Pliny, L. xxx. Nat. Hiſt. cap. 5. where he ſaith, Numa ordered the Romans, Deos fruge colere, &c. And Pauſanias in his Attica tells us, "In the porch of the moſt high Jupiter, was an altar, "where they did not offer the ſacrifice of beaſts, but on- of fine flour." The ſame he repeats in his Arcadica, and ſays, this was ordained by Cecrops; and Triptolemus, another of their moſt ancient law-givers, enacted this, as one of his principal laws, that they ſhould worſhip their gods with the fruits of the earth.

—And he ſhall pour oil upon it.] Which was done to give this ſort of offering a grateful reliſh, as Maimonides obſerves, More Nevochim, P. iii. cap. 46. The heathens uſed oil in their ſacrifices; not mixt with flour, but poured upon the fleſh of the beaſt that was offered, to make it burn the better upon the altar.

——— And put frankincenſe thereon.] To diffuſe a fragrant odour in the court of the tabernacle, which otherwiſe would have been offenſive, by reaſon of the fleſh that was burnt there daily. When they came into the land of Canaan, where they were required (Numb. xv. 2, 3, &c.) to take care that this mincha, or meat-offering, ſhould attend all the freewill-offerings of beaſts, as well as the daily morning and evening ſacrifice, there is no frankincenſe appointed, but a certain quantity of wine, which perhaps was inſtead of it, (having a fragrant ſmell) and was not required in the offering here mentioned. Both theſe were common in the ſacrifices of the Gentiles, as appears in this ſingle paſſage in Ovid, l. v. de Triſtibus. Eleg. 5.

Da mihi thura, puer, pingues facientia flammas.
Quodque pio ſuſum ſtridat in igne merum.

Ver. 2. And he ſhall bring it.] In a ſilver diſh, or ſome other metal (as R. Levi of Barcelona expounds it, Precept. ch. cxvi.) wherein he delivered it to the prieſt, who carried it to the altar, and preſented it to God, by lifting it up over his head; and as the Jews generally ſay, turning it about to all the four quarters of the world, as a teſtimony, that it was offered to the poſſeſſor of heaven and earth.

———To Aarons ſons the prieſts.] To one of them, who miniſter'd at the altar that day this offering was brought, as appears by the next words.

———And he ſhall take thereout his handful of the flour thereof.] As much as he could take up between his fingers, ſaith R. Levi.

———And of the oil thereof.] Which was mingled as was ſaid before with the flour.

———With all the frankincenſe thereof.] None of which was to be reſerved, for the prieſts own uſe; but intierly burnt upon the altar, which was contrary to the cuſtom of the Gentiles, who called frankincenſe, as Diodorus Siculus declares, L. ii.) a thing moſt belov'd of the gods, but yet offered only ſo much as they could take up with two fingers, or, as others ſay, three; ſee Caperus Apotheoſis Homeri, p. 74, &c.

———And the prieſt ſhall burn the memorial thereof upon the altar.] As a grateful acknowledgment unto God, that they held all they poſſeſſed of him, their Sovereign Lord; whom they ſupplicated alſo hereby, that he would ſtill be mindful of them, that is, be gracious to them; for this offering ſeems to have ſomething of the nature of an Holocauſt, or whole burnt-offering; tho' others will have it to be an expiatory ſacrifice, becauſe part of it was eaten by the prieſts. But, it being ſaid in the next words, to be an offering made by fire, which is the phraſe of a whole burnt-offering, in the foregoing chap. ver. 9, 13, 17. we take the other to be the truer.

Of a ſweet ſavour to the Lord.] The very ſame being ſaid of this ſort of offering, which is of the foregoing, that were more chargeable, ch. i. 9, 13, 17.) Procopius Gazæus had great reaſon here to obſerve (which cannot be too often repeated) "that true piety is not demonſtrated by "the greatneſs of the preſents. The way of piety is "open and eaſy unto all; for God's commandment is ex- "ceeding broad, and he that maketh the ſmalleſt ſignifi- "cation of it, if it be ſincere, differs nothing from him, "who ſhews it by the largeſt gifts, &c." Julian contended that the ſacrifices of living creatures were more eſteemed, than thoſe without life; becauſe they were nearer of kin to the living God, and the author of life. But his great doctors, Pythagoras and Porphirius (as S. Cyril obſerves, l. x. Contra Julianum) condemned their ſacrifices of beaſts as hateful to their gods; who, they fancied, were pleaſed, only, with thoſe that were made of fruits of the earth, and of frankincenſe. But they might have learnt from Moſes, if they had pleaſed (Julian and Porphyry being acquainted with his books,) that theſe things were alike acceptable, God having reſpect to the mind of him who offer'd, and not to his gifts.

Ver. 3. And the remnant of the meat-offering, ſhall be Aarons and his ſons.] To be eaten by them. But that meat-offering which was offered for the prieſts themſelves, was to be wholly burnt, and no part eaten, chap. vi. 22, 23.

———It is a thing moſt holy, of the offerings of the Lord, made by fire.] Nothing is more known, than the diſtinction, which the Jews make between things, moſt holy, and the lighter holy things, (as their phraſe is,) the moſt holy were ſuch as none might eat of, or none but prieſts, and the ſons of prieſts, and that only in the ſanctuary; ſee chap. vi. 16, 26. Such were all whole burnt-offerings, all the ſin, and all the peace-offerings, for the whole congregation. Lighter holy things, were ſuch as might be eaten by thoſe who were not prieſts, in any place within the city of Jeruſalem, to which their camp now correſponded, and ſuch were all the peace-offerings of particular perſons, the paſcal lamb, the tenths and the firſtlings of cattle.

Ver. 4. And if thou bring an oblation of a meat-offering baked in the oven.] This is the firſt ſort of baked mincha's, for the preparation of which, there was an oven in the court of the tabernacle, as afterwards there was in the court of the temple, 1 Chron. ch. xxiii. ver. 28, 29. Ezek. xlvi. 20.

——— It ſhall be unleavened cakes of fine flour mingled with oil, or unleavened wafers anointed with oil.] If the cakes were thick, then the oil was kneaded together with them; but if they were thin, like a wafer, then it was only ſpread upon them, before they were baked; ſee Exod. xxix. 2. or, as ſome will have it, after they came out of the oven.

Ver. 5. And if thy oblation be a meat-offering baked in a pan.] Or in a flat plate, as we tranſlate it in the margin; for Maimonides ſays, there was this difference between macabath (which is the Hebrew word in this place) and marcheſheth; that the former was a pan or plate, without any rim about it, whereas the other had one;

Abar-

Abarbinel, in his preface to this book, obſerves out of Jarchi, that there was a veſſel in the temple, which was only flat and broad, and had no riſing on the ſides of it; ſo that the oil being poured upon it, when it was placed on the fire, ran down and increaſed the flame, and made the cake hard.

—It ſhall be of fine flour unleavened, mingled with oil.] This ſort of cake, ſeems to have been both kneaded with oil and to have oil alſo poured upon it, after it was laid upon the plate.

Ver. 6. Thou ſhalt part it in pieces, &c] This, according to Abarbinel, was done as it lay baking upon the plate. Or, if this diviſion was made after it was taken off, the reaſon was the ſame; becauſe part of it was to be given to God, and the reſt to the prieſt.

——— And pour oil thereon.] Upon the pieces; that they might, by this new addition of freſh oil, be render'd more ſavoury.

Ver. 7. And if thy oblation be a meat-offering baken in the frying-pan.] This veſſel was not flat, but deep, as Abarbinel obſerves; ſee ver. 5. becauſe that which was baked in it was moiſt and fluid.

——— It ſhall be made of fine flour with oil.] The oil was not kneaded with this ſort of mincha, but poured into a pan, ſo that it mixed with the flour; which might be ſhaken and moved up and down, as things are which are baken in liquors, ſays Abarbinel.

Ver. 8. And thou ſhalt bring the meat-offering that is made of theſe things unto the Lord.] This Injunction relates to all the baked meat-offerings before-mentioned, which were to be brought to the Lord at his houſe, and there preſented to the prieſt, who was to convey them to the altar, when they were prepared as before directed; ſee ver. 1, 2. And this variety of minchas was allowed, that the table of the Lord, i. e. the altar, might be furniſhed, and his miniſters who waited on him, entertain'd with all ſorts of proviſions.

Ver. 9. And the Prieſt ſhall take from the meat-offering a memorial thereof] A part of the cake of whatſoever ſort it was, was ſeparated from the reſt of the Lords portion; to whom it was offered as the acknowledgment of his ſupreme dominion over them, and in commemoration of his goodneſs to them.

———And ſhall burn it upon the altar.] Before the other parts were eaten by the prieſts; as was directed before about the fine flour, ver. 2.

Ver. 11. No meat-offering which ye ſhall bring unto the Lord, ſhall be made with leaven.] Theſe words, which ye ſhall bring unto the Lord, ſeem to have a peculiar emphaſis in this place; importing, that no meat-offering, part of which was offered upon God's altar, ſhould be leavened. For no part of that leavened bread which was offered in euchariſtical ſacrifices, chap. vii. 13. nor the two loaves offered in the feaſts of Penticoſt, which ſome miſtake for an exception to this precept, were offered upon the altar, but given intirely to the prieſts as their portion. There are many moral reaſons given, both by Jewiſh and Chriſtian writers, why none of the cakes before-mentioned, ſhould have any leaven in them, which we ſhall not here ſet down. Maimonides ſeems to have given the beſt account of this, in his More Nevochim, (p. iii. cap. 46.) where he ſaith, God prohibited this, in order to root out the idolatrous cuſtoms of thoſe days, as this author found them in the books of the Zabij, who offered to their God's no bread, but ſuch as was leavened. Next to this, the account which Abarbinel gives of it, is not to be diſregarded; who thinks it was forbidden, becauſe it would have created a delay, if they had waited at the tabernacle, 'till the fermentation was compleated.

———For ye ſhall burn no leaven, nor any honey, in any offering of the Lord made by fire.] Honey was a kind of leaven, and uſed by the heathens in their religious rites; as appears not only from Maimonides, (who tells us, that they choſe ſweet things for their offerings, and anointed their ſacrifices with honey) but from a great number of authors, who make mention of it: particularly Plato, who ſaith, (in his vi. de legibus,) that anciently, men did not ſacrifice living creatures, but only fine flour, and fruits moiſtned with honey. Phylarchus tells us, that the Greeks ſacrificed honey to the ſun, which was the great God among the Gentiles, but poured no wine upon his altars. This Polemon calls a ſober ſacrifice; becauſe there was no wine in it, but honey and water mixed together. Nay, there was ſcarce any God among the heathens, to whom honey was not offered, as Bochart hath ſhewn at large, in his Hierozoicon, p. ii. l. 4. c. xii. but one teſtimony may ſerve for all, which is from Pauſanias (in his Eliaca,) where having reckoned up at leaſt, fifty altars, erected in the temple of Jupiter Olympius, to ſeveral deities, and ſome of them common to them all, he adds, that they ſacrificed upon every one of them, once a month, after an ancient manner, frankincenſe and wheat mingled with honey. Which being ſo common and ancient a rite among the Gentiles, in their idolatrous worſhip, was probably the reaſon why God prohibited it to be uſed in his ſacrifices. And under the name of honey, the Jews think, figs and dates, and all other ſweet fruits, are comprehended, for the famous compoſition among the Egyptians, called Kuphi, which was burnt every day, morning and evening, on their altars, conſiſted of ſuch ingredients, as well as of Myrrh, Calamus, and Cardimum; ſo Plutarch tells us (in the book, de Iſide & Oſir) and mentions honey in the firſt-place, with wine and raiſons.

Ver. 12. As for the oblation of the firſt-fruits ye ſhall offer them unto the Lord, but they ſhall not be burnt on the altar for a ſweet ſavour.] There were ſeveral ſorts of firſt-fruits; that which is here ſpoken of, was of corn unground, and only a little parcht at the fire; this was to be preſented to God, but not burnt on the altar, becauſe it belonged to the prieſts.

Ver. 13. And every oblation of thy meat-offering ſhalt thou ſeaſon with ſalt.] All the forenamed mincha's, which were Korbans, (as they are often called) were to be thus ſeaſoned, becauſe ſalt was a thing never wanted at any table; and all meat is unſavoury without it.

——— Neither ſhalt thou ſuffer the ſalt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking from thy meat-offerings.] It is called the ſalt of the covenant of God, as ſome think, becauſe required by this law, which they covenanted with God to obſerve, as much as to offer ſacrifices; which were not acceptable without ſalt, as appears by the repetition of it three times in this one verſe; but there is a plainer reaſon than this, which is, that the ſacrifices being God's feaſts, and they who partook of them being his gueſts, ſince they did, in a manner, eat and drink with him at his table, the ſalt that was caſt upon all ſacrifices, as appears by the words following, is called the ſalt of the covenant, to ſignify, that as men were accuſtomed to make covenants by eating and drinking together, where ſalt was a neceſſary appendix at every feaſt, ſo God, by theſe ſacrifices, and the feaſts upon them, did ratify and confirm his covenant with thoſe who were partakers of them. For ſalt, as is commonly obſerved, being a conſtant concomitant of all feaſts, and covenants being made by eating and drinking at the ſame table, where ſalt was ever uſed, ſalt itſelf was thence concited, by the ancients, to be the ſymbol of friendſhip, and was proverbially uſed among the Greeks to expreſs it. This obſervation may be uſeful to explain other paſſages of ſcripture, about which ſome have beſtowed vain labour, Numb. xxiii. 19. 2 Chron. xiii. 5. where the ſame words are uſed, but inverted; it being called a covenant of ſalt, inſtead of the ſalt of the covenant, becauſe covenants, as we have already intimated, were eſtabliſhed by eating together at feaſts, where ſalt was never wanting.

——— With all thine offerings thou ſhalt offer ſalt.] Not only with the mincha's, or meat-offerings, mentioned in this chapter, but with all other ſacrifices whatſoever. Which is ſo ſolemnly enjoined, as Maimonides obſerves, becauſe the heathens did not uſe any ſalt in their ſacrifices. Which is not unreaſonable to think, ſince honey, with which ſalt doth not well agree, was in ſuch conſtant uſe among them. And therefore, ſaith he, God prohibited us to offer leaven or honey, and commanded us, with great ſeriouſneſs, to uſe ſalt in all our ſacrifices; that is, as R. Levi, of Barcelona, Precept. cxvi. explains it, the fleſh of all ſacrifices was to be ſalted, and the meat of all mincha's. For which he gives theſe two reaſons; becauſe nothing is grateful to the palate without ſalt, which alſo preſerves things from corruption, as the ſacrifices did their ſouls from periſhing. Abarbinel ſaith the ſame, and therefore, whatever the cuſtom might be, in ancient times, among the heathens, in after-ages they learned from Moſes to uſe it in all their ſacrifices, as appears from Pliny and Ovid, and many other authors; the first of which saith, that salt was so necessary, that no sacrifices were offered sine mola salsa, which every one knows the Greeks called ἅλας, and ἁλοχύτας. And among the Jews, this salt was not brought by him who offered the sacrifice, but was provided at the public charge, there being a chamber in the court of the temple, as we read in Middoth, cap. 5. sec. 2. called the chamber of salt, which was one of the three rooms on the north side of the court, as there were three others on the south side, for other uses; where the flesh of the sacrifices was powder'd, as the mincha's were seasoned at the very altar. And this was so necessary, that tho' a sacrifice was not look'd upon as null, if the priest neglected to salt it, yet the want of it in the mincha's, as the Hebrew doctors say, render'd them void; because it is here so expressly required in this verse, thou shalt not suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking in thy meat offering; and whosoever offered any sacrifice without salt, or with honey or leaven, was beaten, as Mr. Selden observes, L. 2. de Synedr. c 13.

Ver. 14. And if thou offer a meat-offering of thy first fruits unto the Lord, thou shalt offer for thy meat offering, &c.] This is very different from the oblation of first-fruits, mentioned, ver. 12. for there they are called resith, which signifies the first-fruits at harvest-time; but here bichurim, which properly imports the first ripe fruits, before the rest were ready. And therefore the manner of their oblation was different from the former, which follows in the conclusion of this verse: First, there is a description of what is meant by the first-fruits, which he calls Abib, i.e. full ears of corn, but as yet green and moist; which he saith therefore, in the next place, must be dried by the fire, and then bruised and beaten in a mortar, or with a mill: and they were to be selected from their richest and most fertile fields: For so the last words seem to signify, gareſh-carmel, which we translate corn beaten out of full ears; for carmel sometimes signifies a fruitful field, Isa. xxiii. 15. and therefore may very well be thought in this place to import, the largest ears of tender corn; and the intention of its contusion seems to have been, that it might be reduced into flour; as it might easily be, after it had been dried by the fire. And, therefore, it differed from that meat-offering, mentioned ver. 1. only in this, that the former was flour of old corn, this of new; and that was fine flour sifted from the bran; this had nothing taken out of it, but remained as it came from the mortar or the mill; and so the Seventy seem to have understood it. There are those, indeed, who think it was only threshed out of the husk, and so offered; and fancy also, that from this word gereſh the goddess Ceres had her name among the Gentiles; which last conceit is the stranger, since those who advance it, endeavour to have it thought, that the Jews derived this custom, of offering first-fruits, from the Gentiles, and not the Gentiles from the Jews. We can't find, that it was customary with the Gentiles to offer the first-fruits of green corn, but only the first-fruits of their harvest, which they called novas fruges; of which the Romans thought it unlawful to taste, antequam sacerdotes primitias libassent, before the priests had offered the first-fruits, as Pliny tells us, L. xviii. c. 2. and Censorinus saith the same, De die natali, cap. 1. Or, if they did offer any first-fruits, before corn was ripe, they boiled them in a pot; but did not roast them in the fire, as is here directed, for so Hesychius seems to say, that in the feast called Thargelia (which was in the month which answers to our April) they offered the first-fruits that appeared out of the ground, which they carried about, i. e. in pots as other authors tells us. And Hesychius himself saith, that Thargalos signifies a pot full of sacred decoction.

CHAP. III.

1 The peace-offering of the herd: 6 of the flock, 7 either a lamb, 12 or a goat.

AND if his oblation be a sacrifice of peace-offering, if he offer it of the herd, whether it be a male or female: he shall offer it without blemish before the LORD.

2 And he shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering, and kill it at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and Aarons sons the priests shall sprinkle the blood upon the altar round about.

3 And he shall offer of the sacrifice of the peace-offering, an offering made by fire unto the LORD; the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards.

4 And the two kidneys, and the fat that is on them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away.

5 And Aarons sons shall burn it on the altar upon the burnt-sacrifice, which is upon the wood that is on the fire: it is an offering made by fire of a sweet savour unto the LORD.

6 ¶ And if his offering for a sacrifice of peace-offering unto the LORD, be of the flock, male or female; he shall offer it without blemish.

7 If he offer a lamb for his offering, then shall he offer it before the LORD.

8 And he shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering, and kill it before the tabernacle of the congregation: and Aarons sons shall sprinkle the blood thereof round about upon the altar.

9 And he shall offer of the sacrifice of the peace-offering, an offering made by fire unto the LORD: the fat thereof, and the whole rump, it shall he take off hard by the back-bone: and the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards.

10 And the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away.

11 And the priest shall burn it upon the altar: it is the food of the offering made by fire unto the LORD.

12 ¶ And if his offering be a goat, then he shall offer it before the LORD.

13 And he shall lay his hand upon the head of it, and kill it before the tabernacle of the congregation: and the sons of Aaron shall sprinkle the blood thereof upon the altar round about.

14 And he shall offer thereof his offering, even an offering made by fire unto the LORD; the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards.

15 And

15 And the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it ſhall he take away.

16 And the prieſt ſhall burn them upon the altar: it is the food of the offering made by fire for a ſweet ſavour. All the fat is the LORDS.

17 It ſhall be a perpetual ſtatute for your generations throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood.

Ver. 1. And if his oblation be a ſacrifice of peace-offering,] The Deity having given orders, with relation to whole burnt-offerings, in the firſt chapter; and meat-offerings (which had ſomething of that nature in them) in the ſecond; proceeds to peace-offerings, which in the Hebrew are called Schelamin, from the word Schalam; either as it ſignifies retribution, or peace and concord. They who take it in the firſt ſenſe, think the reaſon of the name to be from this; that God, the offerer, and the prieſt, had each of them their portion of this ſacrifice. And they who follow the ſecond ſenſe, do not much differ; when they ſay, that theſe ſacrifices were ſymbols of friendſhip, between God and the prieſts, and thoſe who brought them; for they all feaſted at a common table, as R. Levi Ben Gerſom expreſſes it, for part being offered on the altar, and the prieſt having taken his ſhare, the reſt was given to him that offered the ſacrifice: So that it was called a peace-offering, ſaith Abarbinel (becauſe it made peace or rather declared peace) between the altar, the prieſt, and the owner. But they ſeem to have given the beſt account of this, who, as peace in their language ſignifies proſperity and happineſs, think theſe were called peace-offerings, becauſe, they were principally grateful acknowledgments of mercies received from God's bounty; for there being three ſorts of them mentioned, chap. vii. 15, 16. that of thankſgiving is the firſt, called Tothath, acknowledgment of ſome benefit received.

——If he offer it of the herd whether it be male or female.] A whole burnt-offering was to be only a male; for being entirely God's, and offered purely for his honour, it was to be of the very beſt, chap. i. 3. but peace-offerings, being alſo for the profit of the perſon who made thoſe oblations, and had the greateſt ſhare of them; he was at liberty to offer either a male or female, directly contrary to the Egyptian cuſtoms, if they were the ſame now, that they were in the time of Herodotus, who ſaith expreſly, it was not lawful among them to ſacrifice females. L. ii. cap. 41.

Ver. 2. And he ſhall lay his hand upon the head of his offering,] In this ſacrifice, laying on of hands ſeems to have been performed, not only with prayer to God, that he would accept the oblation, (which the Jews ſay, always accompanied this action) but with acknowledgment of thoſe mercies which were the occaſion of it. "Laying on of "hands, ſays a learned author, ſignifies devotion and faith, "with an acknowledgment of the Divine benefits: for "which we cannot offer any thing of our own, but rather "return and reſtore to him what we have received; and "that we may underſtand, giving of thanks to be the "greateſt of our ſacrifices."

——At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] Theſe being the leſſer holy things, as the Jews call them, were not offered, as the whole burnt-offerings and ſin-offerings were, on the north-ſide of the altar; ſee chap. i. 11. but any where elſe, near to the entrance of the tabernacle, which was in the eaſt, where the aſhes were thrown out, and therefore a leſs holy place; only in laying on of hands, every man was bound, whereſoever the ſacrifice was killed, to turn his face weſtward, toward the ſanctuary; becauſe then, he offered up certain prayers and acknowledgments to the Divine majeſty, and which were always to be render'd to him in that poſture.

Ver. 5. And Aarons ſons ſhall burn it on the altar upon the burnt-ſacrifice.] By the burnt-ſacrifice, ſeems here to be meant, the daily ſacrifice which was burnt every morning; after which this was to be offered, but not before it.

Ver. 12. And if his offering be a goat, &c.] The law concerning this ſacrifice, is the very ſame with the former, (except what is ordered about the rump of a ſheep) and this and the following veſes 13, 14, 15. need no farther explication.

The reſt of this chapter is likewiſe ſufficiently intelligible, and therefore we think it unneceſſary to offer any farther comment upon it.

CHAP. IV.

1 The ſin-offering of ignorance; 3 for the prieſt, 13 for the congregation, 22 for the ruler, 27 for any of the people.

AND the LORD ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying,

2 Speak unto the children of Iſrael, ſaying, if a ſoul ſhall ſin through ignorance againſt any of the commandments of the LORD (concerning things which ought not to be done) and ſhall do againſt any of them:

3 If the prieſt that is anointed do ſin according to the ſin of the people: then let him bring for his ſin which he hath ſinned, a young bullock without blemiſh, unto the LORD for a ſin-offering.

4 And he ſhall bring the bullock unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, before the LORD; and he ſhall lay his hand upon the bullocks head, and kill the bullock before the LORD,

5 And the prieſt that is anointed, ſhall take of the bullocks blood, and bring it to the tabernacle of the congregation.

6 And the prieſt ſhall dip his finger in the blood, and ſprinkle of the blood ſeven times before the LORD, before the vail of the ſanctuary.

7 And the prieſt ſhall put ſome of the blood upon the horns of the altar of ſweet incenſe before the LORD, which is in the tabernacle of the congregation; and ſhall pour all the blood of the bullock at the bottom of the altar of the burnt-offering, which is at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

8 And he ſhall take off from it all the fat of the bullock for the ſin-offering; the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards.

9 And the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it ſhall he take away.

10 As it was taken off from the bullock of the ſacrifice of peace-offerings: and the prieſt ſhall burn them upon the altar of the burnt-offering.

11 And

11 And the skin of the bullock, and all his fleſh, with his head, and with his legs, and his inwards, and his dung,

12 Even the whole bullock ſhall he carry forth without the camp, unto a clean place, where the aſhes are poured out, and burn him on the wood with fire: where the aſhes are poured out, he ſhall be burnt.

13 ¶ And if the whole congregation of Iſrael ſin through ignorance, and the thing be hid from the eyes of the aſſembly, and they have done ſomewhat againſt any of the commandments of the LORD, concerning things which ſhould not be done, and are guilty:

14 When the ſin which they have ſinned againſt it, is known, then the congregation ſhall offer a young bullock for the ſin, and bring him before the tabernacle of the congregation.

15 And the elders of the congregation ſhall lay their hands upon the head of the bullock before the LORD: and the bullock ſhall be killed before the LORD.

16 And the prieſt that is anointed, ſhall bring of the bullocks blood to the tabernacle of the congregation.

17 And the prieſt ſhall dip his finger in ſome of the blood, and ſprinkle it ſeven times before the LORD even before the vail.

18 And he ſhall put ſome of the blood upon the horns of the altar, which is before the LORD, that is in the tabernacle of the congregation, and ſhall pour out all the blood at the bottom of the altar of the burnt-offering, which is at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation,

19 And he ſhall take all his fat from him, and burn it upon the altar.

20 And he ſhall do with the bullock as he did with the bullock for a ſin-offering, ſo ſhall he do with this: and the prieſt ſhall make an atonement for them, and it ſhall be forgiven them.

21 And he ſhall carry forth the bullock without the camp, and burn him as he burned the firſt bullock: it is a ſin-offering for the congregation.

22 ¶ When a ruler hath ſinned, and done ſomewhat through ignorance againſt any of the commandments of the LORD his God, concerning things which ſhould not be done, and is guilty;

23 Or if his ſin, wherein he hath ſinned, come to his knowledge: he ſhall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a male without blemiſh.

24 And he ſhall lay his hand upon the head of the goat, and kill it in the place where they kill the burnt offering before the LORD: it is a ſin-offering.

25 And the prieſt ſhall take of the blood of the ſin-offering with his finger, and put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offering, and ſhall pour out his blood at the bottom of the altar of burnt-offering.

26 And he ſhall burn all his fat upon the altar, as the fat of the ſacrifice of peace-offerings: and the prieſt ſhall make an atonement for him as concerning his ſin, and it ſhall be forgiven him.

27 ¶ And if any one of the common people ſin through ignorance, while he doth ſomewhat againſt any of the commandments of the LORD, concerning things which ought not to be done, and be guilty;

28 Or if his ſin, which he hath ſinned, come to his knowledge: then he ſhall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a female without blemiſh, for his ſin which he hath ſinned.

29 And he ſhall lay his hand upon the head of the ſin-offering, and ſlay the ſin-offering in the place of the burnt-offering.

30 And the prieſt ſhall take of the blood thereof with his finger, and put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offering, and ſhall pour out all the blood thereof at the bottom of the altar.

31 And he ſhall take away all the fat thereof as the fat is taken away from off the ſacrifice of peace-offerings; and the prieſt ſhall burn it upon the altar, for a ſweet ſavour unto the LORD: and the prieſt ſhall make an atonement for him, and it ſhall be forgiven him.

32 And if he bring a lamb for a ſin-offering, he ſhall bring it a female without blemiſh.

33 And he ſhall lay his hand upon the head of the ſin-offering, and ſlay it for a ſin-offering, in the place where they kill the burnt-offering.

34 And the prieſt ſhall take of the blood of the ſin-offering with his finger, and put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offering, and ſhall pour out all the blood thereof at the bottom of the altar.

35 And he ſhall take away all the fat thereof, as the fat of the lamb is taken away from the ſacrifice of the peace-offerings: and the prieſt ſhall burn them upon the altar, according to the offerings made by fire unto the LORD: and the prieſt ſhall make an atonement for the ſin he hath committed, and it ſhall be forgiven him:

Ver. 1. And the Lord ſpake unto Moſes, ſaying.] God having directed Moſes, with relation to whole burnt-offerings, and meat-offerings, which conſtantly attended ſome of them, and peace-offerings, which ſuppoſed men to be in a ſtate of favour with God, he now proceeds to give orders about the expiation of their ſins, when they had offended him, by acting contrary to his commands. This particular law ſeems to have been delivered to Moſes at a different time from the former, but by a voice ſpeaking to him out of the tabernacle, as before, chap. i. 1.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Iſrael, ſaying, If a ſoul ſhall ſin through ignorance againſt any of the commandments of the Lord (concerning things which ought not to be done) and ſhall do againſt any of them.] This muſt neceſſarily be underſtood of more than common ſins, and daily infirmities; for if every ſuch ſin had required an offering, it had not been poſſible, either for moſt ſinners to ſuſtain ſuch an expence, or for the altar to receive ſo many obligations, or for the prieſt to manage ſo infinite a work. Ordinary ſins were ceremonially expiated by the daily offering, and by that on the great day of atonement.

Ver. 3. If the prieſt that is anointed.] By the word prieſt is meant the high-prieſt, wha only was anointed after the firſt time; ſee Exod. xxix. 7. xxx. 30. xl. 15. Lev. x. 7. Numb. iii. 3. His anointing is mentioned, becauſe he was not a compleat high-prieſt, till he had undergone the unction.

——— Do ſin.] That is, either in doctrine or practice, which, it is here ſuppoſed, he may do; and this is noted as a blot and character of imperfection in the prieſthood of the law, whereby the Iſraelites were directed to expect another and better high-prieſt, even one who is holy, harmleſs, and ſeparate from ſinners, Heb. vii. 26.

—— According to the ſin of the people.] In the ſame manner as the people uſually ſin; which implies, that God expected more circumſpection and care from him, than from the people: But the words may be render'd, to the ſin or guilt of the people; which may be mentioned as a reaſon of the law, and an aggravation of his ſin, that by it he commonly brings ſin, and guilt, and puniſhment upon the people, who are affected or ſcandalized by his example.

——— Then let him bring a young bullock, &c.] Let him bring the ſame ſacrifice that was offered for all the people, to ſhew how much his ſin was aggravated by his quality.

Ver. 4. And he ſhall bring the bullock unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord, and ſhall lay his hand upon the bullock's head.] To teſtify both his acknowledgment of his ſin, and his faith in God's promiſe, for the expiation of his offence.

Ver. 5. And the prieſt that is anointed ſhall take of the bullock's blood, and bring it to the tabernacle of the congregation.] Into the tabernacle; which was not required or allowed in any other ſacrifice; poſſibly, to ſhew the greatneſs of the high-prieſt's ſin, which needed more than ordinary diligence in him, and favour from God to expiate it.

Ver. 6. And the prieſt ſhall dip his finger in blood, and ſprinkle of the blood ſeven times before the Lord.] Seven is a number much uſed in ſcripture, as a number of perfection; and here preſcribed, either to ſhew, that his ſins needed a more than ordinary purgation, and more frequent and manifeſt exerciſes of his faith and repentance; both which graces he was obliged to join with that ceremonial rite.

—— Before the vail of the ſanctuary.] Namely, before the ſecond vail, interpoſing between the Holy of Holies, which is generally called by the name here uſed, as Exod. xxvi. 31, &c. and a variety of other places.

Ver. 12. Even the whole bullock ſhall he carry forth.] No part therefore of this was to be eaten by the prieſts, as was uſual in the other ſin-offerings, Lev. vi. 26. The reaſon is plain, becauſe the ſin-offerer might not eat of his own ſin-offering, and the prieſt was the offerer in this caſe, as alſo in the ſin-offering for the whole congregation, of which he was a member. The prieſt himſelf was not to carry the bullock forth, for this action would have defiled him; but he was to perform it by another, whom he ſhould appoint for that work; as may be gathered from Lev. xvi. 17, 18.

——— Without the camp.] This particular conveyance of it might poſſibly be intended to ſignify either, 1. The abominable nature of ſin, eſpecially in high and holy perſons, or when it overſpreads a whole people; or, 2. The removing of the guilt and puniſhment of that ſin from the people, and their duty of keeping ſuch wickedneſs out of the camp for time to come; or, 3. That Chriſt ſhould ſuffer without the camp or gate; as he did; ſee Heb. xiii. 11, 12.

—— Where the aſhes are poured out, &c.] The aſhes were firſt thrown down near the altar, Lev. i. 16. but afterwards they, together with the other impurities of the ſacrifices, were carried out to a certain place without the camp; ſee Lev. 6. 10, 11.
